She has never owned a jewel or an evening gown. Her favorite book is Charles M. Sheldon's In His Steps, and her hymn, Jesus, Lover of My Soul. She'd "gone before the Board," as they called it in those days, in 1889, to earn a life teaching certificate by passing twenty-eight subjects. Then she had sailed in a steamer down Red River to teach her first school at Grappe's Bluff, Louisiana. Her schoolteaching dollars helped her father, Matthew Wills Martin, to pay off his debt on one thousand acres of East Texas land. "I owed it to him," she always explained briefly, "for my bringing up."

Paul, going on two, cried "Look" as the train entered the desert. Our world was suddenly the fringed soil of the Trans-Pecos, sandy, level, with plains of gama and buffalo grass crossed by several spires of the Rockies—Guadalupe Peak rising to nearly 9000 feet.

Then the train stopped. We were in Fabens, on the Rio Grande, with the Great American Desert as close as the next side street.

I approached a group of Mexicans. "Could you tell me ——"

"No spik Engles."

There were no taxis, no automobiles in sight. A row of salt cedars lined the irrigation ditches. The town was a cluster of adobe structures.

The station agent drove us to our furnished one-room-plus-kitchenette-and-bath adobe which we had rented by mail from Dennis Currie for $18 a month. The building was one of many converted Army barracks built around a common courtyard.

Mr. Myers drove away and I peered through a window. "Why—it's empty. There isn't a stick of furniture."

Nonie laughed and suddenly it was funny. "I'll sit on the floor and hold Ben," she said. "You see if you can find Mr. Currie."

Mr. Currie was smilingly apologetic. His wife had thought we would arrive tomorrow. Yes, he could bring a cot for Paul. He didn't know whether he could get a rocker for mother or not.

"And a hammer!" mother exclaimed, wheat plaits loosened, face tinged with red. "I have to have a rocking chair and a hammer!"

I cooked breakfast on Mrs. Currie's stove. And the next day we had neighbors, furniture—including a rocking chair and a hammer—a ranch dove fry for the teachers, and on Monday following the opening of school.

All that fall when I came home from school in the afternoon, I'd talk of my students, play with Paul and watch Ben for a small sign of improvement, for one look of intelligence in his eyes. I'd ask mother, "Did you try to sit him in anything today?"

"Yes, I tried a seat made out of an orange crate. The pasteboard box I cut for him yesterday gave way."

Beautiful boxes! How many shapes and sizes we used, leaving the sides for arms, cutting holes in the end for Ben's feet to come through. The boxes served where all types of chairs failed because the very narrowness of the box aided in holding his shoulders and spine.

Ben did not improve. There was no co-ordination of muscular movement. True, his body was growing, and looked perfect. Nonie and I massaged it every day in warm water.

With a little money saved, we began our search for help with Doctor C, children's specialist in El Paso.

Perhaps it's well that Ben cannot remember the many doctors' words in many cities. And parents should realize that doctors, out of great or small knowledge, may be mistaken.

"He has congenital myatonia, a rare muscular affliction," Doctor C told us. "There are only a few cases in medical history. Every muscle in his body, with the exception of the sphincters, is paralyzed. He'll probably die before the age of three or four. He'll never sit up or walk."

A German specialist, Doctor G, at the Children's Hospital in Denver called in three other specialists. Nonie and I sat quietly and watched the examination with rubber hammers, pinpricks and tape measures. When they had finished, Doctor G spoke:

"Your son undoubtedly had a cerebral hemorrhage at the time of his birth. There is no operation—there is nothing we can do. But if you will gauge his growth in terms of years instead of months, you will live to see him walk."

His voice was kind, measured as he continued, "He is normal mentally. Take these exercises. Follow them patiently and regularly."

Oh, to believe those four words! To believe them in the morning when we spooned the oatmeal, at noon as we fed the applesauce, and in the evening, watching Paul pull toy trains about the living room.

The superintendent in Fabens had outlined special courses for me to take at the University of Colorado, graduate courses in English and speech; speech to help me help Ben if words ever came, drama courses to help me coach the one-act plays in Fabens. Between classes I studied and helped Nonie give the exercises recommended by the doctor:

Leg Exercise 1: Grasp the feet of the child so that the finger lies on the sole of the foot with the foot turned in, and alternately bend and straighten the legs. Begin slowly and increase in rapidity until a running movement is reached. Also exercise the legs with circular movements, but do not pull on the hip joints.

The same exercises were directed for the CONTINUED ON PAGE 208

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE
CONDENSED
NON-FICTION BOOK

GEORGE R. GOLIA

A lake near Wilton, Maine

Before the crowd gathered–

America the Beautiful

ROY ATKESON

Mt. Hood and Lost Lake, Oregon

ROBERT MOREHOUSE

Sawmill River Parkway near Tuckahoe, N.Y.

DEBIT · CREDIT You — and all other Americans — have just paid a bill. A big bill — $50,000,000. That's what it cost us last year to clean up those "everybody does it" trash borders from America's primary highways alone.

Last year's budget for operating the United Nations — for forging a world weapon for world peace — was $48,250,700.

Proud of the vastness and natural beauty of our country, Americans spend millions of dollars to maintain parks, national forests, gardened roadsides as highly cherished possessions of us all. If some malicious enemy wanted to hurt us deeply he could deal us no greater blow—short of utter destruction—than to blight the beauty and freshness of our woodlands, pollute our streams, ruin our parks, and leave us an unhappy people, haunted by the memory of the beauty which is lost.

If we had such an enemy, he need not lift a finger, for we are doing the same thing ourselves. Our forests are going up in flames started in trash we leave when we picnic, or by cigarettes we throw from cars. Our wild flowers are disappearing under a smothering mulch of beer cans, soft-drink bottles and cleansing tissues which we deposit upon them. Our streams are choked with our discarded refuse. Our roadsides and often our parks are littered with tons upon tons upon tons of garbage: tin cans, pasteboard cartons, newspapers, old shoes, junked cars—almost anything we have ever used we blithely throw away to become one more mark against our national conscience and one more blot on the landscape!

When America was growing up in a headlong rush, the land was beautiful and full of promise. And if it looked a little less beautiful where we had passed—well, what was one abandoned campfire, one broken discarded wheel, one cast horseshoe? There was so much country you could hardly see those small scattered things. Eventually the wind and the sun and the rain would take care of them. And besides, it was a free country, wasn't it? And freedom means the right to do as you choose—what else could it mean?

"I like to see a man proud of the place in which he lives;
I like to see a man live in it so his place will be proud of him."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

After the Ball

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 (AP)—Glitter and litter, you might say, marked yesterday's inaugural parade. The Sanitation Department announced today that ninety tons of rubbish was collected along the parade route after the pageant had ended and the spectators had left.

er the crowd went away

A once-beautiful roadside in New England

s fast becoming a Public Dump Heap

Where the wagon trains led, railroads followed. Then highways and cars—and more cars. The big beautiful country seemed to get smaller. The wide-open spaces we used to sing about seemed to shrink as the towns grew closer together, strung out along the highways like knots on a ribbon. And the country wasn't all beautiful any longer. The roads wore ragged borders of old papers, rusty cans, broken glass. The town dump was often the first thing you saw as the road entered a settlement. Sometimes the last thing you saw as you left the same town was its rusting auto graveyard.

And you began to wonder. Now and then as somebody rolled down the window to toss out another piece of trash, you might say uneasily, "Maybe you'd better not do that. We don't flutter our houses that way." Somebody would shrug and say, "It's a free country, isn't it?"

Of course it is. And throwing litter is such a small thing. Everybody does it. Of course it's a free country. And it's our country, and what we do with it is our own responsibility. The old question about freedom has a deeper meaning than we first thought. Freedom isn't just "the right to do as you choose." In small matters as in large, the answer comes out the same.

FREEDOM IS RESPONSIBILITY

None of us is a vandal at heart. Not one of us means deliberately to befoul the land we live in, and most will be shocked at the accusation. Yet there are millions of us, and if each of us does only a little, then the resulting total damage is tremendous If you have ever discarded carelessly so much as a chewing-gum wrapper or a cigarette butt, if you've ever tossed away an advertising leaflet, or emptied a car ash tray along the roadside, then you, too, have contributed to the overpowering mess of garbage that is engulfing the country. We are all guilty. And no matter how we deplore the "litterbug" or how many millions we spend trying to erase his loathsome trail, we will make little headway at controlling the problem until we realize that this is a matter of individual, personal responsibility; until each one of us makes up his or her mind never again to discard anything at all—not even a used match—except in proper receptacles.

It's as simple as that.

WIDE WORLD

Litter started this brush fire along a western highway

DON OLLIS

Careless picnickers leave a California beach park

GILBERT PRENTISS

"People used to say, 'Feature by feature, Joanne is a pretty girl'—but as a fatty, the features were sometimes hard to find. I was 'only' 200 pounds when this was taken. The other 23 pounds were on their way."

"The only place I had the nerve to wear shorts was in our own back yard. I've taken 7" off my waist since this was taken."

"In this picture there are 70 pounds less of me. I weigh 153 pounds. My doctor considers 145 ideal for my height of 5'10". I'm so glad I lost my weight before entering college last fall. Imagine a 200-pound-plus girl in a strapless lace formal!"

"I'm on the right—all 223 pounds of me. Joann, a high-school classmate, looks small enough—and young enough—to be my daughter!"

FRANCESCO SCAVULLO

JOANNE'S BEFORE-AND-AFTER MEASUREMENTS

BEFORE		AFTER
5'10"	HEIGHT	5'10"
223 pounds	WEIGHT	153 pounds
43"	BUST	38"
34"	WAIST	27"
44"	HIPS	39"
40	DRESS SIZE	16

MONDAY

BREAKFAST
Sliced orange
Oatmeal (¾ cup, ½ cup nonfat milk)	1
Coffee, black
CALORIES	2
LUNCH
Broiled chopped-steak patty	1
Broccoli (½ cup), lemon juice
Tomato stuffed with cottage cheese and chives
Rye wafers (2)
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)
CALORIES	4
DINNER
Beef bouillon
My own "chef's salad" (mixed vegetables with one slice luncheon meat cut into thin strips), lemon juice	2
Protein toast, lightly buttered	1
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)
CALORIES	4
Total calories for day	10

Joanne is in the kitchen Counting out her Calories

Nineteen-year-old amateur pastry chef Joanne Magorien, of Mission Hill, South Dakota, weighed 223 pounds before she realized she was beginning to look like one of her own cream puffs. Here, in an interview, Joanne gives her recipe for reducing 70 pounds in six months.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor of the Journal

JOANNE (sitting facing the window with sunlight streaming in on her peaches-and-cream complexion and putting high lights in her wheat-colored hair): Baking is my hobby! (Blue eyes brighten at the thought of all the goodies she has popped into the oven and into the mouths of appreciative brothers, sisters and friends.) I could have fun baking twenty-five pies in one morning. In fact, I did recently for a church luncheon.

MRS. MAGORIEN (beaming with pride for her pretty, talented daughter): Our farmhouse smells as good as a pastry shop. Joanne's cherry-pie recipe won second prize in the 4-H Club state contest last year.

JOANNE: It's my gingerbread men I love. I put sugar buttons on their coats and frost their faces and then ——

DAWN NORMAN (starving, just before lunchtime): Stop! I can't stand it! Besides, we're here to talk about your diet.

DOTTIE ROBINSON: It's easy to see how you ate your way up to 223 pounds, Joanne, but how did it feel to be up there?

JOANNE (face clouding at the memory): Miserable! I felt just as hopeless as I looked. At our high-school Christmas concert the other girls arrived in clouds of fluffy tulle and organdy. I waddled to the affair in a somber crepe dinner dress with a prim v neck in a size 40. It looked old enough for mother.

MRS. MAGORIEN: It was too matronly for me—something my mother might have worn. And I had to shop all day, going all the way to Sioux City to find it. Shops nearer us simply didn't carry dresses large enough to fit Joanne. That's why I had to make most of her clothes. I felt so sorry for her that evening I could have cried. She was only fourteen, but she looked old enough to be one of the chaperons.

JOANNE: Mother and daddy pleaded with me to diet. They even took my allowance away so I wouldn't be able to buy fatty foods. But it didn't stop me from eating. I'd just go out in the kitchen and whip up my own favorites.

DOTTIE: What were they?

JOANNE: For breakfast I used to eat pancakes smothered in butter and maple sirup—as many as I could hold—a fried egg, three strips of bacon, two glasses of milk, chocolate layer cake (left over). Before lunch, I'd put away three or four doughnuts or candy CONTINUED ON PAGE 228

MONDAY

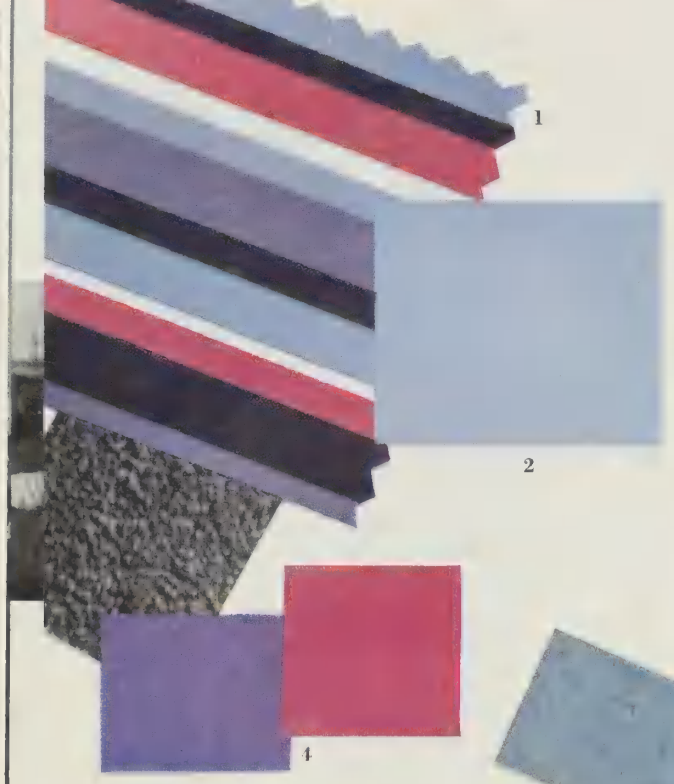
BREAKFAST
Orange juice (4 oz.)
Poached egg on whole-wheat toast (1 slice, lightly buttered)	1
Crisp bacon (2 slices)
Coffee, black
CALORIES	3
LUNCH
Tuna casserole	3
Tomato-and-lettuce salad
Fresh pear
Vanilla wafers (2)
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)
CALORIES	5
DINNER
Chopped-steak patties (2)	3
Peas with mushrooms (½ cup)
Tossed salad (carrot, tomato, onion, lettuce), lemon juice
Fresh fruit gelatin	1
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)
CALORIES	5
Total calories for day	13

She reduced!

Reducing diet week

Approximately 1000 calories a day

TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY	SATURDAY	SUNDAY
Grapefruit juice (4 oz.) 50 Poached egg on whole-wheat toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 170 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 220	Fresh peach 50 Ready-to-eat cereal (¾ cup, ½ cup nonfat milk, 1 tsp. sugar) 145 Nonfat milk (4 oz.) 45 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 240	Orange juice (4 oz.) 65 Crisp bacon (2 slices) 65 Whole-wheat toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 230	Grape juice (4 oz.) 90 Boiled egg 70 Whole-grain toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 260	Grapefruit juice (4 oz.) 50 Hot whole-grain cereal (¾ cup, ¼ cup nonfat milk, no sugar) 135 Crisp bacon (2 slices) 65 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 250	(I splurged on Sundays!) Orange juice (4 oz.) 65 Pancakes (2) with sirup (3 tbsp.) 250 Sausage 60 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 375
Broiled steak (4 oz.) 250 Julienne string beans (½ cup) 30 Cherry gelatin 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 465	Half grapefruit (small) 75 Broiled pork chop (fat trimmed) 200 Spinach, lemon juice 20 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 380	Baked meat loaf (1 large slice) 150 Peas with sliced mushrooms 65 Shredded-carrot-and-cabbage salad 30 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 330	Broiled whitefish 100 Asparagus (6 stalks) 15 Broiled tomato 30 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 230	Broiled chopped-steak patty 150 Broiled tomato 30 Steamed carrots 30 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 295	Broiled chicken (½ broiler) 100 Broccoli, lemon juice 20 Half baked potato (1 small pat butter) 75 Sliced-tomato salad 30 Apple pie (small slice) 150 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 460
Baked beans (½ cup) and frankfurter (1) casserole 215 Mixed green salad, lemon juice 30 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 330 Total calories for day 1015	Scrambled eggs (2 eggs, 1 tsp. butter) 165 Stewed tomatoes (½ cup) 25 Tossed green salad, lemon juice 30 Whole-grain toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 405 Total calories for day 1025	Hamburg-tomato-and-macaroni casserole (seasoned with onion and spices), small serving 275 Fresh fruit salad (¼ grapefruit, ½ orange, ¼ banana) 130 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 490 Total calories for day 1050	Tuna casserole 300 Carrot-string-bean-and-cabbage salad 30 Fruit-flavored gelatin 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 515 Total calories for day 1005	Chicken salad (chicken mixed with 1 tbsp. of mayonnaise, chopped celery and pickle) 270 Asparagus (6 stalks) 15 Fruit-flavored gelatin 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 470 Total calories for day 1015	Beef bouillon 20 Cold broiled chicken (¼ broiler) 50 Tossed green salad, lemon juice 30 Deviled egg 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 285 Total calories for day 1120



She stays reduced!

Maintenance diet week

Approximately 1400 calories a day

TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY	SATURDAY	SUNDAY
Half grapefruit 100 Ready-to-eat cereal (¾ cup, ½ cup nonfat milk, 1 tsp. sugar) 145 Boiled egg 70 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 315	Sliced orange 80 Boiled egg 70 Whole-grain toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Sausage 60 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 395	Grapefruit juice (4 oz.) 50 Scrambled eggs (2) with 1 tsp. butter 165 Whole-wheat toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 315	Orange juice (4 oz.) 65 Oatmeal (¾ cup, ¼ cup nonfat milk) 120 Boiled egg 70 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 255	Grapefruit sections (½ cup) 50 Scrambled egg (1 tsp. butter) 95 Crisp bacon (2 slices) 65 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 210	Grapefruit juice (4 oz.) 50 Pancakes (2) with sirup (3 tbsp.) 250 Sausage 60 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 360
Roast pork (1 medium slice) 100 Spinach (½ cup) lemon juice 20 Applesauce (½ cup) 135 Large mixed green salad, 1 tbsp. Roquefort dressing 85 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 425	Baked beans (½ cup) and frankfurter (2) casserole 315 Sliced-tomato salad, 1 tbsp. French dressing 100 Toasted roll (1 small pat butter) 125 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 625	Roast beef (2 medium slices) 200 Broccoli (½ cup) 20 Kidney-bean salad with ½ chopped egg, chopped celery and onion 150 Rye wafers (2) 60 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 515	Broiled whitefish (1 medium slice) 100 Steamed corn (½ cup) 100 Vegetable salad (large) with 1 tbsp. French dressing 170 Whole-wheat toast (1 slice, lightly buttered) 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 555	Vegetable soup (bowl) 170 Roast-beef-and-lettuce sandwich (1 large piece of roast beef) 300 Fresh peach 50 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 605	Broiled chicken (½ broiler) 100 Julienne string beans (½ cup) 30 Mashed potatoes (½ cup) 100 Mixed green salad, 1 tbsp. Roquefort dressing 85 Apple pie (If I've stuck to my diet all week) 230 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 630
Broiled steak 250 French string beans (½ cup) 30 Baked potato (medium with 1 pat butter) 150 Angel-food cake (small slice) 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 615 Total calories for day 1355	Baked ham (2 medium slices) 200 Asparagus (6 stalks) 15 Tossed salad (cucumber, radish, onion, tomato, lettuce), lemon juice 30 Orange sherbet (½ cup) 100 Coffee, black 0 CALORIES 345 Total calories for day 1365	Vegetable soup (¾ cup) 85 Peach (2 halves) and cottage-cheese salad (4 tbsp.) with 1 tbsp. French dressing 205 Toasted roll, 1 small pat butter 125 Vanilla wafers (2) 40 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 540 Total calories for day 1370	Tomato consommé (¾ cup 80 Tuna-salad sandwich 275 Fresh fruit gelatin 110 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 550 Total calories for day 1360	Broiled steak (small) 200 Steamed carrots (½ cup) 30 Tossed salad (tomato, cucumber, radishes, lettuce), 1 tbsp. French dressing 100 Boiled vanilla custard (½ cup) 130 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 545 Total calories for day 1360	Tomato consommé 80 Fresh fruit salad (½ orange, ½ banana, 1 pear, ¼ slice pineapple) 170 Angel-food cake (small piece) 100 Nonfat milk (8 oz.) 85 CALORIES 435 Total calories for day 1425

Foolproof Color Schemes

Left: Alternate Scheme. For lighter woods, a more modern air, the swatches at left are suggested. Inexpensive and handsome, these could be combined in many different ways. For blue walls they will look best in the following proportions:

1 Draperies:
A random-striped cotton, beautifully inspiring for our whole color scheme.

2 Walls:
Clear, light blue—a color that is gay, restful and young in feeling.

3 Carpet:
Tufted rayon in an unusual, very smart shade of charcoal gray.

4 Accents:
Small amounts of violet cotton and cerise corduroy.

5 Sofa:
Antique cotton satin in a blue that blends with walls and draperies.

Traditional room in red, white and blue has a comfortable country atmosphere. A few pieces of formal furniture enhance its charm, informal fabrics lend a timeless quality.

For our traditional setting, we have picked the well-loved combination of red, white and blue. A simple, cheerful scheme, it is in itself practically sure-fire and eminently variable. We have used it here with lots of white, but depending on the use of the room (a den, for instance, could take less white, more red), you can combine these three colors in many proportions. Our blue paint is ready-mixed, rubber-based, available throughout the country in most paint stores. This is washable, easy to apply and, being a darkish color, would probably cover most surfaces with one coat. The blue-and-white toile printed cotton covers chair and sofa. It is such a fresh, pleasing pattern, you could use it for draperies too. The draperies shown are white cotton hung by rings on a wooden rod. This is a simple, rather casual window treatment. For a more formal feeling, you might try swags of the blue-and-white print combined with plain white or blue draperies. The rosy red in our color scheme appears as an accent in the hearth rug (inexpensive cotton) and in a delightful peppermint-stripe chintz. If your preference and budget permit a large carpet, red would still be an excellent choice; blue would also be effective.

At the top of the page we have suggested other fabrics in this same color plan, for a more contemporary room. A bold and beautiful stripe is the dominant note, and we imagine it used boldly—for draperies, repeated in an ottoman, throw pillows. A sofa and large club chair might be covered in a blue harmonizing with wall color. Accents of violet and cerise are used sparingly. A charcoal carpet (swatch is shown above) would look supremely elegant; or a small white hearth rug could point up a grouping around the fireplace. White ceiling, chimney, woodwork will make these clear singing colors even lovelier.

BLUE is the background for our "sure-fire" rooms this month, a color easy to live with, lovely in traditional or contemporary plans.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

The modern living room in our photograph has a clean, uncluttered look about it. Set against blue walls again, the brilliance of this color scheme, blue, white and yellow, glows warmly. Day or night this room is never cold or unfriendly. Its simplicity is not deceptive, for it is as practical and versatile as it appears. A black-spattered white vinyl floor takes happily to hard wear, is reluctant to show scuff marks and soil. This is an ideal light floor in every way—easy to keep looking elegant, it could fit in with practically any color scheme. We have added to the carefree nature of our cotton fabrics by choosing preshrunk materials and treating them for soil resistance. In the long run this pays off in fewer cleanings or launderings, longer wear and maintaining the original fresh appearance of your room—especially if you pick light colors for slip covers.

For window treatment here, plain white draperies would tie in best or, if you are fortunate enough to have a very light, sunny living room, use a blue the color of the walls. Shutters, too, are always effective. They have an intrinsic design, are wonderfully suited to light control.

An alternate scheme appropriate for a less modern house is shown in swatches. Blue chintz flowered in yellow, white and pale turquoise has all the ingredients needed to make a pretty pastel setting for dark woods, traditional furniture. Against blue walls, a sofa and armchairs in this print look gay, yet blend in with the background. Choose accents of yellow and turquoise, draperies of solid white, blue carpet. If you like yellow, by all means use more of it—for instance, on pull-up chairs or in accessories, lamps, pictures.

HAANEL CASSIDY

Bright yellow, striking striped cotton (we like this stripe so much we have shown it in two color combinations) used with large areas of blue and white make a warm and inviting modern living room. 5

Fabrics and colors for a traditional blue, white and yellow scheme appear at right. Numbers correspond to the uses explained as follows: Right: Alternate Scheme.

1 Sofa and Armchairs:
Chintz freely spattered with spring flowers is cotton, washable.

2 Pull-up Chairs:
Bright yellow cotton, slightly textured, sturdy.

3 Walls:
Soft, slightly gray blue is same as chintz background color, creates a relaxed atmosphere.

4 Draperies:
White cotton faille makes up beautifully, lined or unlined.

5 Rug:
Looped cotton in high-and-low textured effect in a powdery shade of blue.

6 Accents:
Bright, light turquoise, plus same yellow as No. 2.

Taste of Spring

In a superb spring dinner of succulent lamb,
tiny potatoes,
and a green sheaf of asparagus, queen of May's garden vegetables.

May is the month when all life's promises prove worth the waiting for. The branch breaks into foaming blossom. Swallows return from the South. For such a lovely month, here is a lovely dinner: tender young lamb, asparagus just gathered from its dewy bed, and potatoes so new that their very jackets are a delicacy. We have prefaced these with artichoke hearts, anchovies and red cherry peppers. Peach Devonshire pie is the dessert.

The delectable artichoke heart is now easily accessible in that frost-rimed treasure chest known to your grocer as the freezer. Marinated in a pungent sauce, festooned with bright cherry peppers, anchovies and slices of hard-cooked egg, artichoke hearts maintain on the modern table their Roman reputation as the most valuable of vegetables.

ARTICHOKE ANTIPASTO

Make your favorite French dressing. Or, if you don't feel like playing favorites, here are proportions: Use ½ cup salad oil, ⅓ cup wine vinegar, ¼ cup water, 1 package French salad-dressing mix and 1 clove garlic, crushed. Then add to the dressing 2 tablespoons juice from a jar of whole hot red or green cherry peppers. (The peppers themselves will make their entrance presently.) Shake well, and pour over 2 packages cooked frozen artichoke hearts cut in half—they're of generous proportions. Cool. Marinate in the refrigerator for two to three hours. Serve in a lettuce cup with slices of hard-cooked egg, a cherry pepper and a border scroll of anchovies. Sprinkle a little of the marinade over each portion, and add a final flourish of chopped chives. Buttered sesame waferettes, hot from the heart of the oven, are the boon companions of this first-prize first course.

Rosemary—that's for remembrance. And lamb cooked with rosemary is indeed a roast to remember, especially if it's spring lamb, and garlicked to boot. We disagree with the adage that there's no such thing as a little garlic. Indeed there is, and it blends superbly with our chosen herb to enhance the melting tenderness of this most justly prized meat.

SAVORY ROAST LAMB

Wipe the leg of lamb with a damp cloth, and with a trusty blade cut small CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

Menu

Artichoke Antipasto
Toasted Sesame-Seed Waferettes
Savory Roast Lamb
Caper Sauce
New Potatoes Asparagus
Peach Devonshire Pie
Coffee
(PLANNED FOR SIX)

Pert glass sparrows chatter about a pedestal bouquet flanked by flowering china.

STUART-FOWLER

Soufflé COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

Small border flowers—the ingénues of the garden—can be theater, too, if simply arranged in a container.

STUART

Cheese soufflé at the peak of its puffy splendor.

There's been a lot of foolish talk about soufflés. Perhaps you've hesitated to try making this simple delicacy because you've heard soufflés are capricious. It takes less skill to make a perfect soufflé than to make a perfect cherry pie. Knowing cooks prevent soufflé deflation by: (1) baking the soufflé slowly and thoroughly; and (2) urging family and friends to devour it hot from the oven. More good news: A soufflé is agreeably inexpensive and it is an excellent way to use leftovers.

Let's start with a cheese soufflé, the fairest and fluffiest of all.

CHEESE SOUFFLÉ. You will need a soufflé dish, but not necessarily the imported porcelain kind. An eight-inch ovenproof-glass mixing bowl will serve admirably. Though a soufflé climbs high if the dish has straight sides. And you will need a vessel big enough to hold the soufflé bowl and some hot water as well.

Separate 3 eggs. Melt 2 tablespoons butter in a heavy saucepan over low heat. When the butter is golden and bubbling, stir in 3 tablespoons flour. Add 1 cup cold milk and 1 teaspoon salt. Stir constantly until the mixture is thick. Remove the sauce from the heat while you add the unbeaten egg yolks, one at a time, stirring them briskly into the sauce. Mix in 1 cup grated sharp-flavored Cheddar cheese and 1 teaspoon grated onion. Stir until the cheese melts, returning the sauce to the heat for a few minutes if necessary.

Now beat the egg whites until they stand in beautiful glossy peaks.

What about buttering the soufflé dish? Don't! Let your soufflé cling to the sides of the dish for support as it rises.

Spoon a few blobs of the golden sauce over the snowy egg foam; then continue pouring and folding until the sauce and egg whites are barely blended. Cradle the soufflé dish in a pan of hot water and set it in a moderate oven—350° F. No peeking. And no hurrying. After the soufflé has baked a full 50 minutes, open the oven door and behold your work of art, a fragrant miracle of savory goodness.

Soufflé tastes best served hot at the peak of its puffy splendor, so it's prudent to call your family to the table before you open the oven door. Crisp bacon, buttered asparagus, hot sesame rolls and a tomato salad with tart French dressing are good company for a cheese soufflé. The recipe above makes 3 large or 4 moderate servings. If you are counting calories, you will be happy to know a moderate serving of cheese soufflé contains about 280 calories—fewer than a small 3-ounce beef patty.

Soufflés are so delicious your family will ask for encores, so next time try a variation. Tomato soufflé is a new favorite. You might serve it for lunch with hot garlic bread and a hearty green salad containing slivers of chicken, ham and cheese. Perhaps complete the meal with warm apple pie and coffee.

TOMATO SOUFFLÉ. Cook 2 tablespoons chopped onion in 2 tablespoons butter. Blend in 3 tablespoons flour. Add ½ cup consommé or chicken broth (or 1 teaspoon chicken-stock base and ½ cup water). Cook until thick, stirring constantly. Remove from the heat. When the sauce has cooled slightly, drop in 2 egg yolks and stir them in quickly. Add ½ cup tomato paste. (No substitutes here. You need tomato paste to give your soufflé a rich tomato flavor!) Season the tomato paste with a generous pinch of orégano, ¾ teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon fresh lemon juice.

Measure the unbeaten egg whites for this soufflé. Make sure you have at least ½ cup. (You will need the whites of 3 large or 4 medium eggs.) Beat the whites stiff and fold in the tomato mixture. Spoon the tomato fluff gently into individual 5″ glass baking dishes; set the dishes in a pan of hot water. Bake the soufflés 40 minutes in a moderate oven—350° F. This recipe makes 3 medium-sized soufflés.

Do your children like spinach? They'll love it when it comes to the table as a heavenly green-flecked soufflé.

SPINACH SOUFFLÉ. Make a cream sauce (as you did for the cheese soufflé) of 2 tablespoons butter, 3 tablespoons flour and 1 cup milk. When the sauce is thick, cool it slightly and mix in the egg yolks, 3 of them this time. Add 1 cup finely chopped well-drained cooked spinach (fresh or frozen), ¼ cup minced onion and 1 teaspoon salt, a little pepper, a pinch of rosemary and a more generous pinch of nutmeg. Fold the spinach mixture carefully into the stiffly beaten whites of 3 large eggs. Pour into a 10″ soufflé bowl. Bake the soufflé in a moderate oven—350° F.—for 50 minutes, nestled in a pan of hot water. Makes 6 servings.

Spinach soufflé is delicious served with crisp fried chicken, baked stuffed tomatoes.

HAM SOUFFLÉ. Make a cream sauce of 2 tablespoons butter, 3 tablespoons flour and 1 cup milk. When the sauce is thick, cool it slightly and stir in 3 egg yolks, 1 at a time. Add ½ cup ground, cooked ham. Season with 1¼ teaspoons dry mustard, 1 teaspoon minced onion, 1 tablespoon chopped parsley and ¼ teaspoon salt. Mix well. Fold the ham mixture carefully into the stiffly beaten whites of 3 eggs. Pour into a 10″ soufflé bowl. Set in a pan of hot water. Bake the soufflé in a moderate oven—350° F.—for 50 minutes.

Of all the sweet soufflés, chocolate is the richest and the most delectable. Serve it with sweetened whipped cream and a dusting of cinnamon.

CHOCOLATE SOUFFLÉ. Early in the day prepare the chocolate-sauce mixture. Melt 1½ tablespoons butter in a heavy saucepan; stir in 2 tablespoons flour. Add ½ cup milk, ¾ cup sugar, a dash of salt and 2 squares unsweetened chocolate cut into small pieces. Stir the mixture over low heat until it thickens and the chocolate is thoroughly blended. Cool slightly and beat in 3 egg yolks. Then cover the sauce and refrigerate it. An hour before you intend to serve the soufflé, remove the sauce from the refrigerator and stir in 1 tablespoon cold water and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Measure out ½ cup unbeaten egg whites (whites of 3 large eggs) and beat them stiff. Fold the chocolate mixture into the egg whites. Pour the soufflé into individual glass custard cups, filling them ⅔ full. Set the cups in a pan of hot water and bake 40 minutes in a moderate oven—350° F. This recipe makes 6 or 8 individual soufflés.

The clean tang of apricots blends with brown sugar to give this soufflé its luscious flavor. Try it for a perfect ending to a family supper. Keep the rest of the meal simple.

APRICOT SOUFFLÉ. Simmer ¼ pound dried apricots in sufficient water to cover until they are soft (about 15 minutes). Drain the apricots thoroughly, and force them through a sieve. Or reduce them to a purée in an electric blender. You should have about ½ cup thick apricot purée. In a heavy saucepan, melt 2 tablespoons butter. Add 2 tablespoons flour, ½ cup milk and a dash of salt. Cook until thick; stir in 6 tablespoons light brown sugar and cool slightly. Add 2 egg yolks, beating them in quickly. Then add ½ cup apricot purée and 1 teaspoon grated lemon or orange rind.

Measure the egg whites to make sure you have at least ½ cup. Beat them stiff; fold in the apricot mixture. Bake the soufflés in individual custard cups set in a pan of hot water for 40 minutes in a moderate oven—350° F. Makes 6 individual soufflés.

Soufflé variations are as unlimited as your imagination. Use only well-drained fruits or vegetables which have been finely chopped or puréed, and do not add too many. If you use no more than 1½ cups sauce, vegetable or fruit mixture to ½ cup unbeaten egg whites, you should have soufflés to make you proud.

Make new soups from favorite soups!

If your favorite's Tomato Soup . . .

- Start with a can of Tomato Soup—mix it with Cream of Mushroom Soup and 1½ soup cans of milk or water for a new favorite soup!
- Or mix it with Clam Chowder and 1½ soup cans of milk or water for a new favorite chowder!

Make a new soup with Chicken Noodle Soup . . .

- Mix it with Cream of Celery Soup and 1½ soup cans milk or water for a something-special cream soup!
- Or mix it with Cream of Chicken for an extra-chickeny noodle favorite!

Try a variation on Vegetable Soup . . .

- Blend it with Green Pea Soup, 1½ soup cans water and a dash of curry for Vegetable Soup. That's souper-dooper!
- Or mix it with Scotch Broth and 1½ soup cans water for a new favorite big-appetite soup!

(Hot idea: bring your soup right to the table in pretty new cook-and-serve ware.)

SOUPS SUPPLY BASIC NUTRITIONAL NEEDS: Vitamins, Minerals and Liquids—for general well-being • Proteins—for upkeep and growth • Carbohydrates—for energy

Once a day . . . every day . . . SOU

How to win "the battle of the bulge"...

WHEN EXTRA INCHES begin showing up around your waistline, it is time to start "the battle of the bulge." For extra inches and pounds are health hazards . . . and they are signals to start reducing now. Remember, in 98 percent of the cases, overweight is due to overeating.

This does not mean that you have to go on a "starvation diet" . . . or give up all the foods you enjoy most. It does mean a change in your eating habits to avoid taking in more calories than your body needs. Those extra calories make the bulging waistline.

Before you start dieting, it is wise to consult your doctor. Try to do exactly what he tells you, especially about eating the protective foods that supply proteins, vitamins and minerals.

Many combinations of foods provide these nutrients. Here is a list to follow while dieting and daily thereafter:

Milk . . . at least a pint daily—preferably skimmed or buttermilk—including that used in cooking, or in milk products like cheese.

Meat, fish, poultry, eggs or cheese . . . two to three servings daily. Have meats roasted, broiled or boiled. Use lean meats or cut off the fat.

Potatoes . . . one medium baked or boiled daily.

Cereal and bread . . . one slice of whole-grain or enriched bread at each meal.

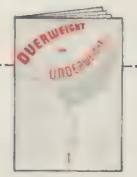
Vegetables . . . eat at least three vegetables every day including one leafy green or yellow. Eat all the vegetable salad you want, but use only dressings made of lemon juice or vinegar.

Fruits . . . two servings daily, including citrus or other sources of vitamin C, such as tomatoes. Skip the syrup that comes with canned fruits.

Butter or margarine . . . three small pats daily, including that used in cooking.

If you plan your reducing diet around these foods and avoid rich desserts, fried foods, gravies, sauces, cocktail snacks and second helpings, those extra inches and pounds will vanish.

Your new eating habits may keep your weight down permanently and increase your chances for better health and a long, active life.



Some Penalties of Overweight

Statistics based on numerous studies of insurance, medical and hospital records show that:

1. At ages 20 and over, people who are considerably overweight have a mortality rate about 50 percent higher than those of normal weight.

2. High blood pressure occurs more than twice as often in overweight people as in thinner people.

3. About 85 percent of all adult diabetics were overweight at the onset of their disease.

COPYRIGHT 1957—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

A MUTUAL COMPANY

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "Overweight and Underweight," 5-57-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

THE DURABLE FIRE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 89

"Jim, what alternative have I? If I don't, it can only make things worse in the long run."

"But there's only this one little thing. There's nothing else, except straight-out debts."

Lowry got up and walked over to the window, unable to look at Peale. "How much are you in the hole altogether?"

"I don't know—with this and debts—I just don't know; over a hundred thousand dollars. Nothing I couldn't pay back in a few years by strict economy. Evelyn's gone her own way."

"She knows about it?"

"No, there were other reasons. How did Daran happen to bring it up?"

"He asked me to find out from you what he was to tell the auditors when they arrived. He said he had written you several times."

"So you were suspicious?"

"He showed me the voucher and the draft. Maduro told him just as he was leaving about the transfer to you. I asked you for an explanation."

"Couldn't it have awaited your return?"

Lowry managed to control his impatience and weariness. "I don't want to hurt you," he said quietly, "but you must realize I was sure the whole thing would be cleared up in a brief cable to me."

"So now Daran knows."

"He doesn't know. He's a very remarkable little fellow about not prying."

"So everyone's behaving splendidly but me? What are you going to do next?"

"Jim, unless you have a reasonable alternative, I must tell Rutledge."

"I knew this would happen," Peale said almost in a tone of grievance, "when it was sprung on me at Larus that you were going to Venezuela. I telephoned two men I knew in New York that night and tried to raise the money. It would have meant nothing to them. One was away and the other insisted on details of why I needed it. I did everything I could. I went to Washington to see Granville. He refused."

"Why didn't you tell me then?" Lowry asked. "Instead of—but never mind. I don't want you to feel worse."

"No, but what would you have done if I had?" Peale asked quickly.

"I can't say definitely except that I would have done everything in my power to help you raise the money and put it back."

"Then, Stephen, what is the difference in doing it today? Fifty thousand dollars is no huge sum. Rutledge would have paid an outsider that and more for a tip-off on Larus any time. Why do you feel ——"

"Jim, surely it's clear that now it's gone too far. You must see that."

"When the men I appealed to before you left turned me down, I was surprised, I was hurt, yes, but I told Rosalie I couldn't believe you were coming back to do this to me. I can't quite believe it now," Peale said.

Lowry could see that his surprise and the tears in his eyes were real. "I hope you have some idea how I feel," he said.

"But what's to become of me, what am I to do? You'll send me to prison. I better end it out a window at the Yale Club."

In spite of his provoking pretense that he was somehow the injured one, and under the theatrical threat of suicide, Lowry realized how truly frightened and lonely he must feel. He told him he was confident prosecution or prison would be avoided by his going at once to Rutledge. Peale's answer was an incoherent outburst about the hundreds of thousands of dollars he had made for C. I. C. and the respect Rutledge had for him. Finally Lowry asked if he preferred to go to Rutledge alone.

Peale, head in his hands, said, "Oh, no. Please go, please do your best for me."

"Of course I will, and Rutledge is no avenger. But this will shatter him as it has me. We'll all do what we can." He reached out to put a hand on Peale's arm. "You have cash to get along, I take it."

Peale nodded. "I am sorry to have involved you," he said.

"You never know," Lowry replied, "where comfort will come from. I'd like to repeat what a man said to me once during the war about someone in a far worse situation than yours. I don't know whether it's true and I don't know whether I believe it. But I think I do and I think it's true. He looked at the man and he said, 'You know he doesn't realize it, but God's still got a plan for him.'"

The two hours he had been gone had been bad ones for Rosalie. The telephone had rung several times and once she had almost answered it. She felt a terrible anxiety that, whether Daran had told the story or not, Peale, breaking down in full confession, might have told it and there might have been a fight between him and Stephen.

The skies had lowered under rain clouds and there was a sense of tender pathos in the evening light, with the blossoms of the tulip trees falling in the park, an hour for lovers alone together. She heard Stephen's key in the door and hurried to meet him.

"It's as I feared," he said. "Now I have to tell Rutledge." He sank down on the sofa, sitting a long time in silence, his hand over hers. "He says he tried to raise the money as soon as he heard in Larus that I was going to Venezuela. If he had told me then, I might have been able to do something. I don't see how I could have foreseen anything like this, but it doesn't make it any easier."

"Darling, I don't think anyone could have done anything for a very long time. Come and rest awhile."

"I'd like to call Rutledge ——"

"Call him later."

"I don't want him or Johnson to call me first. It could be very difficult."

"I'll answer and say you're asleep. Nothing is more natural after your trip. I'll start supper."

When she brought it into the living room he was calling Rutledge in Long Island.

"Well, Stephen, welcome home," Rutledge was saying. "The new house too much to wait for, or what brings you back? Haven't picked up a bug, I hope."

"No, something came up which I felt demanded consultation and I reluctantly came back. Would it be possible for me to see you at your house in the morning?"

"Of course it would. Come to lunch, bring your wife and we'll drive over to see the new estate and take my head gardener along. I'll have the car pick you up at . . . what about quarter to eleven?"

"I think I better come out alone by train."

"Nonsense, I'll send the car. But is anything the matter with Rosalie?"

"Oh, no, but—well, I should like to talk to you alone."

There was a silence at Rutledge's end and then he said, "I know you wouldn't go through this unless you felt it necessary, so come along. If I don't sleep tonight it's your fault."

"I would have waited until morning to call you, but I felt I had to be sure you'd be free."

"I'll be free, but I still can't understand why Rosalie can't lunch with us. However, you're the boss."

The butler took Lowry's hat and led him through the sweet-smelling country house, dim and cool under its awnings, to where Rutledge was waiting in the warm sun on the flowery terrace from which shallow steps went down to the "wild garden." Beyond it Lowry could see some young children playing around their nurse. It seemed almost impossible that he could break his grim news amid such peace and beauty.

Rutledge put down the news section of the Sunday Times and came forward with his hand out.

"Well, you look fine. What's all this about?" he asked, pulling a wicker chair forward. "Will you have some coffee?"

Lowry declined. He still had no idea how or where to begin, whether to "prepare" Rutledge or tell him the worst forthwith. He felt in double-duty bound—to make it as easy as possible for Rutledge and to put it to Peale's least disadvantage.

This is extremely difficult for me," he said wly. "I judge it's best to tell you straight . It was my misfortune to discover in is that Jim has embezzled something like y thousand dollars of company funds. been over it with him and it is a fact. I e come to you only after satisfying myself re is no way we can put it right."

Jim? Jim Peale?"

Yes."

You're absolutely sure?"

Yes."

Who knows this?"

You and I and Daran. I hope I've done the it thing in coming to you."

You've done exactly right. What a hore experience for you. What's his exnation?"

e hasn't any, really. Pressure, was all he l. Expected to pay it back."

Part of the guilt's mine. I knew, though denied it, that he was spending too much ney. Is there more to it?"

No. I should have said he asked me to see alone. I suggested that he come out and you."

He's not going to add suicide to our trou-, is he?"

I don't think so. He mentioned it, and for it it's worth promised to do nothing perate. I emphasized he must pull himself ether if anyone was to help him."

utledge rubbed his face with his hand. ere's always more to some piece of mad- like this than the mere fact of stealing ney. Go back now and tell me how you e on it."

owry gave him the de- of his talk with Daran.

You didn't tell your ther-in-law?" Rutledge ed.

Yes, I did. I asked his ice."

Well, you've been living it. What are we to do?"

It's hard to say. In 's present state he ts everybody told—directors, stockholdthe whole organization and the newsers. It's the only atonement he can think —" utledge interrupted him. "It just doesn't n possible he can have done this and gone is usual way with all of us and now he ts to unload it on us."

It seems to me what Jim wants, or says he s, is an indication of what we ought not lo. In other words, the knowledge of it uld be limited to as few people as pos—yourself, Tom and Charley Curtis."

You don't mean with Jim staying on?"

Oh, no; he'll have to resign, of course."

Well, we can't take a fifty-thousand-dollar and not tell people what it's for."

'm not suggesting that. I can put up some, ten per cent of it, in cash. I'll put up more ou'll loan it to me or assist me to borrow ou may feel you want part. I don't offer o this in any excess of generosity."

But what's going to become of him? Have any idea of how much he owes?"

He says about a hundred thousand dol- but I don't think he knows. The trouble hasn't anything."

utledge sank in his chair. "All of it comes to me. I've made myself responsible for men we have. I thought I was doing ything humanly possible to prevent the test temptation to such a thing as this. k of it! New Year's Eve there we all were ther like a family —— You had absolutely nkling of anything wrong? He said noth- o you at all? I remember his greeting to alie ——" had none at all. The only change I've since then is that he has been less fun to ith."

Has he given any indication of what he ks we'll do about this?"

told you he would like the worst to en."

es, no doubt he would today. He'll get that, of course. Do you know whether 's in town?"

No, I don't. Do you want me to see him all him for you?"

"No, you've had enough. This mustn't spoil Rosalie's pleasure in the new house. I shouldn't tell her if I were you. No need for her to know."

"When you asked who knew it I didn't mean to leave her out. She knows it. Peale hinted there was something wrong just before Tom came to the apartment when she found the house."

"Why did he have to tell her?" Rutledge demanded angrily. "To have her intercede with you? Tom told me about his being there. Do you mean to say Rosalie already knew it when Tom talked to her?"

"Only that there was something."

"But you say Evelyn doesn't know? Why should he tell Rosalie and not his own wife?"

"I suppose that to confess first to Evelyn was more than he could bear. And he told me she was away."

Rutledge sat a moment staring out where his grandchildren were playing. "I'll go in and call Tom, and if he's in town I'll drive in with you. Will you be at home this afternoon if I need you?"

"Certainly. I did tell Jim ——"

"—— that you'd let him know how I took it?"

Lowry nodded.

"It's a marvel how quickly men want someone else to take the consequences of their mistakes. Tell him I listened, but you can't tell him what I'm going to do because I don't know."

There is no room in the universe for the least contempt or pride; but only for a gentle and reverent heart. JAMES MARTINEAU

Late in the warm afternoon, Thomas Johnson telephoned. He spoke in his usual calm voice and said that after a long talk with him and Charles Curtis, Rutledge had gone back to Locust Valley. Both Rutledge and he felt there was no useful purpose in their seeing Peale, though if he made an issue of it they would do so.

"If you feel too badly, Stephen, about having discovered this, why don't. From what Charley tells me, it would have been discovered in a matter of weeks anyhow. If you can, try to get Jim's resignation tonight and bring it in in the morning—simplest possible form, just 'I hereby resign,' and so on, will do."

"What about the money?"

"Curtis already has a check for it."

"I told Edward I'd ——"

"No, no, forget it, nothing to do with you. We're sorry you've had to have all this. Oh, one last thing—we feel it essential that Evelyn be told at once, and if Jim won't, we want to ask you to tell her. Try to get him to. She's at her aunt's in Southampton. Get a car to drive you down in the morning."

"All right. That all?"

"No, one thing more. Daran should also be told at once. Is he likely to inform all Latin America?"

"Oh, no. There's little doubt he already suspects the truth, and having it confirmed will make him feel very badly. He had a great deal of regard for Jim. I'm sure no one will ever hear about it from him."

"Edward says you talked to your brother-in-law about it."

"Yes."

"Is it asking too much for you to telephone him, requesting that he tell Daran? We don't want to shift the responsibility, but ——"

"I'll be glad to telephone him."

Johnson gave a sigh of relief. "It would be the greatest help. Please make clear how much we appreciate it. That is all for the moment then. Good night."

Peale's attitude through Lowry's whole visit that night was that of a man condemned and sacrificed by those he had thought were his friends. He had apparently not expected his verdict would come so swiftly and he signed the resignation almost as though it were his pardon of them.

Lowry said, "They have done it this way because they thought it would be easiest for you. I myself have asked as few questions as

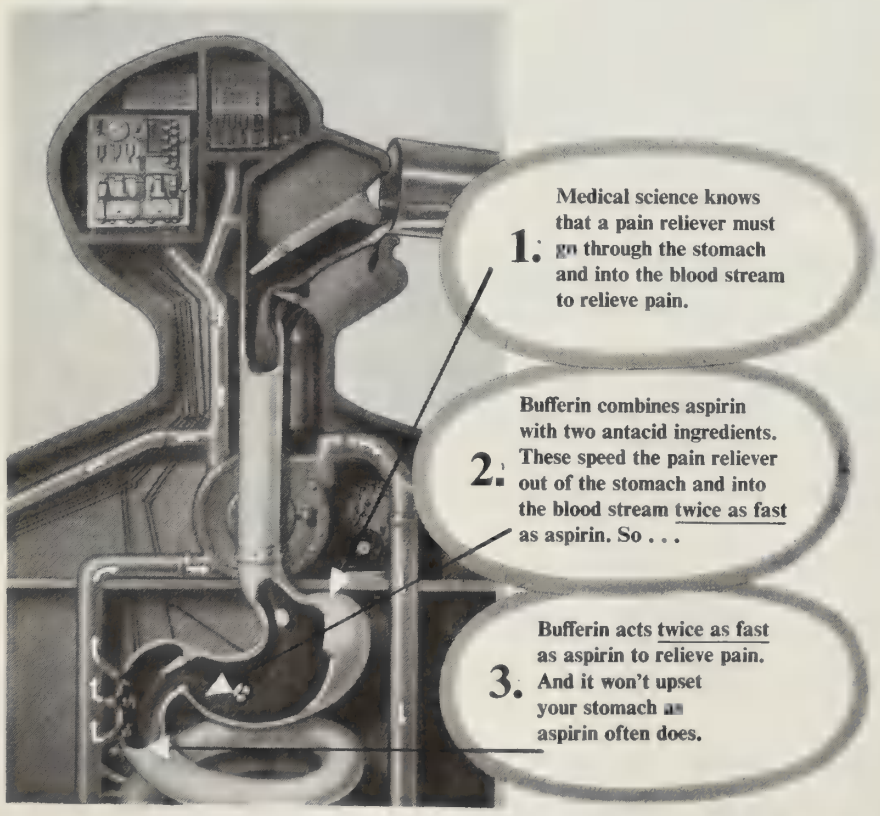
CONTINUED ON PAGE 105

New Spray-Set
by the makers of
Lustre-Creme...

SETS HAIR TO STAY THE SOFTEST WAY!

SUPER-SOFT
LUSTRE-NET HAIR SPRAY

Loved by Hollywood Stars because it's non-drying... contains no lacquer... mists hair with Lanolin!

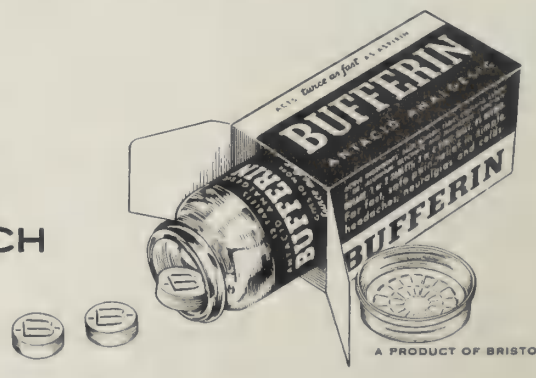


HOLLYWOOD FOUND IT FIRST—NOW IT CAN BE YOURS!

There are 2 types of Lustre-Net. Super-soft for loose, casual hair-do's. Regular for hard-to-manage hair. 5½ oz. can—a full ounce more! Only $1.25 plus tax.

Pain? Headache? Cold Miseries? Muscular Aches?

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must go through the stomach and into the blood stream to relieve pain.



2. Bufferin combines aspirin with two antacid ingredients. These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So . . .

3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

BUFFERIN

acts twice as fast as aspirin!

WON'T UPSET YOUR STOMACH

A PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYER

IF YOU SUFFER FROM PAIN OF ARTHRITIS OR RHEUMATISM, ASK YOUR PHYSICIAN ABOUT BUFFERIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 103

ssible for the same reason, but if you want talk about it or why it happened, please do."

'It isn't that so much," he replied. "It's terrible way that, almost without a word, n I thought believed in me have cut me off. t only cut me off from C. I. C., but apparly right out of their lives. I'm like a man on lesert island, put there and left by his shiptes. I don't know what I'm expected to do. I to speak to people? Am I to call people and say I'm an embezzler? What are the es?"

'I don't think there are any rules. It sounds e, but time, each day, will help, I think."

'Time's a great healer, is it? It's more likely reat destroyer."

Lowry paused. "There's the practical matof how your affairs stand. Evelyn has to be d. Are you willing to see her?"

'No, definitely not. I'll not see her."

'Then I'll have to. Is there anything you nt me to say?"

'No; just tell her that the bad she so easily in me is now apparent to all. Tell her her gment is confirmed by Edward Rutledge."

Peale talked on in the same fashion for aner hour. Lowry finally left, saying that he uld see him as soon as he was back from thampton and extracting a vague promise 'do nothing extreme" before then.

He telephoned Evn early Monday rning to make an ointment. She said would see him, ugh it was useless hink he could perde her to return. reached Southampat eleven o'clock, ing a hired car, asked her to guide to where they ld talk in seclu. There he told her t had happened. he said unemotionshe was not sured. She had exted something from letters coming to house from Venela. Since she felt attachment of any for him, she felt obligation to stand by him in any way. aunt was glad to have her and the chiln with her. Peale could do what he liked n the contents of the apartment. There nothing in it she wanted to see again.

I hope this isn't too disillusioning for you," said. "The only person I'm sorry for in his is you, Stephen. It was sweet of you to e all this distance to tell me. Oh, I'll give whatever jewelry he's given me that I have and he can sell it—there's some in the deposit also. I'm afraid I've rather ked you."

Well, it's not for me to judge," Lowry , "though I suppose ——" He paused.

I know what you're thinking," Evelyn , "but of course you don't realize that disliked him for a long time. To start I was very much in love with him. I did gs to please him I didn't want to do. Do mind if I don't talk about it any more?"

wry thought for a moment. "You'll want get a divorce sometime, I assume, and nwhile there are bound to be questions ut household details. Is there any lawyer can act for you?"

Yes, I suppose my aunt's lawyers would illing. I'll speak to them. Stephen, I don't to worry you like this—please don't be y—but there's nothing between Rosalie him, is there? He's been mad about her New Year's Eve."

Well, not on her part certainly," Lowry "What do you think he should do—or t I should try to do for him?"

shouldn't try to do too much. Jim is still escent—I think that's the word."

ecounting the interview to Rosalie that t, Lowry asked if she felt the same sense lock about it that he had.

"I don't think I do. I understand her feelings," she told him. "Living as man and wife without love must be emotionally the most destructive thing in the world."

A week later Peale walked into his new club, found a bench, and settled himself to read the want ads in the Times. He had resigned from the Hounds, the University, the Yale, a yacht club, a lunch club and a shooting club in Georgia to join the one that required no proposer or second—Bryant Park, with its floating, changing membership of white-collar unemployed.

He had a room in a cheap apartment on West End Avenue which held everything he had kept—his clothes. He had a new "special account" with a number in a branch of a bank that was not a member of the clearing-house.

To see himself stripped of possessions was agreeable to Peale. Lowry went with him to an attorney on the more complex business of deciding whom and what he could pay on his debts. Aside from the embezzlement, and after crediting some chattels that could be returned, including some jewelry, his debts and bills were over $50,000. The attorney and Lowry advised him to keep $1000 to live on until he had a job. The attorney drafted the letter he was to send certain creditors in the hope of avoiding legal action and consequent public bankruptcy. Of it all he said little to Lowry except that he now felt no bitterness toward him.

"Had you not discovered it, I see now I should have gone on to worse things. 'Murder leads to lying,' Oscar Wilde said. I didn't tell many lies. The thing I don't understand, Steve, is that nothing ever turned out right. I never had any luck. Other men have speculated —— Well, what's the use of talking about it? What do you think I should do?"

"For the moment, get any job you can that's respectable."

"I don't suppose there's anyone I can go to and ask for one."

"I don't like to say this, but I think it's inadvisable. A good job is bound to raise questions ——"

"I know. I did see Bill Le Grand of Chevelux. I've spent a small fortune cultivating him and the first thing he asked was, 'Jim, there's nothing funny about your leaving C. I. C., is there?'"

"If you can get a small job and give this time to blow over, something will come up where you can come back. It's hard, but I think it's what you have to do."

"What do you think I ought to do about people I know asking me to dinner or that sort of thing?"

"I don't want to give advice, Jim. I realize the loneliness you'll feel, but to see people socially—oh, well, I can't say it, but don't do it. Don't let people feel sorry for you that way."

"I never thought you believed in hair shirts."

"I don't. I believe in fun. It wouldn't be fun."

In spite of a drugstore breakfast in contrast to the frosty fresh orange juice, the eggs poached in milk, bright with paprika, with a dash of Tabasco, the broiled bacon, the trimmed, hot toast and delicious coffee of the past, Peale settled on a bench in Bryant Park feeling wonderfully free of care. He had lost or thrown away a number of things on none of which, at that moment, he put great value.

The realization on awakening that morning that he was no longer in love with Rosalie—was not tormented, as for months he had been—was an almost priceless relief. Suddenly

CONTINUED ON PAGE 107

Worry is a form of fear, and all forms of fear produce fatigue. A man who has learned not to fear will find the fatigue of daily life enormously diminished. Now fear, in its most harmful form, arises where there is some danger which we are unwilling to face. Every form of fear grows worse by not being looked at. . . . The proper course with every kind of fear is to think about it rationally and calmly, but with great concentration, until it has become completely familiar. In the end familiarity will blunt its terrors.

BERTRAND RUSSELL
The Conquest of Happiness
Liveright Publishing Corp.
Copyright 1930 Horace Liveright, Inc.

Unretouched photo of Charlene Veth, Jackson Heights, N. Y. (See her pretty face below.)

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING MAGAZINE proved in its famous testing laboratory: New Woodbury Shampoo holds curl better, keeps set longer! Example shown above: The left side of Charlene's hair, washed with her usual shampoo, got limp, straggly. Right side, washed with Woodbury, is springy, curly, beautifully manageable.

Leading shampoos were tested this way on hundreds of women. Results were checked by Good Housekeeping Magazine's laboratory. New Woodbury with its curl-keeping ingredient held waves best! Protects hair from drying out—leaves it shiny-clean, without dull soap film! Costs less than other brands — a generous bottle is only 39¢. If it isn't the finest you ever tried, we'll return your money! Fair enough?

WOODBURY HOLDS CURL BETTER, KEEPS SET LONGER

Dress by Dan Keller

Red Cross Shoes

Sunny Riviera Straws Polished import with a continental air . . . to put a co "life of luxury" within easy step. Richly textured . . . in a wealth of ombre blends and glowing colors. Th go beautifully with fashion's billowy cottons, crisp linens. And they fit like a midsummer night's dream they're Red Cross Shoes. Styles illustrated: above: RENDEZVOUS, matching handbag available; lower le BAHAMA: lower right, PARISIENNE. Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from 9.95 to 13

THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 105

had no further interest in the picture of salie still in his pocket and, getting up, crossed the park and went down 42nd eet to the post office where, without look- at the picture, he mailed it to Rosalie. It ve him an illusion of strength of mind and l, and he felt that in now desiring Rosalie more than he did Evelyn—which was to say t at all—he had conquered something.

Half an hour later he walked into the wded anteroom of one of the "better place- nt services—we handle only men of execu- e caliber." He had looked on the lobby ectory for the floor number and gone to the iting elevator. The operator looked at him d said, "Stairs right there."

"To what?" Peale asked.

"Placement Service. One flight up."

How the man knew where he was going he d no idea, but it was like a blow in the face. turned, pushed open the door and climbed stairs. There were said to be almost no employed in the country, but the anteroom s jammed with men filling out forms, wait- for their names to be called, getting up h a confident, jaunty air when it was, turn- away sorrowfully when it was only a ssage, "Nothing today. Mr. Peterson sug- ts you call around in about a week."

Men drifted to the corridor for a cigarette, ing to stay within earshot of the reception- s voice. Her manner was cordial and agree- e. Well, Peale thought, they must get jobs some people or they couldn't pay the rent. He went up to the receptionist.

What kind of position are you looking ?" she asked.

Executive, I guess."

What was your last sal- ?"

He hesitated and then l her the truth. She was ustomed to hyperbole handed him the forms n a smile. He walked vly over to the wall desk write the story of his Reading it back, he did see how he could hand it in. Why should a n with such a record need a job? The only rences he gave were the officers of C. I. C. walked over to the receptionist, who nced through the form without comment told him to be seated. It was an hour be- Mr. Peterson could see him.

Your last salary was five thousand?" erson asked, looking up from the applica- .

Fifty."

You better find me a job," Peterson said. ou have a remarkable record. I wouldn't k you'd need us. What happened, a ze-out?"

Something of the sort."

And your former competitors don't want ?"

prefer not to go to them."

Frankly, we don't have jobs at that level g begging around here, though of course ts do come to us in special cases. I placed an last week at twenty-five thousand. 't know just what to say about you, gh. I'll look around. What's your mum?"

Five, I suppose."

terson chewed his lip a moment. "No real experience —— Well, give me a call, say, rsday. Meantime if anything comes up, n reach you. Let's see. Yes, your tele- he's here. O.K."

You will do your best?" Peale asked him.

That's what we're here for."

ale went back to his club in the park. He d think of nowhere else to go, no one to hone to, no one to lunch with, no one to to, no one even to talk to.

rsday morning he went to the Place- Service without telephoning and, to his rise, the receptionist said Mr. Peterson ed to see him in about twenty minutes. king around the room, he felt he had dy moved up to some seniority.

terson got up and put out his hand. w we've got something I don't know u'll want or not, but I take it you don't to be hanging around. Am I right?"

"Absolutely."

"O.K. Excello Extrusion—it's a plastic out- fit, manufacturing, factory in the Bronx— want a high-class credit man. They do a nice business, owners built it up from a shoe- string and ride around in limousines. They make a point of wanting class. What do you say?"

"How much?"

"Start you off at seventy-five a week."

"At least the taxes on that aren't too much."

"I think you'll like these people if you'll take 'em as you find them. They're smart, a little on the rough-diamond side. Want to try it?"

"By all means. Any idea how to get there?" He started to say he had never been in the Bronx.

"Subway. Here's your card. Hope you land it."

The head of Excello Extrusion was P. J. Cronkhite, who had the business in the palm of his hand. He told Peale they worked long hours in this shop and they wanted a go-ahead two-fisted credit man with vision, a man who could turn a customer down for credit and still make him want to do business with Excello and nobody else. Candidly, did Peale consider himself that man?

Peale said he did.

"No objection to working nights?"

"No."

"I want somebody with class," Cronkhite told him. "This organization's got class. You look as though you had. Am I right? Peterson down there told me you had."

"Well, I think that's for you or him to say."

"Fine; like a fellow to be frank. Now if you like you can take off your coat and go to work now. Check your credits on your orders coming in, get your holdings out of the way and get me a report on everything overdue thirty days. Like to see the whole thing in the morning. Have your collection letters on 'em ready too."

"Whom do I dictate to?"

"Oh, you don't write your own letters?"

"No."

"Sorry to hear that. Well, you can use my girl some of the time."

With his training and experience Peale did not find his work difficult, except for the condition of the files and the fact that he was expected to do his own filing. By the normal closing time there was a good deal of order around his desk, and Cronkhite, with his partner, Ruthven Halperin, stopped "to look things over" on their way out.

"You'll be out of here by nine. I like the way you go at this, Peale. I'd like you in early. Want to talk to you about distributing the mail. You strike me as a doer and I want to see you go ahead fast. Want to get everything systematized."

Peale put in fourteen hours each on Friday and Saturday and spent most of Sunday alone at the office. Order had indeed replaced chaos. Monday morning he arrived in time to open the mail and have it on the desks of the people it concerned by nine o'clock. He was rather pleased with how quickly he had grasped the business.

He was busy at his own desk when Cronkhite came in at nine-thirty, and a few moments later Peale heard a roar from his office. Its door opened and Cronkhite bellowed across the room, "Peale, C. U.," the usual summons to the Presence.

He went in to find Cronkhite in a rage.

"What do you mean by distributing the mail before I saw it?"

"Look, Mr. Cronkhite, you told me you wanted people at work at nine. You said yourself the mail was late getting to them. Anything you need to see as president is on your desk. You shouldn't waste your time on every detail. Where your men are in doubt, they should come to you. I read every letter carefully. The way I've done it is the right way."

"Well," Cronkhite said, "I don't want to bawl you out for an honest mistake, but you see we're one big family here. If we don't, my top associates and I, see all the mail one of us may get the idea we're holding out on him; and by the way, never, but never, give Halperin a bank letter unless I say so. I want to think this over. I'll talk to you later."

Peale went back to his desk. The air apparently had cleared, but he was aware that the staff, sensing that he had been called down, were going in one by one to see Cronkhite with letters, orders and invoices. Shortly afterward Cronkhite went out and did not return until after three. A moment later Peale's phone rang and the office operator said, "Peale, P. J. C. U."

He went in again.

Cronkhite began, "Do you know that submission of a fraudulent balance sheet by mail is a Federal offense, if it's handed in it isn't?"

"Certainly."

"Wanted to be sure, that's all. How do you like it here?"

"Very much."

"Like to stay?"

"Yes, sir. I hope you're satisfied."

"Your work's all right," Cronkhite said, "routine stuff." He paused. "You're not very frank, are you, Peale?"

"I think so."

"I don't. Why did you leave your last job? What was this 'management disagreement'

The things that people give us may disappoint us, but the gifts we give never fail to bring us joy.

MOST REV. FULTON J. SHEEN

you put on your application? I want to warn you now I know more than you think I do, so be careful. What's the matter, are you afraid to answer?"

In the near-panic he felt, Peale realized several things: that only by a miracle had Peterson and Cronkhite not pressed the question before; and that Cronkhite had a right to a full answer. Yet even in the few days at Excello he had begun to feel some security.

He must not lose this job. If he did, he was done for good. He was ready to do anything—to lie his way out, to beg for a chance—to hold it. If a man like Cronkhite could fire him, he could never hold up his head.

"You know what I think? I think you had sticky fingers. You were a pretty big shot, you went to Yale, I know the type, honest little business like this not good enough for you in your Brooks Brothers clothes."

They're not Brooks, they're Pooles, Peale wanted to say. Otherwise his mind was a blank. He could find nothing to say.

"Got you on the raw, eh?" Cronkhite asked. "Well, now suppose I told you I had a plan for you? We'll see what my partner thinks." Cronkhite lifted the telephone. "Halperin, see me," he told the operator.

Halperin came in. Cronkhite drummed on the desk with his fingernails. "Ruthven," he began, "you and I have been partners for a good many years. We've never had any secrets from each other. I've known your problems. You've known mine. That's the way it's going to go right on being." He paused to frown at Peale. "Ruthven, Peale has taken some money. He's admitted it."

"From us?" Halperin asked.

"Before he came with us, from his old crowd. Now, Ruthven, don't get excited, don't say what I know you feel like saying, what I felt like. Now he had trouble getting this job and of course if he loses it, under these circumstances, he's going to have a time getting another. We can't, at least I hope you'll agree with me, turn him out like a dog. Instead of letting Peale go, I'm not only going to give him a chance, I'm going to show him we've got confidence in him. Do you agree with me so far, Ruthven?"

"Perfectly all right."

"How about you, Peale?"

Peale took a long breath and expressed his appreciation.

"This is what I'm going to do. Peale got this job without telling us the whole story. We're paying him at the rate of thirty-nine hundred dollars a year. That's on a week-to-week basis, of course, you understand that, Peale?"

"I do."

"Now you remember the qualifications we set. I think you'll agree that they haven't been measured up to by you. But I'm not going to take advantage of that—you can stay right on as credit man at thirty-six hundred, that is to say three hundred dollars a month, and I'll overlook what you didn't tell me. O.K.?

"That isn't all. I told you I was going to show you more confidence and I am. Miss Blake, who has been our cashier and head bookkeeper, is leaving us, Peale; you'll step right into her shoes. We won't replace her. We'll throw the whole thing together, cash, books of account, credit, and I figure you'll have plenty of time to handle the whole thing. May take a little night work, but you can do it. Now, Ruthven, will you go along with me in this, the way you always have?"

"Perfectly all right," Halperin said.

"There it is, Peale. It's strictly up to you, but remember this: I'll be living in our checkbook and our cashbox and don't you forget it for one little minute. That's all."

That afternoon the senior officers of C. I. C. were requested to meet with Thomas Johnson in the board room.

Since his return Lowry had been impressed by the decency and good manners of their not questioning him. Hewitt, with unexpected delicacy, had left a note for him, reading:

Dear Steve: It occurs to me Jim will have to have funds to go along on and I just want to say that I'll join you, and any others, with my share. Let me know. Probably best if you could act as banker.

He remembered the emotions with which he had said to himself, to Rosalie and to Rutledge that Peale was his friend and he would stand by him. Was he doing so? he wondered.

As he thought of all the happy, golden times of their youth, of the confidences between them, the half-formed hopes and plans they had shared, it was difficult to leave Peale alone in the sorrow, humiliation and perhaps even terror he must feel.

Johnson came in after they were assembled. He did not look well and his manner was more formal than usual. "I felt it best," he said, "to get you together for an announcement that will distress you all. I shall want your advice on the best way to tell the organization.

"As a result of what has happened, Edward, against my protest and those of the other directors, has resigned from the board. He took the position that he had assumed sole responsibility for the selection of our higher personnel and that if, in some way, he had not been derelict, the tragic action of Jim Peale would not have occurred." Johnson paused. "I suppose I would have been less than human if I had not looked forward to the time when I would succeed him. But I assure you I thought of it as something in the future. Coming now, as it has, you will realize there is no pleasure in it. Two men for whom I felt respect and friendship have, as it were, gone down to make room for me. I am not at all sure I retain either the buoyancy, the optimism or the qualities of leadership necessary. I shall need far more help from each of you than Edward did.

"So much for that. How and what shall we tell the staff?"

"I am sure I speak for us all," Curtis began by right of seniority, "in pledging our support to you and in sharing the feelings you naturally have as to how it has come about." There was a murmur of assent from around the table. "'Least said, soonest mended.' I suggest we prepare a brief announcement and have it on everyone's desk when they come in in the morning. I'll have Harold Titcomb in, after we've drafted it, and ask him to handle it personally."

Johnson nodded. "One of you go over it with Charley, will you? I think that I'll go now."

They all got up and shook hands with their new chairman.

"Tom," Curtis said, "I think you ought to tell Harold. It will be an awful blow to him. He was idolatrous about Edward."

"I know. I don't think I can tell him. One of you do it, or better yet, get him in here and let him sit down with you," Johnson said and then paused. "Titcomb has been here longer than any of us. I have the feeling that he's entitled to hear the whole story, if he's to be trusted with the announcement."

When Titcomb came in, Curtis pulled out a chair for him. He listened gravely, without a word, to what they told him about Peale. Then they told him about Mr. Rutledge and what they wanted him to do. His emotion, as his eyes filled with tears and his voice trembled, eased the tension they all felt.

"This is a terrible blow to me," he said. "It is to us all, but we realize you two have been associated longest. Tell us how you think we better phrase it in the announcement," Curtis said.

"Well, as simply as possible. I wouldn't say 'We regret to announce.' It'd be too much like a death notice. We'll have to pretend things'll be the same, but they won't."

"Try a form of words, Steve," Curtis said.

Lowry wrote it out in pencil and showed it to Titcomb, who took off his glasses to read it, nodded and handed it to Curtis. No changes were proposed and they went back to their desks. In a few moments Hewitt came to Lowry's office.

"I don't need to point out to you," he began, "that Tom said nothing about the presidency or the fact that there are only four of us left. What thought have you given to it?"

"None, I should say."

"Well, of course you've had a good deal on your mind, as we all have, but I've been doing some rather tall thinking. I can't tell you anything now, but something has happened that puts me in a position to take advantage of this and I wanted you to know, Steve, I'm also thinking of you. Tell me, by the way, does Rosalie know about Jim?"

"Well, yes, she does."

"I haven't told Paula anything except that he's out. Of course she's curious, pestering me with questions, but I think the fewer people who know, the better. Don't you agree?"

"Certainly as a general practice, yes," Lowry replied, in the dark as to where this was all leading.

"Charley hasn't said anything about how much of his stock Edward's holding on to, has he?"

"No."

"Well, we'll see what we shall see," Hewitt said and went out with an air of breezy mystery.

Profoundly affected as he still was by Peale's downfall and now by Rutledge's resignation, Hewitt's reference to taking advantage of it further depressed Lowry. He realized that in his personal life he must shake off his depression, if only for the sake of Rosalie and the home-coming children. But he was not in a mood to conspire or to battle for their places, with Hewitt as an ally.

He found Rosalie at the apartment, hot and voluble, after a day in Ridingtown with painters and carpenters. Paula Hewitt had driven out with her.

I could hardly feel much confidence in a man who had never been imposed upon. JULIUS HARE

"Darling, she pestered me all day with questions about Jim. Calvin's told her nothing."

"So he told me today in evident disapproval of your knowing."

"Of course, they're not at all close as we are. Did he tell you about Paula?"

"No, what?"

"Did you ever hear of a Miss Samantha Suydam?"

"Died the other day at ninety-six; had one of those 'original Standard Oil fortunes.'"

"Brace yourself. Practically all of it goes to Paula. She was her great-aunt."

"She's enormously rich then, enormously. And now she's going to buy a great block of C. I. C. stock for Calvin—that's what Hewitt meant. Really, it's too much."

"What?"

"That fellow in Rutledge's place."

"Oh, no," she said. "I'm very sure she has no such plan. There have been too many Friday-night dinners. Master Calvin will have to watch his step. Oh, there's a letter from Dolly for you."

"Sit down a moment," Lowry said.

"What's the matter?"

"Mr. Rutledge has resigned." Then he told her what had happened that afternoon. "I feel very badly. We all did."

"Won't it be almost the same with Mr. Johnson? It could be so much worse if it were a stranger."

"Of course it could be. I suppose in a few days it will seem just the same." How quickly, he thought, we all crave the comfortable assurance of familiar ways and people and surroundings and to avoid "new adjustments." How lost and lonely Jim Peale and all the uprooted of the world must feel.

"Who will succeed Mr. Johnson?"

"Nothing was said about that. The offices might be combined for a while, but this Suydam money may change it all."

He took off his coat and tie and sat down in the bedroom to read Dolly's letter. As he took it out of its envelope, a check fell on the floor. The letter read:

nly permanent dare wash at once!

Never before could you wave then wash! It's the loveliest wave in the world–and it's shampoo-fresh!

So easy! No need to shampoo first!

Unlike any other home permanent, Richard Hudnut's new Quick has Crystal Clear Lanolized Lotion. A lotion so pure yet penetrating, you can wave without washing first—and shampoo right after you wave! It's so easy! As soon as your wave is finished, you shampoo instead of rinsing. No need to wait a week to wash away "new perm" frizz and odor. No fear you'll wash out or weaken your wave. It's locked in to last with Crystal Clear Lotion!

Wave and wash with ½ the work!

Quick's the quickest! Only Quick's exclusive Crystal Clear Lotion penetrates so fast, it lets you wrap more hair on each curler and still get a firm curl to the tips of your hair. So you get a complete new-style wave with just 20 curlers —½ the winding time—½ the waving work! Shampoo instead of rinsing and, right from the first minute, your new Quick wave is lanolin-soft, sweet to see and be near. Use Quick today and be shampoo-fresh tonight!

2 new-style waves for the price of 1
Crystal Clear Lotion can be recapped.
Use ½—Save ½. $2.00 plus tax.
(1-wave size, $1.25 plus tax)

ICK

Home Permanent by Richard Hudnut

Dear Stephen: I was in New Haven last night and ran into Stu Winthrop in Mory's. He told me, and I regret to say some others, about Jim.

Although, as you have often so fraternally reminded me, I am a man without conscience, I am not without my own type of pride. Your acquisition of Larus, after I put Jim on to it, resulted in my receiving $5000. I had intended dissipating it in Europe. However, here is my check for it in Jim's favor. See that he gets it, and do not write me a brotherly letter. Yours,

D

Lowry sighed and put the check and letter on the bureau. He supposed it was legally Dolly's money to do with as he liked.

The days of that midweek passed without special incident at C. I. C. The staff responded to the announcement they had found on their desks Tuesday morning with round robins: to Mr. Rutledge of good wishes for a long, happy life in his well-earned retirement and to Johnson of a pledge of the same efforts and loyalty they had shown in the past to "your predecessor."

Without giving any reason, Lowry telephoned Peale to ask when he could see him, suggesting that they dine alone at the Plaza. Peale said that he would be working nights until Friday and they fixed on that night for their meeting.

all heads turn to Noreen

Walking on air . . . that's you after your first Noreen rinse . . . the temporary rinse that puts natural young color back into your hair.

You'll always be definite, never nondescript, when you use Noreen . . . always a really blonde blonde, a true or titian redhead, a jet-black brunette or a grayhead with an elegance and charm all your own. Noreen's colors make the difference that's all the difference between hair and really beautiful hair. Ask about the Noreen Color Applicator for easy application in only three minutes.

Write for literature and FREE sample offer: Noreen, Inc., 450 Lincoln Street, Denver 3, Colorado. Dept. 11.

Noreen®

COLOR HAIR RINSE

at cosmetic counters everywhere, also professionally applied in beauty salons

Johnson was not in the office Wednesday or Thursday. Late on Thursday afternoon Curtis went to the offices of Lowry and the other seniors. "I have some rather bad news," he said to Lowry, "and I don't want to tell you and the others here. Can you be at my apartment at five-thirty? Don't leave the office together. I don't want to start any talk."

The Curtis apartment was on Fifth Avenue, facing the park, and Lowry walked. He could not avoid the fear that they had found Peale's fraud was not limited to the Venezuela matter.

As he crossed 57th Street, Hewitt caught up with him. "What do you suppose this is all about?" he asked. "I swear Charley was so ominous I've been searching my own record. Have you?"

"Well, I'm ashamed to admit I have been saying to myself it can't be about me," Lowry said.

"I don't know whether you saw the will of Paula's great-aunt in the Times. At least I've got something to fall back on. I don't know why I should think of that, but Charley did give me the creeps."

Curtis was waiting for them in his study, standing with his back to the fireplace, where a great copper pitcher was ablaze with colored peonies. Evans and Hardwick were already there. There was a small bar with bottles and glasses in the corner of the room. Curtis made no gesture of invitation toward it, but closed the door after Lowry and Hewitt.

"You'll feel I brought you quite a ways for what can be told in a few words. But I didn't see what else to do. About two o'clock this morning Tom had a heart attack. He's at Presbyterian Hospital. They think he'll make it, but it's the end of his working days. Months of convalescence at the best. Well, that's all I can say."

Something between a whistle and a groan came from the listeners.

"I might say," Curtis continued, "it really has nothing to do with Jim's affair. It was of long standing—though I don't suppose that helped. I don't know how you fellows feel. I feel damn near like an orphan."

Lowry thought of his first talk with Rutledge, the 10–20 year plan, the fixed succession. All that had seemed so permanent had to do with mortal men.

"I don't want to seem heartless," Hewitt said, "it hits me very hard, but what's it going to mean? What will the directors do? It ought to be you to move up. We'd all be in back of you."

Curtis shook his head. "I suppose, I hope at least, it will be one of us. It won't be me. I'm too old."

"How's Mrs. Johnson?" Lowry asked.

"Brave but pretty broken up, a little bitter that he's been allowed to do so much," Curtis said, sighing between his teeth. "I hate to think of what people will say, three of us in a matter of weeks.

"Please have a drink if you feel like it," he added. "I don't."

No one moved.

Hewitt walked over to the window and looked out at the park, hands in his pockets. "If the directors are smart," he said, "they'll see the best answer to what people may say will be to fill Tom's place at once from the organization."

"They will see that, won't they?" Evans asked Curtis.

"I don't know. For so many years Edward not only dominated the board, but Tom and he represented us. I can't say, I don't think any of us can, that we know the directors. We're acquainted with them, yes, and that's about all. We'll just have to carry on. Sure you won't have a drink?"

"Thanks, no," they all said.

On the sidewalk, however, Hewitt said he needed one. "We ought to talk this over and make some plans. How about it?"

Evans agreed. Hardwick hesitated and looked at his watch.

"Steve?" Hewitt asked.

"I don't think I will, thanks. It needs more thought."

They called a cab, Hardwick saying he'd catch the East Side subway to Grand Central. In the cab Hewitt said, "The thing is this, Steve, it should be one of us. If we can agree among ourselves on the setup and put it up in determined fashion, the board will snap at it. I'm fortunately in a position to be of help to us all, as I want to be. Come on in and have a drink. Let's explore it."

Lowry again declined, his main reason being that he was not ready to be a triumvirate with Hewitt and Evans. It was foolish to suppose he himself had a chance for the succession and unlikely that they would support him if he did—and he did not feel that either of them was a choice he would support.

"Perhaps just as well he didn't come in," Hewitt said when their drinks were served. "I don't think he could contribute anything and he's got a mark against him now. Incidentally, you've probably heard about the Suydam money."

"I have indeed. It's staggering. I'm very happy for you," Evans said.

"Thanks. Of course it has its advantages. I didn't want to refer to it even indirectly with Charley just now, because I certainly am not going to be arbitrary in using it. But, Les, I want to ask you something. Tell me if I'm wrong. I find a certain coldness, an air of superiority about Steve. Maybe it's all this foreign service; but take today, wouldn't come in, didn't want to talk to you and me. Of course I may be doing him a big injustice. I sometimes get the feeling his heart's not in his job."

"Why do you say that?" Evans asked.

"He wants to write a book. He told Paula. Well, Les, I wanted you to know how my mind was running and I wanted you to know that if it comes to heavily increasing my holdings. I'm thinking of you. I'm only sorry that Steve feels he doesn't want to be with us, but maybe it's all for the best. Sometimes takes a long time to know a man."

At six-thirty Friday night Peale met Lowry at the Plaza. He appeared very tired and depressed, but his clothes looked well as always and his shoes were polished. They had a table by the window.

He declined a cocktail and a cigarette. He said, "I've given up smoking."

"How are things going?" Lowry asked. "You look better."

He smiled grimly. "I set myself to take whatever happened. I am trying to. I don't know that I can keep it up," and he outlined the blackmail Cronkhite had extorted as the price of the job. "The work is nothing. As a matter of fact, I'm invaluable to them, but the humiliation is relentless. I suppose I could go away somewhere, but if I'm a stranger there might be more questions. I must say I hope every night the mail will have something."

Lowry started to tell him about Johnson but stopped, feeling it was unnecessarily cruel. Every ordinary topic would seem a cruel re-

PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH PROVERBS

It is not a question of size, or a cow could catch a rabbit.

It's a poor hide that is not worth one tanning.

You can look at a man's head, but not into it.

It's a poor sheep that can't carry its own wool.

A mistake is no haystack, or everybody'd have a cow.

He who has never done anything wrong has never done anything right.

Overly wise is half crazy.

Faith saves, but it won't starch grandmother's nightcap.

Think what you please—but not too loud.

The first wife through love, the second a gift from God, and the third from the devil.

minder to Peale of his apartness: domestic happiness, personal plans, business situations.

"What do you do with your evenings?" he asked.

"Work, most of them, or walk or look at the river from Riverside Drive. Only one person I knew has tried to see me. Are you in your new house?"

"We expect to be this weekend," Lowry replied, thinking how wounding everything he said must be.

Peale studied the menu and ordered fish. "The fish seems to be the most inexpensive. I mustn't indulge myself after a diet of spaghetti and meat sauce."

Lowry had the feeling that he should deprecate or even protest the renunciation and the martyrdom as excessive, even morbid, but he said nothing, not knowing what he would do in such circumstances and aware that the weak and frightened invent strange patterns for their comfort.

He ordered strawberries and cream for them both without consulting Peale and then over their coffee he handed Peale the envelope with Dolly's letter and check. Peale's face flushed as he read it.

"Before you say anything," Lowry told him, "I want to say that I see no reason why you should not accept it. Dolly's a grown man and a free agent."

"But he doesn't owe it to me."

"He has not been conspicuous in his life for generosity or kindness. Let him indulge in it for once."

"But I wouldn't know what to do with it. Give it to Rutledge, turn it over to the lawyer to prorate. After what I've been through, I don't want to be accused of preferring creditors."

"Well, you haven't gone through bankruptcy, so I don't think that arises. What would you like to do with it?"

Peale stared out the window. "I will have a cigarette, if I may," he said, took it and lit it without turning his head. "If it doesn't go for tax arrears, have I committed a felony?"

"I don't think so. I can find out."

Peale said, "Stephen, I implied to you, I guess I told you, that you had the whole story. I held something back."

"We all do that, don't feel too badly. Don't tell me now if you don't want to."

"I kept it back because ——"

"Listen, you kept it back because you couldn't stand any more at the time. Now time has passed. You've recovered a good deal and you can face it."

"Do you actually think I've recovered any?"

"Of course I do. You really do look better."

"It isn't much of a recovery to accept money from Dolly. Could we walk over to the park and find a bench? I'm more at ease on park benches."

Lowry paid the check and they crossed the street and walked until they found an empty place.

"This is harder to tell than it would have been that first Sunday. I'm ashamed of it now. Well, here it is briefly. In talks with Daran he brought up the bull market. He said that, besides the lottery, he was doing well, but he'd like a hedge in the U. S. I let him understand I was doing well in the market. He asked me to take five thousand dollars and invest it for him and let him know in a year how he stood. If it was lost, that was life. At the time I intended to invest it, or I think I did. Maybe I always intended to keep it. Actually, I paid somebody with it. Can I send Dolly's money to Daran?"

And that wonderful little man never mentioned it, Lowry thought to himself.

Peale was still talking: "I know it's no solution to anything but, Stephen, if I could just get one thing checked off."

"Go ahead," Lowry said, "check it off."

Peale sat in silence for a moment. Then he suddenly asked for another cigarette and Lowry wondered what was still to come. Peale took the cigarette and then handed it back.

"Big gesture," he said. "Thanks for dinner. I'll walk home through the park. They sometimes knock you on the head in the lonely paths. Good night."

Lowry gave him a pat on the shoulder and said good night.

Rosalie came back to Gramercy Park pleasantly tired and excited after Friday in the new house. She had engaged two maids and Stephen had ordered a new car and a secondhand station wagon from the Ridingtown dealer. By Tuesday, the eve of the children's arrival, Stephen and she would dine from their own china, with their own silver, and sleep in their own broad bed, like prosperous peasants attached to the land.

Stephen had gone directly from the office to meet Peale and, hearing his key in the door when he returned, Rosalie hurried as always to greet him and poured out half her happiness as he kissed her. Then she asked:

"What about Dolly's check? Would he take it?"

"I'll tell you all about it in a moment. First, though"—and he asked about utilities' being turned on, moving-van arrivals and final alterations at the house. Satisfied, he said, "He took the check. He's an extraordinary fellow. Even now I don't know whether he told me the whole story."

"About what?"

"Well, it seems that he told Daran —— What's the matter?"

"Nothing. Someone walked over my grave, I suppose."

"No, really, what's the matter?"

"Stephen, nothing. Go on."

"He told Daran about his profitable market operations and Daran gave him five thousand dollars to speculate with for his account. Jim just used the money to pay someone else. He's going to use Dolly's check to pay Daran."

"What else did he say?"

"That was all, but it did seem to me, just as we were separating, he wanted to say something else and couldn't. I didn't press him. I think he's really trying for rehabilitation—big word."

"So you think next time there'll be more?" Rosalie asked.

"I rather think so."

. . . it's the RelaxAcizor you read about in VOGUE

USE AT HOME . . . new Relax-A-cizor with fabulous new "Beauty Belts" gives you a prettier, trimmer figure . . . so quickly . . . so pleasantly. Look your loveliest! New popularity . . . new happiness for a new YOU!

REDUCE hips, waist, tummy, in size... No Diet!

NEW—no vibration, no massage; a truly easy NO EFFORT way!

ROMANCE begins with a pretty figure. Now, you can lose excess inches from your hips, waist, tummy, thighs . . . without diet or weight-loss . . . QUICKLY, EASILY . . . while you REST luxuriously at home! Relax-A-cizor slims you with a delightful new kind of reducing exercise that requires NO EFFORT!

Twice as easy to use . . . and the NEW Relax-A-cizor . . . with the fabulous new "Beauty Belts" trims away excess inches from hips, waist, abdomen, and thighs TWICE AS FAST as ever before!

You use your Relax-A-cizor at home while you RELAX and enjoy reading, sewing . . . even SLEEPING . . . and excess inches vanish almost like magic . . . never makes you feel tired like regular beauty exercises.

HUSBANDS use Relax-A-cizor, too . . . for their waistlines . . for soothing RELAXING exercise of tired back and feet muscles.

FIRMS . . . TIGHTENS . . . TRIMS — Diet may cause sagging and loss from bust, neck and face. Relax-A-cizor does NOT; it, instead, firms and tightens your waist, hips, thighs and abdomen. New FACIAL exercises, lifts, and tightens muscles under EYES and CHIN.

Don't Risk Your Health . . . this is the safe, sensible, economical HOME method used by more than 150,000 women. Approved by Underwriters' Laboratory.

Beauty Editors Praise . . . Featured editorially in both "Mademoiselle" and "Charm." (Mail coupon below for reprints.) USERS SAY: "4 inches removed from abdomen."—Mrs. M.F. "3 inches from hips."—M.A. "Dress size was 16, now 12."—C.P. MANY WOMEN LOSE AN INCH OR TWO THE FIRST FEW DAYS! You may lose less—or MORE.

FREE — If you live in or near city listed at right, TELEPHONE for FREE INFORMATION, FREE BOOKLET, FREE TRIAL TREATMENT. No obligation. Representatives in most cities and rural areas. SOLD BY MAIL ON MONEY BACK GUARANTEE where company has no representatives.

TELEPHONE TODAY

NEW YORK CITY, MU 8-4690
NEWARK, MA 3-5313
PHILADELPHIA, LO 4-2566
BOSTON, KE 6-3030
DETROIT, WO 3-3311
CHICAGO, ST 2-5680
CLEVELAND, PR 1-2292
SAN FRANCISCO, SU 1-2682
LOS ANGELES, OL 5-8000
HONOLULU, 9-5276
MEXICO CITY, 25-18-34
LA CRESTA, PANAMA, 3-1899

FREE . . . MAIL TODAY

RELAX-A-CIZOR, Dept. LH-1 980 N. La Cienega, Los Angeles, Calif. OR
665 Fifth Ave., New York City, OR
Suite 1200, 17 No. State St., Chicago

Please send in PLAIN envelope FREE information about reducing size of waist, hips, thighs, abdomen. No cost. No salesmen will call. (PLEASE PRINT.)

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE____

TELEPHONE_____

Use margin for more writing space LH-1

"So do I," she said slowly, "and I know what it will be. I dreaded your hearing it. And now I am going to tell you."

"Why, darling, what is all this?"

"I'm going to tell you for the same reason he will—because you're stronger than we are and will know what to do. It's not about anything that's happened between him and me. Is that a relief?"

"Yes, though I didn't suppose it was."

"It's about Tallin that June."

"Oh."

"Jim told me that he had told Daran—this is so horrible—that he knew an Estonian girl, married to an important American, who had let her husband understand the opposite of what was true. That actually she had been the acquiescent mistress of the Russian commander. He told me two days before you came home. I was in terror that Daran had told it. I really never suffered as I did that first weekend you were back because I thought Daran had told it and that you might believe it, you were so aloof."

"Oh, you poor angel," he said, putting his arms around her.

"It's better that you know, isn't it? Now if Jim wants to confess, you won't have to listen. I was afraid if he told you, you might have a fight. Dreadful things were in my mind. You will forgive him and forget it, won't you?"

"I'm thinking of that wonderful little man, Daran. I can remember the moment at dinner with Armas when he must have decided not to tell it. You're all right?" he asked her gently.

"Yes, if you are, I am."

"Then let's forget it. It was far away and long ago. I am not one who can brood."

"My dearest, I hope I am with you, I suppose I will be, on the Day of Judgment."

"Why particularly?"

"To hear you politely advise the Omnipotent not to take it too seriously."

They were at breakfast the next morning when Mrs. Johnson telephoned to ask if he could come to see her at ten. She received hin looking haggard and drawn, but in noble com mand of herself. The terrible hush of tragedy filled the beautiful rooms of the apartment.

"Tom wishes that he might see you," she said, "there is so much he wants to tell you and a great favor he has to ask. I am to ask i for him. I hope you can grant it."

"Of course, whatever it is," Lowry said.

"You will understand that the foundation's future worries him terribly. He isn't worried about the company. There are all of you to look out for it, but the foundation needed more time, more money, more surety of which way it should go. What I am to ask you is, wil you take the post of treasurer at once and become one of the trustees? I'll still be one fo a little while. The others are Henry Dennison whom you know, and Benoni Bailey, profes sor of sociology at Yale. Tom had all but per suaded Walter Caithness, with all his money to come on. He's sure that you'll be able to."

"This is a very great honor," Lowry said "but there must be many better suited."

She gave him a wintry smile. "But you wil say yes. It's so essential—Henry Dennison i in his mid-sixties, Walter and Professor Bailey are sixty. We need you. May I tell Tom it' settled?"

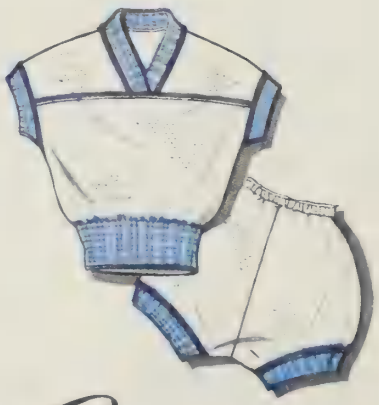
"I only hesitate because I know so littl about it. There's also the question of my bein out of the country at times."

"We've thought of that. It won't matte There's a paid staff of three who are ver competent."

"Well," he said, "I'll do it and I'll do m best."

"Oh, thank you so much. I'm going at onc to the Medical Center to see Tom."

"It's Saturday, but do you suppose I coul go down to the foundation office and g through some files, so I can be thinking abou it over the weekend?"



"Yes; call Mr. Draper, the administrator He lives just across the street from the offic

CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

A little girl dreams . . .

She's the Sleeping Beauty

She loves a fairytale goodnight. And it's "let's pretend" from the moment she wakes! She's the age for princess-pretty sleepwear by Carter's—for Carter's knows the way to a little girl's dreams. This Pretty-Kitty Print shortie gown is cool, dimple-knit cotton. No-iron . . . machine-washable . . . like all Carter's soft cotton knit sleepwear and underwear. At fine stores everywhere.

ABOVE: KITTEN PRINT SHORTIE, matching panties. Nylon lace trim. Blue, pink or yellow print. 3-14 yrs. $3.00. RIGHT: SLEEP & PLAY PAJAMA in knit piqué. Blue or pink plaid cuffing. 3-14 yrs. $3.00. All are Carter-Set® so won't shrink out of fit.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS

THIS IS A LITTERBUG

By MUNRO LEAF

You can see for yourself how mad, disgusted and disappointed the Watchbird is when he watches a Litterbug mess up our beautiful country. He hates these thoughtless, selfish Trash-Tossers so much that he is asking every boy and girl friend of his to be a Watchbird Helper. You can help so much if you will just remind yourself and your family and friends to watch out that none of you ever behaves like a Litterbug.

WERE YOU A LITTERBUG THIS MONTH?

On Baby: Plaid Creeper. Nevabind® sleeve. Blue, mint, yellow. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $3.00.

"Bottoms up!" went my creeper

It's a good thing my Carter's creeper looks good from any angle—because I seem to be spending most of my time with my plaid showing! Mother says it doesn't matter how many times I land on my plaid, either, because Carter's soft, no-iron cotton knits are so easy to pop into the washing machine. And the print on the waterproof pants never does a "bottoms up" and runs all over the shirt! In fact, you would turn somersaults, too, if someone nice gave you a present of Carter's cotton knit plaids!

Plaid Panti-Dress. Nevabind® sleeve. Plasticized pant. Blue, pink. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $3.00.

Plaid Play Pajama. Three-piece sleep-or-play set. Pink, blue. S-M-L. $3.00.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

All are Carter-Set® so won't shrink out of fit.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112

and he can meet you there." She smiled again. "Tom told me to put him on notice you might want to see him today."

Lowry telephoned to him and to Rosalie, telling her that he could not go to Ridingtown until after lunch.

"I'd better go out right away," she said. "You can phone me which train you'll take out and I'll meet you. Is it something bad?"

"Oh, no," he said. "I'll tell you later."

She was waiting on the almost-empty platform for the 3:37 and as he walked toward her she made in miniature the gesture of putting out her arms to him.

"Oh, darling," she said, "I feel so wonderfully American and suburban and housewifely. It's divine. Your classmate, Kenneth Hopkins, or his wife rather, called to ask us to cocktails—Beach and Country Club governors and school trustees to be there—and the whole classified directory wants our business. What about the business that kept you in town?"

He told her in detail. "I can't tell yet how much time it's going to take. Their confidence in me was very touching; I realize I haven't been conspicuous about public service."

"But you have."

"No, not in the sense of doing something for nothing for people I never heard of."

They were alone all Sunday unpacking and settling, hanging pictures, putting books away, moving furniture, one of the happiest days of their lives.

"I love you in shorts and shirt, you look so be-e-g and strong and brown," Rosalie said admiringly as Stephen, outdoing himself, broke up barrels and packing cases or carried them like a Sudanese bearer to the cellar for later firewood. "Stephen, I have a big money-making idea. We don't want to keep all these pictures. Why can't we make up nice selections and sell them to the less fortunate, who don't enjoy our extensive connections with European potentates? There's two of Charlie de Gaulle autographed, five of you with the Prefect of Lyons. Three views of you with the whole Turkish government looking at Ataturk's statue. Here's you outside a housing development at Padova. I can't seem to find Lollobrigida in the crowd, but we could say she's there. Who's this with you in Morocco, Allah Akbar in person?"

"Let me see. That is Bou Aziz. All his sheep had the mange. Keep that one. He was a very nice fellow. Wanted to come to America."

"Oh, here's the big money—the Balenciaga opening, reading from left to right, the Duchesse de St. Simon, Elsa Maxwell, Mrs. Stephen Lowry and other reigning beauties and notables, including that maharani. Dear, do we want this set of Mommsen? We could send it to the Alsop brothers."

"They have a set. I need it for reference."

"Then my little bookworm shall have it and his mummie will cut the pages for him. I'm having such fun."

By Monday morning the office knew of the grave illness of Mr. Johnson and speculation as to his successor was in the air.

Lowry, sure that he would not be chosen, thought it equally unlikely that any of his immediate colleagues would be. He talked to Curtis about the resumption of his trip.

"Well, I think you'd better not start off again until we're more settled. Part of Jim's work will fall on you—and anyhow, you ought to be here to make your own mark with the new president."

"Still no idea who it will be?"

"Not the slightest. Are you chafing to be off?"

"Far from it. Our children arrive Wednesday and I'd like to spend the summer in our new house."

"No reason why you shouldn't," Curtis said.

At nine Wednesday morning, the Lowry children, in dark blue jerseys and gray shorts or pleated skirt, were first down the gangway of the Queen, tumbling into their parents' arms; they had "almost seen" an iceberg; they had been on the bridge and steered; they had been polite; where and how was Smoky? Half the ship's company came to say good-by and they had to visit most of the alphabet to say good-by to their other friends.

"Dear, at least they're not sullen," Rosalie, slightly teary, said to their beaming father.

In the all but deep-country quiet of Ridingtown at night—with the children happy and healthy, wild with delight over new friends and scenes, advanced swimming lessons, tennis lessons, sailing lessons—the various fates of Rutledge and Johnson and Peale seemed far off. The sense of home-at-last was all-pervasive and with it the feeling that all the peace and happiness would last forever and that neither they nor the children would ever grow older.

Neither of them had heard the telephone ringing, when their elder son's voice called from the terrace, "Dad, it's for you. It's Colonel Channing. I've had a nice talk with him. Good night, mum, good night, dad. I'm pretty sleepy now. It's ten o'clock. Oh, boy!"

They hurried in together and Rosalie ran upstairs to see that all was well.

"Stephen," Colonel Channing said, "I have been out to dinner and found a note here to call my brother. I thought you'd want to hear right away what he had to say. There was a special directors' meeting of your people late this afternoon. D. P. Cramer was chosen to succeed Tom. My brother says they were all taken aback afterward at the speed with which they voted. It shows what one determined man can do. William Adams Delano got the id and rammed it down their throats. What you think of it?"

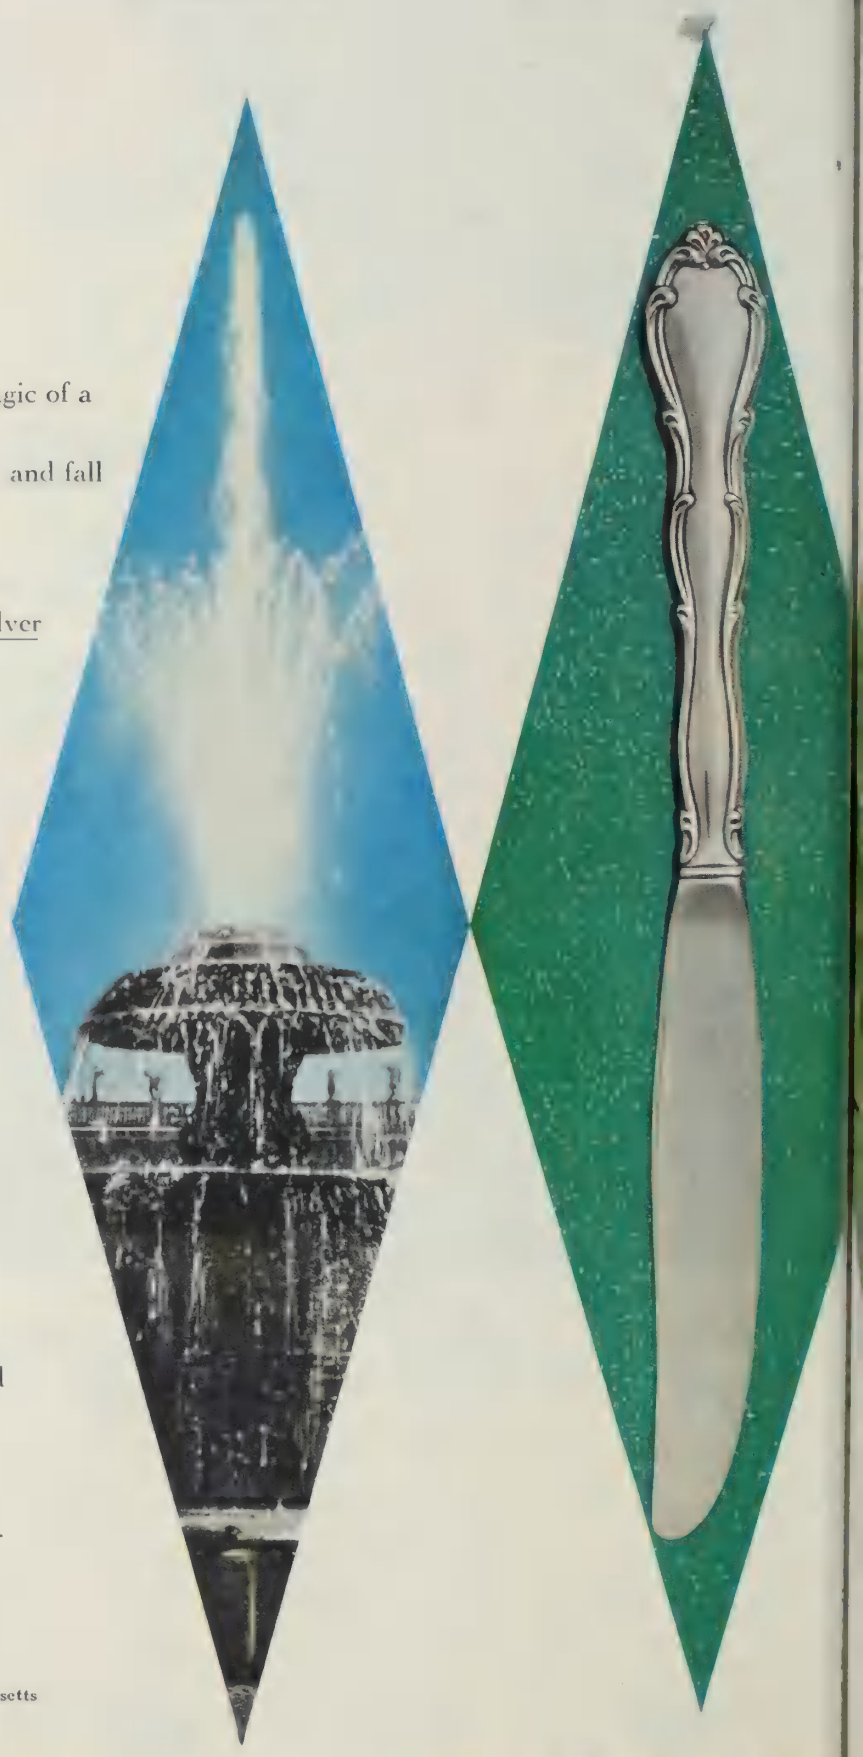
"Well, I hardly know," Lowry said, hims amazed. "He's all right, he's —— It does seem possible, though. I should have thoug he was ——"

"Oh, I know, to me he's a good accounta and beyond that a nobody. My brother thin Cramer proposed himself to Delano and th all the moral platitudes Delano gave out we supplied by Cramer."

"Had this been in the air?"

"I don't think so. How do you stand wi him—Cramer, that is?"

The simple, fascinating magic of a fountain . . . the shimmering rise and fall of water turned to silver . . . now magically turned to solid silver in Towle's newest sterling design . . . Fontana.



Inspired by the joyous fountains of Italy, Fontana speaks the language of light and motion, of youthful springtime places. Graceful. Ageless.

And for you. Now at authorized Towle jewelry and department stores.

Four-piece service for one $26.75.

Six-piece service for one $38.50.

The Towle Silversmiths, Newburyport, Massachusetts

Towle's Fo

"Well I think all right, though I've met him nly twice. Do the others know? Hewitt and vans, I mean."

"They'll probably hear. Charley Curtis, of urse, knows."

"Was Rutledge at the meeting?"

"Oh, no. Well, you've got the weekend to t adjusted."

"Yes, many thanks. Good night."

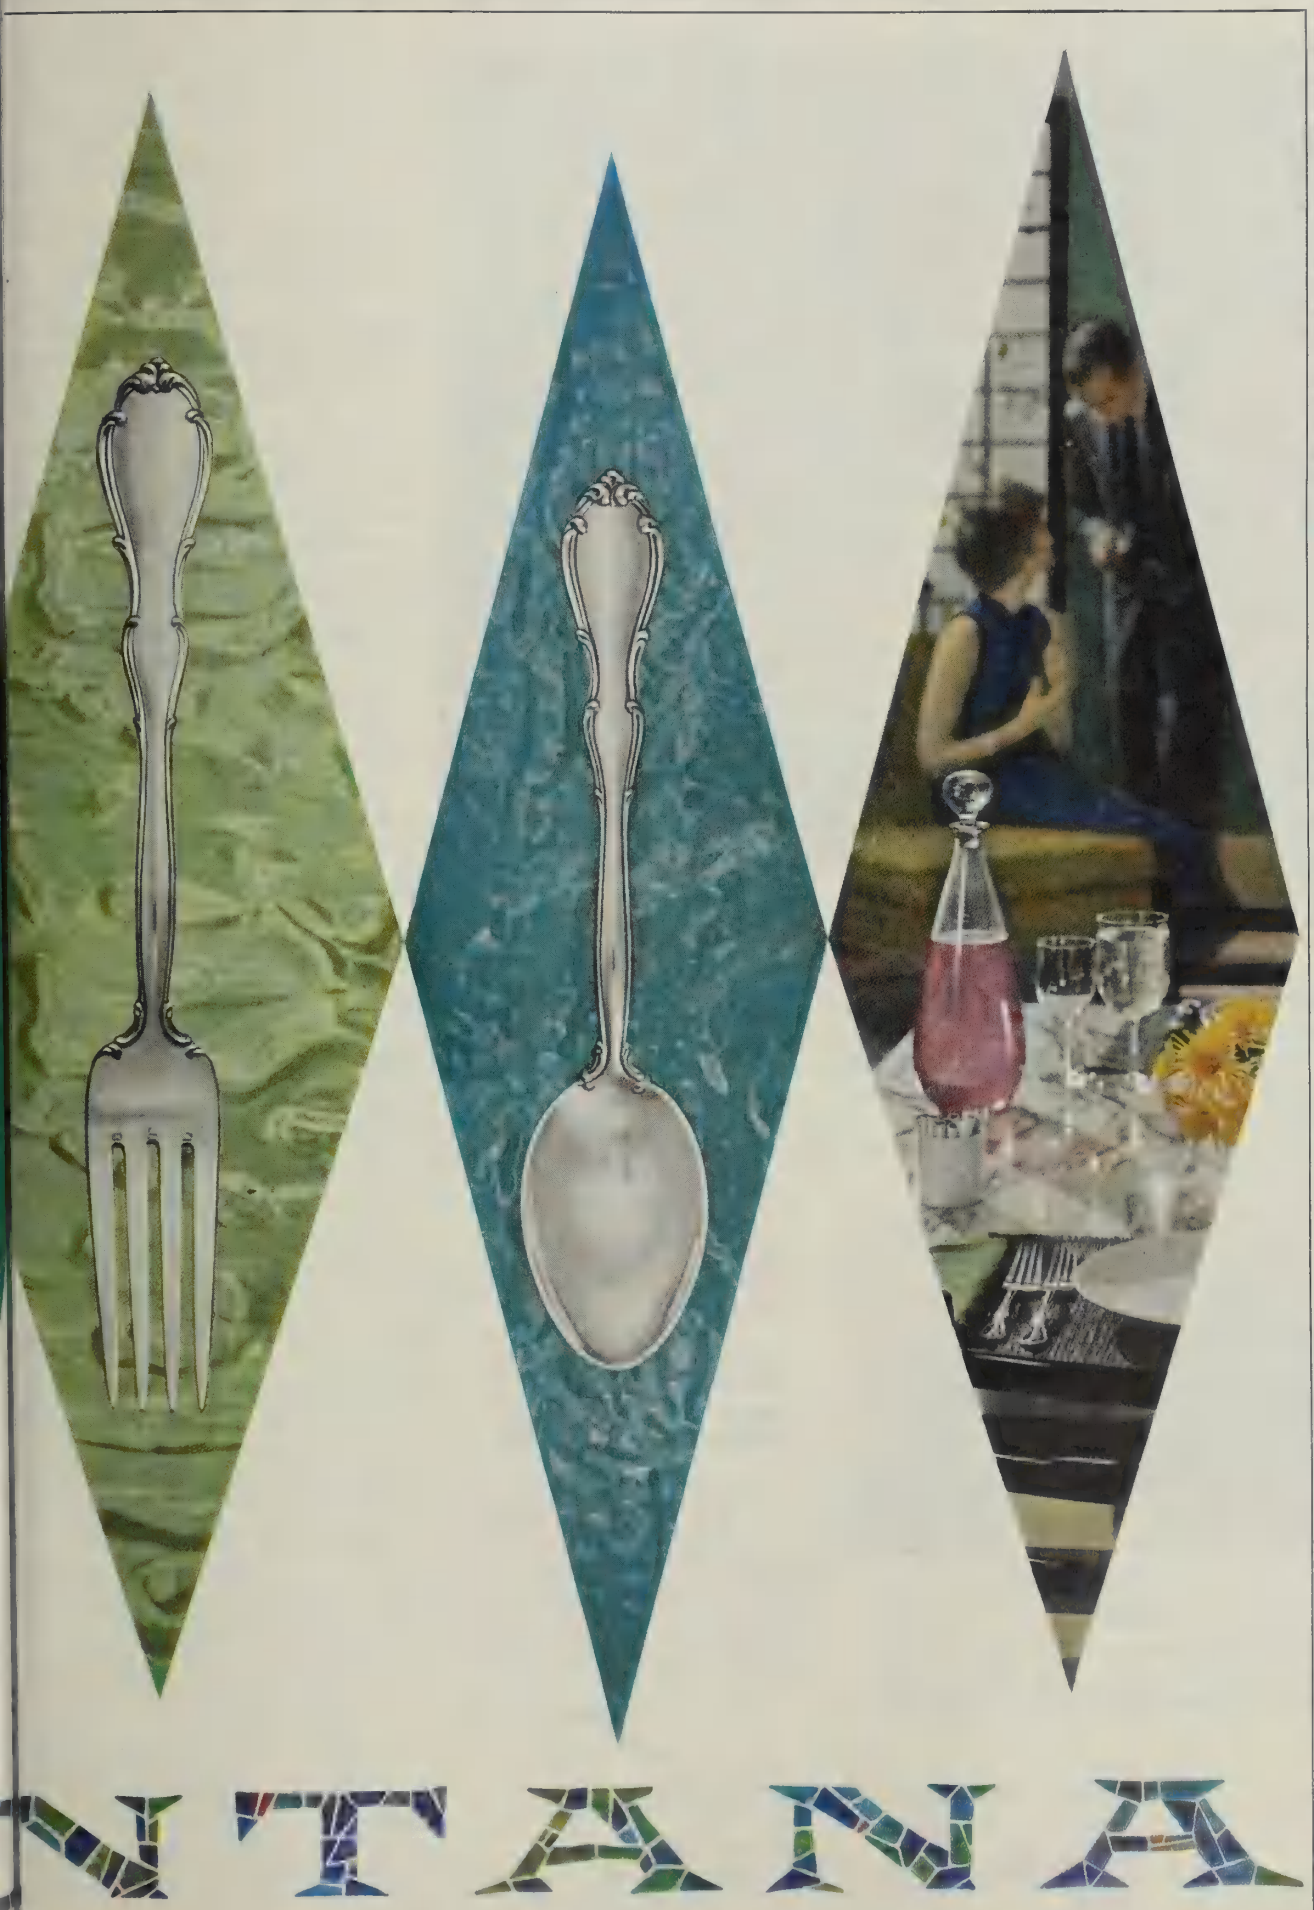
Monday morning Harold Titcomb arrived the office at eight o'clock as usual. The rly shift of his mail room was already at ork. As he entered, Lever, his assistant, oked up, and then came quickly toward him.

"What's up?" Titcomb asked.

"I got here at seven-thirty," Lever told him. "I heard voices in old man Rutledge's room and I looked in. Two guys and a dame I never seen are in there yak-yaking, furniture all changed."

"Who did they say they were?" Titcomb asked.

"I didn't stay. I beat it back here."



"Just go ahead with the work," Titcomb said and walked quietly to the open door of Mr. Rutledge's former office. What he saw appalled him.

He knew the night-wire desks as well as he knew his own street address, hurried to the most remote one and dialed Hewitt's number. A maid said he had been in the country for the weekend and would go straight to the office from there. . . . Mrs. Lowry said Mr. Lowry had already left for his train.

"He's making his usual eight-thirty-six, Mrs. Lowry?" he asked.

"No, he got the eight-one. He ought to be in the office a little before nine."

Titcomb went back to the mail room. Lever came over to the door and Titcomb said, "I recognize the older one. He's that D. P. Cramer—been in here a lot. I imagine he's just using the office for a few days. I'm going down for coffee."

"I never known you to take coffee at this hour," Lever said.

Titcomb tried to smile and make a joke, but he could think of none. He could only remember a line he had read in a book: "An era had ended"—and he didn't want to believe it was true.

For half an hour he did sentry duty by the elevators and at eight-fifty, to his infinite relief, Lowry turned the corner and saw him.

Titcomb drew him quickly aside. "I've been watching for you. The place has been torn apart. That Mr. Cramer who used to come in—he's in Mr. Rutledge's office with a secretary and somebody else. All his furniture was moved in over the weekend, the starter told me. The three of them were there all Saturday, Sunday. Mr. Lowry, what's happened? They could at least have told me. Mr. Rutledge or Mr. Johnson wouldn't do such a thing without letting me know."

"I got a phone call quite late Friday night that Mr. Cramer had been elected president and would be in today, but I had no idea of this weekend move. We better go up."

"Maybe I was wrong in getting so upset about this," Titcomb said in the elevator.

"Oh, well," Lowry said cheerily, "it doesn't make any difference. Mr. Cramer is a very nice man. You'll like him."

The staff had begun to reach their desks and to start the day's work. It seemed to Lowry as he passed them that they were all consciously trying not to look toward Rutledge's door. He paused there and Cramer called, "Oh, glad to see you, Mr. Lowry. Come right in. Both

If it was woman who put man out of Paradise, it is still woman, and woman only, who can lead him back. ELBERT HUBBARD doors will always be open to the whole organization. You do know what's happened?"

"Oh, yes. I wish you all sorts of luck and ——"

"This is my secretary and Girl Friday, Jane Wilkins," Cramer said. A severe-looking woman of fifty said good morning. "You had a quick trip abroad, didn't you? I'll want to hear about it later. Oh—John, come in. Mr. Lowry, this is my son John, who's coming to act as my personal assistant. Just back from his two years in Korea, after college. John, just check again on whether that old fellow in the mail room's in while I talk to Mr. Lowry."

"Right, dad," young Cramer said, giving his hand to Lowry and taking it away in one movement.

"Titcomb's in," Lowry told Cramer. "He came up with me. He's always in at eight, and was this morning. I had asked him to do something for me."

"Leave it, John. That explains it satisfactorily."

"Right, dad."

The elder Cramer, smiling benignly, said he had only had in mind catching any slackness that the interregnum might have let creep in. "You can be sure, I'm here to learn from you all. Till yet I know very little of the whole picture. Any fear on the part of anyone in the organization that I'm here to interfere or make changes should be very and most definitely nipped in the bud. And I hope you'll spread that around. Now don't let me keep you."

"There was one thing you wanted to ask Mr. Lowry, dad," John Cramer said.

"And that was?" Cramer asked.

"You wanted to know how long the Venezuelan manager would be in Paris on personal business."

"Yes, you're right. Can you tell me, Mr. Lowry?"

"I should say he would return in a few days, probably this week," Lowry said. "Originally I had thought I'd be back in Paris in a few days."

"I see; and then this ugly business detained you?"

"Well, yes."

"You can give me the details later, but perhaps, John, you'll make a note to remind Mr.

Lowry to have Mr. Doran return via New York."

"I'll do so," Lowry said.

The father waved his son away with paternal pride. "Fine boy, isn't he, Mr. Lowry? He's got the sort of qualities I lack. He's Phi Beta Kappa, by the way, the honor society. I don't know how many Phi Betes, as they call them, we have in this office."

"There are several, Mr. Curtis and Evans both among them."

"You weren't so fortunate?"

"Yes, I happened to be," Lowry said.

"Oh, well, that's splendid. John and you will be working very closely. Feel absolutely free to call on John and use him whenever you want to. Don't let what he's doing for me interfere. Want to make a note to cable Doran?" He pushed a pad and his own pencil forward.

"I'll remember. His name is Daran, not Doran, by the way."

"Thank you," Cramer said.

Lowry left the office and, passing young Cramer's and Miss Wilkins' desks in the anteroom, was staggered by the amount of papers they had already managed to assemble. Correspondence folders were high on both desks and a drawing board with graph paper on Cramer's as well.

Hewitt, somewhat breathless, eyebrows lifted questioningly, met him outside the door.

"True?" he asked.

"Yep," Lowry said. "Have fun. I forgot to pledge my support to the new regime. Make a note to do it."

That day and the two following Cramer and his son and his secretary behaved very much like a close-knit family of three who had just moved into a large apartment house occupied by tenants of long standing. They spoke to their neighbors in a friendly way but kept very much to themselves. The feverish industry of young Cramer and Miss Wilkins continued, as files were returned and new ones taken away.

With Curtis, Hewitt, Evans and Lowry Cramer's attitude was of smiling, almost embarrassed, detachment and confidence. He questioned nothing, and showed no desire to interfere or even participate in the day's work.

"Of course you realize," Hewitt said to Lowry on the morning of the third day, "this won't last. This fellow will be into everything and that son of his will stop being so deferential. I wish Cramer would stop referring to himself as 'a worker in the vineyard.' Did he mention this dinner he's giving? Us and our wives?"

"Oh, no, not really?"

"Yep, tomorrow night. Command performance. I don't want to rub it in, Steve, but I think all this might have been prevented if you'd felt you could spend a little time to make some plans with me after we left Charley Curtis the other night. However, don't think I hold it against you or that I'm dropping them."

Later in the morning Cramer came to Lowry's office to tell him about dinner. Mrs. Cramer, he was sorry to say, had "not yet come on from the West," but he wanted to "get the family together" right away. He seemed as cheery about it as a Lord Bountiful. Dinner would be at six-thirty at his hotel. Just Miss Wilkins, his son, and the four of them and their wives—a simple dinner "that won't keep us late."

So indeed it turned out. A line on the bulletin board in the lobby of his hotel read, "Mr. Cramer's dinner, Room 1013, 6:30 P.M." They went up to find Miss Wilkins presiding over a tray of tomato juice. The son had a fine salve of canapés. It was all very folksy, husbands and wives next to each other on either side of the beaming Cramer. "Large coffee with" the three-course dinner and an abundance of hard-shelled rolls. Jellied tomato soup, roast beef with baked Idaho potato, broccoli and a fine blueberry pie for all. Fresh hot coffee with it.

"How do you, as a Frenchwoman, like American cooking, Mrs. Lowry?" Cramer asked.

"Exquisite," Rosalie said. "But I'm not French."

"Be that as it may. I don't think we'd use the word 'exquisite' about cooking. It's wholesome and substantial."

"Oh, very."

"For example, there's about eleven ounces of prime steer in each portion of that roast beef. I understand you eat a good many frogs' legs in France and of course they are abundant in this country too. The finest I've ever tasted were in Chattanooga. They were served with a side dish of creamed asparagus. Coleslaw went with it. And you, Mrs. Hewitt, are frogs' legs your favorite also?"

"No," Paula said judiciously with a sidelong leer at Rosalie. "I like ham and eggs with red-eye gravy."

"That must be good," Rosalie said.

"Yes, it's a dish that Arkansas is famous for and there's something that is practically exquisite, Mrs. Lowry, as you said."

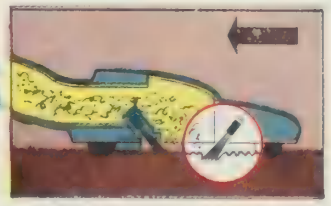
Cramer asked Mrs. Curtis who her favorite columnist was. He said that his was David Lawrence. He felt there was vision there and Miss Wilkins was always good enough to clip it out and have it on his desk when he came in. He went on to say that he put a high value on members of the family getting together in an informal homelike atmosphere. This was the first of such dinners which would gradually be extended to all the staff heads.

His men guests listened to him mainly in silence so that Lowry could not help feeling a little sorry for him. He was plainly making an effort to impress them with something, but he was also trying to please. He told his women guests, looking from one to another, that his one goal was to be helpful. "I'm not a taskmaster in any sense of the word," he said.

Then, startling them all, he said in his low-confidential tone, "Tell me, we're all together here, what is your explanation of Mr. Peale's conduct? You all know him better than I. Mr. Lowry, you knew him best; you were very old friends, I'm told."

Nonplused by the question, Lowry finally shrugged.

New! A vacuum cleaner you never have to lift!



Lift no more, my lady! The amazing new General Electric "Roll-Easy" Vacuum Cleaner rolls anywhere easily—even up stairs. It's the ultimate in labor saving . . . lets you clean both high and low. It won't tip rolling over door sills, or rumple your scatter rugs as it rolls quietly from room to room.

The amazing new General Electric "Double-Action" Cleaning Unit glides along on full-width rollers to let you clean with brand-new ease. No changing! No lifting! No adjusting! One side cleans both carpets and floors . . . and you can use it on scatter rugs, too. It picks up stubborn lint and threads easily.

New General Electric "Double-Action" Cleaning Unit gets rugs and floors cleaner—faster!

Here's how this new unit works: The rear brush pushes dirt into the suction chamber.

The forward brush pulls it in! You clean rugs and floors with fewer strokes . . . less work!

One unit cleans rugs and floors. The low silhouette of General Electric's "Double-Action" Cleaning Unit lets you clean under beds, chairs, sofas and tables. It glides into spaces only two inches high! Vacuum Cleaner Dept., General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.

Roll-Easy
VACUUM CLEANER

NEW LOW LOW PRICE— $59.95*

Price includes set of color-matched attachments and plentiful supply of extra-large "Throw-Away" Bags.

Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Cramer turned to Curtis. "Looking back, end Curtis, do we now see anything which ould warn us in the future?"

"I don't believe anything like that will occur ain."

"Isn't it a fact that before it happened you ould have been just as sure this wouldn't ppen?"

Curtis' normally pale face reddened and he a cigarette without replying.

"The reason I mention it now," Cramer id, "is because I have great faith in woman's uition, and I want to ask you ladies if any you, and you all saw a good deal of him, d any intuitive warning. Mrs. Lowry, let me k you."

As she hesitated, Paula Hewitt said, "Let say this, Mr. Cramer: none of us had an uitive warning. Jim Peale is a friend. He was brilliant, complex individual. He still is. I n't think any of us want to talk about him. you mind terribly?"

Lowry felt ashamed that he had not said mething of the sort as Cramer replied, "Cernly not, Mrs. Hewitt. I merely sought idance."

Mrs. Curtis murmured something about the eness of the hour—it was all of eight-forty—d Cramer pushed back his chair, telling m what a good time they had had. They t in a body, leaving the hosts, so the latter imated, to settle down to a solid evening of rk after a duty well done.

"Nothing less than the Twenty-one after it," Paula said in the crowded elevator. What a dreadful person!"

The Curtises got in the cab with them and the other four waited, Evans said to Lowry, What can the directors be nking of? They must ow this fellow. What's explanation, Steve?"

"I don't know. I suppose has ability and that unrneath he's sincere."

"Oh, stop being cheer-," Rosalie said. "I can't nd it. When's his wife ming on from the West'?"

At 21 Hewitt said, as they settled back, "I'm t referring to his question about Jim, but the t that a man like that's been put in over us. n going to Delano in the morning and dend an explanation. I don't have to take it d I won't."

"What are you going to do, Stephen?" ula asked.

"I don't think it's any good doing anything til we see Cramer in action. We can't very ll go to Delano and say, 'This fellow gives u a commonplace meal when he has you to ner and asks questions in rather poor te,' which is about all specifically we have complain of."

"I think you're right," Curtis said. "We'll ow more when he stops sending for files."

"In his way," Lowry went on, "he even ms to be trying to make people like him. He y turn out to be quite effective."

"I don't question his being effective," Hewitt d. "It's the spectacle of our ineffectiveness talking about."

"Oh, let's give him a chance," Lowry said. "He needs a chance like a tiger needs claws," witt replied.

Curtis moodily agreed with Lowry, and his e, glancing at her wrist, rose, saying, "Heavs, it's long past nine o'clock! You must all me and have a nice baked potato with us ne night."

"I'm going to have another drink, Paula. down." But Paula also rose and picked up evening bag. "Well, do you mind if I don't lp my drink?" Hewitt asked surlily. "I think stop in the Hounds a minute. Delano ght just be there and I could bring it up sually."

"No indeed. Do try. Steve, where's your ? You can drop me," Paula said.

Curtis said he had ordered his car and they uld take her, since the Lowrys had to go all e way to Long Island. They left Hewitt to od briefly on the morrow before having a ephone brought to the table.

When the guests had left Cramer said he d a personal letter he must get off. Miss Wilkins sat down at the desk, pencil and dictation book ready.

"No," Cramer said, "thank you, Jane, but I am going to write it myself."

He seated himself at the desk and squared a sheet of hotel paper before him.

Dear Mildred: Well, the banquet hall's deserted. It's been a hard day and I don't know just what to tell you about it, because I'm not sure how I feel about the dinner I just gave my principal officers and their wives.

I went to a good deal of pains in selecting the dinner and in having everything nice, but either New Yorkers are "standoffish" or these particular ones aren't very whole-souled.

Mrs. Curtis and Mrs. Evans seemed like nice women but Lowry's wife is French, I understand. Lowry himself had very little to say. Hewitt is more of a regular fellow but his wife "snapped my head off" at one point while we were all discussing Peale. Jane has heard that Lowry plans to bring Peale back in the company. Needless to say, I'll put the quietus on any such idea.

I freely admit I feel a little bothered and very lonesome for you tonight and wish you were here. Tomorrow I'm putting in new and stiff procedures. It's all a challenge and I know what I'm doing but I had counted on a little more friendliness. Fortunately I have Mr. Delano's absolute trust and confidence and I know I have yours, and those are all I need.

Your affectionate husband,

D. P. CRAMER.

He addressed and stamped the envelope and walked out to drop it in the chute.

Though he took the train a half hour before his usual one, Lowry arrived at the office to find his secretary was also in, and with the personal mail she gave him, with raised eyebrows, an office memorandum asking that a carbon of all letters go to the president's assistant. She said that Mr. Cramer would like to see him at nine-thirty. There were airmail letters from his brother-in-law and from Daran.

To profit from good advice requires more wisdom than to give it.

CHURTON COLLINS

Lainvee's said simply that he had seen Daran and given him the facts, and that Daran had accepted them with little comment but obvious sorrow.

Daran wrote:

Mr. Lainvee has told me the story which, you may be sure, will be held in the strictest confidence by me. It has made me profoundly sad that this could happen to a man of such broad culture. I cannot think of him as having done it but rather as it having happened to him, like being struck by lightning.

Your cable asking me to return to Venezuela by New York was received and I shall duly inform you when that will be.

I hope when I say I am wholly at your orders, you will understand it is only the truth.

As Lowry went through his outer office to see Cramer, his secretary hung up her telephone and stopped him. "That was Harold Titcomb," she said. "He's been let out. He wants to see you."

"Who did that?"

"'President's assistant,'" she answered, making a face.

"Tell him I'll see him when I come back," Lowry told her.

Since the day Jim Peale's personal things had been packed, the room next to what was now Cramer's had been used by out-of-town visitors for very small meetings. As Lowry passed it, he saw that John Cramer and a new secretary had been ensconced there.

Lowry went through the president's open door to find him all smiling affability.

"Well," he said, "I thought we had a very nice family time together last night."

"We did, indeed," Lowry replied. "It was very nice of you to have us."

Cramer made a deprecatory gesture. "No more than I should do. I wanted to talk to you and the others this morning about some organization matters. I shall of course be mainly concerned with the broad policies on reserves and dividends. The directors insist on that," he added with a shy smile after a brief pause. "That will mean I shall have to ration my time very carefully."

"Oh, I agree," Lowry said.

"Till yet I have always made it a point to give my own attention to details. One learns a great deal that way, but"—with another gesture evidently intended to illustrate the weight of his responsibilities—"that is no longer possible."

Lowry nodded.

"Therefore I would like everything to come to me through my assistant where it can be ——"

"But ——"

Cramer held up his hand with a father's indulgence. "I know what you're going to say, and you needn't say it. My door will still always be open to everyone. I'm sure, though, I'm going to have your wholehearted help in easing my burden."

"Naturally. I'm not sure, however, that I understand just what you intend to go to your son. Are the officers to have a daily meeting with him?"

"Oh no, they are simply asked to keep him advised and to come to me through him with any problems."

"Well, as to the first, such figures as cumulative sales and shipments, collections and so on by countries with comparison to last month and last year go to you now from our department. So with other departments—financial,

"...and here's another thing you'll like about this lovely upholstery!"

Dining furniture by Virtue Bros. Mfg. Co. Los Angeles, Calif.

It's so practical . . . even in the most delicate pastel tones! Just a brisk "once-over" with a damp sponge is all it takes to keep Masland Duran colorfully fresh and clean. You can get this luxurious vinyl plastic on living room furniture, too. Look for it when you shop. Write for free folder with samples. The Masland Duraleather Company, Dept. L-5, Philadelphia 34, Pa.

TEXTURED Masland Duran® vinyl upholstery

Get rid of toilet bowl odor and stains.
Keep your bathroom fresh as lilac time

Use perfumed
VANISH
Toilet Bowl
Cleaner

REGULAR & KING SIZE

New delete

REMOVES RUST & STAINS
from sinks and bathtubs, without harming the enamel. Delete also shines copper pots, pans, stainless steel, chrome car bumpers.

SEND FOR FREE SAMPLE

© 1957 JUDSON DUNAWAY CORP., Dover, N. H.

subsidiaries, branches. You contemplate something more than this?"

Cramer put the ends of his fingers together and looked over his glasses at Lowry. "Let us assume for the moment I do. Have you any objection?"

"I don't object to your having any figures or information you want. I would object, if you don't mind my saying so, to what sounds like a form of direct supervision."

"Friend Lowry, have you ever heard it said that the man who resents supervision can never efficiently exercise it?"

"No, has it been said?"

"Is that levity?"

"Not in the least. Well, shall we see how it goes as to the day's work and if you don't get what you require, we can talk again. There are two other matters I'd like to mention."

"Certainly. I'm here to help."

"No doubt you have heard it said that in management, no one should be given information they can't use. I don't believe you or your assistant can use the information in every letter I write. I imagine my associates will feel the same way. I suggest to you withdrawing this notice about carbons of all letters and that you leave it to your officers' judgment to send you a copy of anything which you ought to know about."

"Now why should you resent a simple business request? Aren't you given copies of the letters your subordinates write? If you aren't, then I am concerned about the way our foreign business is being run. We'll leave that, however, for a later date."

"I have neither heard nor spoken a word about this copies-of-all-letters memo, but I am sure my associates will object as strongly as I do. Aside from all that, I doubt that your office has even considered the weight of papers they would receive or where they'd put it, let alone read it. This is rather a large office. I take it that like all major administrators you want your officers' advice. In this case mine is to withdraw the memo."

"You had two matters, you said. What is the other?"

"Yes. It may be I am misinformed. I heard as I came in that Harold Titcomb has been dismissed."

"That is very and most definitely the case."

"Well, like you, I'm rather a newcomer in the organization, but I understood very early that Titcomb, the oldest employee here and one of the most efficient, was to stay as long as he wanted to. If he is not leaving by mutual consent, I think it's a mistake and I believe it will be widely resented at all levels. Do you mind telling me what happened?"

"Is the mail room part of the Foreign Department?"

"No, but I'm a friend of the head of the mail room," Lowry said with a smile.

"Titcomb has been let go because he's overage, inefficient ——"

"No, he's not inefficient."

"Will you please not interrupt? He's been dismissed because I'm president of this organization and I hire and fire and I don't want him around any longer. I wonder if that is clear?" His voice remained at its utterly unemotional level.

"Clear, yes, but not, I think, the sort of good judgment you're noted for. Is that all?"

"Well, not quite, friend Lowry. You spoke just now of my being a newcomer like you. Of course that isn't so. My close relations with the company go back many years, but I do appreciate how you feel. Your friend, Peale, is gone, Mr. Rutledge, who found you, is gone, and now Mr. Johnson. You feel strange, not quite at home yet perhaps, your first trip turning out badly, uncertain, possibly resentful. Now don't have any such feeling. We're all sure you're going to do very well."

"I wasn't aware of such feelings at all," Lowry replied.

"Well," Cramer said comfortingly, "sometimes it takes us a long time to know ourselves."

Hewitt was not in yet, but Evans was waiting in Lowry's office with the carbon memo.

"What ——" he began.

"Mr. Lowry, you should be leaving for the Johnson Foundation meeting. I phoned you'd be a little late," Lowry's secretary said.

"Thanks. I'd forgotten."

"Before you go," Evans said, "I don't see why this memo isn't enough for Calvin to see Delano with. And today."

"Look, we can't go to see Delano on a detail like that. It would be absurd."

"Do you mean to say you didn't protest?"

"I advised him to withdraw it. I've got to go."

The rest of the morning with his fellow trustees, Henry Dennison and Walter Caithness, was a satisfactory one for Lowry. He was brought somewhat abruptly back to his own problems at the end of it when Caithness asked him how he liked the new boss. Dennison paused to listen to his reply.

"I'm interested, too," he said. "Cramer was very effective on rescue work for the bank some years ago."

"Well," Lowry said, "he has been there only a few days. He's been very nice, had us and our wives in to dinner. He"—he was trying furiously to think of something in Cramer's favor—"he goes about things differently from Mr. Rutledge or Tom, of course."

ARTISTIC APPRECIATION

By SUZANNE DOUGLASS

That yellow circle is the sun.
That oblong shape below,
With windows in it, is a house.
Those spots are flakes of snow.
That red thing is a chimney,
And that wavy line is smoke.
And that purple dot is nothing,
It's just where the crayon broke.
The black line is the sidewalk.
Those green streaks are the grass;
And it's hanging on the blackboard
In front of all the class!
My daughter's name is on it,
Artistically misspelt;
It's beautiful . . . and now I know
How Rembrandt's mother felt.

"Do you know Delano well?" Caithness asked.

"Hardly at all."

"Would you like me to get him to lunch someday?"

Lowry hesitated. "I'd like it very much," he said, "but I think I better not do it at this time."

"I know him very well, of course," Caithness said. "He's responsible for Cramer. Well, I can see your point. We'll leave it for the present, but don't hesitate to call me if you change your mind or need any help."

"That's very nice of you."

"I shouldn't say this in front of Henry, but I should think Cramer would drive you all crazy and I'll bet he does," Caithness said. "But I admit he's always got results."

On Lowry's return to the office his secretary said Mr. Evans and Mr. Hewitt would like to see him as soon as possible. He found them both in Hewitt's office looking angry but dejected.

"We both talked to him separately about this damn memo—and got exactly nowhere. Now what are we going to do?" Hewitt asked. "Are you going to send those carbons?"

"Well, if we do," Lowry said, "a few days should make it clear even to him that it's impractical. If we don't, we're starting a row with him on a detail. Any directors would back him up—a new president's entitled to familiarize himself with operations in whatever way he thinks best."

"So you're just going to take it lying down, Evans said.

"He can always say," Lowry continue "that it's simply a temporary expedient, an that he was quite amenable to suggestions

"I won't do it. I don't have to and I won't Hewitt said and walked out.

"My thought is that if we have to figh there'll be better grounds than this," Low said to Evans.

In his own office, his secretary told him th the president's assistant had been in and ask where he was and on being told wanted know how long he had been a Johnson trust and how often meetings were held.

"I thought you ought to know," she sai

He took a long breath. "I suppose I shoul But I don't want us to get in the frame mind where we think there's something impo tant or personal in everything that office sa or does ——"

"Then I shouldn't have told you?"

"It isn't that. I appreciate your telling n but don't let yourself get worked up about Things will settle down in a few days. N about the carbons"—he sighed—"send th in for the present."

About four-thirty Rosalie telephoned to her class was just over and when could leave.

"I'll be on the sidewalk here at ten at five," he said and looked up to see Crame his doorway. Involuntarily he hung up mid-sentence.

"Can I have a moment, friend Lowr Cramer asked.

"Certainly."

"Just two things in passing. I've got to g meet Mr. Delano at your Hounds Club. been thinking after talking to you and frie Evans and Hewitt that, since you all seem feel so strongly about those carbons, possi I was wrong. I've rescinded the procedure, I'd appreciate if you and the others wo make personally sure John gets carbons anything he should have."

"We certainly will," Lowry said. "And seemed balky this morning, I'm sorry."

"Not at all, not at all. I wanted to tell as soon as I decided, but you were out. I ha realized you were on the Johnson board u John told me. I want to say I'm very gla hear it. I want to be sure all our men feel to use company time or facilities on proj of civil or human betterment. Well, I mus keep Mr. Delano waiting." He blinked beamed on Lowry, backing to the door wh he paused. "Feeling better about things n friend Lowry? Your phone is ringing." An left with a smile.

It was Rosalie and Lowry said, "I'm so Cramer came in and I was —— What's matter?"

"Darling, I'm at the Relief building Thirty-fourth Street. Could you come t for me, please?"

"Yes. You're not ill? You sound as th you were crying. I've got to sign some m

"Just hurry. I'm all right," Rosalie told "I'll wait."

He signed his mail, approved two ca which Halleck, a department manager, bro in, and left. The sight and sound of the tr on Fifth Avenue told him a fast walk t Lexington Avenue subway was the quic route and he strode along among the ho going office workers.

He found Rosalie sitting in their car pa near the Relief building. The fine, new car Rosalie in her pretty clothes were a con to the run-down street and the tired-look shabby people passing. He went around t driver's side and, looking at her as he g he thought he had never seen her look so

"My darling, what is it?"

"I'm sorry to be a baby, but I didn't able to drive," she said and burst into tea don't know what to do. I suddenly feel a of everything, even of going home. Please care of me."

"But I will. Is it some definite pain?"

"Oh, definite—everything terrible isn't nite. I gave the lesson down here. It wasn til it was over that one of them spoke of day it is. Stephen, it's the anniversary of and I hadn't even remembered. I'd let n

CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

...for the richest, longest lasting wax luster you've ever seen on furniture!

Any shade—from lightest blond to darkest ebony—can be beautifully waxed without rubbing. Just apply Pride, let dry, wipe lightly.

As you whisk away the haze, you'll see a gleaming finish of genuine wax. One that won't trap lint and dust the way oily polishes do. A finish that stays shining bright for weeks without constant attention. All this without rubbing—or the name isn't Johnson's Pride.

Made by the makers of Johnson's Wax. Recommended for both light and dark finishes by 51 makers of fine furniture.

Get either the handy 8-ounce or thrifty 16-ounce size today!

"Pride" and "Johnson's" are registered trademarks of S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc.

Mr. Stauffer's

FAR TOO many women suffer the ordeal of drastic reducing methods—yet fail to achieve a truly beautiful figure.

This problem so intrigued B. H. Stauffer, pioneer figure-control expert, that he decided to do something about it. He reasoned that, in order to get—and keep—a slim, lovely figure, a woman must do more than merely lose weight. She must remove inches from the right places and at the same time achieve balanced posture. After long study, Stauffer concluded that this could be accomplished only through proper exercise. It was in this respect that so many reducing methods failed!

Of course, Stauffer realized that most women lack time or facilities for enough exercise to keep slender. He knew, too, that in many cases strenuous exercise is undesirable.

So he set about to find a way to take the effort out of exercising.

After years of experimenting, he found the answer. It's Mr. Stauffer's "magic couch"—a remarkable motorized unit that makes it possible for you to secure essential exercise without lifting a finger!

The "magic couch" principle of effortless exercise has been proved in the famous Stauffer System salons throughout the world. It has helped more than five million women remake their figures along slim, lovely lines.

Because of thousands of requests for salon-type treatments at home, Mr. Stauffer's "magic couch" has now been introduced for use in the home. Known as the Posture-Rest, this unique "magic couch" is the heart of the Stauffer Home Reducing Plan, which already has enabled tens of thousands of women—and their husbands—to enjoy Stauffer treatments in their own homes.

The Stauffer Home Reducing Plan lets you idle away unwanted inches. You simply lie down on the Posture-Rest and let it do all the hard work while you relax. There is no need for you to disrobe.

B. H. Stauffer, pioneer figure-control expert, whose "magic couch" has enabled thousands of women to secure essential exercise without lifting a finger.

Before Stauffer Stella Sambrusky of Beverly Hills, Calif., wasn't excessively overweight—unlike so many women who have successfully remade their figures the Stauffer way. But her figure was poor, her posture sagging, making her look far more than just 20 pounds overweight.

After Stauffer Mrs. Sambrusky had trimmed down 20 pounds, taken off a total of 31 inches. Here she is after following the Stauffer technique. Her figure was remade without starvation diet or strenuous exercise. She is well-proportioned; her weight is properly distributed.

Magic Couch

The Posture-Rest "magic couch" improves posture by gently exercising entire body. At the same time, it removes inches from the right places, gently ding your body along graceful, pleasing lines. Use of the Posture-Rest. pled with the kind of caloric control your doctor advises, restores a slim. thful-looking figure without a starvation diet or strenuous exercise—and, portantly, with no electricity or vibration applied to the body.

Unlike less comprehensive methods that merely take off weight haphazardly nd then temporarily—the Stauffer Home Reducing Plan is more than just ucing. It is a complete program of scientific figure control.

It not only takes off excess weight, but also removes unwanted inches from les, thighs, hips and tummy.

It tones and firms sagging muscles, so that your skin fits smoothly and nly over your new silhouette.

It improves your posture and gives you a more graceful carriage befitting r new, lovelier figure.

It produces wonderful results for all the family—not only helps mother ake her figure, but also gives father the necessary daily exercise that so ny businessmen often find so difficult to get, and helps teen-agers lose "baby " and start their mature life with proper posture.

The remarkable Posture-Rest "magic couch" is portable, lightweight, folds e a card table. You can rent it by the month or buy it for pennies a day.

A free home demonstration will show you better than words all the wonder- things the Stauffer Home Reducing Plan can do. The 20-minute free treat- nt in itself is a relaxing and rewarding experience . . . and it can be the start new life for you. Simply mail the coupon to arrange your demonstration.

Stauffer Home Reducing Plan representatives are highly-trained figure analysts. They conduct home demonstrations and make regular follow-up calls to be sure that their customers get the Plan's full benefits. Many of these figure control experts took up the work after remaking their own figures the Stauffer way.

FREE

STAUFFER HOME REDUCING PLAN, Dept. J-57
5929 Riverdale Avenue, New York 71, N.Y.
or 1500 N. Ogden Avenue, Chicago 10, Ill.
or 1919 N. Vineburn Avenue, Los Angeles 32, Calif.

Please have a Stauffer consultant contact me to arrange a free trial demonstration of the Stauffer Home Reducing Plan without obligation.

NAME_____

STREET_____

CITY_____ STATE_____

PHONE_____

TRADITIONAL HIDE-A-BED sofa. Choose from over 200 decorator fabrics. Full size from $299.50 depending on fabric selected.

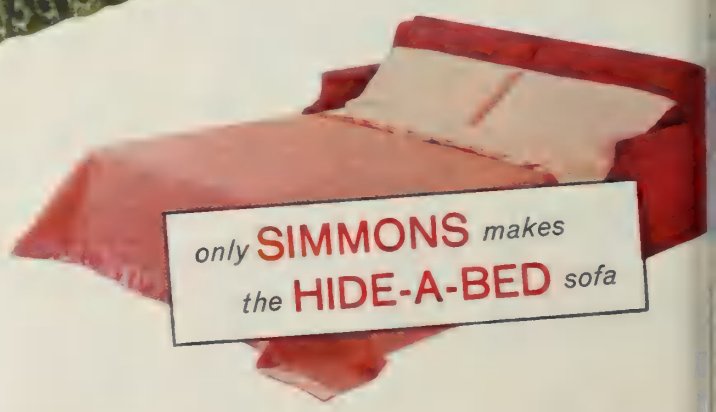
Be your own designer of a HIDE-A-BED® sofa

PROVINCIAL HIDE-A-BED sofa in vat-dyed colorfast prints; natural green, antique red, cafe or red-and-white. Full size $259.50.

MODERN HIDE-A-BED sofa, shown in coral boucle. Also brown, gold, beige, turquoise or olive green. Full size $299.50.

SIMMONS lets you pick and choose from literally hundreds of fabric styles and sizes

Have your Hide-A-Bed sofa ji the way you want. Never before su a wide choice of features, such wonderful service—and it's right your favorite store!



You simply select any one of t more than fifty uniquely detail styles—Moderns, Traditionals, P vincials. Team it up with the size y need—full or apartment, lovesea extra-wide sofas.

And last, take your pick from m than 200 fabrics . . . tweeds, prin linens, nylons, mohairs and bouc in 17 all-new colors!

Then Simmons tailors a Hide-Bed sofa to your special order. Rea usually within 3 weeks!

You get these Simmons exclusive

- Wider arm-to-arm—the full-si sofas are a full 65" between arms.
- Super-comfort cushions—wond ful Beautyrest* (or foam rubb slightly more).
- Exclusive seat design—new low height, slopes down toward the ba for maximum seating comfort.
- Easy-opening mechanism — so opens in seconds to a bed with be ding in place.
- Simmons mattress—a full-leng Deepsleep* mattress. Or the famo Beautyrest mattress, slightly more!
- Exclusive all-steel sofa frame—(n just the bed frame!) for lifetime wea

Visit your favorite furniture or department store for a wide selection of Simmons convertibles, as low as $89.95. Convenient terms.

*Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Patent Office. Copr. 1957 by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

f get father and mother and Inge and I was ppy and carefree."

"But dearie, there's been this anniversary ry year and you've been right and wise not dwell on it."

"No, I haven't. These other people, these le people, remember it and mourn for it and ave pretended it all happened to someone
. I feel like some rich horrible émigré. I en't the right to the house and our kind of
——"

"Darling, this is very foolish!"

"But don't you see ——"

They were entering the brief approach to the dtown Tunnel, passing the planting of trees, and rickety-looking from the dust and nes of the motor age. The exhaust and the brakes of the bus ahead of them drowned voice. "I can't hear you now," he said, and y sat without speaking until they passed the l gate on the Long Island side.

"Now what is it?" he asked, sure he was ht that the past should be left done.

"It was a crise de nerfs, I suppose," she said.
ou're very comforting, but sometimes you're ttle inhuman."

"What's the package?" he asked.

"A bathing suit like mine for Lainvee. She nts us to be twins."

The flood of orders, foreign and domestic, h which the next week opened was like thing that had been seen since the outbreak he Korean war. All the world's dammed-up ying power seemed to be loose. It engulfed president and the headquarters staff. In the h which continued all week even Titcomb yed at his post unnoticed by them.

When Wednesday's record-breaking total s in, Curtis sent word to the three others at Cramer was in his office and would they me in for just a minute. Coats off, sleeves led up, Hewitt's tie askew, they appeared.

"I'll only keep you a minute," Cramer said.
h the face of this, I've wired all our purchasagents to meet me in Chicago in the morn-
. I think it's where I can help most—to ke sure just how our inventories will stand to it. I propose staying right in the Chicago ice ——"

"I think that's wonderful," Lowry said.

"Charley will be on the Teletype to me as n as the mail and cables are cleared tomorw." Cramer paused and beamed at them all.
Vell, sell 'em, cowboy."

"What a relief," Hewitt said to Lowry as y went back to their offices. "And if anydy knows Middle Western suppliers, he
es. And not a word about 'my son, John.'"

"You see," Lowry said. "Wait for the aks."

"He's not such a bad little fellow," Hewitt d him as though that was what he had been ing right along.

All the rest of the week orders continued to ur in. "The biggest five-day dollar volume our history," Curtis said. They were all on Teletype and telephone to Cramer several nes a day. His calm, his resourcefulness, his owledge of components were amazing.

he buying wave tapered off at the end of next week, though with sales continuing ghtly ahead of the same period the previous ar.

On Wednesday Titcomb came to Lowry's fice. In all the rush, his firing had been gely forgotten.

"Mr. Lowry," he asked, "have you ever ard of a fellow named John Dryden?"

"There was an English poet of that name."

"That's the fellow. You know two weeks
o when I was let out I went to see Mr. Rutlge. He was the way he always is, but he said ere was nothing he could do. He was fined, he said, and would soon be forgotten wn here. But then he said to me, 'Harold, member this line by John Dryden and let it your comfort.' He said it and then I got out pencil and wrote it down. I'll read it to
u. 'But what has been, has been, and I have d my hour.' Well, I have and I'm not going spoil it rowing with someone like that amer after the type of men I've been associ-ed with. I'm leaving now. Do you know what n going to do first?"

"No, what?"

"My wife's waiting for me. We're going to take a taxi all the way to Fulton Street, Brooklyn, and we're going to have dinner at Gage and Tollner's where I used to go years ago. They been there since before I was born. Not a change. Well, they got air conditioning, everything else the same, wonderful food, expensive—but I've got money saved. I've got my pension. You can think of me in about thirty minutes ordering two lobsters for my wife and me. There's one last thing I want to tell you. I said to you the morning that Cramer was first here, 'He's going to tear the place apart'—well, he still is and don't forget it."

Lowry shook his hand. His good sense and good cheer were touching, but as Titcomb went out to say more good-bys Lowry felt a little ashamed of his own relief at what had happened and that he would not have to wrangle with Cramer about it.

Cramer was back the next morning. He deprecated the congratulations with which he was greeted and said that all the credit belonged to them and the men in the field. He was proud of each and every one. There was only one thing to be feared—and he did not fear it—but there was always the chance of people getting complacent and coasting. That must be watched.

"Oh, one last thing," he said. "I'd like those in the clerical staff who've been working overtime to have a day added to their weekend on a staggered basis."

"You were certainly right in opposing our seeing Delano," Hewitt told Lowry as they left Cramer's office. "The fellow is really all right."

Just after lunch there was a cable from Trinidad confirming the sale of two pressure vessels on which they had bid the previous week. The components had been the subject of several calls to Cramer in Chicago and Lowry went in to tell him that everything had come out all right. Miss Wilkins said Mr. Cramer would not be back but could be reached at Mr. Delano's late in the afternoon.

"Well, if he calls you might tell him the pressure vessels came through."

"He already knows it, Mr. Lowry," she said, returning to her work.

"I don't think he could. The cable just came," Lowry said.

"Under the new procedure," the president's assistant, who had come in, said, "this office gets advance-action copies of all cables where more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is involved. We had ours at twelve-thirty-five."

"I see," Lowry said, steam from his control valve all but filling the room.

Here of course was intolerable interference on which he must fight. It was an issue on which anyone with any common sense would agree with him, but what was it going to avail to get one more procedure rescinded when Cramer's thinking—to dignify the mental process—could originate them to start with? For the moment he himself was too angry to feel disheartened.

"Did you know about these advance-action copies of our cables going to Cramer's office?" he asked his secretary.

"Yes, the cable room is buzzing with it," she told him.

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"You didn't want 'stories and rumors' brought to you and you told me not to 'get worked up.'"

"Miss Marshall, you are an intelligent, attractive young woman, but you would try the patience of a saint. I am not a saint."

"I'm really very sorry. I know I should have told you, but everything is so changed and there's so much trouble being made and I feel so sorry for you."

"There, there, I'll weather it."

"But what are you going to do about this?"

"I can't do anything until 'that Cramer,' as Titcomb called him, comes in."

He was busy most of the afternoon with his department heads on the analytical report of the last two weeks' sales. The bugbear which hangs over all foreign departments had already raised its ugly head. What were they going to have left to sell? The foreign quotas of production had been filled, running over. Yet most markets had indicated that, though there would be a lull, demands had not been filled, particularly on forward deliveries. The outcome of the meeting, which went for typing, was the sort of thing Cramer ought to like and in which he could be helpful. It ought to ease the way Tuesday morning.

They all got up, grinned at one another, stretched and picked up their papers.

Halleck, the best of the department heads, a young man of thirty, hung back, motioning to Lowry that he wanted a moment alone.

"Can I say what's on my mind?" he asked.

"Sure."

"I'm wondering whether we oughtn't to have had John Cramer sit in on this."

"I can't see what possible use he would have been."

"He's talked to me several times and he wants to get in on such things and says his father wants him to. The Day's Work, he calls it. Well, it's just a suggestion."

Lowry thought a moment and then he said, "Tell me, between us, are you personally worried because I didn't get him in?"

Halleck neatened his papers again. "I'm absolutely loyal to you personally, Mr. Lowry, but yes, I think I am worried. I'm pretty sure he'll be over to ask me what we were doing in here."

"You wouldn't feel easy about telling him politely to go ask me, would you? I can see you wouldn't."

"It makes it awfully difficult," Halleck said. "If you should go to him now and tell him, he'd know I told you and he'd think —— Oh, I don't know. I suppose I'm scared about my job. We've just bought a house and we're expecting a second child in October. You know how it is."

"I do indeed," Lowry told him. "At the moment I can only make one promise that I'm sure I'll be able to keep. So tell him anything you like, say what you like about me for that matter, and you have my word I'll not hold it against you. I ought to be able to tell you your job and future are safe as long as I'm satisfied with you."

"You know," Halleck said, "I feel a lot better. You might have given me a lot of assurances and I might have relied on them. I'll take my chance with you."

"Thanks. Let's be practical. I ought to know more by eleven Tuesday morning. If I were you, I'd beat it now before the president's assistant catches you."

Lowry passed Cramer's office on the way from the conference room to his own. To say anything to young Cramer would certainly appear now to be at Halleck's suggestion. By Tuesday he ought to know whether trouble could be made for him or not. He strode past the open door. Halleck was just disappearing toward the elevator.

"What now?" Lowry asked Hewitt, who was pacing up and down his office. "Let's call it a day."

"Read this piece of insolence," Hewitt said, red with anger.

"Must I?" Lowry said wearily and, then he did read it. "Oh, I see."

"I'm going in and knock his teeth in right now. Do you want to come watch?"

The paper from John Cramer to Mr. Hewitt read:

The president regards it as important that no officer or member of his family keep any touch with Mr. Peale.

"Come on," Lowry said. "I'll leave with you. We don't want a row in here. Come on quick."

"I haven't seen or spoken to Jim since he left, but if I had who's business is it?" Hewitt asked. "I said before and I say now I'm fixed so I don't have to take this sort of thing. I'm going to knock this guy's teeth out as a public service."

In the end Lowry got him into an elevator and down to a bar without meeting Cramer, where they had a drink and wished each other a pleasant Fourth of July.

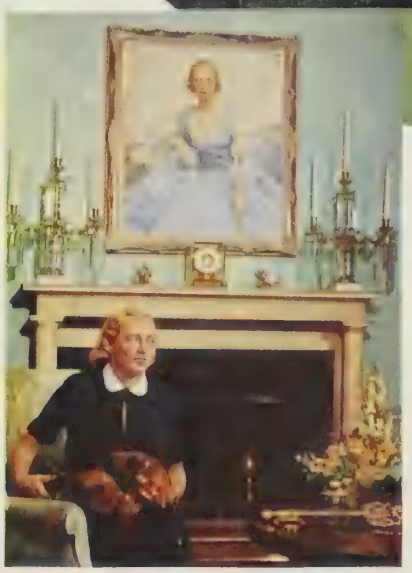
"I'm afraid," he told Rosalie when he came down after a shower for a drink on the terrace, "I'll have to unburden myself about the office. It's rather a mess. I think it's likely to get worse." He told her about the day. "You see, outside of aggression and apparent malice, it seems to have no real reason. Take the memo to Hewitt. What reason? We didn't each get one. Why is he capriciously picked out?"

"Darling, in this case there may have been a reason. Not a good one. It has to do with Paula. Calvin knows nothing about it, and she doesn't intend that he shall. She tracked Jim down and had him to lunch. Young Cramer saw them."

(To be Continued)

REFERENCE LIBRARY

DOUBLE-DUTY HALTER DRESS



Would you like a halter dress you could wear with your sweater on cool days, with a strapless bodice in summer, or over your bathing suit, for a quick cover-up? Or, using black-and-white checked taffeta instead of cotton, you could wear it for evening, with a little black velvet camisole and smart accessories—a sparkling clasp, a bright red corsage. Here is a JOURNAL pattern, simple and very easy to make; cut in only four pieces, it takes 4 yards of 39" material. Sizes 12–16, all on one pattern. To order, ask for No. 2592, and send 35c* to: Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

*Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

STUART

Busy Manhattan buzzes arou it, but the mansion grounds are ru green, serene. Archibald Gracie, who ow a fleet of clipper ships, made his home here in 17 New York City purchased it in 18

DI PIETRO

Susan Wagner, official hostess of New York City, comes of a family of ten, brings homemaking talent to the mansion.

DI PIETRO

His Honor the Mayor, Robert F. Wagner, broils steaks at the fireplace on an informal evening with son Robert, Jr., 13. Duncan, 9, is currently at boarding school.

New Kitchen for Gracie Mansion

A graceful and historic home of the late 1700's, now official residen of the mayor of New York City and his family, has its kitchen re-equipped with waist-high ove sit-down sink, built-in freezer and all conveniences to aid its official and family lif

By MARGARET DAVIDSON Homemaking Editor of the Journal

On grassy banks rolling down to Manhattan's East River, the stately Mayor's Mansion stands serenely in a charmed circle amid skyscrapers. Here the mayor of New York, Robert F. Wagner, and his blond wife, Susan, give leisurely lawn parties, official lunches and dinners for world dignitaries.

When the mansion opened its doors, New York's population was 60,000. Today the city of 8,000,000 crowds around the hush of the majestic old house and grounds. The wide windows of the living room view boats moving downriver, and the low hoot of their whistles mingles with the nostalgic tock of a grandfather's clock in the high-ceilinged hall.

"It's a lovely house," says "Mrs. Mayor" Susan Wagner affectionately, "for raising a family and for entertaining. We use the lower floor for official functions—at least a hundred and twenty-five a year—and our sitting rooms and extra guest rooms are all on the second floor." Each gracious room has its original fireplace. A library of fine books in fragrant leather bindings, gold eagle motifs in wall decoration all add to the home's dignity as an "official residence," but the personal touches of Mrs. Wagner warm it with the talent of a hostess and homemaker. Her own lovely old fruit plates glow from an eighteenth-century breakfront, porcelain birds perch lightly on a marble mantel, a rare old Bible rests on a table among vases of flowers fresh from the garden. Many of the rooms, having grown dark, were lightened with reproductions of the early pastels. Among Sheraton, Hepple white and Adam heirlooms, thin old silver and commodio chests, the home has refreshed itself with new fabrics an conveniences added through the years.

The only neglected room had been the kitchen, until Mr Wagner decided, with JOURNAL help, to bring it up to nov A memo for historians: Susan Wagner installed its fir dishwasher. She decided, also, to replace its old woo cabinets, yearned for a freezer to save trips to the basemer locker, for a food warmer and an eye-level oven.

Now the kitchen shines in the soft pastels and clear foliag colors that were in vogue when Archibald Gracie built th mansion. But now the gleaming pink counters have a delicat crackle design, in laminated plastic, easy to maintain. Th soft potter's blue of cabinets is echoed on the walls. Abov the cabinets a panoramic mural brings back graceful mem ories of the 1800's. The rosy-pink floor with black insets i rubber, silent under the heaviest traffic of the day. Fo sometimes Susan Wagner hears over the phone from Cit Hall: "Can you have the wives and daughters of forty-eigh visiting governors in for tea?" She notes the date. "Of course At four o'clock? We'll be looking forward to them!"

And late at evening, with the mayor and their two sons Susan knows the family can gather for a late snack in th dining nook—for a touch of informality between dates witl guest books and history books.

STUART

Remodeled dining nook, sunny and airy, looks over lawns into heart of Manhattan. The space was once a porch, and outside walls are of wide clapboards. Spirited new curtains are cotton in pink-and-green floral print. Susan Wagner's touch provides fresh fruit and greenery. Around marble-topped table sit black iron chairs with rose-pink plastic pillows. "This room is one of the hardest used in our house—it's never empty."

DI PIETRO

In a typical week there are five or more large dinners on the calendar, and at busy seasons Mayor and Mrs. Wagner are engaged for lunch as well. At the start of a full day, Robert, Jr., breakfasts with his mother, to talk over mail and news. Both boys take an interest in government, and inside view of legislation at home helps their schoolwork.

STUART

In now modernized kitchen, soft blue of the steel cabinets is fired for durability. At left of new eye-level oven is an under-the-counter food warmer of stainless steel which keeps food appetizingly hot during parties when fresh supplies are frequently needed. Above it on counter are pull-down cooking units to supplement the big range (not shown). At far right is under-counter freezer. A mobile cart wheels up where needed (in foreground), holds utensils and bread and cake bins under its carving-board top.

For more views of equipment, see page 127.

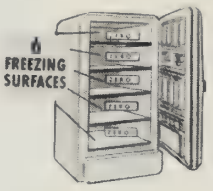
GUARANTEED TO OUTPERFORM ALL OTHERS

Amana Stor-Mor Freezer

Supermarket convenience in your Kitchen!

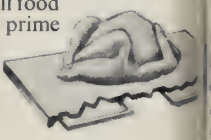
Freezer Model 19

Think of it! 685 pounds of food, at your fingertips, in your kitchen. Choice steaks, roasts, and chops. Fruits and vegetables in or out of season. Ice cream, fish and game whenever your taste asks for it!



And food is protected by Amana-Matic freezing! Each shelf—plus top and bottom surfaces—contains actual freezing coils.

And as added protection, the famous Amana Double Warranty: A Five-Year Warranty on mechanical refrigeration components and a Five-Year Warranty against food spoilage due to mechanical failure of refrigeration system!



More and more American women every day find life easier with freezer living. For an Amana Freezer in your kitchen cuts down shopping trips; reduces meal preparation time; lets you cook and buy in quantity, the easy, economical, modern way!

With more and more frozen food on market shelves every day, it's easy to end menu monotony forever the Amana way. Why not see for yourself what an Amana Freezer can mean in your kitchen. Ask how Amana can bring you finest foods in the finest Freezer made. At better dealers all over the United States and Canada.

Amana
BACKED BY A CENTURY-OLD TRADITION OF FINE CRAFTSMANSHIP

6 FAST FREEZING SURFACES! Refrigerating coils at top and bottom, and every shelf! Means positive contact freezing . . . for Amana stores all food on, or directly below, solid prime freezing plates!

THE NEW "STOR-MOR" DOOR! Holds 80 full pounds of food . . . a month of meals! All food at fingertips! Special rack for fruit juice concentrate. Automatic inventory control.

FOR MODERN FREEZER LIVING AT ITS FINEST . . . Learn about the Amana Plan For Better Living. The most wonderful way in the world to assure your family new health, happiness and convenience. True supermarket convenience in your kitchen with amazing economy!

THE Amana PLAN for Better Living

AMANA REFRIGERATION, INC., AMANA 4, IOWA

WEEKEND IN THE COUNTRY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 73

about law as her celebrated husband. For the seven years Phoebe had been Jeannie's friend, they had treated her like another daughter.

As Phoebe kissed them both on the cheek, Mrs. Moore said, "But Phoebe dear, where is your young man?"

"I forgot to tell you, mother," said Jeannie. "Her young man can't come."

As Phoebe stared at the place set for Bryan, Mrs. Moore patted her hand. "Ah, that's too bad, dear. Do sit down, children. Sammy, you sit over there. Jeannie, fetch me the bell so I can ring for Maggie to bring the soup."

Halfway through lunch Mrs. Moore turned to Phoebe with a complicit smile. "Is this the same young man you were stewing about all last spring?"

Phoebe blushed. "I'm afraid so."

Mrs. Moore laughed. "Well, Phoebe darling, we'll just have to plan a campaign for you. Now look at Jeannie. She's only known Peter for two and a half months, yet they've practically set the date!"

"Mother!" Jeannie was now blushing too. "You really can't go and say things like that. If Peter ever ——"

Phoebe skillfully interrupted: "I don't think any sort of campaign would do any good in this case. Some men just refuse to be coerced."

"True enough," said Mr. Moore, winking at his wife.

"Oh sure, sure," laughed Sammy. "You mean some men just don't have a chance when girls like you two get to work!"

There was the crunching sound of car wheels on the drive, a car door slammed. A moment later Peter Ackerson came into the room, a rangy, sandy-haired boy with a disarming smile that took in the whole room. "Hello, everybody." His gray eyes collided with Jeannie's. "Hello, you."

Mrs. Moore patted her pretty mouth with a napkin, beamed with Mr. Moore at their daughter's beau. "Pull up a chair, son," said Mr. Moore.

"We'll have some lunch for you in a moment," said Mrs. Moore, shaking the service bell.

"No lunch, thanks. I ate an hour ago." Shyly he kissed Jeannie's cheek.

"How did you get here so soon?" Jeannie's eyes were round, adoring.

STUART

Along window wall, pink plastic counter extends over dishwasher sprayed to match cabinets. Wooden cutting section, far right, near breakfast room, is also coffee-making center. Three-way sink extends from wall.

Extra Aids at Gracie Mansion n the remodeled kitchen of the mayor of New York City, these helps are favorites. Other kitchen iews are on page 125. For a busy hostess, a big family or the remodeled kitchen anywhere, consider:

A three-way sink with swinging faucet

To keep work from bottlenecking, the sink above is a real blessing. One side, with shallow basin, has overhang that allows plenty of knee room to pull up a stool for sit-down work. Two basins on opposite side can be used for pan washing or dish rinsing. Faucet swings around. Two can work here simultaneously.

A food warmer with automatic settings →

Shown open at right, the under-counter warmer can be set at "moist hot" or "dry hot," can keep a dinner pipingly edible when a husband is late or can allow a homemaker to cook for guests hours ahead.

A frozen-food locker under the counter →

A freezer that opens like a drawer and can be built in under any work surface is a "second" freezer for the mansion (a big one is in the basement), is also the answer for a kitchen that can't spare wall area for a jumbo model. It holds 170 pounds of frozen food, and its pull-out design makes all five cubic feet of storage visible and also reachable.

"I took the twelve-fifty, then got a cab from the station."

"You really should have called us, Peter," said Mrs. Moore. "Sammy would have picked you up in the station wagon."

"Or I would have," said Jeannie. "We'd have saved you two dollars."

Peter reddened, shrugged. "It doesn't matter—especially about the two dollars." In the small awkward silence that followed, he greeted Phoebe and pulled up a chair. The kitchen door opened, and Maggie, despite his earlier refusal, set a cup of coffee and some of the chocolate soufflé in front of him. He sipped the coffee but ignored the soufflé.

Mrs. Moore leaned forward. "I thought of you last week, Peter, when I went to the Bragaard Gallery and saw that African-sculpture show." She began to talk intently. A few moments later Mr. Moore joined in and there was a spirited discussion of art.

Phoebe sat very still, watching, listening, her heart tight in her chest. This was the way things ought to be: you fell in love, you were loved back, he met your family and it was a wonderful family like this so, inevitably, he fell in love with all of them too. Your brilliant, charming mother and father who could talk about things your man was vitally interested in, at the same time making him feel a part of the family. And a kid brother like Sammy who became suddenly quiet and subdued, showing you that he wanted your Peter to think him a man, reassuring you in this most simple of ways about the soundness of your choice.

When she had received the invitation to bring Bryan along this weekend, her hopes had soared. At last, at last he would see her in a flattering and gracious setting . . . and perhaps forget his picture of the intense, hard-working girl who lived in a small neat apartment in an old brownstone house. In her mind she had heard Mr. Moore talking to Bryan about advertising, Mrs. Moore discussing music with him. She had seen herself arm in arm with him walking about the beautiful garden while Mrs. Moore dabbled in water colors on the terrace, Mr. Moore tended his beloved flowers, and Sammy wandered about in his sneakers. By borrowing some of this background she'd hoped that she might cause Bryan to see her in a new light, to forget the girl who'd made her own curtains, and rather pathetically kept the silver candlesticks out all the time—her sole inheritance of any home, given her by an aunt after her mother had died.

She sighed heavily, bringing her attention back to the table. "Met a fellow last week who's looking for a young architect," Mr. Moore was saying, polishing his glasses with a handkerchief. "He's going to build a weekend house and wants someone with fresh, new ideas." He put the glasses back on, beaming at Peter. "Naturally, I told him about you."

"But wouldn't he want someone with more experience than I've had, sir?"

"When I showed him pictures of the Colberson house you did, he thought you'd had enough experience."

"Who is this man, daddy?" Jeannie asked, putting her hand over Peter's.

"Old friend of mine named Blackman." He smiled. "Very well connected. Could do you a lot of good, Peter."

Peter was looking down into his cup of coffee. "Well, sir . . . I did just take a commission for a housing development up in Massachusetts. I imagine that's going to keep me tied up on into the spring."

"No rush about this. Blackman's a man of great patience."

Strangely silent until now, Sammy suddenly pushed back his chair with a clatter. Glancing at him, Mrs. Moore said, "I forgot to mention that you children were all invited over to the Fullertons' for a swim."

"A swim? In October?" Peter laughed.

"Darling, it's as hot as any day in August," said Jeannie. "And the Fullertons have a pool. Remember I told you about them?"

"Oh, yes," said Peter a shade dryly, "the tobacco Fullertons. Knew somebody who wanted an architect too." He paused. "Well . . . sure I'd like a swim."

"Count me out," said Sammy and started for the door.

"Now, Sammy," Mrs. Moore called after his back, "Sarah expressly told me to have you come. Grace is in for the weekend." As Sammy went out she turned back to the others. "If you are going for a swim, the suits are in the cedar closet upstairs. I put them away weeks ago, thinking that swimming time was over."

The Fullertons lived in a huge sprawling white house, on rolling acres of land. Phoebe, who had been there before, had wanted Bryan to see it because it was the sort of place he loved; he had often pointed out houses like it on drives they took in the country as what he hoped to own, himself, someday. As they pulled into the long driveway, several other cars were already parked there—a station wagon, a convertible and a small red foreign car. Jeannie and Peter climbed out first and walked arm in arm across the grass toward the terrace in back of the house. Phoebe followed with Sammy, the only one not in a bathing suit and robe, who listlessly dragged a tennis racket and whistled tunelessly between his teeth.

Four people were seated on the terrace overlooking the large kidney-shaped swimming pool: handsome Mac and Sarah Fullerton; Grace, their awkward fifteen-year-old daughter; and a dark-haired man seated with his back to the newcomers. Phoebe greeted the Fullertons and was amusedly watching Sammy force himself to talk to the adolescent Grace when a voice at her elbow said, "Since no one is going to introduce us, I'll do it myself."

She looked up into a long, thin, homely face, strangely familiar.

"Aren't you Phoebe Markham? I tried to ask you that on the West Side Drive this morning, but you obviously thought I was just being fresh. I'm Dave Pearson."

Suddenly Phoebe remembered the red car, the drive up that morning, and blushed. "I didn't know how you knew my name ——"

"I met you at a party last year."

Phoebe was only more embarrassed, confused.

"At Alan Bryer's."

She still did not remember. Alan Bryer, an editor on the newspaper where she worked, was one of the best friends of her boss, Sally Fritchett, editor of the women's page. Phoebe remembered going to the party with Sally, remembered meeting many people there. But not Dave Pearson. In desperation, she said, "Do you work on the paper too?"

"No, I work in television. I write material for the moron comedian on the Webman Show." His dark eyes were amused. "I talked to you for quite a while, and look—you don't even remember."

"I'm sorry." She thought, He doesn't have to make such a point of it.

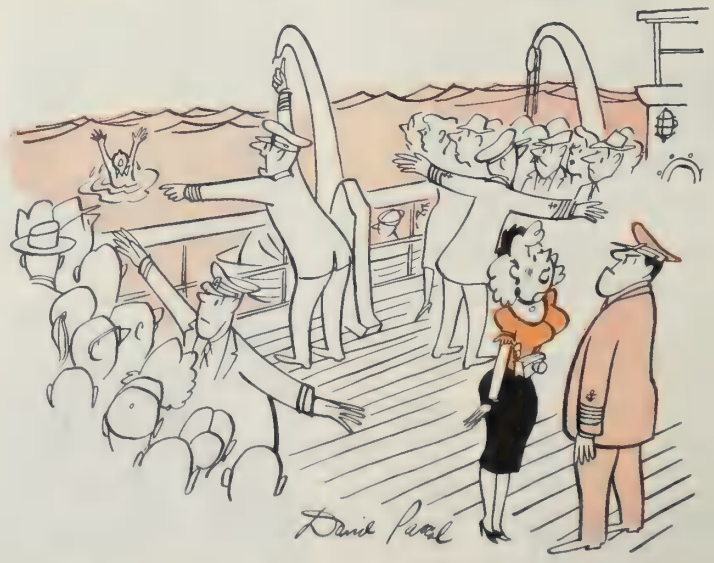
"You even told me about your job: Sally's indispensable assistant."

She shook her head impatiently. The only thing that was familiar about him was, oddly enough, the faint resemblance to Bryan. For in spite of his homely face, his clothes, his build, his sun tan, his manner were like Bryan's. Even

CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

for DEPENDABLE MOVING



'cross town

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER
...he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

"So, just to get rid of him, I said, 'Go jump in the ocean!'"

MIRRO Copper-Tone Canister Set

1½, 2, 3, and 4-qt. capacities.
Complete set, $9.95

Chrome MIRRO-MATIC Electric Percolator

Classic styling, completely automatic.
8-cup, $19.95

MIRRO Copper-Tone Bread Box

With center shelf and cutting-board in door.
17x11x9⅛", $11.95

MIRRO-MATIC Electric Fry Pan

With selective MIRRO-MATIC Heat Control Plug.
Completely immersible!
11" square, $19.95
Matching cover, $2.50

MIRRO Copper-Tone Mold Set

5 decorative molds, 2½ to 4-cup capacities.
Tarnish-proof.
Complete set, $5.95

MIRRO Copper-Tone Cake Carrier

Tall enough for frosted angel cakes.
Positive-locking cover.
11¼" diameter, $5.95

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY

UL

RECOMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE

Prices slightly higher in West.

more and still more MIRRO gift ideas!

...and don't forget to be good to yourself, too!

Chrome MIRRO-MATIC Electric Percolator
Contemporary styling, completely automatic. 9-cup, $17.95

MIRRO-MATIC Pressure Pans
4-qt. (illust.), $13.95
2½-qt., $12.95 6-qt., $19.95
8-qt., $22.95 16-qt., $28.95
4-qt. Electric, $29.95

MIRRO Bun Warmer
With inset basket and cover vent, $4.50

MIRRO Electric Popcorn Popper
Ideal TV companion.
2½-qt. automatic, $7.50

MIRRO Gold-Tone Alumilite Cocktail Set. Shaker, jigger, and ice tongs, $4.95

MIRRO Warp-Proof Fry Pans
7", $2.25; 9", $2.95
10", $3.95; 11", $4.50

MIRRO-MATIC Electric Percolator
Completely automatic. Polished aluminum. 8-cup, $12.95

Look what the Tappan* built-in GAS range offers you today-

Cooks whole meals automatically... does it faster and cleaner, too!

Faster! Everyone who cooks with dependable Gas knows what a wonderful fuel it is. Top burners give high heat in an instant . . . turn down low at the twist of a dial. No warm-up wait; no hangover heat! Ovens heat up in a jiffy. Quick, lively flame in the smokeless broiler gives food that good outdoor flavor. Only Gas gives you perfect control of cooking temperature on top of the stove, in the oven, in the broiler.

Cleaner! No smoke-stained walls when you cook with Gas! The blue flame eats up smoke and odor, guarantees smokeless broiling . . . with the door closed. Pots and pans stay sparkling bright on new Gas burners. And today's Gas ranges are easy to clean. Light-weight burners lift out for easy sudsing in the dishpan. Porcelain enamel finish and chrome trim wipe clean with a damp cloth. AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

COMPLETELY AUTOMATIC! Today's new Gas ranges are not only faster and cleaner . . . they have automatic controls galore to make difficult recipes easy as boiling water. Take a look at the new Tappan Gas built-ins now. You'll be absolutely amazed at what they can do!

BURNER WITH A BRAIN makes any pan completely automatic. This new automatic top burner heat control has a sensing element that "feels" the heat of the pan . . . then it raises or lowers the flame to maintain the right temperature. Food can't scorch or burn on Tappan's "Set-'n-forget" top burner.

WALL OVEN COOKS DINNER AUTOMATICALLY. Just set the handy clock control! This oven turns itself on . . . cooks dinner while you're away . . . turns itself off whenever you want. Convenient waist-level height, easy to clean. And the Tappan wall oven is really planned for big family dinners.

Cabinets by Geneva Modern Kitchens

ONLY GAS

See this new built-in range at your Gas utility company or Gas appliance dealer's.

See "Playhouse 90" with Julia Meade on CBS-TV. Sponsored by your Gas company and the Gas industry. Watch local listings for time and station.

does so much more...for so much less!

The modern, economical fuel for automatic cooking · refrigeration · water-heating · clothes-drying · house-heating · air-conditioning · incineration.

*Product of TAPPAN STOVE COMPANY, Mansfield, Ohio

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 128

his being there at the rich Fullertons' fitted nto the picture. Thinking in this vein, she said, "I suppose the Fullertons are sponsors of ours."

He blinked. "Why, no. Not directly, anyway. They're old friends." He smiled. "But Mac's father is thinking of taking me on as writer of the Fullerton Tobacco Company's new show. He's coming up tomorrow—and Sarah and Mac are giving me all sorts of pointers on how to make the kill."

Yes, that was like Bryan. Bryan who at that very moment was up at Blodgett's, coolly, calmly moving in. "I hope you make it," she said abruptly, and turned to find Jeannie, Peter and Mac Fullerton already gone down to the pool, Sammy and Grace gone off to play tennis, only Sarah Fullerton remaining.

She smiled at Phoebe. "I see you two know each other. Why don't you sit down and make yourselves comfortable? I'm going inside and change into a suit."

Reluctantly Phoebe sat down on a pink wrought-iron chair, and Dave Pearson sat down near her. "I've got to be honest, Phoebe—I've had your name in my little black book for over a year, and I even went so far as to look up your address and phone number in the telephone book."

Phoebe had to smile. "Then why didn't you call?"

"Scared. Just plain scared. I hate calling up a girl cold and going into that you-probably-don't-remember-me routine. Besides . . . I was pretty sure we'd run into each other. I know a lot of the guys that work on your paper."

"Well, you see, we finally did."

"Yes." He dropped the bantering tone. "And I'm glad."

Flushing, she focused on the pool. "Do you know the Moores at all?"

"No. I never get up here much. I have a little place of my own—a little shack I share with another guy out on Long Island."

She couldn't resist it. Again it sounded like the worst part of Bryan. A little car. A little drink. A little account. A little something has come up. The glorious sophistication of understatement. "Just a little shack? Along the same lines as that little jalopy outside?"

"What? Oh, you mean the Mascerati! My dear Phoebe—that is not my car. It belongs to a very nice, very rich friend who loaned it to me for the weekend. Merely transportation."

Hating herself, she was silent.

"When I say shack, I mean shack," he told her. "Tod and I built it ourselves with our own hands. He's a painter and I'm a writer—it works out very well. We literally spend whole days in silence—only coming up for air and talk at meals."

Sarah Fullerton, beautiful in a red bathing suit, came out on the terrace as Phoebe asked, "Do you write anything else besides rags for that comic?"

"Dear girl, does he write other things?" Sarah Fullerton perched herself on the arm of Dave Pearson's chair and patted his dark head. "He's been working on a novel for three years, and has a play all finished, a perfectly marvelous play just begging to be produced." She smiled fondly down at him. "But take a look at our genius. We invite him up to meet Daddy Fullerton, and he goes and gets himself all fitted out like a corny movie version of a writer—tweedy, sportsy in Tod's wardrobe . . . oh, a sketch!" She tugged the short dark hair. "Darling, don't you know that Daddy Fullerton would like you just as well in your usual hoppy state?"

Dave Pearson reddened and turned to Phoebe. "My answer to your question is: yes, I write other things besides gags, Phoebe."

Phoebe smiled weakly. She was all wrong. About everything. Her unhappiness over Bryan was really making a monster of her. This poor fellow, insecure, self-conscious, went and borrowed clothes and a car to give him moral support. Bryan believed in the clothes and the car; and what's more, they were his.

"And what about you, Phoebe?" he said.

Sarah Fullerton stood up. "Think I'll let you two world-beaters sit here and discover each other—me, I'm going in for a swim."

"Don't mind her," said Dave Pearson when she'd gone. "Sometimes I think Mac's money has softened her brain."

"I don't. In fact, I like her very much."

He stared at her with large, earnest dark eyes. "But there's something you do mind, Phoebe. You've got some sort of chip on your shoulder which seems too heavy for such a pretty girl to bear."

Quickly she stood up, undoing the tie of her pink terry-cloth robe. "Let's join the others for a swim. Why don't you go upstairs and change into a suit?"

After swimming, everyone sat on the terrace. Phoebe was watching Jeannie and Peter, who seemed strangely subdued, as though they might have quarreled in the pool over something, when Dave Pearson said:

"You're not listening. Granted, they're a very attractive couple, but I was just saying that if you didn't have anything else to do tonight, maybe I could come over and the four of us could drive into town for a movie."

She looked into his grave, long face near hers. "I'm sorry," she lied. "There is something else to do."

"Then perhaps —— When are you going back to town?"

"Tomorrow night." Then before he could put himself out on a limb again, she said gently, "But I'll be busy tomorrow too."

He smiled. "Well . . . I still have your number back in town."

Phoebe wet her lips. How could you say to such a thoroughly nice person, Look, don't bother. There's somebody else I'm waiting for. He sometimes doesn't call for days, and so I'm free, but not free at all. Because when he doesn't call I'm sitting by the phone, hoping, praying that he will. "Yes, so you do," she said flatly, hoping he would get the idea.

He did. He looked at her hand. "Are you engaged . . . or something?"

"Something."

"Oh."

Phoebe felt unreasonably angry again. She couldn't help it if Bryan hadn't yet branded her, tagged her with a ring for all the world to see, to state in this oldest of ways: Look—this is mine!

"Feeb, are you coming?" called Sammy.

Phoebe rose. "Yes, I'm coming." Then politely, carefully avoiding Dave Pearson's eyes, she said her thanks and good-bys.

There was a real October nip to the air after dinner, and Mr. Moore lit a fire, the six of them settling down in the huge, oak-beamed living room. Sammy seemed unusually restless, and after pacing the room several times finally asked his father if he could have the keys to the car. When Mr. Moore asked where he was going, Sammy said just to a movie in town, smiling oddly. Mr. Moore looked over at his wife, who was frowning down at a magazine she held, and, shrugging, gave Sammy the keys. After he'd gone, Mr. Moore settled in a corner with Peter and began to talk architecture, while Jeannie put a stack of records on the player and came to sit on the floor in front of them, listening and watching the fire play on Peter's expressive face as he talked. Phoebe and Mrs. Moore played chess. At eleven o'clock Mrs. Moore's long delicate fingers pushed her white queen opposite Phoebe's black king. "Checkmate!" she said firmly, and stood up. Several minutes later Mr. and Mrs. Moore went upstairs, and Phoebe, knowing just how much Jeannie and Peter longed to be alone, selected a thick book from the study and said her good nights too.

As she shut the door to the bedroom, the phonograph downstairs began on some romantic French songs. She got into her pajamas and sat at the open window, staring into the dark with a loaded heart. Jeannie and Peter. All sewed up. The Moores were already treating Peter with the proprietary interest and generosity of in-laws, and even though Peter was not yet making nearly enough money to support Jeannie, they could and undoubtedly would get married soon. She'd overheard something Mr. Moore had said to Peter: clearly he was going to help them out until Peter could stand on his own.

It wasn't fair.

RELEASE

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

She followed her man
To a mountaintop,
And her heart was cold
As the day was hot.

He urged her on
Till the sky was bared;
She stood on the rim
Of the world and stared

At the cradle-shaped vale
Buried in sleep,
And her heart was still
As her grief was deep.

He took her hand:
"We'll start anew,"
And, "Sarah," he said—
"I care too."

Is your husband the same man you married?

Of course he is. But, does he look the same?

Hasn't he added an inch here and there? Naturally, you can't suggest this to him—even indirectly. (You know the male ego.) But you can quietly cut down his calories . . . plan your meals around Diet Delight Foods. They're so good-tasting he'll never know they're not the old pound-adders . . . except in his trimming figure.

He will thoroughly enjoy them and compliment your cooking too. Diet Delight preserves natural, fresh flavor without adding calories—even when sweetening is needed. The secret is Sucaryl® (calcium cyclamate, which has neither calories nor a peculiar aftertaste). The result is downright delicious. You'll find a wide variety of Diet Delight Foods at your grocer's. To show you how appetizing any diet can be we have a FREE recipe and sample menu booklet, "How To Diet Delightfully." Drop a card to: RICHMOND-CHASE COMPANY, Dept. DL, San Jose, Calif.

How long had it been? Eight years. Eight hard, determined years of being on her own. With detached pity she thought of the seventeen-year-old who had set out from her uncle and aunt's home. Uncle Harry and Aunt Meg—the two people to bring her up after her parents had been killed in a train crash—two people who had been kind enough to her, but who had never really loved her. How could they, when they'd never had enough love for each other? The bickering, the lying, the shouting and cheating. She had seen it all between them. And so when they had told her at last that they were going to separate, she'd made clear to them that she no longer wanted to be a burden, a worry to them. She had worked her way through college, winning all possible scholarships, taking jobs every summer in the hot deserted city, while Jeannie and the rest of her friends from school went abroad or to some luxurious summer home.

The first time that she'd ever gone home with Jeannie she had known the meaning of real envy. Not for her money, but for the big rambling house, the easy camaraderie between mother, father, brother, sister. It was a house of love, understanding and intelligence. Who could help emerging well adjusted and happy when it was from such a family?

After college she'd fended for herself again, hunting for months until she got the first job as copy girl on the paper. She'd taken an apartment with Mary Jane because she was desperately lonely—and it was cheaper. For Jeannie it was different. With her father's influence she'd got a job immediately, in one of the largest publishing houses in New York, at excellent pay. Pay she didn't need for food or rent, since she lived with her family in their town house, surrounded by loving concern.

It wasn't fair. . . .

The first thing she thought as soon as she opened her eyes in the sun-filled room was, Bryan is going to call. Then she sat up in bed horrified at the idea that he might have called already, and that Maggie or one of the Moores would have told him she was sleeping, and simply taken the message.

As she climbed out of bed she glanced over at Jeannie, who was still asleep, her pretty face pushed childishly into the pillow, her fine light hair tangled on the pillow. She'd let her sleep.

After orange juice and coffee in the kitchen she went outside where Mr. Moore was already at work in the flower beds, Mrs. Moore was polishing her nails in a deck chair, and Sammy was knee-deep in Sunday papers. The said no, there hadn't been any calls that morning, so she said she was going down to the lower level of the terraced garden, would they please get her there when the call came? At the bottom of the garden she lay down on the grass with her hands pillowing her head. An end-of-the-season bumblebee soared over her head. Snippet-snippet-snip went Mr. Moore's shears in the flower beds. He had come down to the lower terrace to get some chrysanthemums and he tenderly clipped them, dropping them in a basket at his side. Finally he went back up to the main level of the garden, and she shut her eyes, luxuriating in the hot sun.

"Really working on that sun tan, aren't you?" said Peter's voice.

She sat up smiling. "Morning, Peter. Where's Jeannie?"

He frowned and pulled a mashed cigaret pack from his pocket. "I haven't the least idea. Sleeping, I imagine."

The way he said it made a chill go up Phoebe's spine. And I don't care a bit was the ugly undertone. Looking closely, she saw that he was pale, there were circles under his eyes, something terrible was wrong.

He looked down at her. "Getting beautiful for Potter's visit?"

She flushed. "At least trying."

"You think he will come?"

"Yes."

"Pretty serious about him, aren't you?"

Her face went hot. "Why? What does it matter, Peter?"

"I don't know. I just didn't think you were the type."

"What type?" Her voice rose sharply.

He blew out smoke, squinted at her through it. "The type that Potter usually messes around with."

"And how do you come to know so much about Bryan?"

"I know him. Not directly—friend of friends. I know about him."

She knew that anger was futile. Her heart beating faster in anticipation of something unpleasant, she said, "You don't make sense this morning. What's the matter, Peter?"

Smiling cynically, he sat down next to her. "This morning, my dear Phoebe, I make sense for the first time in a long time. Forgive me, but in my illumination, I see you clearly."

"All right, talk, riddles. But—what's that got to do with me?"

"Nothing except that I like you, and I figure that since you and Jeannie are such pals, you might as well get straightened out too."

Too. Phoebe waited.

"I thought that since you were sitting here waiting for your shining knight to pull himself away from Old Lyme, you might like to know that Samuel Blodgett is famous not only for his advertising agency—but also for his delicious, twenty-two-year-old daughter, Ariel Blodgett."

Cold clutching pain made her eyes shine hard. "Thank you, Peter. I'm ever so grateful. I'm surprised you didn't tell me sooner. In front of all the Moores."

"The Moores. You know . . . for a small girl, you're pretty naïve."

Her face was white now. "I'm beginning to see that the Moores have been much too nice to you, and it's turning your head."

"Yes, they have been nice to me—so sufficatingly nice they've crowded me out." He took a deep breath and furiously stubbed his cigarette into a patch of rich dark earth. "Guys like me can't help but get confused. About the girls we have to choose from. Either they're kept under wraps by their families and coddled until they expect the world to fall neatly in their laps, or else"—he turned gray eyes

Hold this page about arm's length from your face. Keeping your eyes on the blue dot between the steak and the grill, bring the page slowly to your nose. Hold it there a few seconds. . .presto! The steak goes on the fire. Try this with the Morton's and steak, too.

...Steak on a grill needs fire...
Steak on your table needs Morton's...

iodized or plain

They just naturally go together!

Two new ways to salt steak ...or anything else!

Morton Salters, 3⅞ inches in size, sold in cartons of three, plain or iodized.

Morton Miniatures, 1½ inches high, packed six to the tray.

When it rains it pours

–"they're out on the world on their own. ld-beaters with a lot of smart-aleck ideas. I-know-where-I'm-going girls . . . only t of the time they don't!" He was about to more when the far-off ringing of the phone ied clearly in the morning air. Breathless anger, Phoebe jumped up and began to across the grass. Bryan She ran up the tone steps away from Peter.

e almost collided with Mrs. Moore, com- out the terrace door. "Phoebe dear, have seen Peter? He's wanted on the telephone."

'm right here," said Peter's voice behind hoebe turned blindly back to the garden. head suddenly hurt and the sun seemed bright and she had no idea of what to do herself. "Don't worry, he'll call!" said my's voice out of nowhere. Wheeling ut, she saw him sitting on the grass watch- her.

know he will!" she said more sharply she'd intended, but it suddenly seemed ir to her that so many people should be ding her affairs. She asked if Jeannie had e down yet.

She came down for coffee, but went right airs. Been crying."

hoebe was halfway up the stairs when nie came down. Her eyes were red and and she tried to get by without talking to be.

eannie," Phoebe begged, taking her by the "what's going on?"

ater," said Jeannie in a muffled voice and, ing past, went outside.

ompletely bewildered, Phoebe stood on the s and heard Peter on the phone in the den. e seemed no place to go, so she went up- s.

nch was a strained ordeal. Mr. and Mrs. re, sensing the tension in the air, tossed t remarks bravely back and forth be- n themselves, while Jeannie, Phoebe, and Sammy were ominously silent. At point Mr. Moore's talk about art reached sitively feverish pitch.

The phone finally rang for Phoebe at one-thirty when they'd all finished lunch and were sitting on the terrace. With a furiously pounding heart she went into the den to take it, shutting the door behind her.

"Hello, darling," said Bryan and she knew right away he would not be coming.

And he wasn't. Ah, Phoebe, he was sorry, very sorry, but then he'd said he wasn't sure he could make it from the beginning, hadn't he? There was a long elaborate explanation about Blodgett's having arranged a sailing party, and about his not being able to get away until four, which meant that he couldn't get down there until five at the earliest. Which made it silly, didn't it?

"Yes it does," she agreed, staring at the immobile white queen opposite the black king on the chessboard.

"But listen," he was saying, "I have an idea. I can leave here around four-thirty—you leave there about the same time. I could stop off and get some fixings and we could have dinner up at your place. And then ——"

And then. The receiver slid in her moist palm.

"What do you say?" he asked. "I could be at your apartment by seven."

"No." Her heart was hammering now. "I mean no, you'd better call me first. Call me at the apartment at six and then we can decide." Before he could protest she hung up and sat staring into space.

She was violently trembling. Why? Why had she taken this for almost a year, why had she waited, believing all the time that somehow, sometime he would tell her he loved her and ask her to marry him, when suddenly it was blindingly clear that he never would ask her to marry him? Oh, he would marry, and possibly soon—as long as it was the right girl, someone with money, position behind her. Blodgett's daughter. Or someone like her, A little tableau lit up in her mind and she saw Bryan in caricature, paying court to a girl like Amy Blodgett, being impeccable, polite, treating her with extravagant respect. Then Bryan in her own apartment, solely hers since Mary Jane had gone home to Des Moines, Bryan acting as though he lived there and taking everything for granted, stretched out on the couch after a dinner she'd cooked, criticizing the color of the rug, the way she'd framed a print, waiting until she'd done the dishes, then moving in, ardently, on her. Marry Phoebe? No. Why? When even though she tried oh, so hard—and she did try—she just didn't have it. Didn't have any of the things that were so important to him.

MAY 5–11, 1957

TWENTY-NINTH ANNUAL

NATIONAL HEARING WEEK

YOU Can Help Little Children

Hear More . . .

Speak Better . . .

Live Happily

For information contact your local hearing agency or write:

AMERICAN HEARING SOCIETY

1800 H St., N.W., Washington, D.C.

Her face burning, Phoebe thought of this weekend and her pathetic wish to put on the Moores like a dazzling cloak. Impress Bryan with his beloved values. In a way she'd been worse than Bryan herself . . . for not only had she wanted to trot out all the superficial things she knew he would love but she had only wanted to use her friends to this end. Bryan's game. And as if it would have mattered. As if a shrewd calculator like Bryan would have been taken in by borrowed glory. For after all, wasn't she still Phoebe, immutable "career girl" Phoebe, who lived by herself, managed to pay all her bills and also managed a pleasant air of ease and graciousness about herself—though she had not been born to it?

A thin, painful, belated pride for herself and what she'd accomplished flooded through her. Then anger, self-hate, and this new bewildering feeling of "But I am Phoebe and that ought be enough for anyone!" all mixed and clashed inside her. She felt the walls of the den closing in on her, and throwing open the door, she started down the hall. Passing the open door of the library, she didn't see Sammy sitting in a chair by the window, a book open on his knees.

"Phoebe," he called, "come talk to me."

Since she felt that being alone with herself now would be disastrous, she went in and sat down.

Out of courtesy to her Sammy fumbled for the sneakers he'd kicked off and put them back on again. "Get your call?"

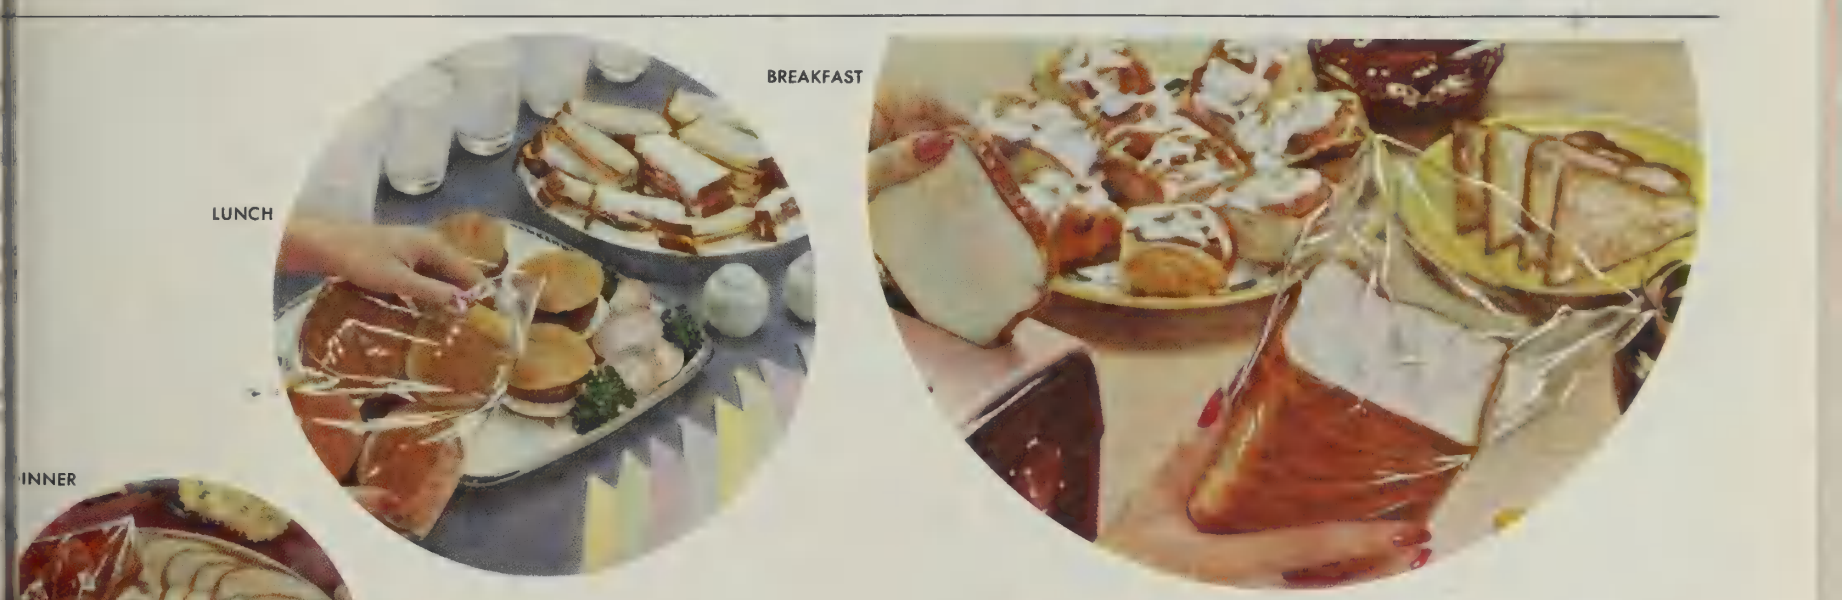
"Yes."

"And he's not coming this afternoon."

"No, he isn't. And if you don't mind, I'd like to skip it, Sammy boy." She looked at the open book. "You probably should be studying."

He slammed the book shut. "Probably. But I can't. I hate the stuff."

Phoebe smiled. "What is it—chemistry?"



"No. It's not even my regular schoolwork. It's some book on law the old man gave me. He'll be quizzing me on it—so I've got to get through it."

Phoebe blinked. "Why would he quiz you on it?"

Sammy laughed, and it was a strangely cynical sound for a boy his age. "Because, old Feebles, he wants me to be a lawyer. He's even got things all set up for me to breeze into law school later."

"But Sammy—do you want to be a lawyer?"

He shrugged. "I don't know. Does anyone ever know what he wants to be at seventeen? But—I don't have much choice, do I?"

Quality Products Deserve to be Seen

Oh So Good! Bread 'n Rolls at Every Meal!

Oh, So FRESH in OLIN CELLOPHANE. Breakfast, lunch and dinner all need the extra pleasure and nutritional values of properly packaged fresh bread and rolls. Don't skimp and don't skip!

Your minimum daily requirement for fresh enriched bread is from three to five slices daily, according to nutritional authorities. How good bread and rolls taste packaged and sealed fresh in sparkling clean Olin Cellophane. How clean they look! How easy to inspect before you buy! And oh, so good, at every meal!

Olin CELLOPHANE®

FILM DIVISION, OLIN MATHIESON CHEMICAL CORPORATION

Chilled, she said, "But that's not fair to you."

"Guess it isn't." He smiled at her. "Poor Feeb . . . you're so gone on the whole routine, you don't see half of what goes on around here."

"What routine?"

"Oh, the Big Happy Family. You're so darned impressed by mother and dad you can't see anything wrong." He laughed the laugh again. "Know where I was last night? Out with a girl in Stamford I met last summer. She's the daughter of the man who owns a hardware store, and mother doesn't want me to have anything to do with her. So I have to lie about seeing her. Mother only wants me to hang around with rich morons like old Grace Fullerton."

"Sammy, dear, aren't you laying all this on a bit thick?" Actually, what Sammy said disturbed her deeply, and she remembered Peter's words in the garden that morning: "So suffocatingly nice they're crowding me out."

"I didn't think you'd understand," he told her. "Honestly, Phoebe . . . for a smart girl you certainly can be taken in. Like by this Bryan whosis ——"

He was interrupted by the sound of the front door slamming, and both of them stood up as they heard Jeannie's light step running upstairs. Looking out the window, they saw Peter walking down the drive, his shoulders sagging.

"You see," said Sammy, "that's more of it. They've been trying to take over old Pete and make a present of him to Jeannie. Honestly, Feeb . . . couldn't you see it yesterday at lunch? All those commissions and contracts. It made me sick."

"Yes," said Phoebe quietly. For suddenly she did see.

"I tried to talk to Jeannie about it later, but she wouldn't listen to me. Now she's upstairs crying again, and twenty to one she's lost Peter."

"No, she hasn't!" said Phoebe, and kissing Sammy's cheek, she ran out to follow Jeannie upstairs.

Jeannie was sitting on the bed. When Phoebe came in she turned and said flatly, "What did Bryan have to say?"

"He's not coming."

"Just as well. Peter's making a train in half an hour."

"Can't you tell me what's going on?"

"Nothing." Jeannie stared out at a golden-turned maple.

Phoebe planted herself in front of her friend, compelling her attention. "If you let him take that train you'll lose him."

Jeannie's brittle reserve finally broke. She turned wretched eyes on Phoebe. "I've already lost him."

"Don't be an idiot! What is it all about?"

"Money!" She spat out the word. "Horrible money. He doesn't want any of those commissions dad helped throw his way, doesn't want any of the money dad sort of hinted he would give us."

Why hadn't she seen? Of course. "He's right to refuse it," Phoebe heard herself say. "And if you want him you'll have to acknowledge it." She wet her lips. "Jeannie, listen—get away. Now. Be away from here with Peter . . . away from your family. He hates to feel that you can't face things with him the way they are, the way he could do it, that you couldn't live without the cushion of your father's money. That you'd always come running to mums and dad when things got too tough."

"You sound just like him!" cried Jeannie. "He said the same things last night." Suddenly hostile, she considered Phoebe. "You know . . . you're hardly the one to be giving advice! But what about Bryan? What about your mess? I suppose you've explained that to yourself?"

Phoebe turned white. "I have. You haven't a point."

"Oh, haven't I?" cried the overwrought Jeannie. "And I suppose you're not playing it safe in your own way? Safe in that you'd rather stake your chances on a cruel, conceited, selfish guy who's not going to marry you ever—and you know it—than"—she gulped some air—"than give a nice guy like that Dave Pearson you met yesterday a break. A guy who won't hurt you and would be crazy about you. In the last year I've seen you turn down five or six guys like Dave. All because he'd marry you, and that's what you're afraid of! You really don't want to get married at all! You're too afraid of the mess your uncle and aunt made—so you pick out Bryan, who can keep you dangling and you can feel sorry for yourself. Just what you want!"

Phoebe did not flinch. "Yes. I know." She went over and took Jeannie by the shoulders. "Listen, please listen to me. I know I've hardly been one to set examples, but sometimes it's hard to see what you have." The new pride came to her aid. "Jeannie . . . now that Mary Jane's gone, why don't you move in with me? If you strike out on your own—and show Peter you can —— Oh, we could really work things out. And it wouldn't be as hard, since I'd be there to help, to show you."

"Oh."

"Jeannie—don't cry!"

Her face streaming with tears, Jeannie turned away. "Oh, I'm sorry—so sorry for everything I just said. I just—you just ——"

"I know. I've just been an awful dope."

The station-wagon horn blasted impatiently in the driveway.

"What should I do? Tell me, Phoebe."

Phoebe went to her purse on the bureau, got out a key. "Here's an extra key to my place. Don't you dare take Peter to that train, but you drive down to New York with him and get this thing all straightened out. You can go to the apartment. There's some food in the icebox, play the phonograph . . . anything. Only be away from here and talk, talk, talk till it's all worked out. I'll be down myself later."

Jeannie took the key, looked at it. "What about mother and dad?"

"I'll tell them where you are. Leave it to me."

Another blast of the horn moved Jeannie to the door, where she stood still a moment, then said quietly, "I've always thought that you were one of the strongest persons I've ever

Who...me? Hold out Canada Dry Ginger Ale on my buddy?

Can't blame anybody for wanting more than his share. It's light and delicious—with longer-lasting sparkle and lively ginger flavor.

ALWAYS BE SURE YOU GET PLENTY OF ALL 10 TEMPTING CANADA DRY FLAVORS—THERE'S A FLAVOR FOR EVERY TASTE

nown." She turned and ran from the room, own to the waiting car.

From the upstairs window Phoebe watched em drive off. Then she sat down on the bed, er face in her hands. From outside she heard Ir. Moore calling out almost plaintively, Sammy . . . Jeannie . . . Peter? Where is ev-ybody?" This simple question was Phoebe's elease. The picture of Mr. Moore, standing olding his garden shears, calling his brood out him in vain, was too much. She cried uietly a long time. She cried for her illusions out the Moores, who were only human and ot perfect as humans never are, she cried for er pathetic illusory need of them. She cried r the strength she'd always had but never nown, and she cried for Bryan. And wasted ve.

When she stopped, she sat and thought out people, really strong, who thought they eeded props. Then she went down the hall to e upstairs phone.

Sarah Fullerton answered, sounding sur-ised, a little amused, but pleased. "He's own playing tennis, Phoebe—but hold on, I'll t him. I know he'll be furious if I don't."

Moments later Dave's breathless voice said, I was on set point, my serve—but I came. ow are you, Phoebe?"

She smiled into the phone. "Fine. I . . . seem be free, and I thought that maybe we could ke a walk ——"

"Dearest girl, you've called too late. Papa ullerton's here with some other people. I'll e tied up till pretty late."

"How is it going?" she asked. "Are you im-ressing him?"

"I think." He laughed. "But sheerly by my arm and magnetism." He paused. "Listen, hoebe, can I call you next week?"

She felt suddenly shy. "Yes."

"Then I will."

Back in the room she stretched out on the d, intending to frame a little story for the loores about where Jeannie had gone, but e fell asleep, and it was an hour and a half ter when knocking on the door woke her up. It was Sammy. "Feebles . . . can you come down? The folks are in a tizzy about where Jeannie and Pete are." He grinned, a conspirator. "Where are they?"

She gave him a shove. "Tell them I'll be right down."

Five minutes later she found them all seated in the living room, waiting for her. Mrs. Moore sat up instantly. "Phoebe . . . do you know where they are? It's way past five—and there's no sign of them!"

This will have to be very gentle, thought Phoebe. I can't hurt them, they've meant too well. She forced a gay smile. "Oh, it's all my fault. They told me where they were going, and I fell asleep. On a crazy impulse they decided they wanted to drive down to New York for dinner."

There was a blank silence, then Mrs. Moore said, "Jeannie's never done anything like this before. Why—where will she sleep? The house is closed up."

Looking at Sammy's delighted face, Phoebe got her courage. "She's going to stay at my place. My roommate's gone." Casually, she sat down on the couch next to Mr. Moore. "As a matter of fact, before she left . . . we got into a long talk, and it seemed to us that it might be a lot of fun if Jeannie really moved in with me."

"What's that?" Mr. Moore ogled her through his glasses.

"But her room was just redecorated!" said Mrs. Moore. "Besides, she has a home of her own. I've never heard of anything so ridiculous!"

Phoebe's smile was all ingenuousness. "But you see . . . she wants to learn how to keep house—wants some practice, that's all! Part of the agreement of moving in with me is she's to do half of the cooking and cleaning."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Moore looked relieved. "But if that's all she's moving for, why doesn't she speak to me?" the latter said. "Maggie can teach her how to cook, and ——" She stopped, reddening, seeing the impossible picture of Jeannie cooking and cleaning in their well-staffed town house. "Well, if that's the way she wants it, I suppose there's nothing we can say."

Mr. Moore shook his shaggy head at Phoebe. "I don't know. Sometimes I don't understand your generation at all."

"I think we'll consider ourselves lucky, and let it go at that, dear," said his wife, exchanging a suddenly wiser smile with him.

Phoebe was back in New York at ten-forty-five. When she opened the door to the apartment the first thing she saw was Jeannie's note propped on the hall table: "We thank you and love you—all is well. We're out having a late dinner ——"

Then the phone began to ring, and just from its insistence she knew it had been ringing like that all evening. She put down the note and sat down calmly at the telephone.

"Phoebe!" shouted Bryan. "Where have you been? It's almost eleven o'clock!"

"I'm sorry if you had to wait."

"Wait? I left Blodgett's at four-thirty—walked out on a big barbecue supper. Blodgett was pretty put out. I've been calling you since six!"

She offered no explanation.

"Well, I'm just a few blocks away. I'm coming right up."

"I'm sorry, Bryan, but I'm tired. I'm going to bed."

Silence. Then: "Don't be a silly girl. If you're mad about this afternoon, don't be—I'll explain the situation when I get there."

"Please. I don't want to see you, Bryan."

"You are sore. What do you mean? Sounds like you mean never again."

"That's just what I do mean."

She could hear his breathing. "I refuse to take that. You'll see me."

His assurance was the last straw. "No," she said softly and hung up.

She picked up Jeannie's note and went into the bedroom, shutting the door. Immediately the phone began to ring again and, gritting her teeth, she read the rest of the note: "—— and celebrating in a way. We have news for you when you return. P. S. Your phone rang all the time we were here, but we decided not to answer it." Smiling, she began to unpack and get ready for bed. After fifteen minutes she could stand it no longer and, picking the phone off the hook, said, "It's just no use. You've got to leave me alone!"

There was a pause on the other end of the line, then Dave Pearson's voice said, "Is that the way you always answer the phone?"

"Oh, Dave." She could not stop the sudden free burst of laughter that came from her mouth. "I'm sorry. I . . . just didn't know it would be you."

"I hope not." He laughed too. Then more seriously: "I don't want to keep you. I just . . . well, to be honest, I didn't feel like waiting the proper interval until Tuesday or Wednesday to call. Can you have lunch with me tomorrow?"

Phoebe felt all the tension go out of her. "Yes."

"Good." There was an eloquent silence all along the line, then after they'd made arrangements where to meet, they said good night and hung up.

The phone began to ring again right away. But this time she knew there would be no gritting of teeth, it was not going to be hard at all and, waiting until it temporarily stopped, she took the receiver off the hook. END

GEORGE ELIOT SAYS:

The only failure a man ought to fear is failure in cleaving to the purpose he sees to be best.

It never rains roses; when we want more roses, we must plant more trees.

The first condition of human goodness is something to love.

Save $1.25 on Lazy Susan Spice Holder!

The spice you want is always in front with

DURKEE'S

Spicemaster

retail value $2.50 ONLY $1.25 with label (or tracing) from any Durkee product

Hang it in or under the cabinet! Just a touch of your finger and the spice you want is in full view. Durkee's exclusive Spicemaster has an adhesive fastener that attaches easily and securely to metal or wood surfaces. Available in 3 exciting colors of high quality durable plastic, the Spicemaster will hold an assortment of 10 spice packages ready for use . . . when you want them.

Reach for Durkee's Spices to pep up everyday dishes

Food seasoned with Durkee's Spices, Seasonings, and full-strength flavoring Extracts, have a delicious true flavor right down to the last tempting bite.

More than 100 years of experience in selecting and processing only the finest spices is your assurance that Durkee's Spices are always fresh—really fresh—with a strong true flavor that won't cook out.

Before you bake or cook again—make sure you have Durkee's Quality Spices in your new Spicemaster.

DURKEE FAMOUS FOODS

Glidden QUALITY PRODUCTS

CLEVELAND 14, OHIO

©1957

SPICEMASTER
Dept. J, P. O. Box 1, Jackson, Michigan

Send me____Spicemasters. I enclose $1.25 (no stamps—make check or money order payable to Spicemaster) and ■ label (or tracing) from any Durkee product for each Spicemaster ordered.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone____ State_____

CIRCLE COLOR: RED YELLOW WHITE

Offer good only in U.S.A. and its possessions, unless prohibited by law, and subject to state and local regulations. Offer expires September 30, 1957.

Sunshine Salad

1 package lemon gelatin
¼ teaspoon powdered ginger
1½ cups boiling water
1¼ cups pineapple tidbits
12 ounces creamed cottage cheese
24 Campfire Marshmallows cut into sixths or 3 cups Campfire Miniatures

Blend gelatin and ginger. Add boiling water. Stir until dissolved. When syrupy add cheese, which has been put through a sieve or ricer. Chill until quivery. Then fold in marshmallows and pineapple. Pour into 1-quart mold. Chill until firm. Garnish with half pineapple rings, sliced strawberries, and tiny sprays of water cress. Serves 8 to 10.

and here's The MAGIC Ingredient

Campfire MARSHMALLOWS

regular or miniatures

10 miniatures equal one regular size

Campfire Marshmallows are pure, wholesome, fluffy ingredient marshmallows—always fresh. Try them. Get Campfire Marshmallows today.

FREE! Send now for Marcia Camp's folder of exciting dessert, salad and specialty recipes.

THE CRACKER JACK CO., Desk 48, 4800 W. 66th St., Chicago 38, Ill.

Preachers' wives are good cooks

At home all over the world, these good-will American wives brought home the best of recipes in China, Mexico and the United States.

Almond pie, amber and allur irresistible to the gu

By LORA LEE PARROTT

Preachers' wives today are among the best cooks on earth. I became convinced of this after accompanying my husband on a five-year stint of itinerant church work which took us into the parsonage kitchens and dining rooms of nearly every state, as well as Alaska, Hawaii and Canada.

My friend Mrs. Robbins, who presides over an enormous old-fashioned kitchen in a Presbyterian manse in Michigan, told me once, "I don't have fancy clothes, we can't afford a new car and we'll never own our own home, but I'll keep up with the best of them in the kitchen. Why, there won't be a crumb of my cake left at the church doings tonight ten minutes after grace is said!" And there wasn't.

For the most part, preachers' wives are good cooks because they practice to perfection on company dinners. Proof of the pudding is this selection of cherished recipes from the files of the world's most overworked hostesses; recipes they rely on when they get that "overwhelmed" feeling.

Colleen Townsend Evans was a Hollywood starlet before she married Louis Evans, Jr., the son of the pastor of the Hollywood Presbyterian Church. Her best-known role was the feminine lead in When Willie Comes Marching Home, directed by John Ford. Her favorite dessert is her family's recipe for almond pie, and it served her in good stead when she went as a bride to the staid city of Edinburgh, where her husband did graduate work in the New Testament. There her kitchen was the bare basement of an old Scottish home, where the washtubs served as sinks, refrigerator there was none, and a four-burner gas stove ministered to the needs of the entire family, including two babies. But she says she will always remember it with longing, as it was the most-used and best-loved room in the house.

AUNT LUCILLE'S ALMOND PIE

Scald 2 cups milk. Beat 3 egg yolks until thick and lemon-colored. Add to egg yolks 1 cup brown sugar, 3 tablespoons cornstarch and ¼ teaspoon salt. Add the hot milk gradually. Place in the top of a double boiler. Add 4 tablespoons melted butter. Cook until thick, stirring almost constantly. Cool and pour into a baked 9″ pie shell. Spread with ½ cup toasted slivered almonds. Top with a meringue of the 3 egg whites and 6 tablespoons sugar. Sprinkle the meringue with a few slivered almonds. Brown in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 15 minutes.

Mrs. Billy Graham lived in China until she was eighteen, and her knowledge of Chinese cooking is authentic and extensive. The Grahams like her Chinese eggs in sweet-sour sauce served with rice and chopsticks, exotic though this will seem in the kitchen of their new home in Montreat, North Carolina. The house is built of old materials, hand-hewn logs and antique brick, and her kitchen is in the tradition of the old-timy "keeping room," with a fireplace she can cook in if the power fails, and a sofa where her four children can curl up from time to time. Mrs. Graham loves blue and white, though she uses other colors. Her kitchen window looks out over the foothills of the lovely Blue Ridge Mountains, and the room itself is furnished in early North Carolina antiques.

CHINESE EGGS IN SWEET-SOUR SAUCE

Slightly beat 6 eggs. Add ¾ cup very finely chopped onion. Season with 2 tablespoons soy sauce, 1 tablespoon ginger, a pinch of salt, and 1 small clove garlic, crushed. Mix well. Heat about 1 teaspoon salad oil or shortening in a medium-sized skillet. Have skillet quite hot. Pour about ⅓ cup of the egg mixture into the skillet. Cook like a large thin pancake, but do not turn. When done, roll and cut into 2″ lengths. Repeat until all mixture is used. Then fry egg rolls in deep hot fat 350° F., for a few seconds until they puff. Serve immediately with sweet-sour sauce. Makes about 30 rolls.

Sauce: Combine 1 cup soy sauce, 1 cup water, 1 cup beef bouillon and ¼ cup vinegar. Add ½ cup sugar and ¼ cup cornstarch. Season with 1 very smal love garlic, crushed, and ½ teaspoon nely chopped crystallized ginger. Cook ery slowly, stirring frequently, until hick and smooth. (Delicious with all ypes of Chinese food.)

STUART

Mrs. Ernest C. Manning is married to ne premier of the Western Canadian rovince of Alberta, an office comparable o governor in the United States. Her hus- and is also well known as the preacher who conducts the Sunday radio program nown as Canada's Back to the Bible Hour. The recipe for baked chicken puff vas given to Mrs. Manning by one of the nany friends who share the pleasures of er beautiful big kitchen at Westerlea arm, which lies in a secluded curve of the North Saskatchewan River. Her kitchen is lanned for maximum efficiency, and she lways says to anyone who is helping her, If in doubt where to find anything, look or it where you want to use it!" It doesn't lways work, but the average is high.

BAKED CHICKEN PUFF

Combine in a saucepan 2 cups cooked hicken, 1 can undiluted cream-of-mush- oom soup and ½ cup milk. Add one -ounce can sliced mushrooms, drained, cup cooked noodles, ½ cup chopped elery, ½ cup slivered toasted almonds, tablespoons diced pimiento, and ½ cup hopped onions sautéed in 1 tablespoon utter or margarine. Season with 1 tea- poon Worcestershire sauce, ½ teaspoon alt, ⅛ teaspoon thyme, ⅛ teaspoon mar- oram, 6 drops hot pepper sauce and a inch of pepper. Mix together well. Cook ery slowly for 30 minutes until hot and ubbly, so that flavors are well blended. Pour into a greased 2-quart casserole. Beat 4 egg yolks. Combine with ½ cup rated Cheddar cheese. Fold in the beaten whites of 4 eggs. Place on top of hot hicken mixture. Bake in a moderate ven, 350° F., for 30 minutes or until top- ing is puffy and brown. Serves 4.

Mrs. Charles Templeton was born in ower California, where she learned to love the exotic spices with which the shelves in her Peter Cooper Village apartment are loaded. Here, too, she has as many copper pots and pans as she dares to hang up "without tearing the walls down." All her friends, both clergy and laymen, are greeted with gales of garlic or onion odors as soon as they step off the elevator. Her calabacitas con queso is a favorite with everyone, served either as a vegetable or as a course in itself with thick slices of French bread. Mr. Templeton's official title is Secretary of Evangelism of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

CALABACITAS CON QUESO

Sauté 3 or 4 zucchini, which have been cut into ½" pieces, in 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add ½ cup diced onion and 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Stir and cook for 10 minutes or until all are tender. Add 1 No. 2 can tomatoes, a pinch each of basil and orégano, ½ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Let simmer for 15 minutes or until the sauce is cooked down and blended. It may be served at this point, or, if you prefer the flavor of cheese, grate ⅓ cup Cheddar cheese and sprinkle on top just before serving. Makes 4 servings.

Mrs. Peter Marshall is the author of A Man Called Peter, and her recipe for steak-and-kidney pie was mentioned in the book, although not by name—see page 91 of that volume:

"Several evenings I spent taking down Mother Janet's favorite recipes. They were, to say the least, unorthodox."

Unorthodox or not, this is a pie to remember. Mrs. Marshall lives in a small town house in Washington, D. C., in the Cathedral Park area near the National Cathedral. Her recently remodeled kitchen has white walls, blue formica counters and blue spattered linoleum.

STEAK-AND-KIDNEY PIE

Simmer 3 lamb kidneys in salted water for about 15 minutes. Have your butcher

For weight watchers...low-calorie
D-ZERTA GELATIN

HERE'S A NEW SLANT on reducing. A bright, tempting combination of lemon, lime and cherry D-Zerta Gelatin.

Desserts and salads made with D-Zerta contain hardly enough calories to count. There is no sugar in D-Zerta, but it's so sweet and refreshing your family will love it.

Try new D-Zerta Pudding. It's low in calories, too. Comes in three delicious flavors: Chocolate, Vanilla and Butterscotch.

Compare the calories in one serving
Vanilla layer cake	308
Milk sherbert, lemon	241
One-half grapefruit (5″)	100
D-ZERTA PUDDING (with skim milk)	54
D-ZERTA GELATIN (in six flavors)	12

D-Zerta and Jell-O are registered trade-marks of General Foods.

Made by the makers of Jell-O desserts...so you know it's good!

No matter what you bake... you save time and work with PYREX® ware!

When measuring

PYREX Measuring Cups are accurate and crystal clear, with large red markings to make all measuring quick and easy. Three sizes: 8-oz., 29c, 16-oz., 59c, 32-oz., 89c.

When mixing

PYREX Color Bowl Sets have four different sized bowls—from 1½ pints to 4 full quarts—all heat-resistant. Yellow, pink, turquoise, or contrasting colors. $3.45 per set. Also transparent 3-piece mixing bowl set, $1.75.

Even when cleaning up

PYREX ware is wonderfully easy to wash clean, because sticky dough—nothing, for that matter—will cling to the smooth, hard surface.

And you get perfect results every time

PYREX Baking Dishes let you see what's cooking. You can watch foods bake to the "doneness" you prefer, see them brown more evenly. And, unlike other materials, smooth, non-porous PYREX ware can't absorb or pass on any other taste. PYREX Square Cake Dish, shown here, 2 qt. size, 89c—2½ qt. size, $1.00.

There's only one PYREX Ware, a product of CORNING GLASS WORKS, Corning, N. Y.

VISIT THE CORNING GLASS CENTER, CORNING, N. Y. CORNING MEANS RESEARCH IN GLASS

cut 1½ pounds round steak into ½" cubes. Sauté ½ cup chopped onion in 2 tablespoons butter or margarine until soft. Remove the kidneys from the broth and cut into slices. Save broth. Salt and pepper the steak pieces and dust with 1 tablespoon flour. Add the steak and kidneys to the butter and onions. Sauté until well browned. Cover with ½ cup kidney broth and ½ cup boiling water. Season with 1 bay leaf, crumbled, and 1 teaspoon salt. Simmer slowly for 1½ hours. Stir occasionally.

Pour into an unbaked 8" pie shell. Cover with top crust. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 25 to 30 minutes or until crust is nicely browned. Serves 4.

Mrs. H. C. Benner lives in a Dutch Colonial house on an elm-shaded street in Kansas City whose quiet is often broken by her family's musical activities, which precede and follow most meals. Doctor Benner, who is one of the five superintendents of the Church of the Nazarene, writes music, and their young son and daughter are also accomplished. Mrs. Benner spends most of her creative energies in her yellow-tiled kitchen, where she experiments along many lines—one being new, economical and easy ways to serve vegetables. Vegetable chop suey is one of her outstanding successes in this field of endeavor. She is also famous as an artist at the buffet table, and teaches a class in homemaking to young seminary wives.

VEGETABLE CHOP SUEY

Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine in a large skillet. Add 3 cups coarsely shredded cabbage, 1 cup thinly sliced celery crescents, 1 cup sliced green pepper and ¼ cup thinly sliced onion. Cover and cook over low heat for 5 minutes. Uncover, and season with 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and 1 tablespoon soy sauce. Continue cooking 1 minute, stirring gently. Makes 6 servings.

Mrs. Andrew W. Blackwood found herself a neighbor of Albert Einstein's when her husband was teaching in the theological seminary at Princeton University. One day when she took her favorite orange cakes to his house, she was rewarded by hearing the greatest of twentieth-century scientists exclaim that they were the best he ever tasted! The Blackwoods are now living in a suburban apartment near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where Mrs. Blackwood has a convenient kitchen whose keynote is—surprisingly—red! Her husband is now Professor of Bible and Preaching in the Temple University School of Theology in Philadelphia.

ORANGE CAKES

Cream together ½ cup sugar and ½ cup butter. Meanwhile grind ½ cup seedless raisins and the peel from 1 orange, using the coarse blade. Add to the butter and sugar and mix well. Add 1 egg and beat until light and fluffy. Sift, measure and then sift again 2 cups flour with 1 teaspoon baking powder, 1 teaspoon baking soda and 1 teaspoon salt. Add alternately to the egg mixture with 1 cup sour milk. Fill your smallest cupcake pans, which have been well greased, ⅓ full with batter. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., 10 to 12 minutes.

Combine the juice from ½ orange—about ¼ cup—with ⅓ cup sugar. Let stand while cakes are baking. This will make a simple sirup. When cakes are done, and before removing from pans, dribble ¼ teaspoon of this sirup over the top of each cake. Remove the cakes carefully from the pan and allow to cool. Makes about 5 dozen.

Mrs. H. J. Ockenga is the wife of the pastor of the famous Park Street Church on the edge of the Boston Common. The Ockengas have two homes—a winter one in Belmont, Massachusetts, and a summer one in New Hampshire. She writes, "In our summer home I have my dream kitchen. One side of the room has a large picture window going almost to the floor. Through that window can be seen the Presidential Range, including Mount Washington. In this setting, with the wood stove crackling away, the simple things about us, the polished copper pump, the old-fashioned house plants, the oil lamp, the pile of Bibles on the shelf for family devotions, all seem a balm to the soul and symbolic of a rich, unhurried, happy day." Her cooky recipe comes from a parishioner who made and sold them to Boston's finest stores in order to bring up her sons after their father had died, giving generously to Christian missions into the bargain. Cookies to conjure with, these.

MAPLE-NUT COOKIES

Cream ½ cup butter or margarine. Add 1 cup brown sugar and continue mixing until light and fluffy. Add 1 egg and mix well. Sift together 1¾ cups sifted flour, ¼ teaspoon salt and ⅔ teaspoon baking soda. Add to the egg mixture. Then add 1 cup chopped dates and ½ cup chopped walnuts. Finally add ½ teaspoon imitation maple flavor. Chill thoroughly and shape into bars 1½" in diameter. Chill overnight or freeze. Then slice very thin and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 8 minutes. Allow them to sit on the pan a minute before removing to cooky racks to cool. Yield: 7 dozen thin cookies. END

"The book doesn't say, 'Make a child share his toys.' It says, 'Make him want to share his toys.'"

NOW VELVEETA IS RICHER THAN EVER IN VITAL NON-FAT FOOD VALUES* FROM MILK!

*High-quality protein, calcium, phosphorus, riboflavin

Extra good for youngsters—Velveeta sandwiches like this!

f you have to coax to get a young-ter to drink the needed quart of nilk a day, here's happy news for ou! A single 2-ounce slice of Velveeta (the amount you put in a usky sandwich) gives more high-uality protein, more calcium, more phosphorus, as much riboflavin and more vitamin A, than a big 8-ounce glass of fresh, whole milk. And how the youngsters go for the rich yet mild cheddar flavor of this fine pasteurized process cheese spread! Get Velveeta in the two-pound size.

Extra good for you, too, both before and after the baby comes

You young mothers know your particular need for milk's vital food values both before and after baby comes. Possibly you also have to watch your weight. You'll certainly be interested to know that Velveeta's special goodness comes from the non-fat part of the milk. A single ounce supplies more of milk's vital food values and no more calories than a 6-ounce glass of fresh, non-fat milk. So, for snacks and dessert, enjoy Velveeta 'n crackers and Velveeta with fresh fruit.

VELVEETA BY KRAFT is full of health from milk

THE MOUNTAIN THAT FELL AT THE FALLS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 68

was for a lawn mower that I'd talked him into buying, and he thought it would be funny to pay me in pennies so that I would have as much bother counting as he would have mowing. But it was quite a spell back. I can't name it to the penny."

"That sounds like Uncle Wilbur."

"He was a fine man."

"I know." He had willed me his farm, too, when he died last April. "Here's your check."

"A fine man," Bill Hayes repeated, nodding his head gravely. "I miss him. We all do."

"I know. You were boys together." I couldn't keep the bitterness out of my tone. I knew Uncle Wilbur was—had been—a fine man. But why throw it up at me?

Bill's old man's face told me nothing as I picked up my box and carried it out through the door.

I got in the car and drove home. In three months it would be green around town, the trees would be budded, and the birds would be back, and the daffodils out. In six months the town would be gay with the bright new out-of-state cars, and the gaudy new clothes of the tourists. Now it was bleak, beautiful but bleak. The snow along the state road was windrowed as tall as the car in banks darkened by age and compression and sand. Over the lips of the right bank, the biting north wind lashed a continual spray of fresh powdery snow of a clear brilliance. I knew it would be a wild night. Already the road was drifting.

I got home to find Faye in tears. You may have seen Faye in the late '40's. She was then an actress, a starlet in Hollywood. In the late '40's I was just getting started with the Macomber and Pratt Advertising Agency in Chicago. I was doing some local copy for one of the films she appeared in. It was called Days of Glory, and I thought, How apt, after I met her at the Chicago première. Days of Glory was her last picture, but she appeared in five in all, and you may remember the small, eager blonde with such a radiant look, the look of something wonderful going to happen in the next minute. That would have been Faye. Faye Fallon was the name she went by, until we were married in 1948, and she gave up the movies, and began having babies—Linda in 1949, and Jeff in 1952, and Melody in 1954.

Faye was crying because Jeff had cut his finger on a paring knife, and because the stove in the kitchen was smoking, and because the house was so cold and drafty, she was cold, she would never be warm again. Those were her excuses for crying, rather. The real reason was deeper.

I held her and kissed her and made her warm, and then Linda came home on the school bus, in her bright blue snow suit, with her bright blond curls peeking shyly out from the protection of the hood.

"Did you have a good day, darling?"

"No, mamma. I got a hundred in spelling, and a hundred in arithmetic, and—and ——" Linda's lip began to quiver, and her lovely eyes drowned soundlessly in sudden tears.

"And what, baby? Tell mamma."

Faye knelt beside her.

"And Rachel's going to have a birthday party Saturday, and I'm not going. She asked Cynthia and Rosalind and David and Bobby and almost everyone, and not me. She says we're stuck up. Oh, mamma!"

"There'll be lots of other parties, wonderful parties," Faye said, in a small, choked voice.

"But I wanted to go to this one."

I couldn't take it any more. I went out to the woodshed and began to split the night's wood.

Damn them, damn them all, I thought. And No one can be so impossibly, unutterably cruel as a child.

The ax rose and fell viciously. My hand set the sticks on the chopping block, and the ax rose up, crash, up, crash, and the sticks split and flew like shining yellow birds against the woodshed wall.

When the word came last April about Uncle Wilbur leaving us the farm—the house that my great-great-grandfather had built in 1829, the house where my father was born, and his father, and his father, and the big red barn, and the rolling fields, and the wood lot with half a million board feet of standing pine—we had been so thrilled.

I was making nine thousand a year with the agency, and another promotion had been promised. We had a fine apartment filled with fine things in Chicago. But all we could think about was the country, getting back to the fundamentals, to the place where your roots were, to Nature and the soil.

"What a wonderful place to bring up the kids!" Faye said then.

"Skiing, swimming, hikes, bird watching, having a garden and raising our own vegetables, having a cow, having flowers, Faye. You always loved flowers, and we could have acres of them there if we wanted."

"And, Roger, you could get to work on your book. You could do books in the country, and I'd join the Ladies' Aid, and the—what is it, the Grange?—and talk all the time on the party line."

We were both caught up in a contagion of longing. We were pioneers. Life was no good unless we had time to enjoy it, we said. And last August we did it. We burned our bridges. I gave up my job, and we cleaned out the apartment, and we rented a huge trailer to tow behind our car and piled it with the color TV set, and with silver and dishes and with the divan and overstuffed chairs, and with the big painting of Faye, and with my typewriter, and with the rugs, and with all our clothing, and we loaded in the kids, and we headed for Wilson Falls.

We were a couple of weeks getting settled, and you wouldn't have known the place. There was an Oriental rug in Uncle Wilbur's parlor and the life-size painting of Faye hung from the wall, and the neighbors around were nice to us to begin with, and so we decided to have the party.

We invited thirty-six people, and all of them came. "Don't dress," we said. "This is informal. We'll just talk and have fun."

And we didn't dress either. I wore a sports shirt and slacks. Faye wore one of her nicer dresses and looked cute as a bug. But everyone else came dressed in the finest they had. Some of the men's suits smelled of moth balls. Some of the women's gowns bulged, where the figures had grown since the owners had bought them.

And the wonderful party went wrong. Our guests milled about the house, ill at ease but observant, taking in the color TV, the fine rug, the chair that replaced Uncle Wilbur's, the mink coat in the hallway closet. They looked at Faye in the painting, oozing glamour, and then at Faye in the flesh, a flushed homebody. If we had dressed in our best to match their best, it might have come off. But our casual clothes seemed to them like the ultimate in snobbery. It was unforgivable that we had dressed down for them. Nobody said it. Everyone was very polite. But Faye and I could feel it.

The drinks were another mistake. Five of the men took Martinis. None took a second. Most drank Cokes as they nibbled at the hors d'oeuvres. Old Mrs. Schraft asked for water. The dooryard was full at eight, and by ten they had all gone home, so very polite in their farewells, so very final.

Since then, I had been the rich writer fellow with the actress wife and well, you know what they say about actresses. Maybe no one ever said that, but that was what we imagined.

I carried in three armfuls of wood, and Faye had all the kids in her arms in the rocking chair by the fire. She was reading them

[other West Wind, and the house shuddered the real north wind blew in a rage of olence.

We ate supper—at night you eat supper, not nner, in Wilson Falls—and we got the kids
l to bed and tucked in, and then Faye said, can't stand it any longer. I thought I could, it I can't stand it any longer. I wouldn't stay this place another day if I could help it.
'e'll sell it, or give it away, but we're going ick to Chicago."

"Maybe things will change. Spring will me, darling. It won't always be so cold."

"The cold," she wept. "I can stand the cold eather, but not the cold people. So they think e're stuck up. They wouldn't give us the time day without security. It's something, it's ally something, when your next-door neighor won't let your little girl come to her little rl's party. Isn't that something, Roger?
n't that really something?"

It was no use to tell her that our next-door eighbor didn't know we were broke, or most so, and that all ir economizing had een watched and eighed, and put down more snobbery.

I held her a long time,
id finally we had it all ttled, and her way was ir way. We were going ck to Chicago.

"You taste like pop-rn," I said, as we aled the decision. "All at salt on your outh."

"You're nice." Faye t at my nose. "I love
u, Roger."

"I love you too."

"I'm going to bed
w. It's warmer in bed.
on't stay up too late."

"I promise."

Faye went into the llway and I heard her t on the stairs. I put ore wood in the stove,
d then I got out the pewriter and my mancript. It was quarter
st ten.

There was the usual
ouble in getting rted, but finally I
ped "page 233," and der that, "Chapter
fteen," and I forgot icago and Uncle Wilr's kitchen, and my ind and my story went f to war, to the war had known a dozen ars back. It got to be eleven o'clock, twelve, d then one. I typed on. The fire burned iskly, the windows rattled in the wind. At e, it was seven below on the outside ther-ometer, and a drafty sixty-two above on the side thermometer, and I put on a jacket to ep warm.

And the wind shrieked, and the fire sounded rm even if it wasn't warm, such a pleasant ackling, and finally I looked around and I uldn't believe what I saw.

Because a fire is a lot like dying. You agine it as happening to other people, never you.

It was happening to us. Our home was on e.

Behind the square of tin into which the vepipe bored through the kitchen wall on way to the massive chimney, the dusty incessible heart of the house held the birth of a owing nightmare.

For perhaps two seconds I sat paralyzed, hile I waited for the thin circlet of flame I w to be only imagination, but the flame was real as the trembling in my hands, and the und it made was as loud as my pounding art.

I thought, I must call the fire department.

And I thought, I must turn on the water ucet.

And I thought, I must get Faye and the ls up.

The next minutes were very confused, but I remember running into the front hall, turning on the kitchen faucet as I dashed by. I remember shouting up the stairs, "Faye! Faye! Get the kids up. Get the kids up. We're on fire, and everything's going to go."

In the same instant, I was ringing the long ring for Central on the phone. While I waited, I could see flames boiling already in the back of the front-hall closet. When Central did answer, it was a young substitute operator, no one familiar.

I tried to be calm. "This is Roger Lothrop," I said. "I live on the Wilbur Lothrop place four miles from the Falls on Route Twenty-seven. I've got to have the fire department as soon as it can get here. My house is on fire."

"Gee, that's too bad. Who did you say you were? And exactly where is it?"

"The Lothrop place! The Lothrop place!" I was shouting. "Route Twenty-seven. Four miles out. Get someone here quick!"

"There's no need to shout," the substitute operator said. "I'll take care of it. I can sound the siren on the firehouse by just pushing a button, and you can listen."

Over the wires came the sound of the siren, and I knew its high keening would shatter sleep in that instant in Wilson Falls, and that men in another instant would leap from warm beds. Even so, it would take precious minutes for the volunteers to dress and run to the firehouse, another minute to warm up the fire-truck engine, and more minutes to drive the four bitter miles in an open truck over the drifting roads. Too many minutes.

I was sweating. I ripped off my jacket and flung it down.

"Operator, operator. Are you still there?"

"I'm taking care of it," she said soothingly. "The Lothrop place. Route Twenty-seven. Four miles. I've got it. I'll tell them."

The firehouse was next door to the telephone exchange.

"And would you please call my close neighbors? Tell them—tell them that I need them now."

"Yes, I will. I'll get Mrs. Wheaton up. She'll know who to call."

I hung up. I could hear the water pail under the faucet running over. I could hear Linda sobbing upstairs, "Mamma, I can't find my other slipper." I could hear Faye saying over and over, "It's all right, it's all right, it's all right. Everything's going to be all right."

I ran to get the water pail, and I ran back with it to the closet, splashing my legs at each step. I hurled the pailful into the closet, where our outdoor clothes were brightly flaming—Faye's Hollywood-era mink coat, her cloth coats, my overcoat and topcoat. The flames recoiled, hissing like angry cats, but they came on again. How they came on!

I dropped the pail with a clatter and ran despairingly up the stairs.

My wife had Melody in her arms, wrapped in a blanket. Melody was not frightened by the noise and confusion. Jeff sat on his bed unconcernedly, a solemn Buddha in a cocoon of blankets, sucking his thumb. Jeff was not frightened. Linda was frightened. Standing by Jeff's bed in an old brown coat of Faye's that trailed about her on the floor, my blond daughter was not pretty any more. She was older, much more aware.

I smiled at them all. I said, "Well, gang, we have to go now. Isn't this exciting?"

SONG OF A GIRL

By EDLYN CANTWELL

Tell me not that there is no purpose
In returning; I am vulnerably young
And cannot believe that now for us
The word is said, the song is done.
I love you well. You must remember
The swift days of blossoming green
On these hills, or the near of December
When sky as sharp and wind as keen
As this pain now, kept us in.
Do you, in harsh strong thoughts, expect
Me to forget all that has been?
I will not; for in this respect
I am unchanging—my heart lives and dies
In rhythm with the look of your young eyes.

74% more food energy than fresh whole milk in every delicious serving!

Milk is Nature's best food—as every mother knows. It's needed for strong, sturdy bodies, for growth, for vitality. But a serving of ROYAL PUDDING gives you all the benefits of the milk you make it with plus 74% more Food Energy. Get Regular ROYAL for easy-to-cook, velvety-smooth Pudding and Pie Filling . . . no-cook Instant ROYAL for quick, melt-in-your-mouth desserts.

FOR SCRUMPTIOUS DESSERTS EVERY TIME . . .

Always Reach For Royal

"Everything's Better with Blue Bonnet on it"

Better for FLAVOR! NUTRITION! FOOD ENERGY!

TWO FINE PRODUCTS OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

Faye said, "Oh, Roger!" Her eyes were like a sleepwalker's.

"You go first, Faye," I ordered. "And Linda, you follow behind mamma—don't be scared, lamb. Jeff and I will be right behind you."

We had just edged down the stairs past the golden hot breath of the closet when every light in the house went out.

Faye screamed, "Roger!" All three of the children began to wail.

"We'll just keep going," I told them. "We're safe now."

But it had been so near. In another minute, we could never have got down the stairs.

There was light enough from the flames to light up the hallway, and we went on from there through the kitchen lit only by moonlight, and through the darker summer kitchen, and through the windowless back entry, and out into the night. As we went I could hear the phone ringing. I think perhaps it had been ringing all along. Ten rings, and then ten more—the Wilson Falls signal for fire, ringing out on our eight-party line.

We waded through new drifts to the car, and I got my family inside.

"I'll have to go back," I said.

"Oh, Roger, no."

"I want to save the manuscript."

"You haven't a flashlight," Faye moaned. "You can't see. Be careful. Be very careful."

"I will." I went back. I got as far as the summer kitchen, and there I was engulfed with a smother of smoke. That was what came from leaving all the doors open on our way out. Coughing, I turned back without the manuscript, and I stumbled into something. It was a chair. It was, in fact, Uncle Wilbur's favorite chair, that we had relegated to the summer kitchen because it was so shabby. I carried it out, and put it a safe distance away from the house in the snow.

"Where are you taking us?" Faye asked.

"I don't know. Somewhere warm." I started the car.

As I drove out of the yard, I took one long look at our home. It looked normal. Peaceful. Fronds of wind-borne snow were racing across the roof. A white curl of smoke came from the chimney, and was bent south by the wind. It was just a white house standing in white moonlight—a landmark that had stood there beyond the memory of any living man. It looked like a sleeping house—no lighted windows, as yet no flame showing. It did not look like a statistic, but that was what it was going to be.

Linda was sobbing in the back seat. "Did you get out my dolly, daddy? And her stroller? All our new toys?"

"There will be another dolly, darling," I told her, as I spun the wheel to the left.

"The Logans are up," Faye noticed with relief.

I looked, and they were. Beyond the Logans', there were lights at the Barbers', and still beyond, at the Clarks', and for as far as our eyes could see, lights were winking across the snow.

I drove to the Logans' and stopped. John Logan was out at his car, and so were his teen-age twins.

John called, "Take them right in, Roger. Martha's expecting you."

The drifts were deep in the Logan yard. It was a hard pull for Linda in her dragging coat, harder than we knew until we had reached the house, to have the door opened for us by Martha Logan, to have her wordlessly fold Faye and Melody together within her wide arms. Then we discovered, in front of the Logan fire, that Linda never had found her lost other slipper. That she hadn't herself realized it made it no easier to bear—that she should have had to run barefoot through the snow.

I left Linda and Faye and the others to go back to the fire, and there in the air I heard the glittering sound of the siren, more beautiful than bells. They were coming. The Logans had already got there, and the truck was on the way.

I had barely time to turn my car around, and the flashing red eye above the two white eyes came thundering out of the night, and I pulled out of the road to let it streak by, trailing cylindrical clouds of snow from each wheel, and trailed by the low-flying cars of a score of other drivers.

I will never know where they all came from, or how Grady Lum wheeled the big truck through the drifts from the Falls in under five minutes, only twelve from the time I had called.

Volunteers were chopping a hole in the roof when I got back, and the pumper put two hundred and fifty gallons of water down through the hole, and then they hooked it on to my cistern, and pumped until that went dry, and that ended the water, and ended my last faint hope.

Some woman brought me a jacket, and told me to put it on. I did not know the woman, though perhaps she may have known me. I could never find her later to give it back.

Bill Hayes came along. "Did you save anything, Roger?"

"Uncle Wilbur's chair. And our lives," I added.

"How about insurance?" he asked cautiously, wanting not to be seeming to pry into someone's business.

"There was some on our house—no enough. None on our things. We had to pu eating ahead of insurance."

None on our things, I thought. None o Faye's portrait, none on her mink, none on ou furniture and appliances, none on the irreplace able personal mementos acquired over both ou lifetimes. With money so tight, we hadn thought we could afford it.

"I want to see you at the store in the morn ing," said Bill Hayes, moving away.

Numbly, I watched men on the roof of th barn, stamping out sparks on the shingles Numbly, I heard the Logan twins shouting in side on the mows, watching for any spark that might be blown inside to ignite the hay But the house burned with a terrifying ferocity and radiance. Flames were laying the rafter bare on the roof, flames were crawling up al the exterior walls, and the tops of all the win dow casings blazed eerily with a strange blu fire, possibly caused by the metal flashings The heat had become intense, and under th rending discordancies sounding within th house was the nearer, underfoot sound of run ning water, caused by the melting snow.

When it became too difficult to watch the house, and the two beautiful maples before i flaming from every branch, I turned to watch the people, the silent onlookers, the firelit faces of my neighbors and of some who were not my neighbors. Many said a few words to me in the next hour, but there were no memorable words. I do not recall any single expression of sorrow, but the sorrow was there and its depth was not to be measured in words. In their undemonstrative way, they were grieving fo me, and I could read it in their faces.

Many times a day I realize how much my own life is built upon the labors of my fellow men, and how earnestly I must exert myself in order to give in return as much as I have received.

ALBERT EINSTEIN

Finally, Grady Lum came over. "Mr. Lothrop," the undertaker said kindly, "the boys and I can save the barn. We'll have the fire watched all night, and do everything that needs to be done. Why don't you go to your wife?"

"Yes," I told him. "I guess I'd better."

Faye and Martha Logan sat together by the fire in the Logan kitchen. Melody and Jeff slept side by side on the Logan couch. Linda, Faye said, had sobbed herself to sleep at last, and was now in bed with Rachel.

"The spare room's all ready for you two," Martha added. "I'll just set here and look after your kiddies if they should wake up."

"All right, Martha," Faye said, obediently rising. "Come, Roger."

"You're very kind," I said, "to take us in."

Martha said, "That's what neighbors are for, to help in the bad times."

"She's so nice," Faye said, after we were alone. "I know I won't sleep, and I'd rather stay up, but Martha wanted to do it, and we had to let her do it. You see that?"

"She would have been hurt if we hadn't," I agreed.

"I watched the fire from here," Faye said. "I didn't want to, but I had to, and I saw the roof fall in, and I felt as though part of my heart were burning in the house. It seems silly, when we were going to leave it anyway, but it was the only house of our own we ever had, and I loved that house."

"So did I."

In bed, Faye came softly over against me. "Roger, what are we going to do? We've got nothing to wear left, nothing to live with, no place to live. I don't know whether we've even got money enough left to get back to Chicago."

"We'll talk about it in the morning," I told her.

Faye was so soft. I loved her so. At quarter past four by my wrist watch, she went to sleep in my arms.

When I got up at seven, leaving Faye still asleep, the first thing I heard was Linda and Rachel laughing merrily in the next bedroom.

In the kitchen, Martha said, "They seem to like it here fine," nodding at Jeff and Melody. Melody was in a high chair drinking milk. Jeff had already begun on his oatmeal.

what does a salad wish for?

WISH-BONE

ITALIAN DRESSING

. . . and you'll wish for MORE when you taste mouth-watering Wish-Bone! It's an Old World blend of pure oil, vinegar, rare seasonings, with "just the right touch of garlic"! It coats every vegetable lightly to bring out its distinctive flavor. Wish-Bone is blended with a touch of genius that can't be copied.

MARINATED STEAKS

Do as famous chefs all over the world do. Add an extra zest to your steaks. Marinate with Wish-Bone Italian Dressing for that light savory flavor. Mama mia! It's absolutely delicious!

WISH-BONE PRODUCTS COMPANY • KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

They should," I said. "You've been wonful."

was breakfasting with the older Logans en the first box arrived. It was a big box, l it was packed with shoes and clothing, l a baby panda perched on the top of it. I not know the donor.

"Thank you," I said. "I don't know how to nk you."

Martha found something in the box for Jeff put on, and dressed him, and then she nd things for Melody and dressed her.

At half past seven that morning, the phone g, and it was Abner Williams, the big dairy mer.

"I've got a house on the place not doing thing," he told me. "It would oblige me ou and your family would move into it, p the fires and such. I've been doing it nt along, to save the plaster, and keep the es from freezing, but it's kind of a chore. all furnished, and until spring there won't any rent."

"But the wood, and the light bill?" I asked n.

"You can pay for the lights, if you want to. r as the wood goes, it didn't cost me much ept a little time, and I was using it up anyy, to keep the house het."

"I don't know how to thank you," I said

All that morning I—and Faye, when she got —didn't know how to thank anybody.

The boxes kept arriving, the Logan kitchen s piled high with them, and always it was the ne story. "Just a few old things we'd outwn," the donors would say diffidently. hought maybe you folks could get a little r out of them." The few old things came in sizes for everybody. I had lost two good olen jackets, and by noon that day I had , and I would have been willing to bet that least three had been purchased that morn. Faye had more than twenty suits and sses, and about half were in her size.

Before noon, I kept a date with the insure adjuster to inspect the ruins, and I wonred then what had become of Uncle Wil's chair, and looked in the barn for it with finding it, and then I remembered to visit Hayes and was given other ideas to think ut. He led me into the dry-goods section of store.

"I want to give new shoes and socks for ur kids," he explained. The new shoes and ks turned out to be complete head-to-toe tfits, plus a large assortment of Christmas s he "happened to have left over after ristmas."

"It's too much, Bill," I said. "I can't let you it."

"Look, you've had a little hard luck," he d me. "Right now, most everybody in Wil- Falls is better off than you are. We're all going to help. Someday you'll be getting a chance to even things up."

He helped me load my plunder into the car, and then said, "Almost forgot. Just a minute."

In just a minute, he came back with a hundred-pound keg of nails.

"Bill, what's that for?"

"For when you rebuild. It takes a lot of nails for a house."

"I'm sorry," I told him. "We don't have the money to rebuild. We're going back to Chicago."

Bill looked at me. "No," he said slowly. "I don't think you'll ever go back. You've already got the standing timber. Around here, we have a bee to cut it and yard it, and a bee to saw it into lumber at one of the mills, and bees to help you make it into a house. Don't be too hasty deciding. Lothrops have been on your place for a long, long time."

That afternoon, two pickup trucks carried our belongings to the rent-free house, which was a fine house, with four bedrooms and a bathroom, and with hardwood floors, and with an all-electric kitchen. The wives of the truck drivers helped Faye get settled. By then, there was more than clothing to unpack. There were over a hundred jars of canned goods, stuff that "was just going to spoil if it didn't get et up." There were dishes, cutlery, bath towels, even two clocks. There was a crib for Melody, and a playpen. There were toys, especially dollies. Linda's classmates had seen to that.

Our last caller that night was Mrs. Modica, who had nine children of her own, and came bringing a huge white stack of sheets and pillowcases.

"I should have been here earlier," she said shyly, "but Jim couldn't get the car started before. We burned out last winter, you know"—we hadn't known, we hadn't been here—"and these are some I had left over from those I was given then."

We didn't know how to thank her either.

That was before we knew about Uncle Wilbur's chair. Bill Hayes came bringing that back the following night. I had forgotten it again.

"You'll need it for your new home," he said. "It's a very valuable chair, rich in associations. And this goes with it."

The paper bag he held out was stuffed with checks and bills In two days, he had sold the chair ninety-six times for just under eleven hundred dollars, and it was still our chair. It had been sold to little Rachel Logan for fifty cents, and to Ken Wyman, the hotelman, for a hundred dollars, and to ninety-four others at figures within those extremes. We couldn't believe it.

After Bill had gone, I said, "Now we won't have to wait until we get the insurance money. We've got enough now to get us back to Chicago."

Faye looked at me as though I were a man from Mars, and then she saw I hadn't really meant it, and then she put on her something-wonderful-is-going-to-happen-in-the-next-minute look, and her eyes swam in happy tears as she grabbed me.

"You go right ahead if you want," said Faye, "but I've been asked to join the Ladies' Aid, and Linda has been asked to Rachel's birthday party, and we almost didn't find out how everyone was until it was too late, but we know now, and Wilson Falls is where I belong, and that's where I'm staying."

"But I have to stay where you stay," I told her.

"Do you?"

"Always."

I sat down in Uncle Wilbur's chair and pulled Faye into my lap. The chair felt as big as the house which we were going to build, and as warm as the hearts of its ninety-six purchasers.

We had had to find out that fire was a lot like dying before discovering that, when it counted, helping was a lot like people.

Especially Wilson Falls people. END

"You're the most intelligent girl I ever met."

Marie Gifford's secret—perfect pie crust in 5 minutes

The final test of a pie is the crust. To turn out melt-in-your-mouth crust start with the right shortening. The right shortening is lard and the finest lard is Armour Star!*

Marie Gifford, Armour's Home Economist and pastry authority, makes this wonderful crust in just five minutes: Measure 2 cups all-purpose flour, then sift with 1 teaspoon salt. Blend in ⅔ cup Armour Star Lard until mixture resembles coarse meal. Add 4 tablespoons tap water. Mix lightly, press into ball. Roll out to ⅛" thickness.

FREE: NEW PICTURE PIE BOOKLET. 32 new pie recipes. How-to-do-it illustrations. Write to Marie Gifford, Consumer Service Dept., Armour and Company, Chicago 9, Illinois.

The best pie crust is made with a good lard and the finest lard is Armour Star.

*Use Armour Star Lard, too, for light, fluffy biscuits and crisp, golden-brown fried chicken.

No other rice is this easy!

Pour Minute Rice in!

Just add to boiling water, cover
. . . remove from heat.
No cooking! No steaming!

Pour perfect rice out!

Because it's already cooked, Minute Rice is always fluffy and delicious!

Another favorite from General Foods

Only Minute Rice is perfect every time!

MEMORIAL DAY 1900

TOM ALLEN

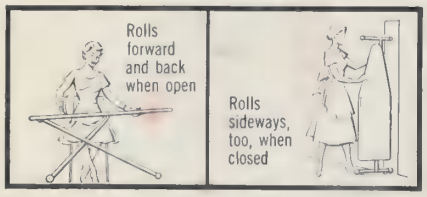
THROUGH ALL THE MEMORIAL DAYS OF MY CHILDHOOD, MY FATHER'S SPEECHES RANG LIKE BUGLES—A SIMPLE ACT OF GRACE BROUGHT HIM GLORY.

By MARY ELLEN CHASE

When my father was born in 1861, he was named Edward Everett, after the "silver-tongued" orator of that time. The possession of this name may conceivably have turned his thoughts and ambitions toward the writing and delivering of public addresses; but I am inclined to think that even without its stimulus he would have cherished such desires. For he was by nature drawn toward the eloquent use of language, and it was his habit while dressing, or descending the stairs for breakfast, or doing his chores in the barn, to declaim lines from Thucydides or Macaulay, Cicero against Catiline, Patrick Henry or Abraham Lincoln. He could shout "Give me liberty or give me death!" so that one actually believed he was ready for instant extinction, which he most surely was not, being singularly and almost inordinately gifted with a love of life. He loved rolling periods, rhetorical questions, fervent imperatives, and intricate, often mixed metaphors. He would be sadly out of place today when eloquence in its old sense has become more than slightly ridiculous and "elocution" practically banned from both the language and its use.

My father was frequently in demand during my childhood as a public speaker for Memorial Day. Not only did the selectmen of Maine towns and villages in our own county, Hancock, occasionally invite him to deliver the annual Commemoration Address, but those of neighboring counties as well, Washington, Waldo and Penobscot. Whenever he received such an invitation, serious deliberations took place in our household, both between him and my mother and among us all, for a great deal was involved in an affirmative decision. The strain upon my father was bound to be considerable, for he could not take lightly the composition of his oration, its many rehearsals and its final delivery, and, since my mother was deeply concerned in all these activities, upon her as well. Moreover, his insistence that his entire family, except for the baby, accompany him upon these occasions meant a distracting upheaval of our usual uneventful routine. And finally, much as we children welcomed a rare excursion abroad, we were inwardly torn both by nervous dread lest my father should fail to do honor to himself and to us all and by an intense regret over missing the Memorial Day celebrations at home.

At that time, in the eighteen nineties and at the turn of the century, New England villages and small towns, and many outside New England as well, provided they were north of Mason and Dixon's line, observed this sacred holiday after a carefully prescribed manner; and ours was no exception to the rule. In the morning all graves in the village cemetery, which during the preceding week had been mown and clipped by our sexton, were decorated by the families concerned with potted plants and with jars and vases of flowers; and small American flags were set upright by our town authorities on those which marked the resting place of soldiers, whether of the Revolutionary or of the Civil War. At precisely two o'clock in the afternoon a long procession marched from our town hall on the green toward the cemetery one half mile distant above our small, quiet harbor.



Our village band headed the line of march, erect and spruce in gold-laced green uniforms, which upon its original formation had been eagerly provided by local contributions. Its few members played their fifes, cornets, trumpets and drums with marked dignity, martial music being the order before the procession entered the cemetery, when muffled drumbeats superseded it. Directly behind the band rode our one cavalry officer, Capt. Augustus Stevens. He wore a broad-brimmed hat with a faded gold cord and in his free right hand held aloft a flashing sword. He was an imposing figure, who each year sent a chill down my back; and although his horse was hardly of the mettle of those which charged at Gettysburg, he, too, seemed to us magnificent as his hoofs sent up whirls of dust from the country road. Captain Stevens led our soldiers of the Civil War, those survivors of the Grand Army of the Republic, mostly elderly men or of late middle age, solemn in their worn blue uniforms with small, stiff-visored caps. Our two ministers, of the Congregational and Baptist churches, followed in somber black, and behind them marched the speaker of the day (sometimes my father himself) in top hat, Prince Albert and striped trousers, who would deliver his oration once the procession had returned, broken ranks and filed into the town hall. Children completed the line of march: scores of children; boys in tight knee pants and white blouses, girls in summer frocks of gingham or percale, all awe-struck and silent. Each child carried a bouquet of flowers—lilacs and apple blossoms if the spring was early enough, violets and wild cherry if it was slow in coming—to place upon the graves of our honored dead when once the procession with a final roll of drumbeats should halt in the cemetery and the signal should be given us.

To miss all this—the music, the sight of the soldiers with their mounted commander, the lines of people watching by the roadside, the intoxicating thought that one played a part in a tremendous drama, enacted but once a year—was deprivation indeed. There was also the chance, slender to be sure, but not impossible, that one might be mysteriously chosen to march beside the soldiers and to carry a pail of water with a dipper in case one of them should suddenly become faint or tired. A boy and a girl were selected each year for this stupendous honor and service. I never was numbered among the lucky ones, but I always hoped and dreamed that I might be. Still, as my mother made quite clear to us, if my father were honored by an invitation elsewhere and if he should decide to accept it, we must all do our utmost to uphold him in his decision and without the least show of disappointment.

Communities desiring an outside orator usually proffered their requests around Town Meeting Day, which was then, as now, the first Monday in March. On or about that date in the year 1900, when I was thirteen, my father was invited to give the Memorial Day address in the town of Castine, sixteen miles away. He took less time than usual in returning an affirmative decision, for Castine was a historic town with a most unusual past. Named for a French baron of the seventeenth century, who had built a fort there, it had later known occupation by both Dutch and English and in the War of the Revolution had been held in British possession. It was (and still is) a beautiful

CONTINUED ON PAGE 230

Exclusive new

Lady Arvin

ROLL-AWAY De Luxe

EASIEST-TO-HANDLE ironing table ever developed. This new Lady Arvin "Roll-Away" De Luxe provides two sets of wheels to eliminate lifting and dragging. It rolls anywhere—even sideways into the slimmest storage space!

Either right or left-hand ironing with utmost ease and ample knee room. Adjusts from either side also, to any height from 24″ to 36″. Other Arvin quality features include: Triple-strength ventilated top for all-important stability . . . Sturdy but lightweight all-metal construction . . . Safety lock . . . Rolled, snag-proof edges . . . Non-skid front foot . . . Chrome-plated legs, turquoise enameled top.

Other Arvin models both adjustable and non-adjustable. Write for illustrated folder—Dept. TJ-75.

LADY ARVIN PADS AND COVERS

Custom-tailored to fit perfectly all Arvin Ironing Tables—without bulge, bunch, slide or slip. Many unusual features make ironing easier—on you and on the things you iron. At your department or hardware store.

Arvin INDUSTRIES, Inc., Columbus, Ind.

Arvin also manufactures Outdoor Furniture, "Charky" Outdoor Grills, Radios, Fans, Electric Heaters, Lectric Cook, Car Heaters.

COMMUNITIES DECLARE WAR ON THE LITTERBUG

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 46

Perhaps Americans as a whole aren't yet accustomed to the idea that our wide-open spaces can no longer be used indiscriminately as a dumping ground. But across the country awareness is growing. Forty-four states now have antilitter laws. "But," campaigners point out, "the problem is not solved by the mere passage of laws. The laws must be enforced."

Enforcement can be difficult. Many communities put their faith in a program of education first. "Americans aren't accustomed to strict regulation of their habits, good or bad. You get further with persuasion than you do with prohibition."

Like Tucson, the city of Montpelier, Vermont, is rimmed by mountains. Here they are gentler, greener mountains and they overlook sparkling streams and mirrorlike ponds reflecting evergreens, maples and silvery birch. Tiny crossroads towns have white-painted, steepled churches and names like Adamant and Maple Corners.

Vermonters are no less eager than Arizonans to have visitors see their state at its best. Its state parks and forests draw 500,000 people a year—campers and fishermen in summer, skiers in winter.

Fifty-one Vermonters gathered in the high-ceilinged Senate Chamber of the 100-year-old state capitol in answer to an appeal by Gov. Joseph Johnson, one of the first state governors to agree that an antilitter program was badly needed.

Governor Johnson announced that Vermonter George Adams Ellis had donated $10,000 to promote a Beautify Vermont program. With the help of this group, Johnson said, he proposed to get the program under way immediately. "We'll start with a statewide study of the highway litter problem. Vermont's beauty is its greatest asset. Let's keep it beautiful!"

"The response," one volunteer says, "was like touching a spark to a ready-laid fire. It was as if everyone wanted to do something about it and hadn't known just how to begin."

Governor Johnson's committee became a permanent organization—Keep Vermont Beautiful, Inc. Its objective—"Education of the public to the seriousness of the litter problem. Enforcement of antilitter laws. Enactment of new, tougher laws where needed."

Washington County (which includes Montpelier, Barre, eighteen towns) organized its Cleanup Week. Blueprints for other communities were based on Washington County's experience. The 200 volunteers who served on various committees represented not only state and county officials, but churches, schools, clubs and service organizations.

Representatives of the state's Board of Forest Parks and the highway department (which spends $275,000 a year on highway cleanups, $30,000 on tidying picnic areas) studied the highway litter survey and doubled their number of travel-trash receptacles. The receptacles were given a new paint job, a vivid orange.

"The first time I saw one," says Mrs. Curtis Smith, vice president of Keep Vermont Beautiful, "I was startled and indignant. 'Can't we go back to the nice dark green ones that weren't such a shock to the eye?' I asked. Our KVB program director, Ted Kane, explained that the trash receptacles were twice as effective just because they were so glaringly visible."

Oil companies distributed litter bags and placed converted oil drums labeled TRAVEL TRASH in service stations. As the campaign's kickoff day dawned, people on their way to work in Montpelier watched Governor Johnson—smiling broadly—deposit the first litter bag in the first Travel Trash can as a signal that Washington County Cleanup Week was officially under way. (Those same people dodged drying puddles here and there—the city's streets had been thoroughly washed at 7:30 that morning.) Posters, newspapers, radio and TV stations appealed to residents to clean up alleys and yards.

Everyone chuckled over a picture the papers carried that evening. Wearing wide grins, Peter Gregory, 8, and Francis and Michael Mier, 7 and 10, were pictured standing beside their day's haul—more than 1000 cans, bottles and cartons gathered along a single road. Above the mess they held a large homemade sign. Its letters were uneven, but its message was clear: "LITTERBUGS LEFT THIS—WE CLEANED IT."

"Want your picture in the paper?" campaign workers asked. "Paint your house during Cleanup Week." They added a financial appeal. ("We're said to be canny with a dollar here in Vermont.") "A good coat of paint can increase the value of your house by 12 per cent."

With that same canny eye, owners of local paint stores saw a good thing, both civic and business-wise. They announced sales of paint at bargain prices.

"You could smell paint from one end of town to the other," says Mrs. Joseph Lovell, president of the Woman's Club. "When a house on your block was painted you'd see neighbors turn to look at it thoughtfully. Next day you'd see them at work painting their houses too. It was as catching as measles."

"Surrounding towns caught it too," adds Elizabeth Kent Gay, KVB chairman for nearby Calais (Vermonters call it "Callus"). "When you drove through Adamant, a group of teen-agers waved at you cheerfully from their job of painting a shabby church. At Bliss Pond they cleared a beach and built a swimming raft. At Maple Corners ten grade-school children cleared seventy sacks of litter from the roadsides. Older youngsters helped rehabilitate the lovely old Grange hall we use as our community center."

Chairman Helen Pitkin, of Plainfield, says proudly, "Our high-school students took over Town Hall—mowed the lawn, cleared away all the weeds, planted flowers. Another group of teen-agers tore down a dilapidated old barn for years a neighborhood danger and eyesore.

All across the state, Vermont's antilitter volunteers went into action. With that well-known Yankee reticence, they'd far rather have visitors see what they've accomplished than do much talking about it themselves. But the national Keep America Beautiful organization in New York points to Vermont with astonishment and admiration. "The state reduced its highway litter by 50 per cent in three months!"

With almost the width of the country between them, Montpelier and Tucson drew the same conclusions from their antilitter campaigns.

"Making people aware of the litter problem, its magnitude and its cost, is your first biggest problem. After you do that, it's easier," says Vermont's Ivan Edwards. "There are a good many more profitable ways for Americans to spend $50,000,000 a year than paying it out to clean up the mess we make along our highways."

"Litter is caused by thoughtlessness," says Tucson's Chris Reilly. "Our job is to make people think."

And at Sabino Canyon the Forestry Service's Pierre Early (who states firmly, "You can't talk to kids, and if they feel you're right they'll listen") sums up with the air of a man who has done a lot of thinking on the subject: "I'd like to see our schools add another R to the three they already teach—make it readin', 'ritin' 'rithmetic and responsibility."

NEXT MONTH

HOW TO HAVE ENOUGH MONEY TO RETIRE IN COMFORT FOR $10 A WEEK NOW

Robert Peterson tells you how a family man of forty with $6000 yearly can build a sound program of financial security after 65. And in "How America Lives" you'll meet three families and a widow living in Basking Ridge, New Jersey; Tucson, Arizona; Rutland, Vermont; and Coral Gables, Florida, who have met the problems of retirement, each in a different way, and find their days filled with activity, interests and pleasure.

"HE HAD NO TIES TO THE ISLAND. HE WOULD LEAVE NOTHING BEHIND—ONLY THE VERY CORE OF HIS HEART."

Tom Carruthers knew he couldn't burden Medora with the knowledge of his love; on the other hand, he couldn't stop seeing her. Medora was the wife of another man. And she was in peril, as were all the others on the island of Martinique. "Escape to the Mountain," the new novel by Thelma Strabel, tells the story. It's complete in this issue.

A VISIT WITH CYD CHARISSE AND TONY MARTIN IN HOLLYWOOD

They live in a beautiful hilltop house, overlooking the sea, with their two sons. ("Big T" is Miss Charisse's name for her husband. "Little T" is young Tony.) Cynthia Wheatland and Eileen Sharpe take you to meet the family and see their home in two pages of four-color photographs.

WHAT GOOD IS A HUSBAND WHO'S NEVER HOME?

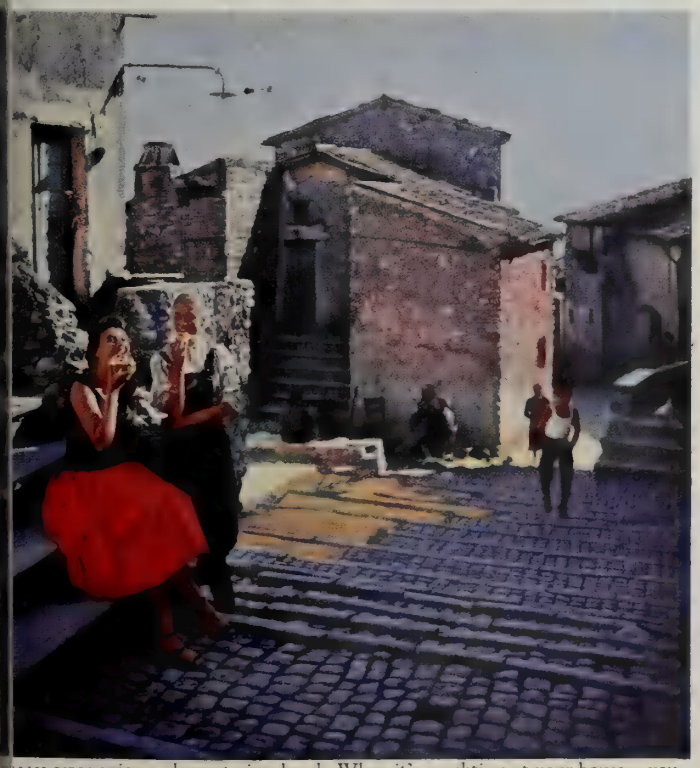
Della says, "My husband's business is wrecking our marriage. The children and I practically never see him. I feel like a widow." Says Riley, her husband, "Della used to be full of fun and gaiety. Now she wallows in self-pity and cries over trifles." Read the marriage counselor's advice in "Can This Marriage be Saved?"

THE "SCOOP" IS THE NEW SHORT HAIRCUT

It's trim and easy to care for. But if your hair is longer and you like it that way, there are seven new ways to arrange it flatteringly. They will all stay put with a minimum of fuss between settings.

OH, WHAT A BEAUTIFUL SWEATER!

Seven of the prettiest sweaters to make a summer dress twice as becoming and useful—and there's a JOURNAL pattern for each. In addition seven pages of summer fashion news and photographs in colors.



THE SALADS THAT BLOOM IN THE SPRING

Coral-pink shrimp, prisms of chilled fruit and others as delicious are included in five pages of menus and recipes. These are meals to please the family, treat the budget kindly and even save work in the kitchen.

Also short stories by your favorite writers, Dr. Spock's page for mothers, a new prefabricated-house plan and many other features, all coming

IN THE JUNE JOURNAL

"Sizzling good Italian pizza—in minutes!"

IAN GIRLS enjoy a pleasant pizza break. When it's snacktime at your house—you enjoy the same treat so easily with Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Pizza Pie Mix.

All the makings—including cheese

Shh! Just listen to it sizzle . . . sniff the warm, delicious fragrance of tomatoes and cheese . . . sink your fork into the crispy, golden brown crust . . .

Now . . . taste real Italian pizza—as they make it at a pizzeria in Naples . . . or as you make it at home with Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Pizza Pie Mix.

Everything you need comes in one box: a package of crust ingredients . . . a can of ready-to-use Pizza Sauce, rich with tomatoes and cheese, spiced as only an Italian chef knows how . . . and a can of luscious Italian-style cheese to melt on top.

Let it bake about 15 minutes . . . serve bubbling hot. Chef Pizza makes wonderful munching at snacktime or suppertime—cut appetizer-size or in wedges.

Whenever you have it—it's pizza at its Italian best. Remember Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Pizza Pie Mix—the one that includes cheese.

real Italian-style

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE®

Pizza Pie Mix

These are the hands of Mrs. Margaret Lane, Seattle, Wash. Only her right hand was treated with Jergens. This photo is unretouched.

Simple as 1 2 3 to stop "Detergent Hands

It's simple to have lovely hands. Over 450 women proved it in a scientific test.* They soaked both hands in detergents 3 times a day. In several days, left hands not treated with Jergens Lotion became coarse and red. But right hands, treated with Jergens, stayed soft and lovely. No other lotion similarly tested kept hands so soft, smooth Jergens stops all chapping and dryness. It doesn' "glove" hands with sticky film…it penetrates t help replace natural moisture lost to wind an weather, indoor and outdoor chores. It's th world's most popular hand care! Only 15¢ to $1

*Notice to doctors and dermatologists—for summary of test write The Andrew Jergens Co., Cincinnati, Oh

THE BOY IN THE DREAM

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

it without any sense of sacrifice or duty; it was the thing he thought was right, and at that moment he even wanted it.

"Oh, don't make me laugh!" she cried, but her voice broke and she bent her head down, turning away from him. For a moment she could say nothing, and when she turned back to face him, the ocean wind blew a strand of dark hair across her face and it stuck to her tear-wet cheek. "Alan, you're kind—and you're good. Maybe you're the best person I've ever known." She touched his face and then let her hand drop; she shook her head. "But us get married, you and me? Alan, we haven't got anything to make a marriage out of, us two. Not for the sake of any child. It wouldn't stick, Alan. I'm pretty dumb, but I know that much. We don't like anything the same, down deep. It wouldn't stick at all."

"Then what do we do? What do you want to do?" He gripped her by the shoulders. "Oh, God, why did I get you into a mess like this?"

Jean reached up, pushing her hair back under the kerchief. "I'll be fine, Alan," she said. "Honest . . . if you—if you just see I get enough money to have—to have the baby—then he can be adopted, all proper like it ought to be ——" But she watched his face and saw, perhaps, some sad premonition of the dream pass over it. "People who adopt kids really want them, you know," she said gently. "It'll be better than anything we could do—after we got sick of each other and were wishing—wishing it never happened."

They clung together, and she kissed him once, warmly in the cold wind.

"Write me," he said.

Jean shook her head. "No."

He thought, bewildered, how much stronger she was than he, and he did what she asked, sent only a check each month, folded in blank paper inside the envelope. In no time at all, in a handful of months, his last check to her came back, neatly torn in half. She had scrawled a note: "Thanks, but I'm back at work and everything is fine. Jean." That was all, except that something had impelled her to add, hastily, "A boy.—J."

In the dream he knew the boy was his. Daddy, daddy! the boy called—but Alan, trying to answer, was voiceless and could only open his mouth and swallow the swallowing wind, could only limp with millstone legs and weep with frustration. Sometimes, when he awoke, the tears were almost there in reality, and he felt a fool. But after a while the dream had almost gone; and when he met Naomi and married her, he thought it would be gone forever.

This was nothing he could have foreseen: that they would be married three years and still be childless; that they could love each other so warmly and fully, that every part of their life together could be so richly satisfying—that they could be husband and wife so completely and never father and mother.

When they had walked out of the doctor's office that morning three months before, he had known the dream would come back. On the stairs, Naomi had reached for his hand and held it tight. "I can't help feeling I've failed you," she said in a low voice. "Failed myself, failed us."

"It could just as well have been me," he answered. "Is everyone a perfect specimen? Look at me—hay fever."

"But this is important," she said angrily, "this is different. It's not like hay fever. Hay fever doesn't have anything important to do with—with our marriage. But this does." She walked down the stairs and pushed the outer door open and stood there in the sunlight. "Oh, it isn't fair!" she cried. "Other people have children they don't even want, and we—we can't!"

Alan wanted to say something healing, something good and fine. Nothing came to him, only mute love caught in his throat like a stone. And it struck him that this was as if what had happened so long ago to him and the girl named Jean had suddenly been turned inside out, that this was the ironic obverse of the coin he had cast.

"We can adopt children," he said. "Other people do that too." It was the simplest thing he could say, and he said it harshly, as if he were shutting her up. "The doctor gave me the addresses of two agencies ——"

Naomi squinted in the sunlight, narrowing her great luminous eyes. "Right now, then," she said. "I want to find out about it now."

In medieval France no woman, regardless of her rank in society, had any legal rights. She was the liege subject of her husband, and from his dictates had no appeal. But even in the Dark Ages, women knew the value of tears! Having no other recourse, noblewomen offended by their husbands would retire to a cubbyhole and weep. The practice became so common that in wealthy homes a special room was reserved for this purpose. Men loftily referred to such a room as the "bouder," from the French word for sulking or pouting. When the great ladies of England began including their own private rooms in their homes, they appropriated the French term. Anglicized, it became "boudoir"—whose literal meaning is, therefore, "the room in which the lady goes to pout."

WEBB B. GARRISON

"A year?" Naomi cried. "I knew we couldn't expect a baby right away—but a whole year?"

The woman behind the desk laid down the sheaf of papers and smiled pleasantly. "Sometimes it's as much as two or three years, Mrs. Seymour," she said. "In the first place, we try to place infants with adoptive parents as close in appearance and background as possible. And there are so many people waiting for infants—of course, if you were ready to take on an older child ——"

"Oh, but it doesn't have to be just newborn," Naomi interrupted. "I—we said right there on the form that we'd be happy with a child one or two or three years old."

"I mean older than that."

"But why wouldn't . . . is there something wrong with a child when it isn't adopted before—not—not that a child has to be perfect ——"

"Well, Mrs. Seymour, there are cases like this, for example: a child whose parents were separated, the child living with the mother; the mother died, but when authorities contacted the father he refused to sign release papers although he didn't want the child. So all we could do was to keep the child institutionalized and try to place him in temporary foster homes; this went on until the father remarried, had children of his own, and was finally persuaded to sign a release. By that time the child was ten years old—and very unhappy."

"That happens often?" Naomi asked, shocked.

"Once is too often, as far as I'm concerned," the interviewer answered sharply. "But if you would consider an older child, I do have a little boy in mind who would fit into your family nicely—not the one I just mentioned, but a similar situation. I think you'd like him—as a matter of fact, he's got your coloring, Mr. Seymour, almost exactly."

Excitement rose so suddenly and thickly in Alan that he did not dare to look at Naomi. A little boy that looked like himself ——

"How old is he?" Naomi asked quickly, leaning forward.

"He's five. He's a bit shy, but he's not a psychiatric case by any means, I assure you."

Alan caught his breath and felt his racing blood abate. Five. It had been stupid of him to react that way; and his boy, his own boy, would be over twice that old by now.

"Alan?"

Naomi was looking at him, inquiringly. Her face was eager, anxious.

"Do you want to see him, Alan?"

"Yes," he said, feeling guiltily indifferent. "Yes, if you would."

"His name is Johnny," said the woman behind the desk.

They saw him through a one-way window, in a playroom where he was busy making something elaborate and unrecognizable out of building blocks.

Naomi clutched Alan's arm. "Why, he does look like you!" she whispered. "Alan, he's—he's just wonderful!"

But Alan felt withdrawn and aloof. It was a strange feeling; he looked at the boy and realized Naomi was right, and even as he looked and saw the boy's russet hair and the cut of his chin and the way he bit his lips together and dilated his nostrils as he worked, he wanted to say, "Wait, Naomi, there is another boy, somewhere, who is really mine!" But he could never tell her—not that another woman had so easily done what she had failed to do; not that all their loving love-making, strengthened with the deepest desire of their

Let BUDS do it!

Baby care . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS for baby's most delicate cleansing needs. The soft cotton is tight-spun—won't slip off!

Soap in the ears... Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse ears, nose gently. Only the softest, finest cotton is used on BUDS.

Skinned knee . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse open cuts safely, to apply medication. Tight-spun BUDS won't "fuzz up"!

Treating hangnails . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse and treat tiny skin wounds easily, accurately . . . to apply cuticle cream.

100% STERILE

Made by the most trusted name in surgical products

Johnson & Johnson

hearts, could never duplicate the thing that had merely happened.

"Oh, he's wonderful," Naomi was saying, and she wept unashamedly.

In the gray morning he lay sleepless beside his sleeping wife, trying to shake off the melancholy enchantment of the dream. For Naomi's sake he had gone through all the motions—the subsequent interviews, the home visits—and now everything was settled. Somehow it would have to work out; he would have to wait, and be patient with himself. Naomi stirred and turned toward him, still asleep. She smiled, thinking even in her sleep, perhaps, that this was the day they were going to get Johnny. But Alan felt suddenly cold as charity; and what would happen if it didn't work out, if he found he couldn't be a father to a stranger, if the little boy of the dream reproached him night on endless night?

Johnny had a new plaid flannel shirt, but he held a very old and disreputable Teddy bear and a small, battered, metal police car.

"Here's your new mommy and daddy," he was prompted gently.

"Hello," he said very politely. "Mommy. And daddy."

Alan thought, If it doesn't work out, at least this is only the probationary period. The final papers don't go through for a long time yet. And he felt rotten for thinking it.

Johnny sat between them on the front seat. It was queer, looking over his head at Naomi, feeling the boy against his side.

"Let's stop and have a treat or something," Naomi suggested. "We ought to do something special—don't you think so, Johnny?"

He didn't look up from his Teddy bear and his police car. "Yes," he said woodenly.

Naomi looked at Alan in agonized appeal. "Please, Alan, how about a soda? It might be . . . a good idea."

But Johnny drank a soda solemnly, not even burbling with the straw. Carefully he took the long-handled spoon and dipped out the last bits of froth and ice cream. Then, while Alan and Naomi finished their coffee, he moved restlessly on the seat and looked about him; but he said nothing. He swung his legs and hunched his shoulders up and down, nervously, but he did not permit himself even the phantom of a smile. When they were through he got up, gathered up his Teddy bear and police car, and waited by the jukebox while Alan paid the check and Naomi stood at the door. Then, when Alan turned to him and said, "O.K., Johnny, come on," it happened. Midway between the jukebox and the door he stood still, his sober face frozen in anguish.

"Daddy! Daddy!" he howled, and Alan lunged for him and scooped him up, toys and all, and bore him away to the back of the restaurant, through the door marked GENTS.

"It's all right," Alan kept saying, "it's all right, never mind. We've got lots of dry pants your size at home." And then, bending over, cramped in the little washroom, he tipped Johnny's face up and looked into the hazel eyes so astonishingly like his own. "I'll tell you a secret," he said. "It happened to me once in front of a whole roomful of people, more than a hundred people. It was pretty awful."

"Did it?" Johnny asked, hiccuping. "Did it really?"

"And I was older than you too."

"How old?"

"I was six."

He carried Johnny back to the car, grinning at the waitress who met him on her way back with a damp cloth and sighed at him, "Oh, kids!"

As they drove away, Naomi put her arm around Johnny's shoulders. There was a smell of warm, wet wool in the car, but Alan did not notice it. He was thinking that the boy in his dream who cried Daddy, daddy! had always been a small boy, a boy about five years old, and that this was the little boy in the dream—Johnny, his boy and Naomi's—that somewhere, somebody who loved and wanted a child had taken that other boy, and now he and Naomi had taken Johnny, and everything was going to be fine. END

NEW TEST "FINGERPRINTS" A RUTHLESS DISEASE OF CHILDHOOD

■ A bare 20 years ago cystic fibrosis—a hereditary, almost invariably fatal disease involving the respiratory and digestive organs—was striking at its child victims (an estimated one in every 600 children born) from the safe shadow of ignorance—our ignorance. We did not know that cystic fibrosis existed.

Its baffling symptoms often mistaken for those of pneumonia, chronic bronchitis, asthma, liver disease, malnutrition, cystic fibrosis too often led the bewildered parents of cystic children on a long, costly, heartbreaking search for an answer to the question "What's wrong with our child? He is sick, he must have help." The "new" disease was known to too few nonspecialist doctors. Even when its presence was suspected, cystic fibrosis was far from easy to diagnose with certainty. Tests were complex and wearing, and there were not enough hospitals where they could be carried out.

Doctors who did understand the disease worked desperately to see that it became more widely recognized. As yet they had no cure for it, true, but they did have treatment, and the right treatment often permitted a cystic child to live comfortably and happily in spite of the disease, prolonging his life while the search for a cure went on.

One vital step in that search—they must find a simple, inexpensive, easy-to-read diagnostic test for the presence of the disease, a quick test that could be made almost anywhere, a test that might save a child's life by getting him the proper treatment immediately.

That test is a reality now. Based on work done by Doctor Paul di Sant'Agnese, and further developed by Doctor Harry Shwachman, of the Children's Medical Center in Boston, Massachusetts, the test takes mere seconds, is almost 100 per cent accurate. A print is taken by touching the small patient's hand—or foot—to a chemically treated plate. If the patient has cystic fibrosis, the high salt content in his sweat (a symptom found consistently in the disease) causes a strong whitish-yellow imprint on the plate—a "fingerprint" to help unmask a ruthless foe.

In addition to the lives it may help to save or prolong, the new test makes it possible for the first time to compile accurate statistics on the true prevalence of cystic fibrosis. There are doctors who suspect that—when compiled—these figures may reveal cystic fibrosis as the most widespread of all the critical diseases of childhood. Whether or not it proves these suspicions to be true, the new test is a sturdy weapon in the fight to make life safer for our children.

THE NATIONAL CYSTIC FIBROSIS RESEARCH FOUNDATION, 2300 Westmoreland St., Philadelphia, Pa., will reply to queries.

new! Scotties in powderpuff pastels!

the soft, soft facial tissues that really hold together!

Even with the new liquid face creams,
Scotties hold together throughout an entire creaming!

PROVE IT TO YOURSELF! JEWEL TEST SHOWS SCOTTIES STRONG WHEN "WET"!

Soak an ordinary tissue and a Scottie with equal amounts of liquid cleansing cream.

Ordinary cream-soaked tissue breaks. A tissue without the wet-strength of Scotties breaks when you drop just one earring into it.

Cream-soaked Scottie holds and holds! Drop earring, bracelet, pin, necklace into cream-soaked Scottie —and the Scottie doesn't break!

In powderpuff pink,
white and yellow

SCOTTIES—ANOTHER FINE PAPER PRODUCT BY SCOTT

"SCOTTIES" REG. U. S. PAT. OFFICE

To stop time from telling on your face...use Tussy Moisture Cream or Moisture Lotion. With them–your skin can look the age you want to tell.

to be as lovely as you can be...

TUSSY moisture cream and lotion

Cream 4 oz. $5 — 2 oz. $3 — "Vitamin A" enriched Lotion 4 oz. $5 — 2 oz. $3 Prices plus tax. On Counters everywhere. Use Tussy Astringent Powder

Separates in Cotton $5.95 and Under!

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

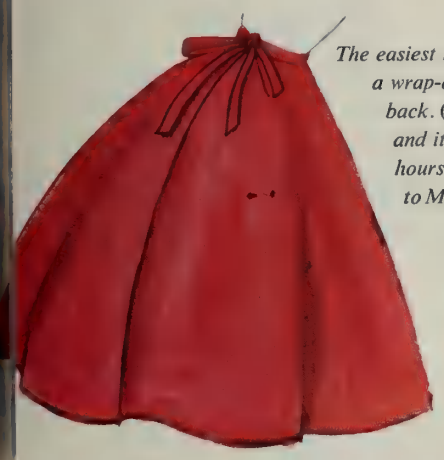
Summertime and cottons, Barbara J. feels, are synonymous. Both have a touch of brightness, a feeling of gaiety, and this is exactly what Barbara decides to add to her by now very well-established wardrobe! Shopping the stores on a Saturday morning, she finds two separates in an enchanting print; the price is so practical, the fabric so pretty she continues on her happy pursuit for others.

But don't let the prices fool you; just because they're definite budget figures doesn't mean they were bought without a thought or without a care in the world. With her customary determination and fashion figuring, Barbara comes up with five additions—to wear with costumes she has already, as well as a whole wardrobe unto themselves. But what truly amazed us this time was the price—five separates, and all for under $20.00. We'll let you figure out the total number of costumes it all adds up to; we stopped counting when we reached ten!

By BET HART

A shirt—very prosaic except for the fabric. Striped in fine lines of bright pink and strewn with rosebuds and roses. A pretty roll-up sleeve. Barbara can wear this with her black pleated skirt or with her white skirt bought way back in December—a perfect costume of chiffon and roses for a summer evening!

$3.95



The skirt in the same enchanting fabric. Put them together for one of the loveliest shirt-dresses to wear all through the day or for an evening. The skirt has its own green cummerbund, a full skirt of tiny unpressed pleats. For a dressier look, Barbara can wear her scoop-neck white Orlon sweater with the skirt.

$5.95

A little blouse, but a great deal for the money. Made in white bird's-eye piqué and buttoned with pearls down the front. Barbara can wear this with any one of her skirts from preceding months, including her beige silk linen from March.

$3.50

The easiest skirt of all to make—a wrap-around that ties to the back. (Barbara timed herself and it took her exactly two hours.) Vogue, "Very Easy to Make" Design No. 9163. (Sizes 12–40, 60c.) Her fabric choice: cherry denim, a practical fabric, a gay color!

$2.55

© VOGUE

Shorts with a delicate air, soft pink, but in sturdy cotton twill. Two slit pockets are the only detail, and a pretty one too. Barbara wears these with her new print blouse or the lace-trimmed shirt from a season ago.

$3.95

$19.90 Total

SHARLAND

For a spring or summer evening, in the country or city, Barbara wears her white piqué blouse, the rose-print skirt tied together with a bright red scarf. On her feet? Her pretty red sandals from last month. For a cover-up on a cool evening, Barbara wears her white cardigan made last January.

A weekend in the country or shopping in town, Barbara wears her denim skirt, print shirt. Barbara added the pockets: 6" squares of the same fabric. And as if there weren't enough flowers already, she adds one large rose to the pocket!

DRAWINGS BY R Craver

A PRINCE FOR NIMMI

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 66

Om impatiently turned back into his room, growled, "Every morning this is done to me; is there no peace?"

Nimmi's door opened and she came out in a pink silk sleeping suit. "Pitaji, why do you make so much noise? I was having a good dream."

Lalaji laughed and said, "Come down; I will make your life better than any dream, my daughter."

The telephone rang, a servant answered, then shouted, "Babuji! Babuji! It's a girl!"

Lalaji ran down the stairs, snatched the telephone. "A girl? It is all well? We are coming!" He dropped the receiver shouting, "Om, a daughter has been given to you! Nimmi! Viddi! Usha! A girl!"

Lalaji sat downstairs in the sitting room with his legs supported on a chair. Usha was massaging them; she pressed them as hard as she could, kneeling on the floor. Nimmi, her plaits now piled up on her head, wearing a pale blue housecoat with a design of dark blue wisteria, read the cinema and restaurant advertisements in the newspaper while eating a banana.

"A girl," Lalaji said dreamily. "All the rich men in Delhi will run after her with their sons. The dowry I will give with her, no one will believe the figure."

Nimmi said, "Pitaji, you think you can buy everything with money."

"With what else will you buy it?" her father answered simply.

Om, eating a huge breakfast from a brass tray, took time off to laugh. His brother Viddi looked at him with loathing. "Money, money, money," he said. "That is all anyone thinks of in this house."

Viddi was scowling. This was his favorite expression nowadays: he felt very much misunderstood. If he had known that his scowl made him look even more like his eldest brother Om, he would have taken good care never to assume it. But even without it, there was an inescapable resemblance. Both sons took after the father, who in himself was the prototype of what they would become. "Massiveness" was the only word for Lalaji. He had spread out so far that he was flat rather than round, the stomach hanging in huge folds, chins overlapping, eyes swamped in cheeks. Yet there was nothing inert about him; vitality quivered in the masses of flesh; the eyes were bright and intelligent.

Nimmi tossed aside her newspaper and jumped lightly to her feet. "I am going to college now," she announced.

"And our new little daughter? You will not see our new little daughter?" her father protested, quite shocked.

"Today I have a class in English literature. We will learn about an English poet called Keats. None of you have heard about him, but he has written very beautiful poetry and that is why it is important for me to go." She looked very proud as she said this, her head tossed back and her lower lip pushed out.

"This college," said Om, "it is only a waste of time and of good money, and will perhaps even give her wrong ideas. Look at that one there," he said, thrusting his chin toward Usha, massaging her father's legs. "How much money was spent on her education, and what has it all led to now? A betrothal today, a marriage tomorrow, children the day after. Only with her we were lucky: she is too stupid to get any harm out of education."

Usha laughed. She had failed many times to pass her exams, and reference to this always moved her to good-humored laughter.

Nimmi, trembling with fury, picked up the newspaper again and pretended to read it. "Please do not think I am listening to you," she said in a strained voice.

Om pushed his breakfast tray aside and got up to yawn and stretch. "I would like to go straightway to the office," he said. "All my wife's relations will be at the hospital."

"When my children were born," Lalaji said, "not one minute could I rest till I had seen them."

"I will see her for the rest of my life," Om replied gloomily.

The nursing home was a very expensive and very modern one. Lalaji's wife thought it was a most unsuitable place for any baby to be born in. Her own confinements had been at home, which still seemed to her the best and only possible place. Of course times had been different then; they had not been so rich. But what was the use of so much wealth if all it did for you was to force you to abandon your own comfortable habits?

Shanta was asleep now; she lay on the bed with her hair straggled over the pillow and her face sagging with exhaustion. Her mother sat beside her, waving a hand fan in the sleeping face, though there was a perfectly good electric fan turning from the ceiling. Lalaji's wife—since the place of honor beside Shanta was taken—had to content herself with sitting beside the baby and looking at it and making out whom it resembled. Sometimes she thought its features were like her husband's—the nose—sometimes she thought it looked like Om—the hair—sometimes like Usha—the hands; but mostly she thought it looked like Nimmi (all the girls born in the family were made out to resemble Nimmi, though none so far did). She stole a look at her husband's sister Phuphiji, lying on a charpai, sternly asleep; no, it did not in any way resemble Phuphiji. Her eyes strayed to Shanta's mother, and she noticed with surprise, and some satisfaction, that she, too, was asleep, the hand with the fan resting on Shanta's pillow. Lalaji's wife thought proudly that she herself had never gone to sleep by a daughter's bed. No, not if she had had three sleepless nights.

Because she was lonely, with everyone asleep and no one to talk to, she called to laee, the old woman servant. "Look at that ne there," Lalaji's wife said with a cruel igger, indicating Shanta's mother, whose ead nodded obliviously on her chins, "see ow well she is guarding her daughter."

"Oh, that one," Maee said contemptuously. Why does she come here? We have no need f her here."

"She thinks her right here is greater than urs," Lalaji's wife said.

Maee gave a mocking laugh. "And who is ," she demanded, "who feeds the daughter nd sees to her comfort and the comfort of her hildren every day of the year? Is it she who oes all this?"

There was the sound of many feet trying to tread softly in the corridor outside and then the door opened and Lalaji's broad head was thrust in. His wife laid her finger on her lips and beckoned him forward; Lalaji turned round with his finger on his lips and beckoned the others forward. They all tried to walk on tiptoe. Shanta's mother woke up with a start and at once began fanning Shanta's face again. She said, "Be very quiet, you will disturb my daughter." There was a gentle smile on Lalaji's face as he tiptoed to the baby's cot.

The others crowded round, all smiling, all tender. Nimmi forgot about being blasé; she clapped her hands and asked with subdued joy, "May I hold it, please?" Usha kissed its little finger and there were tears in her soft eyes as she did so. Om looked proud and possessive until his father transferred the baby to him and then he looked embarrassed. Lalaji slapped him on the back. Maee appeared in the door from the veranda, holding a teapot. Everyone was smiling.

Servants came in with high baskets of fruit and boxes of sweetmeats which they at once began to unpack. Soon the room was brimming with bananas, pineapples, oranges, apples, nuts, pomegranates and huge chunks of sweetmeats—green, white and pink, and covered with silver foil. Phuphiji woke, sat up on her charpai and looked round severely, and then called to Maee for tea. Lalaji took out two one-hundred-rupee notes and thrust one into each clenched fist of the sleeping baby. "All your life may you have two fistfuls like that," he wished. His wife looked triumphantly at Shanta's mother and was chagrined to find that she was not watching.

More footsteps could be heard in the corridor, the door opened and Shanta's relations came in. Behind them came servants with more sweetmeats and fruit. The room was very full now. Shanta's relations crowded round the baby's cot and thrust money into its hands. Everybody ate sweets.

Lalaji was very happy. He joked and laughed with the men, receiving and dealing out good-natured insults, which was his favorite form of humor. The women meanwhile sat huddled round the bed, discussing pregnancies and miscarriages and other matters of interest. But whereas with the men the harmony was unsimulated, with the women it was very much a thing of the surface. The men had two lives, the women only one. If the men had business rivalries, they could forget them in private life; they could bitterly resent one another outside, but at home, and on an occasion like this, be the best of friends. For the women there was only that private family life, where a grievance was a grievance forever. Yet they met frequently, visiting in one another's houses. They could not have lived without one another, if only because afterward, after they parted, there was always so much to talk about, so many veiled insults to be brought to light.

The men of the two families were aware of this strife, but took no notice. Anyway, nothing could ever disturb the good relations between Lalaji and Shanta's father, Dev Raj. Both were counted among the richest men in Delhi, and the wedding of Om and Shanta had been one of the costliest and most elaborate ever seen in the city. On a happy occasion like this, they reserved the choicest and most jovial insults for each other; they poked each other's vast proud bellies and shouted, "He is like a tub of ghee!" . . . "He looks like a pregnant woman in the last month!" Their mutual esteem was very great. Lalaji was a contractor, Dev Raj the owner of a fleet of buses and heavy lorries. Their business interests never clashed—on the contrary, they were often useful to each other, for both had extensive and valuable connections.

At the moment Lalaji was much troubled by the idea that the contract of the new building to be put up by the Happy Hindustan Trading Company, at a cost of twenty-five lacs of rupees, might go to a rival contractor. But having discovered that one of the directors of the company was uncle to Dev Raj's cousin's sister-in-law, he felt much reassured. Dev Raj would speak to his relative; all would be well—ah, but it was good to be connected with such a man.

These matters were lightly, very lightly, touched upon. "I hear," said Lalaji casually, "that the Happy Hindustan Trading Company are investing in a building." And Dev Raj registered this and knew what was wanted. No more was said; there was no need to say more.

Meanwhile Shanta's mother said to Lalaji's wife, "I have not seen your second son with his wife here this morning. Will they be coming soon?"

Lalaji's wife was put out, though she knew that the absence of Chandra Prakash and Kanta would not, could not be allowed to pass without comment. And indeed it was very strange, not to say unprecedented, that the second son should fail to come and pay his respects when a child was born into the family.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 157

Humanitarianism consists in never sacrificing a human being to a purpose.

ALBERT SCHWEITZER
Philosophy of Civilization
The Macmillan Company

BAYER ASPIRIN makes you FEEL BETTER FAST!

BAYER®

And it's one thing most everyone can take any time—WITHOUT STOMACH UPSET!

MINOR PAINS OF SCIATICA? FEEL BETTER FAST—Grandfather amazes everyone with the active life he leads, despite the minor pains of sciatica. His secret is taking Bayer Aspirin. Millions of people use Bayer Aspirin regularly to get quick, temporary relief not only from minor pains of sciatica, but those of arthritis, bursitis, and rheumatism, as well!

HEADACHE? FEEL BETTER FAST—Now there's no need to call off the date! Bayer Aspirin came to the rescue and relieved Joan's headache in a hurry! And Sue knows one reason why: When you drop a Bayer Aspirin tablet in a glass of water, it starts to disintegrate instantly. What happens in the glass also happens in your stomach, so Bayer Aspirin is actually ready to go to work instantly—to make you feel better fast!

ACHING MUSCLES? FEEL BETTER FAST—Steve and Joe rely on Bayer Aspirin, too—especially for quick relief from backache or aching muscles. Like countless others, they take it with complete confidence. You can always depend on Bayer Aspirin to bring you the fast relief you want, and the safe relief you need!

NEURALGIA? FEEL BETTER FAST—When it's time to relax, Mom and Dad don't let neuritic or neuralgic pain stand in their way. Two Bayer Aspirin tablets bring relief with remarkable speed! Besides being fast, Bayer Aspirin is gentle, too! In fact, it's so gentle that doctors prescribe it even for small children.

Don't Pay Twice the Price of Bayer Aspirin for ASPIRIN "IN DISGUISE"!

What is aspirin "in disguise"? . . . a pain relieving product that attempts to belittle straight aspirin, yet combines aspirin with such non-pain-relieving ingredients as magnesium carbonate or aluminum compounds—and it costs you twice the price of Bayer Aspirin!

Why pay more for extra ingredients that can't relieve pain? Instead, get Bayer Aspirin. It's all pain reliever—100%—and medical science has never discovered a safer and more effective pain relieving agent!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 155

had telephoned. She had said, "Please e at once." Kanta had replied somewhat lly, "Of course." And yet they had not e. She could not understand it. But then, as not often that she could understand her ghter-in-law, Kanta. The girl had very nge ways. "I think Chandra Prakash could get away from office," she said. "These etted government officers work very hard." huphiji disapproved very heartily of nta. But she said, "Just now she telephoned. oke with her myself and she told me that of the children has been taken sick. As n as the doctor has been there she will e, so she told me." She looked round erely, defying anyone to give her the lie.

Lalaji's eldest daughter, Rani, also did not Kanta. However, she, too, said, "Ah, yes, n children are sick it is difficult to leave, Kanta will come as soon as she can."

Nimmi was by this time rather bored with baby and was amusing herself by making itical survey of the women sitting round bed. How fat they all are! she thought h disdain; and if not fat, then thin and dry meager like Phuphiji. And how badly ssed they were. She looked at her eldest er. Rani wore expensive clothes, but she not have much taste; her sari and her use did not match, for one thing, and she wearing too much jewelry. She thought of nta: yes, she would be like Kanta, only of rse she would be more beautiful than nta, and lead an even more fashionable life; her husband would be better looking than ndra Prakash.

More people came in, friends and distant tions. The room was so crowded that they to open the doors and overflow into the sage and veranda.

A passage was cleared and the lady doctor e in, accompanied by two nurses. The lady tor said there were too many people and much noise; but as there were a number prospective patients in the room and the enses of the nursing home were heavy, she ld not say anything more. After she had gone, the men started to leave, having run out of jokes and insults and being anxious about business. Lalaji also went, with Om Prakash, for he had to see his lawyer and meet various people. The women stayed behind and spent the rest of the morning in agreeable, if pointed, conversation.

After leaving the nursing home, Viddi went straight to the Rendezvous. Tivari was already sitting at a table by himself, drinking whisky and staring in front of him in a melancholy fashion. He was not very pleased to see Viddi because he knew that Viddi could not stand him any drinks. Viddi was painfully aware of this and felt ashamed. He ordered coffee for himself, but to excuse himself for not taking a drink (which anyway he would not have wanted), he said, "What can I do? My father will not give me money."

Tivari laughed and turned sideways on his seat to look at him. "But he gives you enough to eat," he said, making a gesture with his hand to suggest Viddi's bulky outline.

Viddi looked down at his stomach and felt more miserable. "Sometimes I feel I will go mad," he said. "You do not know what it is like in my father's house. How can I live with people like that?" He wanted some response from the other, sympathy, agreement, comfort, suggestion, anything. He admired Tivari very much, for Tivari was a journalist and had been to England and smoked cigars. He had a well-paid government post, but most of the time he sat about in restaurants and let other people buy drinks for him.

"I would like to meet your father," Tivari said. "He must be a very interesting man."

"How you would hate him," Viddi said, his own hate brimming in his voice. "You do not know what he is like. He is so crude. He is quite uneducated; he can barely read or write, and he speaks very bad English."

"But what need has he," Tivari pointed out, "to read and write and speak English? He pays people like us to do it for him."

Zahir-ud-din joined them. He wore a pale green bush shirt and a signet ring and he walked languorously. He was an artist and very handsome. It was he who was responsible for the murals on the walls of the restaurant; he now sat looking at them with one eye critically closed. He said, "They have depth and vision." He opened his eye. "Who will buy me a drink today?" Tivari continued to stare, while Viddi looked down into his coffee and felt ashamed all over again. Zahir-ud-din philosophically ordered a coffee.

Several businessmen had come in, fat and prosperous, and sat talking to one another

Kindness consists in loving people more than they deserve.

JOSEPH JOUBERT
Pensées

and scribbling figures on the menu. Zahir-ud-din looked at them in fascination and said, "How rich they must be."

"They are busy bribing one another," Tivari said.

Zahir-ud-din laughed, showing many beautiful teeth. "You have been following the T—— bribery-and-corruption case? Oh, it is a wonderful case. Hundreds of people are involved. Is your father not involved too?" he asked Viddi.

"How should I know?" Viddi asked listlessly. He did not know that his father was fighting and bribing hard to keep out of the case: Lalaji did not believe in sharing his worries with his family.

Tivari said, "Why do you not introduce us to your father? We will persuade him what a good business proposition we are."

"Please," Viddi said, "do not talk to me about my father."

But Zahir-ud-din entered into the idea with enthusiasm. "Yes, we will make him richer, and not only richer but also great and famous. Does he not want to be a great patron of the arts? Only let him send me to Paris for two years. I will come back famous and everybody will say it was Lala Narayan Dass Verma who first set this man on the path of fame." He rapped his knuckles on his fine chest and smiled brilliantly.

"Or perhaps," Tivari said, "he would like to finance a magazine. I will edit it for him."

"What are you talking about?" Viddi said. "He does not even know what a picture is, and reads only business letters and advertisements in the newspaper."

"That does not matter," Tivari said. "Only tell him we are offering good investment and he will listen."

"He never listens to me. For months I have been begging him to send me to Europe, to let me study at an English university, but he does not hear me. Do you know what he wants me to do?" He paused for a second for effect. "He wants me," he said slowly and clearly and with a laugh that was half mocking and half tearful, "he wants me to go into his business."

Both Tivari and Zahir-ud-din became attentive. Zahir-ud-din laid his hand on Viddi's and said enthusiastically, "But what a wonderful idea. He will make you a partner, you will have all the money you want."

"I want to go abroad," Viddi said passionately. "I want to study, I want to learn things, I want to meet people. I want to get away from home, from my father and my eldest brother and all the women in our house."

"That will come later," Tivari said. "In your father's business you will become rich and then you will be independent and able to do what you like."

"Independent!" Viddi laughed bitterly. "When once he has got me into his business, the next thing will be he will find a wife for me, the cross-eyed stupid black daughter of some other rich contractor. She will bring me a great dowry and we will live in my father's house, like my brother Om Prakash and his wife. That is the life my father wishes for me."

The two others thought how it would be if they had millionaire fathers who offered to make them partners. They looked at Viddi,

I'm a Charis figure stylist. I've measured hundreds of women and I've never found two exactly alike. That's why we don't type you...we tape you! Carefully. Completely. With professional skill. And how easy it is. You simply call, and I come to you . . . in the privacy of your home . . . where there's time to analyze your figure. You'll be gratified, I promise.* For the garment I bring you will seem custom-made. It costs no more to have me style you in

CHARIS

*THIS IS NOT JUST MY PROMISE, BUT THE WONDERFUL CHARIS MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE!
CHECK PHONE BOOK OR WRITE CHARIS CORP., ALLENTOWN, PA.

and Zahir-ud-din said wistfully, "At least think of us. Think of your friends."

Viddi was flattered that they regarded themselves as his friends, but he said, "If I went into business, you would not want to be my friends any more."

At this they gave him up. Zahir-ud-din said sadly, "At least, ask your father if he would not like his portrait painted. Tell him I will give him a beautiful picture of which he will be very proud."

Nimmi missed the lecture on Keats, but at lunchtime in the college canteen she copied out the notes her friends had made, which was just as good. In between nibbling biscuits she wrote, "John Keats was born in 1795 and died of consumption in Rome in 1821." Her friends were talking about one of the lecturers, and she listened as she wrote.

"She would not be bad-looking," Rajen was saying, "if she dressed better and did something with her hair." She fingered her own hair, cut short and set very fashionably. "Nimmi, will you come and play tennis at the club this evening?"

"I can't," Nimmi said sadly, though she would have loved to go. She adored going to the club; it was there, she felt, that the life she wanted was lived. Rajen's parents were members, and now that Rajen was eighteen they had allowed her to become a member independently, so that she could go whenever she liked and take her friends as guests.

"Oh, why not?" Rajen said. "We could have a swim after tennis and then sit on the lawn and drink pineapple juice. Please come."

Nimmi shook her head. "I have to go to the nursing home because of the new baby. Mummy would be very angry if I did not go." At home she never called her mother "mummy," but among her friends she did, because that was what they called their mothers. "But please go this evening, I want very much that you should go this evening."

"Why?" Rajen asked.

Nimmi threw a significant glance toward the others. "I will tell you later," and then ostentatiously busied herself with her notes.

Rajen was impatient to know why Nimmi so particularly wanted her to go to the club in the evening; and since the other girls gave no sign of moving, she suggested, "Nimmi, shall we go to the library?"

Nimmi agreed at once. They walked along the corridor, proud and graceful, their heads in the air. Nimmi wore a sari of pale blue chiffon and Rajen a white Kashmiri silk with a pattern of tiny green squares. Sometimes they nodded to a group of girls, but they kept themselves aloof, for they were very conscious of their position as the prettiest and most fashionable girls of their year. They walked up the stairs and stopped on the first landing.

Rajen said, "Why do you want me to go to the club this evening?"

"I think," said Nimmi, "Pheroze Batliwala will perhaps be there this evening."

Rajen at once became pleasantly excited. "You want to send a message to him?"

Nimmi shook her head vehemently. She had not yet reached the stage of sending messages to Pheroze Batliwala and the suggestion embarrassed her. "No," she said, "not a message."

"What, then?"

Nimmi laughed, and swung round. She took a pin out of her hair, adjusted the coil on top of her head. "I only want you to see if he is there and then tell me."

"I will tell him, 'Nimmi is dying of love for you.'"

Nimmi flung her arm round the other's neck and with a little giggle buried her face in Rajen's shoulder. Rajen also giggled.

"You want me to tell him so?"

"Please do not tease me," Nimmi said, squirming and laughing. Some girls coming down the stairs stared at her disapprovingly; but she did not care. She despised these girls, for their manners were not very refined and they spoke English badly. And she knew that they were jealous of her because she was friends with Rajen; they expected her to be friends with them, because they were of the same community.

Rajen stared after them disdainfully. "What horrible clothes they wear."

"Horrible," Nimmi said, wrinkling her nose, trying to forget that these were the things her own sisters liked to wear—gaudy saris sparkling with sequins, and little gold hoop earrings and even—oh, horrible—diamonds at the side of their noses.

"I do not think"—Rajen smiled—"that Pheroze Batliwala would be very interested in such girls." That reminded her to ask with great interest, "Last time we were at the club, you spoke with him a long time. What did you talk about?"

"Oh," Nimmi said, feeling superior, "we only made conversation."

"But what about?" Rajen pressed her. Naturally she was very interested; it had been at the club and in her company that Nimmi had first become acquainted with Pheroze. "What did he say to you?"

Nimmi thought back, but she could not remember anything very outstanding that he had said. "He said he liked the way I did my hair. Rajen, do you like my hair?"

"Ye-es. It is nice."

"I love the way you do yours. Oh, how I wish I could have my hair cut short, I would so much like to wear it like you do."

"I will take you to my hairdresser. You must have it cut and washed and set, and I will sit with you and keep you company."

Nimmi smiled in a self-conscious manner. "Daddy would be very angry," she said. She did not mention that not only her father but her whole family would be very angry. There would be an uproar—Rani would be summoned, Phuphiji would pray, Om Prakash remark upon the results of sending girls to college, and her mother would weep and wring her hands and think only of what Shanta's mother would say.

"What nonsense!" Rajen cried. "Why should he be angry? Everybody has their hair cut nowadays! I am sure Pheroze Batliwala would like you even more if you had your hair cut short. He is the type of man who likes women to be fashionable."

Nimmi walked up the stairs, one hand at her knee to lift the sari a little above the ground. "I do not care," she said, and looked proud, "what Pheroze Batliwala likes and what he does not like. It is a matter of great indifference to me."

UNSUBSTANTIAL GHOST

By ELEANOR ALLETTA CHAFFEE

He was so anxious to please, so awkward at it;
Even his baby steps were tardy, slow.
Whistling a tune, he was almost sure to flat it;
He was the one who plowed the crooked row.
All of his love for us brimmed up and spilled
Not neatly, but with embarrassment and shame.
His heart was a hastily packed valise, half filled
With scraps of living, a remembered voice, a name.
How could he in his going strike us down
With the smile we thought the mask of a grimacing clown?

Lalaji sat in his New Delhi office. It was not much of an office, only a small square room with a high ceiling in which stood two old wooden tables, three chairs and several cane stools. Lalaji had another office in Old Delhi, in the heart of the city, more comfortable than this one, where he transacted all his private business. The New Delhi office was chiefly a place where people could come to see him and, being very central, it was ideally situated for this purpose. Its only drawback was that it was stifling hot all through the summer. Lalaji had been intending for a long time to install an air conditioner, but somehow he always forgot.

Om Prakash was sitting at one of the little tables, perspiring profusely. He asked, "When will you get the air conditioner, Pitaji?"

"It is a little hot," said one of the men sitting in the office. There were many people sitting in the office. Lalaji did not know who some of them were, though on their first entrance he had greeted them all very cordially. By and by they would tell him their business. Meanwhile he looked at his letters. Most of them were from distressed Punjabis who implored him for work, money, letters of recommendation, houses to live in.

He pushed aside the letters with his elbow and turned to one of the men sitting patiently waiting. "Please command me," he said, and they went through the preliminary formula of disinterested affection. The visitor declared that his sole purpose in coming was to regale his eyes on Lalaji; Lalaji said that it was too long a time since he had had the pleasure of seeing his visitor (though as far as he could remember he had never seen him before). The visitor solicitously inquired after Lalaji's health and after the health of his family; Lalaji inquired after that of his visitor and his visitor's family. They continued in this strain for some five minutes, both very cordial and both thinking of something else.

"This is the matter," said the visitor at last and Lalaji listened with more attention. All the other people in the room also listened. It appeared there was some small government work to be given out—some very small work, the visitor said, not worth the attention of such a man as Lalaji—some sweepers' hutments to be erected. He felt ashamed even to mention such a trifle. But he was a poor man, he had four daughters to be married, he had a son whom he wanted to send to college. Lalaji was so good, so religious and he had so much influence, one word from him and all would be settled ——

Lalaji listened and nodded and made encouraging noises. More courtesies were exchanged and then the visitor took his leave, joining his palms together and walking backward for a few steps. Lalaji knew that he would see him every day till the disposal of the work was settled. The man would come to the office and, the preliminary courtesies having been exchanged, would sit and patiently listen to whatever conversation was going on; after half an hour he would go away without saying another word. Lalaji himself in his beginnings had sat just so in great men's offices, meeting with much courtesy and very little help. Still, in the end it had been worth it.

He greeted another visitor whom he did not remember seeing before. This man was very long and thin and looked mournful; he touched Lalaji's feet and spoke in a whine. After the first few sentences, Lalaji no longer bothered to listen. He was thinking of that small job the contractor had mentioned. A row of sweepers' hutments: it was a very small job, but just now it might do for Viddi. A kind of token job for the boy to cut his teeth on, to introduce him into the business. He thought about it as he telephoned his lawyer; certainly the boy must be brought into the business, and quickly, too; he could not be allowed to drift about doing nothing but sit in restaurants and consort with undesirable people.

"I am not satisfied!" he shouted down the telephone; "I will change my lawyer! For months I have been paying out large sums and still nothing is settled!" The lawyer protested from the other end—"the deputy minister," came the remote worried voice—and Lalaji shouted, "Always the same! He is a man only! I give you four days, then I will change my lawyer!" and slammed down the receiver.

Lalaji really was angry; not with the lawyer, but with the deputy minister. Ever since this man had come into office there had been trouble. Before that everything had gone quite smoothly; he had tactfully passed on little gratifications to the officers and things got done. But now everyone was frightened of the new deputy minister who had launched a offensive against what he called bribery an corruption. It was he who had first instigate proceedings against T——. Lalaji himself ha already paid out enormous sums, patientl pursued prosecutors and witnesses, in order t avoid being caught up in the case; and still h was not sure whether he would in the end suc ceed in keeping out of it. And all because th new deputy minister had ideas about briber and corruption.

Bribery and corruption! These were foreig words, it seemed to him, and the ideas behin them were also foreign. Here in India, h thought, one did not know such words. Givin presents and gratuities to government officer was a custom, a tradition even, and henc should be respected; not tampered with b upstart deputy ministers who had been abroa and brought home unsuitable ideas.

That was the worst about sending sons ou to study in foreign countries: they invariabl came back with unorthodox ideas and tried t upset the old order at home. There was h son, Chandra Prakash, who had come bac entirely changed, had refused to come int the business, had married a girl outside h own community and against the wishes of h family. He was quite lost to them; he failed t understand his own people and they failed t understand him; that was what came of sen ing sons abroad.

Shanta was awake now, looking weak b complacent. All the women were groupe round her, massaging her legs, settling h pillows, wiping the perspiration from her fac Phuphiji sat cross-legged on a charpai. H lips were drawn in tight and her eyes, ve large and round above jutting cheekbone darted sharply round the room. She whisper fiercely to Rani, "Go telephone again. St they have not come. We will be shamed fo ever in the eyes of that family."

"But I have already telephoned three times, said Rani in despair.

"I knew such things would happen, Phuphiji accused. "I know very well wha happens when people marry outside their ow community. I have lived long enough in th world. But you were all too weak." Lalaji wife said nothing. She had heard this so ofte ever since Chandra Prakash had marrie Kanta, and she had never been able to find a adequate reply.

Lalaji's wife began to worry whether sh should stay the night in the nursing home o go home to her own house. "Shall I go hom tonight? I want to see to my house," she sai in self-defense.

Phuphiji said, "You can go. I will be her to see to everything."

But Lalaji's wife did not like that either; sh did not think it was right for only the aunt t stay and the mother-in-law to go hom "Shanta's mother will say bad things."

"As long as I am here she will say nothing

"But she will think."

"We also have our thoughts about her Rani said scornfully.

Nimmi, listening, wondered why her moth and her sister and her aunt should feel so b terly toward Shanta's family. For it was not if Shanta's relations were such bad people had done anything really outrageous. An almost every day they came to the house an everyone talked with them in a very friendl manner. Why should one do that—be friend with people and afterward, after they ha gone, abuse them? Nimmi frowned and mad another resolution: never to say anything ba about anybody with whom she was keeping u friendly relations. If she did not like peopl she would have nothing to do with them. Sh looked up and saw Shanta's cousin, Lakshm Yes, she would treat everyone she did not lik in the same way she treated Lakshmi: by turn ing her back, as she did now, unceremoniousl

Lakshmi came straight up to her and sai "Hallo, Nimmi." Lakshmi went to the sam college as she did and was one of the girls wh dressed in gaudy saris and spoke Englis badly. "I saw you today," Lakshmi sai "You were standing on the stairs."

Nimmi made no reply; but to her annoyan her mother came in with, "You two gir must know one another very well, you a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 160

SURF ADDS BRIGHTNESS

(yes...even to perfect whiteness)

New Laundry Discovery!

A wash that's merely white is no longer the best you can do. Now all-purpose Surf has a special brightener that puts ultra-violet rays (like those in sunshine) to work for you. Surf actually adds brightness—even to perfect whiteness. Brightens colors, too. Try today's Surf and see. If you don't get the whitest, brightest wash ever, Lever Brothers will refund every penny.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 158

both college girls." Shanta's mother also came over and said, "Lakshmi and Nimmi have much to talk about."

Lakshmi fostered the impression of intimacy by saying, "You were with Rajen Mathur."

Again Nimmi did not answer. She was not prepared to discuss a girl like Rajen Mathur with a girl like Lakshmi. But Lakshmi carried on obliviously: "I often see you with her and also that other girl, Indira Malik. I think you must be great friends."

"Yes, they are my friends." Nimmi replied coldly.

"You go to visit in their houses also?"

Such unashamed curiosity, coming from a girl like Lakshmi, was most distasteful, but Nimmi was too proud of her great friendships not to be able to answer, "Of course," in a haughty manner.

"What is it like there?" the shameless girl eagerly continued. "You have met their families? I think they are very rich people. Next time you go to their house, please take me with you. I would like to see it."

Nimmi was so indignant she could not speak. But just then Chandra Prakash and Kanta came in, and her attention was diverted.

All the women of Shanta's family noticed that Kanta did not touch her mother-in-law's feet, nor her elder sister-in-law's. They watched her with great attention, for they did not see her often and were much interested in her. She was quite bold and self-confident, walked straight up to the baby and looked at it appraisingly; Chandra Prakash followed her, very much less confidently. She placed a perfunctory kiss on Shanta's forehead and asked in a matter-of-fact tone, "How are you feeling?" Not a word of explanation, not a word of apology, for not having come earlier. Phuphiji's lips were drawn in tight and Lalaji's wife smiled uneasily.

Lalaji slapped Chandra Prakash on the back, saying, "Now it is your turn, son," and laughed cordially. But actually he was not quite at his ease; ever since his second son had come back from England, and especially since his marriage, he had not been quite at his ease with him. In his embarrassment he seized a bowl of sweetmeats and thrust it into Chandra's face. "Eat, son, eat," he urged. "Sweeten your mouth in honor of your eldest brother."

"Also it will give you strength to emulate him!" one of the other men put in, to another burst of laughter. Chandra, who hated sweets, took the smallest he could find. He would have liked to say something humorous in reply, but could not think of anything. He was fond of a joke and carried on banter with his colleagues very successfully, but theirs was a different, more refined kind of humor from that indulged in by his own family.

"How is your office, son?" his father asked him.

Chandra, embarrassed by the question, blinked three times very rapidly behind his spectacles and then answered, reluctantly, that it was all right.

"Ah, yes," said Dev Raj; "we are very fortunate to have a government officer in our family. Soon he will be head of his department and then there will be nothing we cannot get done."

Chandra felt more uneasy than ever. He did not like to have his office discussed in these circles; he felt it to be highly compromising. "It will save us a lot of money," said Lalaji, winking, and thinking of all the many subordinate officers who had to be gratified before one could begin to speak of presents to a head of department.

Om Prakash took no part in this conversation. He had not been on speaking terms with his brother Chandra Prakash for seven years. Besides, he was very tired and wanted to go home and sleep.

Lalaji continued to joke and laugh with the other men. But he was not happy; he never was when, at these family gatherings, he was brought face to face with the oddities of his three sons. There was Om, who would not speak with Chandra; there was Chandra, who did not know how to speak with anybody; there was Viddi, who sat apart and looked supercilious. Wistfully he glanced at the sons of Dev Raj, who took a hearty part in all the jokes, laughed uproariously, slapped one another on the back, supplemented one another's humor, and stood as a tower of strength behind their father. Why should he be so punished in his own sons?

In the afternoon, at teatime, the Rendezvous was more crowded than in the mornings. There was a band playing and there were coffee and cakes and a cozy cosmopolitan atmosphere. People came in from the embassies, and also radio artists and playwrights and freelance artists and journalists. Viddi usually squeezed in at any table where there was a spare chair; but today he was surprised to hear Tivari and Zahir-ud-din calling him over to their table the moment he came in.

"You know Bahwa?" Zahir-ud-din asked, lightly tapping that person on the chest with the back of his hand. Viddi knew him to be a playwright who produced his own plays and acted the chief role; he dealt only with profound social problems. Viddi had never before been thought worthy of being introduced to him. "We have been telling Bahwa what we were saying yesterday," said Zahir-ud-din "and he is interested."

"What we were saying?" Viddi innocently inquired.

"About you and your father financing us."

Before Viddi could disclaim anything, Bahwa had leaned across the table and explained himself forcefully. "I have in mind," he said, "that we form a professional company of actors to tour the country. That is the only way to establish ourselves."

Zahir-ud-din nodded earnestly at this and looked at Viddi, who felt uncomfortable. "We have all the talent for such an enterprise," Bahwa said. "I will write the plays and produce and act the dramatic parts. Zahir-ud-din will paint scenery and Tivari will be our publicity manager and press representative. You must have seen some of my plays?"

"Your plays are all nonsense," Tivari said. "Even you know it."

"Please do not be flippant," Bahwa said. am speaking seriously with Shri Ved akash."

Viddi turned appealing eyes on Zahir-ud-n. "But I told you ——"

Zahir-ud-din smiled brilliantly; he looked ery handsome when he smiled. "Listen, you e a cultured man and you care about art. e need men like you. We need patrons. But w can you be our patron if you have no oney? Listen, Ved Prakash, what is so bad out going into your father's business? If I d such a father, I would give up everything d at once go into his business so that I uld do good to my fellow artists."

Viddi was flattered. He had never before en appealed to in this manner by people he dmired, and he found it very pleasant. At e same time, he was uneasy because they ere assuming that he had a share in his ther's money.

"I wish very much to help you," he said. But I have told you, I am very poor. I have o money at all and my father will not listen one word I say."

"If you go into his business," Tivari said, e will listen and you will no longer be poor."

"But I have told you!" Viddi cried des-erately. "I want nothing to do with his usiness; it will kill me!"

"Do you not know," Tivari asked Viddi, hat all the big film magnates are really usinessmen who have made their money sewhere and then invested it in films? You n do the same: first you get money by enter-g into your father's business, then you spon-r our film company."

"No. I am not interested in making films. do not like films. I like literature and art."

"But our films will be full of literature and t!"

Viddi shook his head. "No, I want first to to Europe."

"What do you think you will be doing when u are sponsor of a film company?" said ivari. "You will be flying to Europe once a onth and to America to make all arrange-ents."

"You will be a great man, a patron of all the arts," Zahir-ud-din said. To which Bahwa added, "I will write such scenarios, our films will become internationally famous."

It all sounded very exciting, and Viddi wished it were real. But he could not help comparing it with reality, his existing poverty which would not allow him even to drink a chocolate milk shake, and his father at home wanting him to enter into the contractor's business.

Lalaji received his lawyer at home. He sat in an armchair with his feet up on a little stool. His eyes were half shut and his hands folded over his stomach; this was his usual attitude for listening intently.

The lawyer gingerly broached the subject of the deputy minister, glancing at his client sideways. But Lalaji did not stir, not even when the lawyer, growing bolder, told him how the deputy minister had been heard to declare his intention of ruining and ousting Lalaji and all men like him. Lalaji heaved a staccato but very round and rich laugh from the stomach. The lawyer nodded: he quite understood his client's contempt for the deputy minister and shared it. But he said, "There is only one thing."

"What?" Lalaji lazily asked.

"The letter."

Lalaji knew about this letter. Five years ago, when Om was still fairly new to the business and acted on his own initiative (he had learned better since), he had written this letter to T——. In itself the letter was innocent enough. It referred to one of Lalaji's many transactions with T——, but stated nothing directly; a bland, innocent, routine letter. But seen in connection with the evidence which the committee of inquiry had since accumulated, it could be wrested out of innocence, could be made incriminating. That the letter had been written—and, having been written, had been filed and preserved in government records—was one of those slips that could happen in the best organizations. Lalaji wasted no time in recrimination—he had not even mentioned the existence of the letter to Om—but took his usual attitude of what has been has been; now the only thing left was to take steps to eliminate the consequences. The committee of inquiry had not yet found out about the letter. But this, Lalaji knew, was only a matter of time.

"You must find it," Lalaji said, opening his eyes and unfolding his hands from his stomach. "I do not care how much it costs."

Afterward he sat thinking. He thought about the letter, long and hard, and tried to devise various complicated plans for recovering it. But after some time he gave it up. He switched his mind onto something else; and there were enough problems for him to ponder. There was, for instance, the problem of the new building of the Happy Hindustan Trading Company. This was becoming urgent, for rumors had begun to reach him that the directors were inclined to favor a rival firm of contractors. Yesterday in the nursing home he had met Dev Raj and had managed to remind him. It would do no harm to give him a ring in his office now, inquire after his health.

They asked Lucman, "From whom did you learn manners?" He answered, "From the unmanneriy." SAADI

He put his hand on the telephone, but just then he was disturbed by a commotion outside. Something heavy was being carried indoors and servants shouted instructions at one another. Above this, giving conflicting instructions of their own, he heard the voices of his wife and his sister. So they have come, he thought. After a while he got up and went into the women's quarter. Out of habit he coughed before entering, and the women, hearing this male sound, automatically pulled their saris over their heads. "You have come home very quickly," Lalaji said.

"And what are we to do there," his wife replied with spirit, "when that woman will not let us come near our own children?"

Lalaji ignored this reference to Shanta's mother. He always did. He lowered himself onto a charpai and sat rubbing one knee.

"And what have you been doing—cutting grass?" Lalaji's wife turned on her daughter Usha. "Two grown-up daughters I have living in the house, and still I cannot leave here even one minute. When I was your age, I was married and had children, and my mother-in-law and elder sisters-in-law could sit at their ease all day in the courtyard because I was there to see to everything. What will you do when you are married in two or three months?" she demanded. "I pity your husband and also your poor mother-in-law."

Lalaji chuckled. "They will be content enough when they think of the dowry they have got with her."

"Dowry indeed!" his wife said contemptuously. "They will wish they had had half the dowry and twice the better girl."

Widely yawning and stretching his arms above his head, Lalaji got ready to leave. He never stayed long in the women's quarter. But they had not finished with him yet.

"Where are you going?" his wife demanded.

"To the office."

"What is the use of always going to the office?" Phuphiji asked. "It would be better for you to stay at home and think about settling your children. See to your Viddi and your Nimmi—if anything happens, please do not say we have not warned you!"

Lalaji stopped short. It was not the reference to Viddi that arrested him—he knew all about that—but Nimmi. That anything should be hinted against his Nimmi!

Phuphiji, seeing her advantage, continued quickly, "He is twenty-one and she is eighteen; what have you done about settling them?"

But Lalaji merely shrugged. "It does no harm. Let the child enjoy herself."

"Enjoy herself!" Phuphiji cried. "A girl of that age has no right to enjoy herself! She

CONTINUED ON PAGE 163

Exciting offer from Niagara Instant Starch

FAMOUS

DU BARRY

SIMULATED PEARLS AND

PEARL EARRINGS

Regular $3.50 value

ONLY $1.00

and 1 Niagara endflap

Fashion's latest for spring and summer wearing, a beautiful single strand of pearls with sterling silver clasp. Lustrous simulated pearls with that deep, expensive look. The earrings have a lovely large pearl that matches the necklace. Made by famous Fifth Avenue DuBarry. Order your set today.

●

QUICK... EASY... make perfect laundry starch instantly in cold water. Swish, it's ready! Gives a wonderful 'like-new' look to all your cottons. Try it now.

Mail to: Niagara Pearls
Box 1750, New York 46, N. Y.

I am enclosing $_____ and _____ Niagara Starch endflap(s). Please send me _____ set(s) of the DuBarry Pearls and Earrings, postpaid.

SEND $1.00 AND ONE NIAGARA ENDFLAP FOR EACH SET.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

This offer expires August 30, 1957 and is void in any states or localities where such offers are taxed or prohibited by law.

926 LINT REMOVERS!

Maytag's "Lint Remover Tub" swirls lint, dirt and sand out 926 holes never to return...no lint pans to remove... no lint traps to empty ever!

No lint problems! Because—(1) Maytag's gentle wash action, proved in nearly 10,000,000 Maytags, creates less lint to begin with. And (2) the lint that does form is automatically separated from clothes through 926 holes in the Maytag "Lint Remover Tub"... and is flushed away forever by Maytag's exclusive Swirl-away Rinse.

Cleans clothes automatically! No need for pans, trays or traps! The new MAYTAG All-Fabric Automatic cleans clothes without resort to mechanical gadgets. This means simpler operation, the mark of a well-designed washer. See this new Maytag—see a demonstration of the most complete automatic ever built—the Maytag.

New Maytag COLD WATER WASH delights "Good Housekeeping" editors

"Even kinder to wool, cashmere, 'Orlon' and the like than tenderest hand squeezing," says magazine

PLUS THESE OTHER MAYTAG FEATURES

2 SPEEDS... to wash delicates safely, almost wrinkle-free, push Maytag's "Modern Fabrics" button. Wash and spin speeds are slowed by one third. Push "Regular Fabrics" button for all regular wash loads.

WATER SAVER . . . automatically saves up to 9 gallons hot water per small load, 2500 gallons of water a year.

Once twin cashmeres! Left, hand-laundered 12 times: slightly faded, matted, shrunk. Right, cold-water washed in a Maytag 12 times: color, size, softness just like new. The Maytag Company, Newton, Iowa

SEE THE AUTOMATIC THAT HAS EVERYTHING:

3 Water Temperatures . . . 2 Speeds . . . Water Saver . . . Suds Saver . . . Gyrafoam Wash Action . . . Safety Lid . . . Non-rust Cabinet . . . Maytag Dependability.

MAYTAG

All-Fabric AUTOMATIC WASHER

New Maytag All-Fabric Washer and matching No Vent Dryer in Pasteltone Pink, Green, Yellow, White As little as $3.50 a week.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 161

should be managing a household and bearing children and looking after a husband."

"It will come to her soon enough," Lalaji said.

His wife, hearing this, looked up sharply to ask, "You are arranging for her? You have not told me."

"When the time comes I will tell you," Lalaji said.

"It has come!" Phuphiji cried. "It has come and more! She is eighteen years old. It is a disgrace to us that she does not even know how to cook."

"My daughter Nimmi," Lalaji proudly said, "will never need to know how to cook. She will have so many servants that she can wear her jewelry and drive about in a motorcar all day if she wants to."

Nimmi and Rajen played tennis on the club courts. They did not play well, but they looked nice. Long, slim brown legs stretched out from their brief pleated shorts, and they wore silk jerseys which were tight and revealing. Rajen was quite at home in her tennis costume, but Nimmi still felt a little self-conscious. It was so strange, showing bare legs in public. She felt uncomfortable every time she thought what her family would say if they could see her, so she did her best not to think about it. Her tennis costume was a great secret. She had bought it out of her own money—her father gave her a liberal allowance—and Rajen had ordered it for her from Bombay. Of course she never took it home, it always stayed in Rajen's locker at the club.

After they had completed the set, they walked off the courts and went to change in the dressing room. They took a long time over putting on their saris and doing their hair and applying lipstick. Then they walked through the lounge, marbled and pillared and empty, out onto the lawn where they sat at a little table in green-and-white wicker armchairs. A bearer in white with a huge red turban served pineapple juice to them from a silver tray. Rajen had to sign the bill, but Nimmi always paid her own share afterward, and sometimes also some of Rajen's.

"How lucky you are," said Rajen, "to have so much money of your own. Of course mummy and daddy would like to give me a bigger allowance, but they have so many expenses, now that Amita is studying in Cambridge."

Nimmi smiled but made no answer. She thought, Well, even though Rajen's sister is at Cambridge, still it is to me Pheroze Batliwala likes to talk. She said, "Do you think he will come this evening?" and Rajen said, "Who? Pheroze Batliwala? I think so; every evening he likes to play at least one game of tennis."

Nimmi was quite excited now, because she thought she might see him any minute. The tables out on the lawn were beginning to fill up. There were little groups of men in white tennis shorts, their rackets laid across their knees, and there were girls in fresh pastel saris, and ladies from the embassies in fashionable shoulder-free frocks. It was almost dark and shaded lamps had been lit on the lawn. Rajen pointed out her parents' acquaintances to Nimmi, and sometimes people came up to her and asked after her parents, or she went herself and was polite to middle-aged couples. If she had not been waiting so tensely for Pheroze, Nimmi might have felt her own anonymity more sharply.

At last he came. He seemed to be looking for someone and tapped his tennis racket against his legs as he stood and looked around. Nimmi kept her eyes intently lowered and then she saw his legs and neat white ankle socks, and she looked up as he said "Good evening" in his slow voice. Feeling herself grow hot, she smiled at him, successfully assuming an expression of casual politeness.

"May I sit down?" Pheroze Batliwala asked. With the same polite smile, Nimmi gave permission, thinking triumphantly, So he was looking for me. The thought gave her confidence.

Pheroze drummed his fingers on the table. "It is hot this evening."

"Yes," said Rajen, "but I think the cool weather will be coming soon."

"I love the really cold weather," Nimmi said. "December and January are my favorite months."

Pheroze continued to drum his fingers on the table. There was an awkward pause. Nimmi felt Rajen looking at her with a faint expression of amusement, and this annoyed her. She flung back her head and tried to look unconcerned.

"What will you drink?" Pheroze asked.

Rajen and Nimmi looked at each other, and Rajen said, "We have just drunk pineapple juice."

"Have a proper drink," said Pheroze.

On an impulse of daring Nimmi asked, "May I have a French sherry, please?" She hoped this was correct. Authoritatively gesturing the bearer, Pheroze asked, "Dry or sweet?" and Nimmi plunged again to say, "Sweet, please."

"Dry for me," said Rajen, fingering her short curls. Nimmi wondered whether this was more correct or whether Rajen was only trying to be different.

Pheroze cleared his throat, crossed and uncrossed his legs and drummed his fingers. Nimmi covertly studied him and admired his handsome appearance. He had a long, thin face with a big nose and a very pale yellow skin. It was his fair complexion that attracted her most. She watched him taking out a long silver cigarette case, flicking his silver lighter with a practiced gesture which she admired. He had such elegant, worldly ways. She thought, Parsis are not allowed by their religion to smoke, but of course Pheroze was England-returned and very modern and emancipated.

Rajen said, "This sherry is good; I like a dry sherry." Nimmi thought hers tasted like petrol, but she hoped she looked as if she liked it.

"It is a good lady's drink," said Pheroze, drinking whisky and soda. His large melancholy eyes were fixed on Nimmi over the rim of the glass. She wondered whether he was thinking she was pretty. She tried to imagine herself as he saw her, but could only visualize a dim slim shape.

"Please excuse me for one minute," said Rajen, and got up to speak to a well-dressed middle-aged lady. Nimmi's heart beat a little faster at being left alone with Pheroze; and she quickly tried to make casual conversation.

"Do you come here every evening?" she asked, but was sorry the moment she had done so because it might lead him to suspect that she was interested in him.

She need not have worried, for he did not take her up on it. Instead he said, "I have not seen you for several days. I have been looking for you. I wanted to ask you," he said, "will you have dinner with me one night?"

"Where?" Nimmi promptly asked.

"Here in the club, or anywhere you like. Please, will you meet me here next Sunday at seven-thirty?"

There was no time for thought, for here was Rajen back again, and Nimmi had to say quickly before the opportunity was lost, "All right."

Rajen made a face. "It is awful to have to be polite to so many old people only because they know your parents." But neither Nimmi nor Pheroze heard her.

In the morning Lalaji received a telephone call from his lawyer. The lawyer told him that he had located the letter to T——, that it was at that moment lying in a file on the desk of his son Chandra Prakash.

Afterward Lalaji sat unusually pensive. He had to admit it—he would have been happier if the file had been located in someone else's office. Because someone else could always be settled; past obligations, present cash or future promises could be conjured with. It was more difficult with Chandra; for what could he offer Chandra that he had not already given him or was paternally pledged to give him? It made him angry that he had even to consider offering his son anything; that he could not implicitly rely on the boy's loyalty.

It was early in the morning and his family were sitting round him, Om and Viddi and Nimmi and Usha and Om's children, while his wife and the servants were walking about seeing to everyone's needs. As usual, there was a lot of noise, the children playing, Nimmi and Viddi quarreling with Om, and his wife shrilly intervening. He frowned, annoyed not at the noise, which did not bother him, but at the lack of harmony in his family. Every day it was the same, every day there were these quarrels. It should not be so between brothers and sisters; it had not been so between him and his own brothers and sisters. He hit the flat of his hand on his thigh with great force and shouted, "Be quiet! Is there no peace in this house?" There was a sudden silence. They all looked at him in surprise, for Lalaji did not often shout at his children.

But now that he had started, he could not stop. All his grievance was loaded onto his tongue. He told his children, in a loud angry roar, that they were worthless and shiftless and lazy and ungrateful, they had neither heart nor brain, and he was sorry that he had ever begotten them. With a sound of disgust he heaved himself to his feet, threw the newspaper on the floor and stamped on it and then screamed at the servant, "Will you stand there forever! Go and have the car taken out!" In the doorway he turned and, shooting his finger out at Om, shouted, "I am going alone in the car. Today you can walk to office! Perhaps with a little exercise you will start to think of your father and what you owe to him!"

LOVE'S HARVEST

By JAMES STAFFORD

If I have loved you it is because
I've seen the sun make the corn to grow.
I've seen your little toes among the blue forget-me-nots,
And your fingers bind the sheaves
In fields of grain where at night
The hare hath lain, not without
Some fear. Have faith! I cannot help my heart.
My toil was but to see the light
Within your eyes. Love soon dies.

And now I know the plow that cut the earth
In spring is the scythe that let its blood in fall.
The mellow moon is steel when for you
The harvest has been gathered.

He swung out of the house, and threw his vast bulk into the back of the car, so that he bounced from the leather seat and the whole car shook. But just as the driver, ostentatiously efficient, turned the key and pressed the accelerator, Viddi appeared in a supplicating attitude with hands joined together and spoke to his father through the car window: "Pitaji, you are right, we are all worthless and do not know how to work. That is why I want you to send me abroad so that I can improve myself and become independent and no longer be as a burden on your back."

For a moment Lalaji only gaped at him. Viddi attempted a little smile, ingratiating, uncertain, but not unhopeful. Lalaji's face began to quiver, he opened his mouth and broke into a torrent of violent language. Viddi suffered a rather ridiculous change of face; the smile slipped off and he looked astonished. The driver stared straight in front of him with absent eyes. "Drive on!" Lalaji roared and Viddi was left standing in the driveway, his hands still foolishly joined together.

"Where to, please, Babuji?" the driver respectfully inquired. Lalaji did not know where he wanted to go. He only wanted to sit there and brood upon his anger. "To the old office," he ordered. It was a long way to the old office. He had plenty of time to sit back and think while the car threaded its way through dense shop-lined streets, hooting hopelessly to clear the way of stray bullocks and tongas and coolies and overloaded pushcarts. He thought about his sons; he thought about them with anger, and felt his anger to be righteous. But, as always, he could not keep steadily on the one thought. There were too many other things clamoring for his attention. Thinking of Chandra, he glided into thoughts of the T—— case; from there to the deputy minister; from there to various government officers whom he had to contact for various purposes; from there to the Happy Hindustan Trading Building, and to Dev Raj, whom he would have to telephone again today.

He walked up the stairs to his office. The house was old and narrow and crumbling; downstairs it was crammed with godowns, upstairs with the offices of film companies, astrologers and wholesalers. Lalaji's own office was on the first floor, a surprisingly spacious room with a very high ceiling. The clerk sat on the floor, for there was no furniture, only carpets and an earthenware water container and a telephone. Big dusty ledgers were piled against the wall. When Lalaji came in, the clerk got up and joined his hands and lowered his head over them with great respect. He was a frail old man and very clean in a white dhoti and a thin muslin shirt. He was known to be very religious; every day he said all the prescribed prayers and he lived only on vegetables and pulse. Lalaji respected him highly and paid him a salary of seventy-five rupees a month.

But today, as Lalaji looked at him, he felt uneasy—because the man was so meek, so peaceful, and had so very obviously cast anger out of his heart. Lalaji remembered his own anger, was ashamed. Abruptly he said, "Sohan Lal, I have a brother who is full of wrath; he curses even his own children." In a very weak but very clear voice, finely distilled, strained of all roughness and imperfection, the clerk replied, "In the Gita it is written that from anger arises delusion; by delusion, loss of memory is caused; by loss of memory, the discriminative faculty is ruined; and from the ruin of discrimination, he perishes." Lalaji listened to the words; he silently repeated them after the clerk, moving only his lips. Then he picked up the telephone to call Om in the New Delhi office.

"You have arrived in the office?" he rather foolishly asked; and Om replied in a resigned voice, "I came by taxi; it cost me one fourteen." Lalaji grunted and hung up. He would put one hundred—no, two hundred—rupees into Om's bank account; his son should not be sorry that he had had to spend one rupee fourteen annas on a taxi. There was also Viddi; something must be done for Viddi, something that would please him and make him think kindly of his father. He called the driver, "Go to all the restaurants in Connaught Place, find my son Ved Prakash and bring him to me."

But when Viddi arrived in the Old Delhi office, his father only stared at him and asked what he wanted.

"You sent the driver for me," Viddi replied with a hurt air.

Lalaji then remembered that he had wanted to do good to Viddi. But what a nuisance that he should have to do it now. "Listen, son," he told Viddi, and tried hard to sound kind and concerned. "Leave off talk of abroad and more studies. What will you gain by going abroad? Look at your elder brother Chandra Prakash: he is a government officer, he has to go to the office. When his superior officer calls him he must run and stand before him with lowered eyes. What sort of life is that for a man? It is not a life good enough for my son."

"I do not want to be government officer. I want to be art critic or write books."

His father was irritated. But he said in a patient voice, "Listen, son. You do not even know what money is. I want to teach you. When you feel it in your hand and know that it will always be in your hand so, then you will know what it is."

Viddi thought, Money, money, money, it is all he knows. Beauty, art, poetry, all this means nothing to him.

"I will do this," Lalaji said. "I will give you, to begin with, five hundred rupees a month. For this I will not ask you to do any work, it is only so that you may have some money in your hand." Let him have his five hundred rupees a month. After three months of it, he would start him on the sweepers' hutments vacation hints

yours for the asking

If you are considering a trip to any of the western regions named below, I would appreciate the opportunity to be of help.

Opposite the numbered squares are various questions of interest to women travelers. After you have noted them, just fill in the coupon as directed and mail it to me. I'll be happy to provide the answers.

Mary Lou West
TRAVEL CONSULTANT
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Vacation Regions in the UNION PACIFIC WEST:

CALIFORNIA • PACIFIC NORTHWEST • COLORADO
YELLOWSTONE-GRAND TETON NAT'L PARKS
SUN VALLEY, IDAHO • ZION-BRYCE-GRAND CANYON NAT'L PARKS
LAS VEGAS-HOOVER DAM, NEVADA • DUDE RANCHES

1 What should I wear while on the train?
2 What should I take in my personal luggage on the train?
3 How much additional baggage can I check through to destination?
4 How about tipping for service on the train?
5 What is the easiest way to obtain tickets and reservations?
6 Can I stop over at various places en route?
7 What is the money-saving FAMILY FARE PLAN?

UNION PACIFIC TRAINS

Domeliner "CITY OF LOS ANGELES" and "THE CHALLENGER" Domeliner "CITY OF PORTLAND"
Domeliner "CITY OF ST. LOUIS"
Streamliner "CITY OF DENVER"
Streamliner "CITY OF SAN FRANCISCO"

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Note: Place a check-mark opposite items for which you would like information.

UNION PACIFIC Railroad

1 ☐ Mary Lou West, Travel Consultant
Union Pacific R. R., Room 772
Omaha 2, Nebr.
2 ☐ Please advise me about a rail trip
3 ☐ to_____
4 ☐ I am interested in the items checked.
5 ☐ Name_____
Street_____
6 ☐ City_____
7 ☐ State_____ Phone_____
Also send information on escorted all-expense tours ☐ and give him a salary of eight hundred rupees a month; and by that time he trusted Viddi would have learned the value of money—how much better eight hundred rupees is than five hundred, one thousand rupees than eight hundred, two thousand rupees than one thousand—and would adjust his ideas accordingly.

Viddi thought, Five hundred rupees a month; he will give me five hundred rupees a month. He accepted the idea quite calmly and began at once to think of all the things he could do with five hundred rupees a month: how many chocolate milk shakes and cigars and pastries he could stand treat for in the Rendezvous; what beautiful clothes he could buy for himself, suits and shirts and shoes and a gold wrist watch. And, of course, books and pictures and records of classical music.

"I will start today," Lalaji said. "When I come home, at once I will give you your first five hundred rupees."

Viddi thought, Now life will start for me.

Nimmi was nervous but very, very happy. This really was Life, was Society. She had never been to a night club before, and felt much impressed. The place was called The Sweet Spot and was extremely fashionable. Pheroze was in evening dress—black trousers, white coat, black bow tie—and it suited him well. She was very proud to be seen with him, and wondered whether he was also proud to be seen with her. She felt quite confident, for she knew herself to be looking her best. No wonder, since she had spent three and a half hours over getting ready; which had made her sister Usha repeatedly exclaim, "But where are you going? You are going to a wedding?" She had answered, "Today I have been invited to the house of my friend Rajen," and then had quickly fled to the sitting room, where she was safe from further questioning.

Pheroze held his knife and fork in a very refined manner and in between mouthfuls of food—he never spoke with his mouth full—he made conversation. He said, "This is quite a good place," and Nimmi replied, "Oh, yes, it is very nice." It was the third time they had said this—the first time had been when they had come in, the second time while they were waiting for their drinks. "Later there will be a cabaret," said Pheroze; this, too, he had said twice before, and as before Nimmi declared that she was looking forward to it.

She was so excited she could hardly eat. She kept looking round her with big brilliant eyes, and thought that it was even more fashionable than the club. There were many Europeans and everybody, Indian as well as European, wore evening dress. The European ladies wore strapless dresses, very flimsy and lacy, while the Indian ladies glittered in elaborate saris with heavy gold borders, and their necks and ears and arms sparkled with jewelry. Nimmi herself wore no jewelry at all, except for one bracelet; she wore fresh white jasmine in her hair and behind her ears. The jasmine gave off a very sweet and pungent smell.

They watched the dancers, Nimmi very intently because she wanted to learn all she could. She had not often danced before, and never with a man; all she knew she had learned from Rajen, who had learned from her sister, and they practiced in Rajen's house to a phonograph which played Waltzing in the Wind and Just One More. Nimmi was rather nervous. She was sure Pheroze was a very good dancer and he would expect her to be one too.

At last he said, "Shall we?" and escorted her solemnly to the dance floor. She managed to look at her ease as she arranged her sari over her left arm, though she was praying silently, Please make me dance well. Pheroze touched her gingerly and his body was held well away from her; only his head was thrust forward, so that the cheek nestled against her hair. And to Nimmi's delight and surprise she found herself dancing quite fluently. Pheroze did no very elaborate steps, but from time to time he swung her round and even then she followed him with ease and enjoyment. This was better than dancing with Rajen.

Nimmi's eyes shone with happiness. She could not see much of Pheroze's face because it was held over her shoulder, only a smooth cheek and ear and hair. He smelled of an expensive brilliantine and of talcum powder, and she could feel his breath on her ear. She thought, I wonder if I am in love with him? Certainly she was very happy and greatly aware of him, even though he held her so gingerly and did not speak at all. And all the time she was asking herself, What would they say at home if they could see me dancing in the arms of a young man?

When they got back to their table Pheroze said, "How about going for a drive in my car?" It was an exciting suggestion: to drive in the night with Pheroze, just the two of them side by side, like two lovers in a film. But she hesitated because it was late already and where would she tell her family she had been?

"We could take a spin down to Kutb Minar," he said. "It is a moonlight night, and the Kutb looks very nice by moonlight."

Kutb and moonlight and Pheroze—it was irresistible. And it was so late already, they would be angry anyway. If she were later still, they would probably be asleep and then they might not even notice what time she came home. The watchman could unlock the door for her and she would give him eight annas not to say anything.

After all the noise and lights of The Sweet Spot, the silence outside was very romantic. The road to Kutb was deserted and white in moonlight. Pheroze told her about his car; he said, "Last week I had to have the battery recharged, it was completely run down." From time to time a jackal darted across the road in front of their headlights and Nimmi would cry, "Oh, look!" and Pheroze would say gravely, "Jackals are to be found frequently in this area." He drove very fast—"Good little car, this," he said—and a pleasant wind rushed into their faces.

When they parked the car at Kutb, Nimmi looked round and tried to feel the right sensations. All this was so old, so historic, so ruined; and the moonlight so romantic—she tried to find a line of poetry to fit the occasion but all that came into her head was "I galloped, Dirk galloped, we galloped all three," from the Selections from Browning which she was studying for her English exam. She did not want Pheroze to think her unfeeling, so she said, "It is so beautiful, it makes one think

CONTINUED ON PAGE 167

NEXT MONTH

"You must get away from the island before it's too late!" she begged.

"No," Tom said. "I love you, and I'm not quitting St. Pierre until you've gone. I'm giving you responsibility for my life as well as your own."

"No, Tom. Oh, no." Medora flung out her hands against the heavy air. "I can't desert my husband when there's danger. As long as he insists on staying ——"

● Around them there should have been the questing call of the night birds, the great wood crickets. But there was nothing. No sound from the hedges, the trees, the fields. Only a vast silence in the moonlight and over them the menacing shadow of the volcano.

ESCAPE TO THE MOUNTAIN

By THELMA STRABEL

Complete in the June JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by Harper & Brothers under the title "Caribee."

Extra-safety for mother's helper with milk in Pure-Pak

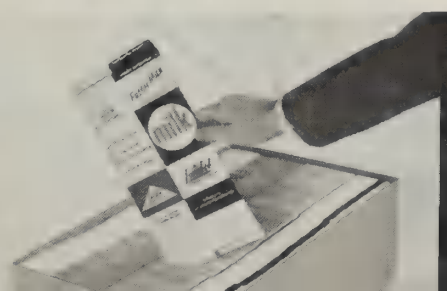
A big armload for a little girl! But you don't worry, when milk is in lightweight, shatterproof, Pure-Pak cartons. Pure-Pak cartons have so many advantages. They're so sanitary . . . used only once . . . only for dairy products . . . only by you and your family. They're disposable . . . no bottles to wash or return. Pure-Pak seals in milk's natural goodness—seals out vitamin- and flavor-destroying sunlight. Ask your milkman for this modern dairy service today! The modern Pure-Pak milk packaging method is a product of the Pure-Pak Division, Ex-Cell-O Corp., Detroit, Mich.

Pure-Pak
EX-CELL-O CORP DETROIT MICH.
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER



20 million times a day, someone breaks the seal on a fresh Pure-Pak carton.

The wonderful "New Story of Milk" is told by Bob Considine, famous reporter, radio and TV star, in a new full color, 16 mm sound motion picture. Call your dairy to arrange a showing for your church, school, or civic group; or write directly to Pure-Pak.

From seedling to tree to Pure-Pak cartons. A controlled process all the way.

These flat Pure-Pak "blanks" are made into milk containers right in your dairy.

An instant before filling, every Pure-Pak carton goes through a sterilizing wax bath.

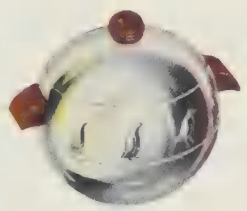
Formed, sterilized, filled and sealed —all in seconds—ready for delivery.

Mother's Day, Anniversaries, Weddings, Birthdays . . .

remember her with a West Bend Gift

Automatic Skillet. Large 11" × 11" size. Extra deep. Set the dial for the correct temperature and the skillet maintains perfectly "balanced" heat over every inch of cooking surface. Other extras – vented cover and continuous pouring lip.

Penguin Server. Keeps hot foods hot, or preserves chilled foods or ice cubes for hours at parties, potlucks, and picnics. Beautifully fashioned in chrome or copper-plated steel. Stainless steel inset. Walnut color handles. 2 qts.



Electric Bean Pot. Gently simmers baked beans for that tantalizing, old fashioned flavor. Authentic early American stoneware, modernized with a chrome electric base. 2 qts.

Trig Tea Kettle. West Bend's famous tea kettle with the unique trigger-operated spout cap for easy one-hand pouring and filling. Whistles cheerily when water boils. Gleaming stainless steel with solid copper bottom. 2½ qts.

Canister Set. Kitchen beauties! Silhouettes of Grandma's flour sifter, sugar bowl, coffee grinder, and tea pot identify contents. Protective coating prevents fingerprinting.

AUTOMATIC SKILLET
$19.95*
with polished aluminum cover $22.95* with copper color aluminum cover $23.45*

PENGUIN SERVER
chrome-plated $8.50
copper-plated $9.95

ELECTRIC BEAN POT
$7.95*

TRIG TEA KETTLE
$4.95

CANISTER SET
copper color aluminum $9.95
polished aluminum $8.50

Flavo-matic coffee makers

For your Mother's Day gift select the finest. West Bend's 6 to 8 and 2 to 5 cup Flavo-matics are America's favorites for delicious coffee. Gentle percolation is the Flavo-matic secret. Automatically correct timing and temperature control brew your coffee carefully, extracting only the true delicate coffee flavors. The flavor is never sacrificed for speed . . . the coffee never burned nor underperked. The handsome Flavo-matics are available in gleaming chrome, polished aluminum and copper color. For Mother's Day and every gift occasion, give beautiful and practical West Bend gifts for the home!

6 to 8 cup Flavo-matic

WEST BEND®

	2 to 5 cup	6 to 8 cup
gleaming chrome	$17.50*	$18.95*
copper-color aluminum	$12.95*	$13.95*
polished aluminum	$11.50*	$12.95*

*INCLUDES CORD AND EXCISE TAX

Dept. 675

WEST BEND ALUMINUM CO., West Bend, Wisconsin

AT LEADING HOUSEWARES, HARDWARE, GIFT AND APPLIANCE STORES; PRICES SLIGHTLY HIGHER IN CANADA AND HAWAII

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 164

f all the old times and the Mogul emperors ke Akbar and Jehangir and Shahjehan."

Pheroze, elegant and fashionable in his well- ut white evening suit and black bow tie, said, The Kutb Minar was built in the thirteenth entury A.D. by Altamsh."

The sweet and heavy scent of night flowers oated over the warm air. They walked round illars and marble tombs, isolated amid green wns and trees and marble and moonlight, ke lovers in a miniature. Nimmi's silk sari ently rustled and the jasmine gleamed white n her hair. A bird stirred in a tree, and sud- enly Pheroze turned round and took her into is arms and kissed her. It was sudden and not ery successful. Ridiculous, but their two oses got in the way; so he tried again and this me brought his mouth firmly down on hers. he kept her eyes wide open and thought, So is is how a man kisses; and next, What would ey say at home? and next, How excited Rajen ill be when she hears.

Pheroze thought, What would my mother y if she knew I was kissing a girl who is not a 'arsi? He had kissed several girls in the course f his career, and this had always been his first ought. After a while he took his mouth away nd they walked on and Nimmi rearranged er sari. She wanted to laugh but bit her lip ecause she thought he might be hurt. The utb Minar loomed up before them, its layers f sculpture dim through a veil of moonlight. he said, "Shall we go up?"—not because she anted to, but only for something to say.

"It is locked now," he said. "They always ck it in the night because of the many people ho climb up to commit icide."

Nimmi thought of young irls like herself climbing p the steps of the Kutb, ght up to the topmost bal- ony, and then throwing emselves down because ey were in love. She won- ered if she would have the ourage to throw herself own for Pheroze's sake.

"The Kutb is only two hundred and thirty- ght feet high," Pheroze said. "This is not so ery tall. The Eiffel Tower in Paris, France, is ine hundred and eighty-four feet high. You an go up in a lift and on the top you can buy icture cards and curios."

They stood outside the mausoleum of Al- mish, and Nimmi traced her finger along the elicate latticework of the windows. Pheroze ood close beside her and she could hear him reathing rather heavily. She wondered if he as going to kiss her again, and before she ould stop herself she had let out a little gig- le. To cover this up, she took the jasmine out f her hair and said, "These flowers fade so uickly," and stood threading the wilting hite blossoms, soft as silk, over her fingers. he could feel him looking down at her and nsely waited. But all he said was, "Flowers emain fresh only if they are put in water." he twisted her flowers round her fingers, and e kicked pebble stones with his elegant shoe.

It was only on the way home, while he told er about the carburetor of his car, that she ot really excited about having been kissed.

alaji awaited Dev Raj's visit anxiously. hen at last he came, they greeted each other eartily and vigorously and went to the wom- n's quarter to admire Shanta's new baby. fterward deck chairs were put out for them n the lawn, where it was cool and pleasant, nd they sat and drank sherbet. Their voices roned soft and lazy in trivial conversation. rom time to time they yawned and shifted eir broad thighs. It would not have been pos- ible to guess that their conversation was, very efinitely and purposefully, drawing to a point.

When the proper moment was reached, Dev aj said, "I have spoken with my relative, the irector of the Happy Hindustan Trading ompany."

Lalaji only yawned and scratched his neck nd called to the servant for more sherbet.

"He is interested in your proposition," Dev aj said. Lalaji gave a vague indication of in- rest which, however, sounded indifferent nough to be almost another yawn. "His in- uence is great," Dev Raj said.

"Of course," said Lalaji. "Who has not heard his name?" though he had never heard it before he became interested in the Happy Hindustan Trading Company.

"He tells me," said Dev Raj casually, and smiling a little as if such an idea were rather ridiculous, "that Chunni Lal is interested in the work. But we all know what sort of a contractor Chunni Lal is."

Lalaji laughed, though not very easily. Chunni Lal was his greatest rival.

"But my relative is a man of great influence in his company," Dev Raj went on. "He can bring all our worries in this direction to an end." He helped himself to a betel leaf, wrapped in silver foil, which the servant offered him from a tray. "And, as I have said, he is interested in your proposition."

Lalaji waited. He knew that something more was coming.

Meanwhile Dev Raj said, "You have sufficient water to water your lawn? At my house there is this trouble, if the gardener turns on the tap, we cannot get water for a bath."

"This difficulty is everywhere in Delhi. But of course the grass needs water. It is pleasant to sit on a lawn in the summer evenings."

"My relative, the director of the Happy Hindustan Trading Company, has a beautiful garden; often I envy him, it is so large and spacious."

Lalaji nodded and continued to listen very intently, though he sat in an attitude of relaxation.

"His house also is very spacious. It belonged once to a maharaja; today its value is at least four lacs. He has had many offers."

"Property is the best investment," Lalaji said.

"He also owns another house, on Prithviraj Road. It is a little smaller, but also very valuable. He has let it to people of the American embassy at a rent of nine hundred and fifty rupees a month. These people, he tells me, will go back to America after six months, and then he is not quite sure what he will do."

"There will be others," Lalaji said. "Foreigners from the embassies pay high rent for good houses."

"I will tell you the truth," Dev Raj said. "My relative is not very anxious to rent it out again. What need has he of the money? Why should he let out his own house to foreigners?"

Lalaji knew they were drawing near the point. Soon he would hear what he was expected to do for Dev Raj's relative in return for his influence.

"No, he has no great need for nine hundred and fifty rupees a month. But perhaps he may need the house."

"He has relatives who wish to live there? Perhaps one of his daughters?"

"No, not his daughters. They are all three very well settled in good families."

"And he has no son?"

"He has one son," Dev Raj replied, and there was a short pause which convinced Lalaji that whatever he was expected to do was connected with the son. "Yes," said Dev Raj. "He has one son whom he desires now to settle. It is for him that he is thinking of the house in Prithviraj Road."

So that was it: Lalaji was to help in the settling of the son. Perhaps he was to initiate him into the contractors' business. "And what business does your relative wish to settle him in?" he said, to help the request along. But to his surprise the other only laughed; he made noises in his throat and his shoulders shook.

"No," said Dev Raj, laughing so, "there is no question of settling him in any business. That has been done already. Thank God, the boy is very well settled in his father's business, already he has been made a junior director in the Happy Hindustan Trading Company. All that a father can do for a son, my relative has done. Now only one thing remains." He allowed a short pause, to let Lalaji grasp his meaning. "Already there have been many very good offers," Dev Raj said.

For the first time Lalaji was sorry that he had betrothed his daughter Usha. Not that he

Let us impart all the blessings we possess, and ask for ourselves, to the whole family of mankind.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

The best chocolate frostings are made with

Baker's deep-flavor chocolate

Baker's gives more flavor because it has more flavor—deeper, richer flavor than any other chocolate. That's why Baker's just naturally glorifies any recipe that calls for chocolate!

So rewarding . . . the raves you get from your family . . . the thrill of pride you feel yourself!

Try this quickie frosting, for example. Easy. . . and there's the richness only Baker's deep-flavor chocolate gives!

DOUBLE-FEATURE FROSTING

2 squares Baker's Chocolate
5 tablespoons butter or margarine • 4½ cups sifted confectioners' sugar
Dash of salt • ½ cup milk • ½ teaspoon vanilla

Light Chocolate Frosting. Melt chocolate and butter over hot water. Combine sugar, salt, milk and vanilla; blend. Add melted chocolate and butter; mix well. Let stand, stirring occasionally, until of right consistency to spread. Makes enough frosting to cover tops of about 2 dozen cupcakes or tops and sides of two 8- or 9-inch cake layers.

Dark Chocolate Frosting. Use recipe above, increasing chocolate to 4 squares.

Product of General Foods

would have sacrificed his daughter for a business deal, but there would have been no question of sacrifice—the family of Dev Raj's relative was unexceptionable and the son himself, by all accounts, a worthy, handsome young man. It was really a great pity. He was sorry about it, and hoped only that the relative of Dev Raj might be induced to ask for some other favor in return for the contract.

Dev Raj held the end of his kurta and lifted it away from his body, to which it had begun to stick with perspiration. "When we become older," he said, "the heat of the summer is hard to bear. It is easier for young people, for our sons and daughters."

"There is my daughter Nimmi," Lalaji said complacently, "like a flower, like a lotus she looks, so delicate; but in the worst days, when there were dust storms and hot winds, and in the rains with flies and mosquitoes, she always sat and studied and did not complain."

"She is a pearl," said Dev Raj. "I have heard many people speak in her praise. For instance, once she was seen at a wedding ceremony by the wife of my relative, the director of the Happy Hindustan, and she said to my wife, 'How beautiful is the youngest daughter of Lala Narayan Dass Verma, she is fair as a Kashmiri girl.'"

Usually Lalaji reveled in every word spoken in praise of his daughter Nimmi; it was the sweetest music he knew. But this time he was not pleased. Because it was impossible—impossible! He would not even think of it.

"She is how old now?"

"She is eighteen," Lalaji replied with reluctant truth. Eighteen was an advanced age. His wife and his sister told him so every day. Dev Raj would also think it was a good time for her to be settled. So Lalaji said, "I want her to have very good education; she must go to her college for several years and she will learn to play the veena. She is very musical and I will place her under some famous pandit." Nimmi was not musical, but he thought how beautiful she would look playing the veena.

Dev Raj stared out over the garden with melancholy eyes. Then he said, "What need is there for ceremony between relatives? If I wish to speak truth to Lala Narayan Dass Verma, I do not have to cloak it in formalities and lies and say only half my meaning."

Lalaji said, "Please speak quite freely. You are my brother," but reluctantly, for he could guess what was coming.

"I also have daughters. I know how a father's heart feels for a daughter and how he longs to do all he can to recompense her for having been born a girl. But I also know this," he said.

Lalaji did not have to listen; he also knew that a woman is a woman and her duties in life very different from the duties of a man. He had himself said it so often. How it is a woman's fate to leave the house of her father and go to a husband's house, to bear his children, to look to the comforts of his family.

Dev Raj came forcefully to his point. "What, then, is the use of allowing a woman to go outside the home? Studies, music, these things are very well for a girl as playthings, but after she is sixteen, seventeen, eighteen, what is the use of them?"

No use; Lalaji had to say so. But he was very sad. Night had come on quickly. The margosa tree was almost black and alive with birds settling down to sleep; inside the house they would be melting the ghee now and browning the onions, and the first pungent smells would be creeping through the house. It was his favorite hour, but he was sad.

Dev Raj was saying, "A daughter must be settled early in life. If we allow her to roam about too long, she will perhaps become discontented with her fate, and the sin of it will be on us."

Though this was only the echo of his own opinions, Lalaji refused to let himself be convinced that it applied in any way to the present case. It applied, he was very ready to admit, to his daughters Rani and Usha, to his daughter-in-law Shanta and to his daughter-in-law Kanta, to all the daughters of Dev Raj and all the daughters anyone had ever had; but no one had ever had a daughter like his Nimmi.

Kanta sat at her dressing table and brushed her hair one hundred times. She brushed it very fiercely and said, "How dare he suggest such a thing?"

Chandra paced up and down the bedroom. He looked worried and miserable and jangled his keys in his pocket. "He does not understand," he said.

"What is there to understand! It is only a question of right and wrong. Everyone can understand what is right and wrong. You are a gazetted government officer; you are in a position of trust; also you have a social position to keep up. How dare he ask you?"

"He has different morals. We do not understand him and he does not understand us. You do not know what it is like in business."

Kanta was applying lipstick, but at that she turned round from her mirror to ask, "And what do you know about it?"

He continued to stare at his toes, wagging the big one and watching the effect. "Only a little," he said. "Pitaji never talked much at home, but of course I know something of what goes on, if only from the papers. Look at the T—— case."

"The T—— case," Kanta said. "That is the greatest shame for our national character. A government officer to do such things, to mix with such people, to let himself be bribed by unscrupulous businessmen—do you know what I would do to T——?" She left a short pause for effect, her lipstick suspended in the air. "I would give him the death penalty, this is what I would do, because he, a high government officer, has betrayed his trust."

Chandra looked very uncomfortable. He said, "Sometimes there are circumstances. It is not always easy to judge."

Again she turned round from her mirror to say sharply, "What do you mean? How can there be any circumstances to excuse such acts as he has done?"

Chandra had begun to pace the room again. Kanta could see him in the mirror, while she bent forward and studied the fine lines on her face, persuading herself that they were not very clearly visible. "Why are you so nervous?" she said.

"Who would not be nervous!" he cried in a strained voice. "I did not know any such file was on my desk! How am I to know all the files that are brought to lie on my desk?"

"Of course not," Kanta said. "A busy man like you."

"People who do not work in government offices have no idea how much business we have to attend to. Always files are brought to us and they are all marked 'Urgent' and every ten minutes there is a new departmental note. Often I do not know where to start, there is so much to attend to."

No man has a right to all of his rights.
PHILLIPS BROOKS

His father had laughed at him because he had not known that the file was lying on his desk (a glance at the date on which it had been sent to him revealed that it had been there for three weeks). "You people lead a restful life," Lalaji had said. This rankled.

"It is well known in government offices," he told Kanta, "that it takes time before a file or a note can be seen to and passed on."

The file now lay thrust at the back of his wardrobe, beneath his undershirts. His father had not been able to persuade him to destroy the letter there and then, but he had judged it best himself to take the whole file out of the office and keep it, for the time being, at home.

"Darling," Kanta said, and put her hand over his, "attend to the file first thing tomorrow morning and pass it on to the next officer as quickly as possible. That is the only way. Then your father will not be able to come and worry you any more: you will simply tell him 'I am sorry, I have had to pass the file on; the routine of a government department cannot be upset.'"

"He does not even know it is dishonest," Chandra said. (Lalaji had talked about it so blandly: "You will take this one letter out," he had told him, "and destroy it; more I do not ask. It is a very simple matter.")

"He has no shame," Kanta replied with indignation. "It is terrible to be related to such a man. I wish we need have nothing to do with him." But this she knew was impossible. There were so many things they needed and which could not be managed on Chandra's salary. She especially looked forward to her holiday in the hills every summer. "However, he is your father, we owe him some respect."

"That is what he said," Chandra said miserably. "'I am your father, your father.'"

Bahwa cried, "No, no no!" and ran up onto the stage. "You must do like this." He strained his plump body onto tiptoe and, holding his hand daintily in the air, spoke in a trippin voice, "'Why must we two, innocent as we are be the victims of this moral evil? We are a two roses and the worm that eats our heart i the society we live in.'"

The chief actress, one Mrs. Iqbal Singh, lady who had always been interested in acting looked at him coldly and repeated the lines i the same way as she had said them before.

Bahwa returned to his friends who sa sleepily in the auditorium. "How do you lik my producing?" he asked.

Tivari only yawned and Zahir-ud-din said "I am so thirsty." But Viddi said, "It is mor fashionable to be restrained in acting."

"A play like mine," said Bahwa, "calls fo passionate acting and great feeling. Especiall at the end when the two lovers decide to kil themselves. This is a very moving scene Kamla says, 'I will put an end to my existence Not by one minute will I survive your mar riage,' and Ram Gopal throws himself at he feet, crying, 'Such a marriage will never be for when the wedding party assembles, the soul of the bridegroom will have abandoned the body it inhabited.'"

"Very nice," said Tivari. "But is there any moral to your play?"

"Is there any moral to my play!" Bahwa shouted. "All my dramas have serious themes. I do not believe in writing for one hour's entertainment only. Always I take some socia problem and make my drama out of that. This play will teach parents that happiness is more important than a big dowry. It is aimed against the whole dowry system, which is pernicious and makes our women like slaves for sale. I do not admire people who marry a girl only for the money they get with her from her father."

"I also do not admire them," said Tivari. "But I would like to be one of them." At which Viddi laughed heartily.

"You would open your eyes wide," he said, "if you heard how much dowry my father gives with my sisters."

"Is there a sister left for me?" Tivari inquired, but Viddi pretended not to hear. He admired his friend, but he would not have cared to see him married to Nimmi.

A slick German sports car came driving right into the auditorium of the open-air theater. At the wheel sat Capt. Iqbal Singh, pressing the horn. "He has come," said Mrs. Iqbal Singh. "Rehearsal finished for today."

"That is the trouble," Bahwa told his friends. "What is the use of writing good drama when the actors do not co-operate? They are lazy and careless, and most of them have no talent. They think more of going to clubs and parties than of rehearsal. Just think, the play is to start next week, posters are being printed and I have booked the theater and they do not even know their lines."

"How thirsty I am," said Zahir-ud-din.

"And not one sketch have you showed me for the sets you promised. How is it all to be finished in time?"

Zahir-ud-din stretched himself and said, "I will give you beautiful sets. They will be impressionistic. Realistic sets are very old-fashioned and quite inartistic. Ah," said Zahir-ud-din, "what beautiful sets I could make if only you would give me a good stage, instead of"—he waved his hand—"this." Indeed, the theater left much to be desired. The proscenium arch, which had once been painted blue, was flaking and blistered, planks were loose, the rafters sagged. "Why do you not tell your father to build us a nice theater?" he asked Viddi.

"First bring him to my play," said Bahwa. "Let him get taste of the work we do. Then I will come to your house and I will read to him all the other plays I have written, and also my novel which I want to have published."

"Or why do you not build a theater yourself," said Tivari, "now that you are going into the contracting business?"

"Please," said Viddi. "I have told you. I am not going into any business. I am going abroad, to study literature and art and perhaps also sociology." Unfortunately this month he would not be able to save anything because his expenses had been so high; but he would definitely start next month.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 170

50 YEARS TOO LATE!

Grandmother would have had lots more time for tea and tintypes, if Archway Cookies had been in the picture in her day.

Oven-fresh, with all the old-fashioned goodness of grandmother's own secret recipes, Archway Home Style Cookies are rushed to your favorite grocer's to bring you "ready-to-serve" convenience and much more old-fashioned pleasure!

"Old Fashioned Goodness"

HAWAIIAN CROWN LOAF Cut loaf of canned luncheon meat into 8 wedges (cut crosswise, then diagonally). Arrange on oven-proof platter with drained DOLE Pineapple Slices standing between each wedge; secure with picks if necessary. Stud with whole cloves. Mix together ¼ cup brown sugar, 1 teaspoon dry mustard, and 2 tablespoons pineapple syrup; spoon over meat and pineapple. Bake at 400° for 15-20 minutes. Garnish with parsley and serve for luncheon or supper.

Hawaiian DOLE PINEAPPLE makes magic with meats!

Golden DOLE Hawaiian Pineapple has the gift of tasting good all by itself—AND adding glamour and goodness to meats, salads, desserts. Quick and easy to use, too, for it comes ready to serve. Buy some today, and try the delicious recipe above.

7 tempting varieties chunks

sliced

spears

tidbits crushed juice pie filling

Servettes by Quaker enhance casual serving

The finest TRAY TABLES made!

KING SIZE TRAYS . . . hold a full dinner place setting! VERSATILE —indoors or outside—for TV snacks, barbecues, buffets . . . Gleaming brass or modern black curved legs. Stain resistant trays, clean in a whisk!

Featuring new decorator designs by world famous artist, Sheppard Meade

Set of 4 tables includes handy storage rack.

Patterns shown:
(a) Palomino
(b) Marble
(c) Mallard

tables from $2.45 . . . sets from $9.95

(a)

(b)

(c)

Available at all Better Stores

Another Great Product of...

QUAKER INDUSTRIES • KENOSHA, WIS.

how to make chicken taste even more delicious!

says... "Only one thing tastes better than chicken, and that's chicken cooked with Ac'cent. Fried or roasted, broiled or barbecued —chicken needs Ac'cent to bring out the delicious flavor."

By the time foods reach your kitchen, they've lost some of that good fresh taste. A quick shaking of Ac'cent restores it. You'll notice a mouth-watering difference in your vegetables, meats, poultry, seafood, soups, gravies, salads. Ac'cent is a natural food derivative ... adds no flavor of its own. So you get all the credit!

For Chicken: Shake Ac'cent on liberally (inside the cavity, too, if röasting). You'll really taste chicken! All food stores have Ac'cent, in the red package with shaker-pourer top. Available in Canada also.

Ac'cent comes in 1-oz., 4-oz., 8-oz., 1-lb. sizes

Ac'cent®

BRAND
Pure Monosodium Glutamate
AC'CENT · INTERNATIONAL
20 N. Wacker Drive, Chicago 6, Illinois

... the secret of better cooking!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 168

Tivari said, "That was a nice party you gave for us yesterday. I like Chinese food."

"You must give parties like that more often," advised Zahir-ud-din. "It is good for people with artistic inclinations to meet together over food and drink and exchange ideas. This is how the artistic life of a city is stimulated. Only think of Paris in France: how rich it is in artistic life, all the world knows this. And why? Because it has very many restaurants where people can meet together and talk while they eat and drink."

"Perhaps also we can come to your house," Bahwa wistfully suggested. "You can have a party for us there, and then your father will sometimes come in and listen to our talk."

"No," Viddi said decisively, "you cannot come to my house. And I cannot give a party because then I will not be able to save sufficient money to go abroad and study literature and sociology."

"I will tell you," said Tivari. "I will let you give a party in my rooms. We will ask everybody to come and the party can go on as long as we like."

Zahir-ud-din struck his hands together and cried, "But what a beautiful idea!" His eyes shone and he looked like a handsome and very excited little boy. "We will invite Meenakshi and Leela Sinclair, and there is Mira who is learning to play the veena ——"

"Please," said Viddi, "going to England is costly, that is why I must save and cannot —— Please listen to me," he said, but nobody did.

Taking precedence in his mind over the new deputy minister, over the ten-lac income tax for which the government was suing him, over the T—— case, and even—though it was intimately connected with it—over the Happy Hindustan contract, was the problem of Nimmi. Lalaji was surprised that one small frail eighteen-year-old daughter of his could so seize upon his mind and heart as even to make him absent-minded over business affairs. At the most awkward times—he might be sitting in his office, checking bills, reading lawyers' reports, listening to supplicants—suddenly he would think of Dev Raj's proposition; and then he would forget everything before him in order vehemently to tell himself that it was impossible. She is too young, he told himself; though he knew she was not. It is necessary for her to finish her education; though he knew it was not. The match is not suitable; though it would have been hard to think of one more so. She who is worthy of a king, he would tell himself, to be married only to the son of a director of a trading company ——

He was not a man given to self-analysis. He performed actions because they seemed good to him, and did not probe into his own motives. But here, in his uncertainty, the question of motive did arise, and then he could not help asking himself whether, when he thought of sacrifice, he thought of it not so much in connection with his daughter as in connection with himself. That he should lose her, give her away to a husband's house, not hear any more her voice ringing through his home and see her curled up on the divan eating a banana like a queen, young and graceful, dainty and fresh and fragile; his Nimmi.

He did not see much of her. Except in his thoughts, his family did not play a great part in his daily life. But what home life he had was colored by her more than by any of the others. She filled his house and his thoughts like a fragrance. To come home, to think of home, and to find that fragrance missing, this was what was intolerable to him; this was where the sacrifice came in.

He would have liked to talk with someone about it all, and for a while he thought he would confide in Om Prakash. But he speedily rejected the idea. Om would not be able to understand why his father was not jumping at the offer. Even if the match had not been as advantageous as in fact it was, Om would still have jumped at it, because it would get them the Happy Hindustan contract.

Even less did he wish to consult with the women of his family. But Dev Raj was too shrewd for him; he knew from which side to soften a man's opinions. A hint of the negotiations was dropped to Dev Raj's wife, who could hardly wait to get to Lalaji's house.

The moment she came in they knew she had something special to impart, for she wore a festive blouse of blue satin. They were a little apprehensive because, whenever she came like this, she usually had something to their disadvantage to impart. However, it was not until she had been sitting there for some time, drinking sherbet and eating sweetmeats and fanning herself with a fan made of peacock feathers, talking of this and that very amicably, that at last she said, "And your Nimmi—where is she this evening?"

"I have sent her," Lalaji's wife lied defiantly, "to the house of my sister this evening, for always my sister asks, 'Why do you not send your children to visit in my house?'"

Shanta's mother nodded. "Of course, a sister's children are our own children," and then, to everyone's surprise, dropped the point. Only to say, almost roguishly from behind her fan, "And I hear that soon perhaps we are to be related even more closely."

They had no idea what she could mean, but took good care not to look surprised. Lalaji's wife replied noncommittally, "Ah, the ties between us are very fast," while they waited to hear what explanation they could pick up.

But Shanta, who saw no necessity to be as wary with her mother as the others, innocently cried, "What do you mean, Mataji?

CONTINUED ON PAGE 172

"Unless there is more than meets the eye, I can't understand what you see in each other!"

NOW! DROMEDARY COMBINES ITS Treasured Historic Recipes with "STAY~FRESH MAGIC"

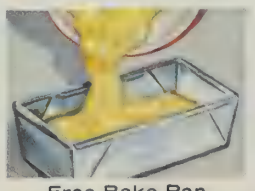
Photographed in the original kitchen at Monticello, Home of Thomas Jefferson, Charlottesville, Va.

Only Dromedary Guarantees:

"No Other Cake Tastes So Good Yet Stays So Fresh...day after day"

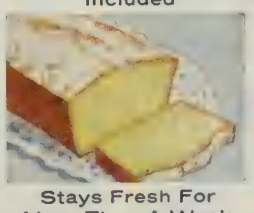
The better the recipe the better the cake! New Dromedary—the first Pound Cake Mix—is the only one inspired by a treasured historic recipe used by Thomas Jefferson's daughter, Martha. Now, with "Stay-Fresh Magic," it always tastes so good yet stays so fresh—day after day!



The better the ingredients the better the cake! New Dromedary Mixes contain only the finest ingredients! Dromedary's Miracle Shortening and scientific blending always insure cakes with perfect texture!

The better the directions the better the cake! You always get a perfect Pound Cake with Dromedary—the directions are so easy to follow! And with "Stay-Fresh Magic," you can now bake days ahead of time, serve later!

Guarantee: Women everywhere tell us Dromedary Cakes taste like, stay fresh like, the best homemade! If you don't agree, send box top to Dromedary, 110 Washington St., New York 6, N. Y., and we'll refund your money.



2 Minutes Mixing Time

Free Bake Pan Included

Always Cuts Like Butter

Stays Fresh For More Than A Week

Copr., 1957, The Dromedary Company, Division of National Biscuit Company.

Only New Dromedary
MAKER OF THE FAMOUS GINGERBREAD GIVES YOU SUCH OLD-FASHIONED GOODNESS THIS NEW-FASHIONED WAY!

DROMEDARY received the rights to this recipe from the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, member of the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 170

How are our two families to be related even closer?" She did not realize that she had said anything wrong till she caught Phuphiji's eye.

Shanta's mother waited no longer. "You know your father's cousin-brother Madan Mohan? He is married to Rampyari, and the brother of Rampyari, Ram Prasad, is married to Romeshlata, and the mother of Romeshlata has an elder brother whose name is Amar Nath. Amar Nath has three daughters and one son; all three daughters are married and for the son he has just made an offer for Nimmi."

It was not until she had gone that they could express their feelings. And even then there was so much to express that they did not know where to start. Eventually they started on Lalaji; for this was the worst, that he should not have breathed a word to them about this admirable proposition. "How we were shamed before that woman," said his wife. "I could read it in her eyes. She knew he had not told us, and she thought, 'The women of this household have no power in their family at all. Even over the disposal of the daughters they are not consulted.' And now she will go tell it to all her relations; how an offer was made for Nimmi, and the mother and the aunt and the elder sister were not told. Such shame he brings on us with his obstinate ways."

Phuphiji agreed in very strong language.

Even Rani, who was usually milder in judging her father, had to say, "Why did Pitaji not tell us? Such an excellent match."

"Because he has forgotten what is the duty of a brother and a father and a husband," was Phuphiji's grim explanation.

They could think of none other. It was inconceivable that he could have any doubts about accepting the proposal.

"Send for him," Phuphiji commanded. "At once let him come here to speak with us."

His wife was more realistic: she knew he was not the man to be summarily sent for and made to discuss a subject which he had no desire to discuss. "What is the use?" she said. "You know too well how obstinate he is in his mind. His wife, his sister, his eldest daughter—he will listen to none of us."

"He must listen," said Phuphiji. "He must be made to act quickly. Such an offer we cannot afford to neglect."

Lalaji's wife sadly shook her head. "It will make him more obstinate," she said, wise by the bitterness of her experience.

Here Shanta, who had hitherto been quietly crooning to her baby, unexpectedly asked why did they not send for Om. Perhaps he could tell them something. She was not entirely disinterested in this suggestion: she wanted to see her husband, who had not come to the women's quarter for several days.

Love is blind; friendship tries not to notice. BISMARCK

This was thought a good idea, so Phuphiji at once made it her own. "Let the eldest son be sent for. When the father is neglectful of his duty, the burdens of the family fall on the eldest son."

A servant sent to the sitting room soon returned with an Om who was very cross and whose first words were, "What do you want with me? All day I work in the office, and even in the evening I cannot sit and rest for one moment."

Shanta rocked her baby in her arms rather ostentatiously and sang to it, "Just see who has come. Your pappaji has come."

"What do you want?" Om asked his mother.

"Son," she said, "has your father spoken with you about the proposal that has been made for your youngest sister?"

"For Nimmi?" asked Om.

"A very rich family of our community. One hundred years you can look and not find a better, and then also there is a contract ——"

"What contract?"

"For a building," said Phuphiji. "It is worth twenty-five lacs of rupees."

"The Happy Hindustan?" Om asked. The women nodded, and he looked impressed. "It is good news," he said. "Is it certain?"

"Who knows what is certain? With your father, who can tell? If the Lord Krishna himself came and asked for his daughter in marriage, one cannot be certain if he would say yes, he is so obstinate and self-willed and without proper regard for his family."

"He has wanted this contract for a long time," Om said. "We have both worked hard to get it. He will not throw it away when it has dropped into his hands."

"With the other one, with Usha, he waited till she was twenty, though there were many good offers. It is only because we begged of him and begged that at last he has made a marriage for her."

"What is it," Phuphiji cried, "but a disgrace that a girl eighteen years old should run out and show herself to all the world? At this very moment we do not know where Nimmi is and three nights ago she came home so late that no one knows how late it was, though she says she was in her bed at ten o'clock."

"I was awake till ten o'clock," said Lalaji's wife, "and she never showed herself to me then. What can we do, what can we say to her, when always there is her father to say let her alone, let her do what she wishes, let her go to a college, let her go out into the world?"

"You must speak with your father," said Phuphiji. "This marriage must be arranged as soon as possible."

"Do not worry," said Om. "Pitaji has been in business long enough to know the value of a twenty-five lac contract."

It was strange, Nimmi thought, but when she was away from Pheroze she was more excited about him than when she was with him. The kiss was a case in point: for when he had actually been there, kissing her, her sole reaction had been one of amusement. But afterward she could not keep her thoughts away from it, and then it became romantic and thrilling. Perhaps it only became real, fully experienced with all the correct accompanying emotions, in the telling of it.

Rajen was properly impressed. "He really ——" she cried. "You are not teasing, he really ——" and Nimmi nodded and burst into fresh giggles. Arm in arm they walked down the corridor and Nimmi told it all over again, thinking that although Rajen had very fashionable parents, a sister in England and was herself a member of the club, she had never been kissed by a young man.

Going to the club was more exciting than ever. Hitherto, Nimmi had had a slight feeling of inferiority, because she was not really a member of the club, because her parents were not fashionable and had no friends in fashionable circles, because she was young and inexperienced and unknown. But after she had been out with Pheroze all that was changed. She felt she had a right to be there, for she, too, was now experienced and fashionable. And her self-confidence increased even further when she discovered that she had another admirer.

Nimmi knew at once that while they played tennis one young man watched them with more than ordinary interest. Next evening he was there again and he stayed all the time they were playing. Afterward he came up and said, "You know, you could play quite well if you had a little training," but as several other young men had already said that to her—Pheroze had been the first—she was not so excited as she might otherwise have been. Anyway, she in no way encouraged him; because she was in love with Pheroze and had no time for anyone else, even though this young man was also, in his way, quite nice-looking. He was not very tall and he was rather thin; but he dressed well, even though it was only in white shirt and white flannels, and he wore a pink scarf with white stripes on it tucked very rakishly into the open collar of his shirt. And he always looked so gay; this was the first thing that struck her about him. He laughed a baked for you in a "down east" kitchen

CONTINUED ON PAGE 175

B&M

BRICK-OVEN BAKED BEANS

in New England Sauce with Pork

For hearty, healthy appetites, you just can't beat B & M Brick-Oven Baked Beans. They're simmered long hours in a delicious brown sugar sauce in real, old-fashioned New England brick ovens and generously topped with carefully selected pork. Enjoy them tonight!

Burnham & Morrill Co., Portland, Me.

It takes two . . . to start the day right

UNIVERSAL

Coffeematic Twins

Matched in Appearance . . . Matched in Performance

It's a happy day that starts with this matching twosome.
The famous Universal Coffeematic with Flavor-Selector to give you wonderful, full-bodied real coffee at exactly the strength you choose, automatically. And matching it in beauty and convenience, the Universal Automatic Toaster with Reflector-Control that toasts any bread to the same golden brown without changing the adjustment. Best of all, you can now have these Universal Coffeematic Twins at a saving of $9.95 less than their regular price.

COFFEEMATIC Regularly $29.95
TOASTER Regularly $19.95
A $49.90 VALUE

Both for only $39.95

UNIVERSAL

LANDERS, FRARY & CLARK, NEW BRITAIN, CONN.

Live in Luxury...

THE Starfire GROUP

Sofa	$149.50
Chair	$89.50
BOTH PIECES	$239.00

Enjoy these! Add luxury of foam rubber cushions at moderate extra cost. Prices slightly higher in some areas and vary with fabric selected.

There's a feeling of luxury in the new fleetness of line . . . in the superb designing and the meticulous attention to every detail that distinguishes the exciting new Starfire Group.

Exciting new fabrics, too, add a rich note of luxury . . . with choices of fabric colors that anticipate your most personal tastes and desires. And lasting luxury is assured, for like all Kroehler living room furniture, the Starfire Group is Plus-Built, with built-in strength far above normal needs. See this outstanding furniture value soon! Get set to live in luxury!

WORLD'S LARGEST FURNITURE MANUFACTURER

KROEHLER

PLUS BUILT®

LIVING ROOM FURNITURE

Also makers of Permanized® bedroom furniture

General Offices: Naperville, Illinois

In Canada: Stratford, Ontario

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 172

lot, and when he walked from one place to the other he did not seem to be walking so much as skipping. Nimmi thought that he would probably be very amusing to talk to.

On the third evening that he presented himself, even Rajen noticed him. Afterward, while they were sitting on the lawn, drinking their customary pineapple juice, she said, "Did you see the young man with the pink scarf? I think he likes you. He is always watching you."

"Oh, that one!" Nimmi said and gaily laughed. "He is only a boy." He might have been about twenty-one or twenty-two, whereas Pheroze was twenty-six and therefore much more experienced and exciting.

"He looks quite nice," said Rajen; which pleased Nimmi so much that she rejoined, "But I think his friend, the tall one with spectacles, is interested in you."

After a while Nimmi said, "My family would be very angry if they knew I went out with Pheroze." Lately she had become a little more outspoken about her family. She felt that Rajen had now accepted her as an equal and that her position in the social world had become, by her own efforts, secure enough for her to relax some of her self-imposed censorship on her family background. It was more comfortable that way, too; she could talk almost freely with Rajen instead of having to be on her guard all the time.

"What nonsense," said Rajen.

"My eldest sister," Nimmi said, "was married when she was seventeen, and she never knew any young man before that."

"That is what makes daddy so angry," Rajen said. "He says it is a primitive custom to marry girls young, without giving them any education, even if you can afford it, or without letting them see anything of the world. He says this is what retards our progress."

"My other sister," Nimmi continued, "is also to be married soon. She is twenty now."

"She likes the young man she is to marry?" Rajen asked.

Nimmi shrugged her shoulders. "Like?" she said. "How can you like someone you do not know? Could I like even Pheroze if I did not know him?"

"Your poor sister! How unhappy she must be. Thank heaven that mummy and daddy do not believe in arranged marriages!"

"No," Nimmi said slowly, "I do not think she is unhappy." She had never given the matter any thought before. Like everybody else in the family, she just accepted the fact that Usha was to be married. And Usha never talked to anyone of her feelings.

"Nimmi," Rajen said, "if your parents arrange for your sisters, will they not also arrange for you?"

"Oh," said Nimmi and laughed. "Oh, I will never marry!" And just then she became aware of the young man in the pink scarf, who had settled himself with a group of friends at a nearby table. She lowered her head and said with a very faint smile—the last vestige of a vast amusement which she struggled to suppress—"Look, Rajen. Here is your friend with the spectacles come to sit near you."

After this it was impossible to carry on conversation as before, though they tried hard to look unconcerned. Nimmi was greatly aware of the young man with the pink scarf and Rajen of the one with the spectacles. The young man with the pink scarf sat in an easy attitude, his arm resting on the back of his tilted chair, his legs crossed and one foot swinging. He laughed a lot, Nimmi noticed, and made the others laugh a lot. He was drinking orange squash.

"Is he looking at me?" asked Rajen in a low voice.

Nimmi darted a look at the other table. All she saw was her own admirer, gazing at her intently. She quickly looked away again. "Oh, yes," she said; "he is looking at you so hard his spectacles are nearly bursting."

Rajen giggled and said, "How you tell lies."

Nimmi was almost surprised when Pheroze joined them. Not that she was not expecting him; she was always expecting him. But at that moment she was not thinking about him.

"Please sit down, Pheroze," she said with dignity, and as if she owned him. As really she did: he was her boy friend.

"It is rather hot this evening," said Pheroze. Both girls hastened to agree to this and to add their own comments. Rajen also was on her best behavior, for she had a very great respect for Pheroze now. "In Bombay," said Pheroze, "the air is more pleasant, especially by the seaside." Nimmi could still hear the voice of the young man in the pink scarf and he was still laughing. "Do you not feel the heat very much on your head" Pheroze asked her, "with so much hair?"

Her hand went up to those heavy coils and Rajen's also went, a little complacently, to her short curls.

"Yes," said Rajen, "it must be very hot. Why do you not have it cut? You would look so nice and it would be more comfortable. Do you not think so, Mr. Batliwala?"

He considered the question. Nimmi wondered whether he knew the name of the young man in the pink scarf and whether she would dare ask him. "Yes"—Pheroze at last delivered his opinion—"I think it would suit you very well. And it is more fashionable."

"There," said Rajen, "I always tell her so. But she says her parents will not allow her to have it cut."

Nimmi was annoyed. There was no need for Pheroze to know that her parents were not fashionable people. Why could Rajen not keep her mouth shut? Was she being spiteful or just stupid? "No," she said, frowning, "I like to wear it like this. I think it suits me better. We were thinking," she told Pheroze, "that perhaps one evening we could go out, you and I and Rajen and her boy friend." Rajen looked embarrassed so Nimmi noticed her embarrassment and thought defiantly, Well, she should not have said that about my parents.

"Yes," said Pheroze, not very enthusiastically, as she had known he would. Of course he would prefer to be alone with her. How could he kiss her if there were two other people present?

It was a very large party. A cocktail party, it was called, and Viddi was immensely proud to be host at a cocktail party. But he would have been happier if it had been made clear that he was the host, at any rate that he was paying the bill, though all the guests had been invited by Tivari and the party took place on the lawn of the house in which he lodged. Tivari took no pains to enlighten people that really it was Viddi who was giving the party. He did not even introduce Viddi properly, but would just break off—rather impatiently—in the middle of amusing conversation to wave his hand and mutter a few names which Viddi failed to catch. Zahir-ud-din was even more preoccupied, dancing round a number of attractive young ladies. As for Bahwa, he seemed to know as few people as Viddi. In fact, Bahwa, Viddi noticed at once, did not belong at all. It was a pity he had been invited, for he lowered the tone of the party. Not only was he shabbily dressed, but he also made himself a nuisance by trying to sell tickets for his play to people who stared at him coldly.

Otherwise the tone of the party was very high. Viddi was impressed. He had not known that there were so many fashionable and advanced people in Delhi. Most of the girls behaved as freely as he thought European girls behaved, and some of them even smoked cigarettes. It was a warm, languid night, the garden full of tall stiff flowers, the lawn smoothly mown, and lights had been fixed in the foliage of the trees so that the undersides of leaves glimmered a faint golden green. There was a buffet, a long table covered with a white cloth bearing glasses and bottles and plates full of potato chips and sandwiches. Viddi felt a little uncomfortable when he thought of what it was all going to cost.

"Ved Prakash Verma," Tivari muttered, waving his hand, as Viddi insistently appeared by his side; and this time he added, "He is the son of Lala Narayan Dass Verma."

Viddi was much annoyed at that, but noticed that people seemed to look at him with more interest.

One man said, "So you are the son of Lala Narayan Dass Verma."

Since this was the only opening he had, Viddi had to brush away his feeling of annoyance. "You know my father?"

"Everybody knows your father," the young man answered, and laughed, though not offensively. He was just a young man who liked to laugh. "I have also seen your sister," he said; "she comes to our club and plays tennis."

"Oh, do I know her?" cried a girl with a cigarette. "Who is she, Kuku?"

"I think you mean my sister-in-law Kanta," Viddi said. "She goes to club and I think she plays tennis."

"No," said Kuku. "I mean your sister. Her name is Nimmi."

"Nimmi?" said the girl. "Who is Nimmi?"

"My youngest sister," said Viddi. But Kuku had already turned away to join another group, and when he walked he did not seem to be so much walking as skipping. The girl followed him, and because there was no one else who seemed inclined to talk to him, Viddi trailed behind them. The group they joined included Zahir-ud-din who, though Viddi stared at him very hard, made no attempt to introduce him.

Kuku took Viddi's arm and said to the others, "Please meet my friend, the son of Lala Narayan Dass Verma.'

"Ah, yes," cried Zahir-ud-din, "his father is a very great man. I shall paint his portrait—you have fixed it up for me?"

"Do not listen to him," said Kuku. "For months he has been trying to come and paint my father's portrait too."

"But who is this Nimmi?" cried the girl with the cigarette.

"She is his sister," said Kuku, and Zahir-ud-din asked, "She is pretty? Shall I come and paint her?"

Viddi did not answer because he did not like Zahir-ud-din to talk so easily of his sister. Kuku also did not seem to like it. "No, you will not paint her," he said with such decision that Viddi wondered just how well he knew Nimmi.

"I think you people are not very interested in art," Zahir-ud-din replied. "You are too materialistic."

"I am not materialistic," Viddi answered, for he did not wish to appear in a bad light before his new acquaintances. "I like art very much."

"Of course," said the girl with the cigarette impatiently, "we all like art."

"And dancing," said Kuku, "and parties and drinks and tennis." He hummed a tune and threw his arm round the girl with the cigarette who shook him off with a great show of indignation.

Viddi looked at him and was much impressed. He is no older than I am, he thought, but he knows how to live.

"Kuku is wiser than you are," Zahir-ud-din told him. "You see, he knows how fortunate he is in his birth and he has gone into his father's business and has a lot of money."

"I am going to Europe to study. Literature and art and sociology," Viddi said.

"Your father is sending you?" Kuku asked.

"I am saving out of my allowance, which is five hundred rupees a month"; and this reminded him that he was—at any rate financially—the host of this party and he said, "Why do you not have one more cocktail?" He wished that he could state his importance at this gathering more directly.

"They are not very nice cocktails," said the girl with the cigarette, wrinkling her nose at the glass in her hand.

"This is not a very nice party," said Kuku. "It is very dull. All the people are dull."

The girl with the cigarette said, "They are people who are never asked to really nice parties, so they come here." Viddi ceased to devise plans by which he could explain himself as the host.

"Come on," said Kuku, "we will go somewhere else. We have been here long enough." Viddi wondered whether he was also included in the general invitation to go somewhere else. Certainly he no longer wanted to stay, he had no interest in a party at which only people who were not invited anywhere else were present. As he stood hesitating, Kuku called over his shoulder, "You also come with us, son of Lala Narayan Dass Verma," and Viddi

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Just about the only thing that can be said against attics is that they encourage the hoarding of love letters.

Dieting: short cut to frame and fortune.

For an epitaph, one woman says "I'd be content to have them utter, 'She was one who never scrimped on butter.'"

Pride in a parent's heart probably blooms before love, but the latter blossoms fast—somewhere between the changing of the first diaper and the hundredth.

Hypochondriac: a person with an infinite capacity for faking pains.

How sharper than a serpent's tooth is the dull edge of a tool . . . just returned from a neighbor.

By the time a couple can afford to go out evenings, they can't leave the grandchildren alone.

Advice to girls seeking husbands: The way to hold a man is to let him spend some money on you; the way to lose him is to let him spend a lot of money on you.

Why is it that the person who needs no introduction usually gets the longest one?

Spring comes to every man when, with a sudden swirling gush, the ice of worry and lost dreams breaks in his heart and love of life flows again through his veins.

A cat, lying before a hearth, introduces as much peace into a room as a clergyman sitting in a chair.

Any father who pays for a daughter's wedding should have the exclusive privilege of giving her away.

Many women are weighed and found not wanting.

The granddaughter of a couple married over sixty-five years says that even though granddad could not exist long without grandmom, he is likely, every now and then, to explode with the ultimatum, "I can't live with that woman another day!"

Just as a scientist, with only one bone, can classify the animal from which it came, so a woman, from another's hat, can catalogue her exactly.

A woman acquaintance says, "I look at pictures parents proudly show me of their children and I'm not as much impressed by prettiness as whether or not there's that little spark in the eye showing the snap hasn't been taken out."

said to the girl with the cigarette, who did not hear him, "Yes, I think I will go too. This is a very dull party."

They piled into their cars, and Viddi was fortunate enough to get into Kuku's car, though it was already very full. Nobody said anything about where they were going and Viddi was quite content to let himself be taken wherever they chose. They stopped at a restaurant and the doorman swung the portals open for them. There was a cabaret in progress; an Indonesian girl in a tight skirt and a brassière walked up and down, jerking one hip and clacking castanets. They ordered drinks and kebabs and some of them danced. Viddi, unfortunately, did not know how to dance, but he liked watching, sitting there with a whisky glass in one hand and a kebab in the other. He thought, Yes, this is what I want; this is life.

Kuku leaned over to him and said in a low voice, "There is your sister over there." Indeed, there was Nimmi, sedately eating dinner at a table for two with a young Parsi in evening dress. Viddi drew in his feet and sat up. He was surprised, and his first thought was what the family would say if they saw Nimmi sitting in a place like this, alone with a young man who was a Parsi. But it was a thought he checked immediately; of which he was even ashamed, because it was right for his sister to be here, to be emancipated. It raised his own status in the fashionable world to have such a sister.

Kuku said, "You see, she is only a student, but she knows the right places."

"I will introduce you if you like," Viddi replied. But Kuku laughed and said, "That will not be necessary now," and then the girl with the cigarette took him off to dance.

None of them felt at ease, not even Lalaji, who did not usually suffer from embarrassment. Nor would he have done so now, if it had not been for the children. But the children made him unhappy. They were his grandchildren, he wanted to love them, he did love them, but when he gathered them into his arms and drew them close, they squirmed away from him and then stood staring at him from a distance.

"They are a little shy," said Kanta. "They do not usually kiss other people."

"And is the grandfather also other people?" Lalaji asked.

Chandra fidgeted and looked reproachfully at Kanta. They could not afford to annoy his father. But Kanta assumed an expression of defiance; she did not care, she was not going to be more polite than necessary. She had not asked him to come, and the sooner he went away again the better. "All right," she said to the children, "you can go off now to play." They walked to the door slowly but without protest, and looked back over their shoulders at their grandfather.

"Why do you not bring my grandchildren to our house?" Lalaji asked his son.

"They are very busy at school," Kanta replied; "and then they go to dancing classes twice a week."

Lalaji made no comment, though many occurred to him. He did not wish to speak harshly to Kanta. She was his son's wife, she had borne his son's children, and even though she came from a different community and her ways were not their ways, he had always tried to love her as a daughter.

"We want them to have a good education," Chandra said almost apologetically.

"They must have a good grounding," Kanta said. "In a few years' time they will be sent to boarding school in the hills. These are still the best schools in India; they are run on English lines and the children are taught good manners and also good English."

"You will send them away to the hills?" Lalaji asked his son. "They will not be at home with you?"

"They will come home only for holidays," Kanta told Lalaji. "It is best for children to be away from their parents. It is the English system."

Lalaji was scandalized. He looked at Chandra, who did not dare to meet his eye. "Best for children to be away from parents!" Lalaji repeated in a dazed manner. What did this mean? He did not understand how such a thing could be said. How could parents live without children, or children without parents? For it was only the children—running from the women's quarter to the men's, into the kitchen, into the neighboring houses—it was only they who united a family, united a neighborhood, brought life to a society. "But such an education," he said, subtly changing the theme, "will bring great expense."

Nervously twitching his nose and looking away from his father, Chandra said, "Yes, we will have to think of the expense."

"As long as I am here," Lalaji answered smoothly, "there will be no worry."

Kanta was irritated. There was no need for him to mention the fact that he sometimes had to help them out. He was Chandra's father and it was only natural that he should do so; it was his duty.

"I am your father," said Lalaji. "It is my duty to help you." But though this was a voicing of her own thoughts, Kanta was not pleased. Certainly it is your duty, she answered him with silent indignation, and she felt that their demands on him were really far too modest.

"I do not want to fail in my duty toward my son," said Lalaji.

Chandra twisted his fingers. He knew that what Lalaji was really saying was not, "I am your father; I must not fail in my duty toward you," but "You are my son; you must not fail in your duty toward me." And Chandra's thoughts crept reluctantly to the one spot from which he had urgently tried to keep them: to the back of his wardrobe, to the file, to the letter.

"I do not say you have not shown yourself worthy of what has been done for you," Lalaji told his son. "No, you are a good son to me. I know you are a good son."

Chandra paced up and down. His nerves felt taut and strained. He could not bear it. He was a man who needed peace and quiet, and peace and quiet for him depended on certainty. He had to be certain what he was dealing with, have it all clearly defined before him in the shape of minutes or a report with correctly headed sections; he could not deal with things indirectly.

Suddenly he stopped short in his pacing and, looking toward his father with unhappy eyes, he blurted it out: "Pitaji, I have the file with me, it is lying here at the back of the wardrobe. It is quite safe with me; you need not worry. For some time I can keep it with me."

"Son," Lalaji said quietly, "why do you not give me the letter?"

"But that is impossible!" Kanta cried. "Chandra cannot remove a letter from a government file!"

"It is so simple," Lalaji told his son. "You will take the letter out and return the file. That is only right. The letter belongs to me, it came from my office."

"It does not belong to you!" Kanta cried. She was really furious; not only because of what her father-in-law was saying, but also because he so completely ignored her. "It belongs to the government, and Chandra, who is a government officer, is responsible for it."

"It is a private letter," Lalaji said to Chandra. "It was written to T —— privately, as a friend, and it was only by mistake that it was put in a file. Such mistakes must be put right. Government files are very important things; you cannot put your own private letters into them. It looks very bad."

"The file came to my office," Chandra said desperately. "I had to give my signature to it and when it leaves my office I will also have to give my signature. How can I sign if I take the letter out? Without this letter the file will no longer be the same file, it will be a different file. I cannot pass a different file on."

"Listen, son," Lalaji said. "If someone eats a mango in your office and then throws the stone which he has sucked on the floor, can you not tell the sweeper to pick it up, can you not say to him, 'Take this dirty thing out of my office at once,' because if he takes it out it will no longer be the same office?"

"A letter in a government file," Kanta said, "is not a dirty mango stone on the floor."

"Son," Lalaji said, and he spoke very calmly, "I have told you this letter is a private letter, a letter like you might write to a friend any day or perhaps to your wife when she has gone for the summer to the hills. It is just such a letter, a private letter which concerns only two people."

"Then what harm is there," Kanta asked, "if it stays in the file? Let it stay there. Why do you concern yourself?"

"I do not say," Lalaji told Chandra, "that the people who make public inquiries are bad people. On the contrary, they care very much about their duty, which is a good thing in any profession or business. They care so much that they will spare no pains and sometimes they will even do something that is not moral in order simply to make out a case. For instance, if they find a letter written by one friend to another they will read it from here to there and backward and forward and upside down till they have succeeded in thinking something into it which will help their case. It is only their case they think of. The innocent Whatsoever we beg of God, let us also work for it.

JEREMY TAYLOR

Oh, for the life of baby with
KANTWET

A healthy baby is a happy baby . . . and KANTWET products are all designed to make baby's life easier, safer, more comfortable. At-home or on-the-go, baby's free as a lark . . . laughing, loving, living every minute of it. For safety and confidence, insist on KANTWET.

KANTWET CRIB MATTRESSES

Insure healthful, restful sleep. Never boardy or saggy, KANTWET gives baby the firm, resilient support doctors recommend for growing bones and muscles. Gay, wetproof fabrics stay sweet and sanitary. There's a fine KANTWET for every budget.

KANTWET TRAVEL NEEDS

KANTWET car beds and car seats are safer! Plenty of room to kick around, yet baby's always safe and comfortable. Many exclusive safety features. Baby travels "first class" on a KANTWET!

NEW! YEAR-ROUND FOLD-A-CRIB

First outdoor-indoor portable folding crib for year-round use. Combines draft-free quilted construction on one end with free ventilation of fibreglass screening on the other. Combination shade and screen top (removable) makes it ideal for outdoor use. Constructed with aluminum, it's just the right height for tending baby.

KANTWET PADS
for every nursery need!

Extra-thick . . . extra-strong, KANTWET pads are best.

EXCLUSIVE! Only KANTWET play-pen pads have "Snap-Tabs" . . . no more soiled or torn tapes . . . just snap 'em and they stay put.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

best for health and safety

KANTWET BABY PRODUCTS

THE GREATEST NAME IN CRIB MATTRESSES whom they will call for witness and whose e will be printed in the newspaper and se business perhaps will suffer, of him they not think. They do not think of him," ji said, shaking his head. "Neither of him of his family. Just think, such a man may relatives who are in responsible positions, aps they may even be working for gov-ment—how will it be for them when the e of their relative is printed in all the news-rs and spoken in all the bazaars? Will not suffer too?" With which he slowly ered himself together, drew out his feet on h he had been sitting and, with great dig-assumed his shoes. "Your house is so

," he said. "It is pleasant to sit here."

immi, looking defiantly casual, came tering into the sitting room. Only her r was sitting there. He was laughing nt-mindedly into the telephone and at the time checking some bills. But even when ad put down the receiver he still did not e her.
Hallo, Pitaji," she said, studying her nails.
ooked up for a moment, grunted and reed at once to his bills. He does not even e, she thought. She had hoped to go to the ien's quarter with his approval; or, if not oval, at least with his resigned consent.
he would have given her that, she knew, ly he had noticed. He was not the man to e a fuss over something that was finished done. Her hair was gone—very well; after nitial shock that was what he would have —very well. Not so her mother and her
: no consideration of the inevitable would ain them. She hoped at least that Rani there, for Rani knew that short hair was ionable and she might be able to point this with some effect to the others.
ani was not there. Only her mother and ohiji and Shanta. And they noticed at . Their reaction could have been pre-
d. Even Shanta let out a gasp and looked immi with horror. Maee, hearing the up-, came running into the courtyard, and n she saw the cause at once joined in:
r beauty is gone! How will we find a hus-l now?"
Go tell him!" Phuphiji screamed. "Go im what his daughter has done!"
Pitaji has seen me," Nimmi said sulkily.
He has seen?" cried her mother.
And he says nothing?" cried Phuphiji.
two women looked at each other, Phu-with bitter triumph, Lalaji's wife in great ess. "Now we know what sort of a father s," Phuphiji said. "He is careless and ectful, but we will see to it that a husband und for you, now, at once, quickly! You be married and the first who will take you have you!"

nmi put her hands over her ears and ran ght up to her bedroom. Usha was sitting he floor, looking at some sheets which part of her dowry. When she saw mi, she clapped her hand before her th and gasped, "Oh, you have cut your
"
So I have cut my hair!" Nimmi shouted.
haps you also will have something to sha smoothed a sheet. Then she turned it d and smoothed it from the other side.
"
t is impossible for me to live with such le," Nimmi muttered, and sat in front of mirror. She looked so unfamiliar, she had a shock. She might have been a boy, her was so short—but her full mouth, her
, the rounded contours of her face were those of a boy. She shook her head, then her hand up to pass it over her hair. Tears e into her eyes. She wished she had not it. Her thick, heavy, braided coils that shone brown-black and could be twined t with fresh jasmine —— think it looks nice," Usha said quietly behind her.
Really?" she said and turned round. "You y think it looks nice? You think it suits
"
Yes," Usha said; but then added, very ously, "What will Matiji and Phuphiji
"
immi sighed and replied, "They have said ady," and threw herself on the bed. She lay there thinking, looking up at the fan spinning on the ceiling, her arms under her head. "Usha," she said, after she had thought for a while, "do you not think it is very bad that our family is so old-fashioned?"

"Old-fashioned?" asked Usha and laughed.

"Yes, what else? They understand nothing. For instance, they do not understand that it is fashionable for a girl to go to a club and have her hair cut and meet young men. They think all these things are bad because they do not understand them."

Usha, sitting on the floor, turned over another sheet and lovingly ran her hand along its surface. "Perhaps it is not very good," she suggested, "for girls like us to meet young men ——"

"What nonsense!" cried Nimmi as Rajen might have cried. "Really, Usha, sometimes I feel Om is right: you are stupid. All you do is sit with hands joined together and your eyes downcast and say yes to everything Matiji and Phuphiji tell you."

After a while Usha replied in a diffident manner, "They know how things should be done; that is why I say yes when they tell me to do something: because I know it is right."

Nimmi rolled over onto her side and, supporting her head on her hand, looked at her sister with interest. "Is that why you said yes when they came to you and said in four months you are to be married and this man is to be your husband?"

"Every girl has to be married, what else is there? How could I not say yes? There was nothing else for me to say."

"There was much else for you to say," Nimmi replied decisively. "I will never say yes if they come to me with a husband they have kindly found for me. On the contrary, I will tell them, 'Thank you, I am grateful to you for your trouble, but if you do not mind I will find my own husband; this is a work I will do for myself.' "

"Perhaps it is different for you."

new life for old nylons

BLU WHITE

Instant Dissolving Beads

washes nylons dazzling white — stops nylon gray before it starts!

Nothing you've ever used before—soaps, detergents, safety bleaches—can whiten and brighten nylon like new Blu White Beads! And nothing's safer!

The instant they touch water, these tiny beads of dazzling brighteners burst into action—whitening, bluing, washing the life back into yellowed, greyed, dingy-looking nylons!

But why wait 'til nylons grow wear-weary and grey? From the very first, wash them in Blu White Instant Dissolving Beads! Whites will look whiter, colors brighter when you pamper undies, stockings, blouses with Blu White!

Works wonders on all other miracle fabrics and cotton, too, in washbowl or automatic washer!

ANOTHER OF THE PUREX CORPORATION'S FAMILY OF PRODUCTS FOR YOUR FAMILY: Sweetheart Soap, New Blue Dutch Cleanser, Trend for dishes, Beads O' Bleach and Purex Liquid Bleach

A PRODUCT OF PUREX CORPORATION, LTD

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

"How should it be different for me than for you?"

"Oh," said Usha, smiling, "you are not like me. Everybody knows this. Everybody knows you are beautiful and clever ——"

Nimmi jumped up from the bed and squatted beside her sister, throwing her arms round her neck. "You also are beautiful and clever. Who says you are not?"

Usha returned her caresses very affectionately. "I am so proud of you," she murmured. "When you first came to the college and I was still there, how proud I was when I saw you walk down the corridors and I could tell everybody, 'This is my sister.'"

"How sweet you are! Usha, I love you more than I love any of the others." And she rubbed her face against her sister's shoulder.

Usha stroked her short straight hair and said, "Where did you leave the rest?"

"I brought it with me. It is downstairs in a paper bag. There was so much of it, I did not want to leave it at the hairdresser's. I tell you what I will do—I will stuff a cushion with it and give it to you for a wedding present. Oh, Usha," she cried, "do you really want to be married?"

Usha faintly smiled. "Why not?" she asked. "Someday it will have to be, so why not now?"

"But you do not even know him!"

"I have been allowed to see him."

"To see is not to know." For instance, she had only seen the young man in the pink scarf, she could not say she knew him.

"Afterward there will be plenty of time to know him."

"Yes," Nimmi said, not very hopefully. "But Usha, you do not want to become like Shanta?"

"Like Shanta?"

"Yes, like Shanta, only to sit all day in the women's quarter with your mother-in-law and your aunt and have babies all the time."

"Yes," said Usha almost obstinately. "I think she is very happy. She has three children and they are all her own and she can wash them and feed them and dress them and play with them the whole day long."

"And when your husband comes," Nimmi said in disgust, "you will not dare raise your eyes to his face and you will never speak his name and you will do everything that he tells you to do and if he likes, you will let him beat you?"

"Om does not beat Shanta."

"He does," Nimmi said, "I have heard him. And she did not even dare cry out. And what is worse, I think he goes to other women ——"

"Do not say these things," Usha pleaded. "Please, Nimmi, I do not like to hear such things spoken."

"But it is life," Nimmi told her. "If you are to be married, you must hear such things spoken. You must learn that men are sensual."

"Are what?"

"Sensual." Or was it sensuous?

"You are wrong," Usha said quite fiercely. "You do not understand at all." Nimmi was surprised. Usha, who was always happy and smiling and eating sweets, to speak so fiercely. "You understand nothing!" Usha shouted even more loudly. She did not want to believe these things that Nimmi was telling her; and because she did not want to believe, she did not want to hear. There was nothing in life except bearing babies and looking after them and sitting in the women's quarter amid servants and the smell of cooking; nothing, except perhaps for a gentle lovely love for one's husband, which made the babies come. "Why do you speak, when you understand nothing!"

Nimmi did not get angry. On the contrary, she felt sorry for Usha because she was so ignorant, and thought it was her duty to enlighten her. "My dear sweet sister," she said in a patient tone, "what do you think marriage is? Do you not know that men ——"

"Please," Usha cried, "I am not listening!" Stumbling over her sheets, she ran from the room, down the stairs, into the women's quarter.

Nimmi was very much surprised. She could not understand what had happened to Usha. Something must have upset her, and she wondered what it could have been, for it took much to upset Usha. But she did not wonder for long. She remembered that the bag of shorn hair was still lying somewhere downstairs. It would be better, she thought, to retrieve it before someone found it and got into a fury over it.

On the stairs she met Viddi, who said, "Oh, you have had your hair cut."

"Yes," she said defiantly, "I have had my hair cut."

He looked at her critically and then decided. "It looks nice. It is very fashionable for girls to have short hair." He thought of the girl with the cigarette and added, "All modern girls have their hair cut."

Nimmi laughed out loud and measured him up and down with amused eyes. "What do you know about fashionable and modern?" she asked. And then it struck her: How he has changed. He was no longer the fat slovenly young student she knew. Instead he had become sleek and stout and smart, wore expensive clothes and what was almost a worldly air.

Viddi drew up his eyebrows and smiled. But he only said, "Yesterday I met a friend of yours."

"Yes?" she said casually.

"Yes," said Viddi. His smile deepened and his eyebrows rose higher. "And it was not only your friend I met. I met you too. I saw you in The Pipal Tree having dinner with a Parsi. Oh, you need not be afraid: I will say nothing to the family."

THE CATALPA

By CHARLES G. BELL

The blossoms of the catalpa
Are a white carpet under
The tree. As the last few fall
And go brown now, I wonder:
What contentment of seed will Atone for the year's lost splendor?

Nimmi curled her lip in a fine attempt at defiance. "I do not care if you do tell. What is it to me? Viddi," she asked quickly, both to take his mind off the subject and because she really wanted to know, "who was the friend of mine you said you met?"

"It was Kuku."

"But I know no one called Kuku," she said. "Who is she?"

"Do not try to pretend with me. You know very well Kuku is no she."

"A boy? I know no boy called Kuku."

"He says he knows you. Of course he knows you—it was he who first saw you in The Pipal Tree. He said, 'There is your sister Nimmi.' Why do you pretend with me? You know I am not like the others—it does not matter to me whom you know and whom you do not know."

"But I am not pretending. Viddi, did this Kuku who is my friend wear a pink scarf round his neck?"

"Certainly not. He wore very nice clothes, evening clothes. He looked like a gentleman."

Lalaji appeared at the bottom of the stairs. He held a paper bag into which he peered with a very puzzled expression on his face. He looked up at them and asked, "What is this?"

Nimmi could not help laughing. She leaned over the banisters and called down, "Pitaji, it is my hair!" He looked even more puzzled, and this made her throw back her head and laugh very gaily.

It was a peaceful morning. Shanta, having sent the two older children to school, was feeding the baby. Lalaji's wife squatted in the kitchen and kneaded dough for the midday meal. Usha sat and ate sweetmeats, smilingly content. Into this peace came Shanta's mother, accompanied by her niece Lakshmi.

"Ah," said Shanta's mother, luxuriantly lowering herself onto a mat. She looked so sleek and clean and oiled, so complacent. Lalaji's wife felt very much at a disadvantage, for she had not yet had a bath or combed her hair, which drooped in a weak pigtail down her back. Surreptitiously she tried to wipe the dough from her hand by passing it down her old cotton sari.

But then Rani came and Shanta's mother was eclipsed. For Rani looked even sleeker. "Come, daughter," said Lalaji's wife, "come and entertain our guests." She was glad that Rani had come, for she would be able to deal with the fact of Nimmi's hair better than any of them. And she was quite sure that this was what Shanta's mother had primarily come to discuss. Why else the look of triumph?

"Oh, my pretty one, oh, my lovely one, oh, my pride, my beauty," said Shanta's mother to the baby which sucked rapturously at its mother's breast.

"Every day she grows fatter and more beautiful," said Lalaji's wife; and added with cunning humor, "Just see what a fashionable one is our child, see she wears her hair short just like a modern lady, oh, the little queen."

Shanta's mother smiled. "Like her father's youngest sister she is," she said and looked at Lalaji's wife, who came in very hurriedly with, "Yes, our Nimmi also wears her hair short now—what can you do when these young girls take it into their minds to be fashionable? We can only say, 'Bless you, child, do as you wish, my beauty.'"

"What else," Shanta's mother surprisingly agreed.

"She has done like her friend Rajen Mathur," said Lakshmi. "Her friend Rajen Mathur also wears her hair short." She took a sweetmeat and as she chewed her little gold earrings shook.

"Lakshmi," said Shanta's mother, "you are acquainted with the friends of Nimmi?"

"I know her friend Rajen Mathur and also her friend Indira Malik," Lakshmi replied.

"She has no other friends?"

"Oh yes," said Lakshmi placidly, "she has many friends. She also has a boy friend. He is a Parsi and England-returned."

To everyone's surprise it was Shanta who spoke first. She spoke indignantly. "Lakshmi," she said, "how can you say such lies about my husband's sister?"

"But it is true," said Lakshmi. "Everyone in the college knows. She goes out with him and has dinner in restaurants with him, and they dance." Her voice was full of admiration; she was not censuring, only stating enviable facts.

"Your cousin does not tell lies, Shanta," said Shanta's mother in a gentle voice. "She is your mother's sister's daughter."

"And Nimmi is my husband's sister," said Shanta with unwonted spirit. "My husband will be very angry if he hears my cousin speak such lies about his youngest sister."

"Come, Lakshmi," said Shanta's mother. She heaved herself to her feet. "We still have other visits to make. We have to go to the house of my relative Amar Nath, who is director of the Happy Hindustan Trading Company. I have things to say to his wife. Please, no ceremony," she said to Lalaji's wife who rose to accompany her to the door.

Usha sat there and frankly cried. Because it was all her fault. Yesterday Nimmi had told her that there was no harm in a young girl's going out to meet men and, beyond a mild protest, she had said nothing. I am selfish, she thought: I think only of my own happiness; my sister's is nothing to me.

The others did not notice her distress. They were too engrossed in their own, though theirs expressed itself more pungently. Phuphiji kept beating her temples with tight fists and shouted, "Send for him! Tell him this!" Lalaji's wife held her hands before her face and rocked herself to and fro.

"Pitaji must be told at once," said Rani, her bosom heaving up and down. "How can I go home to my husband's house when soon all the world will know of this disgrace?"

"A Parsi!" cried Lalaji's wife from behind her hands. "Not even a boy of our own community!"

"Send for him!"

"How can we send for him?" wailed Lalaji's wife. "He is in the office, he will not come. If the house is burned over our heads he will not come."

"I will go out and telephone to Pitaji," said, "and I will also call Om Prakash."

"Go!" cried Phuphiji. "Let the eldes come to teach the father his duty."

Rani dialed with a very determined loo her face. "At once," she told her father. must come at once. It is very important brother also must come."

Lalaji could hear the determination i voice and knew this was serious. If it had his wife or his sister, he would have lau and said, "I am coming home in the eve please have a good dinner ready for me." with Rani it was different.

"He is coming?" cried Phuphiji as so she got back. "And the son also is com Now we will see."

Om Prakash was very hot and very c Lalaji, too, was hot, but unlike his son he quite calm and even wore a tolerant smile which said, These women, we must h them sometimes. His calm radiated out the room, though it did not communica self to the women—they could not allow do that. Their case depended on the vigor heat with which they put it forward. Ye presence had a reassuring effect on th they were no longer helpless and alone.

But the frenzy had to be kept up, the ousness of the situation driven amply hon him. Phuphiji opened the chorus: " woman will tell the disgrace that has bef our family to all the world!"

"Even now she has gone to the hou Amar Nath and we will lose his son!"

"A Parsi!" cried Lalaji's wife. "This i worst, that she should disgrace us wi Parsi!"

"They go into public places," cried phiji, "and they dance! She dances—a da ter of our family!"

"This is what has happened because has been allowed to become eighteen years and no husband found for her!"

Om Prakash, though he understood tha this referred to Nimmi, could not piece th together. But Lalaji needed no further planation. The whole thing was as clear to as if it had been stated in a few precise tences: Nimmi had been seen with a P Shanta's mother had heard of it and had ta the news to the house of the director of Happy Hindustan Trading Company. It serious then. The smile had vanished an sat sunk in thought, picking his teeth.

Shanta told the whole story to her husba the others punctuated the recital with t own vehement comments. Om's face see to swell with rage. He jumped up and pa about the room for a while and then fronted his father. "Why did you not arra it?" he shouted. "Why did you sit and do n ing when this offer came to you? Now perh we have lost that contract forever."

"For months, for years we have been tel you," Phuphiji cried, "arrange for her, right and fitting!"

Om shouted, "A better offer we can n hope for! Is a contract of twenty-five la joke perhaps?"

"Sit down!" Lalaji suddenly roared. sat down. "All of you eating my life up!" laji said more calmly. "Let me think at lea

"Please think, Pitaji," Rani said. "Ple now, you must do something. I will not back to my husband's house till you h promised me that you will do something."

"What do you want me to do?"

She lost no time in patly replying, "The thing will be you send to this Amar Nath arrange with him. Please, Pitaji, send to h quickly, today, arrange with him."

"It may not be too late," said Om.

"And take the girl away from this colleg said Phuphiji through tight lips. "She m stay at home here with us and not move ou the women's quarter. Then we will hear more talk of Parsis."

Lalaji shrugged his shoulders and said etly, "Do as you like." The women looke one another and were triumphant.

But Lalaji was very unhappy. Because n after all, it had come to this: that he had give her in marriage, and quickly. There no other alternative, for to leave her un trothed now would be dangerous for the new Fashion Look for your bath... with prints that bloom on both sides!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 180

New beauty for your bath. Decorate it just as you do any other room in your house, with these fresh and charming printed towels. A great new fashion at a tiny price . . . Pacific's famous Supersorb® Terry printed on both sides in a whole new group of charming designs for every decor. Use hand towels for curtains at your window . . . use the extra-large bath sheets for shower curtains (with curtain clips and a plastic liner) and watch your bathroom come alive! Forest Lace shown right, Morning Glory, American Beauty, large bath sheet, 36″ x 78″, about $5, bath towel $1.49. Glorioso Daisy, Laurel Stripe, Fleur De Lis, big bath towel, $1.29. Hand towels and wash cloths too, all available at fine stores throughout the country.

Bathroom fixtures by Sherle Wagner

PACIFIC MILLS DOMESTICS CORP., Dept. PT 504, an affiliate of Wamsutta Mills, 1430 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

MR. & MRS. Steve Allen

lose weight together with Ayds!

Steve: "We take Ayds to take off weight."

Jayne: "Tell everyone why Ayds." (Mrs. Allen is the lovely Jayne Meadows.)

Steve: "Because delicious Ayds candy was proved the most effective. Ayds helps us lose weight the natural way."

Jayne: "And the private way, Steve. Right here in the comfort of our own home."

Steve: "About 15 minutes before each meal, we take one or two Ayds, as directed. Immediately, Ayds low-calorie appetite-depressant begins working."

Jayne: "Ayds vitamin and mineral candy supplies needed nutritional elements, too."

Steve: "When we're ready to eat, our hunger has faded. So we eat less."

Jayne: "And lose weight automatically. Tell everyone how we read about the Ayds Plan in a magazine article."

Steve: "It reported a test at a New England clinic. Ayds users lost nearly twice as many pounds as users of the next best weight-reducing product."

Jayne: "You can send for a reprint of Medical Journal report or, before reducing, ask your doctor to write: Campana, Box MD, Batavia, Illinois."

Steve: "That was fine, Jayne. How about dinner?"

Jayne: "How about Ayds?"

Take Ayds...
first aid for overweight!

A Campana Product

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 178

dangerous for them all. His heart was heavy, but he did not know whether he grieved more for her or for himself.

Viddi sauntered into the Rendezvous. True, it was dull and vulgar, but then he had nothing else to do. As soon as he came in, Zahir-ud-din stood up and waved to him. "Please sit," he said. "We have kept a place for you."

Bahwa sat with his heavy head supported on both hands. He said, "You did not come yesterday," in a manner that was at once despondent and accusing.

"Only fourteen people came to his play," Zahir-ud-din explained. "And the critic from the newspaper said very bad things about it."

"I will sue him," Bahwa groaned.

"But it was not a good play," Viddi said.

Bahwa raised his head and stared at him.

"There are too many characters in your drama," Viddi informed him. "And they all say too much and what they say is not real, it is not what people would say in real life. In a good play characters speak like people in real life. You should read classical plays like those by Sir James Barrie and Shaw. You would learn from them." He called the waiter and said, "Bring me one strawberry milk shake with ice cream."

Tivari looked at him and said, "Lately you have learned a lot about literature." Tivari was slightly drunk; his eyes looked sodden and his mouth hung loose. Viddi allowed himself to be disgusted.

"Why did you not bring your father to my play?" Bahwa said. "He would have appreciated it."

"Why should he like bad drama?" Viddi said. "Let Bahwa write a good drama, then I will bring my father."

"Remember," said Zahir-ud-din, "you promised to be our patron. A patron must always give encouragement and constructive criticism. It is his duty."

"How can I be a patron when I have only five hundred rupees a month?"

"That reminds me," said Tivari, patting the breast pocket of his shirt. "I have this for you." And he laid before Viddi a paper.

Viddi looked at it. It was a caterer's bill for supplying drinks, snacks, bearers, lights and glasses to a cocktail party on 24 October. Viddi looked only at the total: 762 rupees 4 annas. It was impossible. He could not pay so much money; he had no intention of paying it. He pushed the bill back toward Tivari and said, "Why do you give this to me?"

Tivari laughed. "Is not your name written on it?"

"It was not my party. You gave the party at your house. You invited all the guests and you did not even once tell them that I was the host. You did not even introduce me."

"We did introduce you," Zahir-ud-din said. "We introduced you to very many people. For instance, we introduced you to Kuku; he is a very useful man to know. His father is director of the Happy Hindustan Trading Company and he himself is also on the payroll of the company. He draws a very big salary."

"I do not care how much salary he draws," said Viddi, "or who his father is. Now I am in a hurry to go, because of an appointment for lunch."

"Please do not forget to take your bill," said Tivari.

Viddi, already on his feet, looked down at it lying on the table. Then he looked at Tivari. "There is a mistake," he said. "It is your bill."

"Well," said Tivari good-humoredly, "leave it then, if you think it is a mistake. The caterer will send you another bill. He is used to this, for there are many people like you who think bills are sent to them by mistake."

Though he left with a shrug, Viddi was worried. He had never had any bills made out to him before and knew of no technique to avoid payment. But he was quite determined to avoid it: Tivari could do what he liked, and the caterer could do what he liked, but he was not going to pay.

He thought, If only I could consult with someone; someone who has had more experience in these matters. And he thought of Kuku, but did not know where to find him. He strolled on, thinking hard, and only noticed that he had come full circle when he saw the Rendezvous again. Coming toward him was a cluster of businessmen, on their way to lunch. They were fat and merry and looked very successful. The doors of the Rendezvous swung open and swallowed them up, and Viddi heard a last burst of their rich laughter. Then he knew where to go.

The door of the office stood ajar; he peeped inside and saw that it was empty. Viddi pushed the door farther and saw Om Prakash sitting there behind his desk, his lunch on one chair, his feet put up to rest on another. Viddi sat down and said, "Where is Pitaji?"

Om scooped up a pile of vegetables, "Why do you want him? You know he does not like to be disturbed in business hours."

Viddi said, "When is it not his business hours?"

"If you want to ask him to send you to Europe, you need not speak with him. He will never send you. I will see to it myself. One England-returned brother is enough for me."

Viddi assumed a superior smile. He thought of his five hundred rupees a month and how he could save out of that for his study trip to Europe. One day, when he had saved enough, he would simply tell them, "Tomorrow I am going to Europe." Then Om would look with a different face. But thinking of his five hundred rupees brought a sharp reminder of the bill for 762 rupees, and his smile disappeared. "I have urgent business with Pitaji," he said.

S S S S S

Blaming your faults on your nature does not change the nature of your faults.

ANON.

S S S S S

"You can speak with me," said Om, licking the tips of all his fingers.

Viddi considered. Om would be just the person to know about a thing like this. Not as well as his father, of course; but still, he had been working with his father for many years now and must have learned a lot. "This is the thing ——" he said.

Om brought his lunch container to the table and said, "You have eaten?"

"No, and I am hungry." He plunged his hand in, while Om from the other side plunged in his.

"Enough to feed ten people she sends me every day," Om said. Shanta always prepared his lunch with her own hands and saw to it that it reached him punctually and hot.

"The thing is this," said Viddi, taking another mouthful of food. "A bill has come to me. A bill for a party."

"You gave a party?"

"No, I did not. This is what I want to tell you. Someone else gave the party and he invited people whom I do not like and now he wants me to pay the bill. He told the caterer to send the bill to me."

"He is a very wonderful man. A man of ideas. Tomorrow I will order three new suits to be made and I will tell the tailor to send the bill to my brother-in-law."

"What shall I do?"

"What would my brother-in-law do if such a bill came to him from my tailor? He would send it back and say, 'Are they my suits that I should pay for them?' "

"But this man will tell the caterer that it was I who gave the party. Then he will send me another bill."

"And then you will sit quiet."

"He will send me another."

"Again you will sit quiet."

"He will file a suit against me."

Om Prakash threw his head back and laughed. "Listen, brother, we know more about these things than any caterer. He will be very careful before he starts with us."

Viddi felt very comfortable. He had eaten well and his mind was at rest. He liked the way Om kept saying "we"; it gave him a sense of solidarity. The problem was no longer his alone but also that of his father and his brother. They stood behind him, they guarded him, and in their wisdom and experience they would see that no trouble came to him.

Viddi yawned and comfortably scratched his shoulder. He thought, Om has had much erience, it is good to have a brother like him.

said:
You know Pitaji gives me five hundred ees a month?"
m nodded. He knew that, and also that n the five hundred rupees would be in-sed to eight hundred, and that the busis of the sweepers' hutments was practically led. Only that morning Lalaji had spoken r the telephone with a clerk of the Works
e who was eager to serve him.
It is not very much," Viddi ventured. And ally was not very much. He needed money clothes, he needed money for membership club, he needed money for entertaining—ne son of his father he had to keep up a cerstandard of life.
Soon Pitaji will make it more," Om said also yawned.
He has said so?"
m, deeply immersed in his yawn, only
ded. But it was enough to make Viddi py. He would get more money, he would able to buy more things. One day soon, n he had made many fashionable friends, would give a really first-class party of his . Everybody would talk about the party he given. And since his allowance was to be eased soon, there was no need for him to t saving for his trip to Europe now; he ld start later. It was difficult—no, impossi-as he had already found—to save out of five hundred rupees.
Only stay here with us," Om said, "and will take care of you. All things will come ou."

he match was too good for them to raise difficulties. Lalaji had known it. If they heard that she had been seen with ten sis, still they would have been glad enough ave her: for such a prize was not to be had y day. They would talk about her, settle terms, there would be some haggling, but ybody would be very good-humored and complete agreement would be reached.
Raj was already in high good humor, and old one or two stories which Lalaji's clerk, bent over his ledgers, pretended not to hear. Lalaji's laugh came only from his throat.

"Listen," said Dev Raj at last. "I know how it is with you. Parting with a daughter is never easy." He trailed off, looking at Lalaji, who only nodded absently. "Listen," said Dev Raj, "we will do like this: we will have a picnic—they can meet at a picnic—soon it will be cool enough, we will go to Kutb or the river at Okhla or anywhere you choose."

"Yes," said Lalaji without enthusiasm, "we will have a picnic."

Left alone with his clerk, Lalaji sat cross-legged on the carpet and thought and sighed, "It is very hard for a father to part with his daughter."

This was the clerk's cue and he spoke up—he had it all ready—in his weak clear old voice. "It is written that a daughter is but a loan to her parents; when it is time for her to go to a husband's house, they must return this loan. This is written in the work of our great Sanskrit poet Kalidasa."

"True," sighed Lalaji, "it is true." Everything that was written was true, he knew it. But it was difficult to accept it into one's own life. He looked toward his clerk with envy, for here was a man who had steeped not only his mind in the wisdom of the Vedas and the Gita and all the old writings, but also his whole life. He was pure, withdrawn, detached. As he often quoted to Lalaji, "The Supreme Self of the self-subjugated and serene-minded is ever undisturbed in heat and cold, pleasure and pain, as well as in honor and dishonor"; which Lalaji translated to himself as "A wise man is indifferent whether he earns a salary of seventy-five rupees or seven hundred and fifty or seventy-five hundred a month." But then, Lalaji argued, it was easy to be serene and withdrawn on only seventy-five rupees a month. Easy, he bitterly told himself, to be without attachment if one had nothing to which to attach oneself. If a man had no prospect of ever earning seventy-five hundred rupees a month, he could say without pain that a wise man is indifferent whether he earns a salary of seventy-five rupees or seven hundred and fifty or seventy-five hundred a month. Had he been born without the nature of a rich man, Lalaji himself could have said so without pain. As perhaps he could also have said that a daughter is but a loan, if he had not had a daughter like Nimmi. All men wish in their hearts for wealth and for beautiful daughters; and yet, thought Lalaji, there is great sorrow both in wealth and in beautiful daughters. Since the one has to be kept up, and the other given away.

Nimmi looked at Rajen with eyes stretched wide. "And that is all he said?" She was not clear what she had hoped he would say, but it was certainly not this.

"Yes," Rajen said. "I went to him as you told me to ——"

Nimmi urged, "But what did you tell him?"

"I sat down beside him and he asked, 'Where is Nimmi?' "

"Yes?"

"And when I said, 'She has not come because her parents will not let her,' he asked me what I would like to drink. Oh, Nimmi, you know the boy with the spectacles—the one who goes with the one in the pink scarf—he was sitting very near and I think he was looking all the time and wondering what I was saying to Pheroze."

"But what did you say to Pheroze about me?"

"I told you," Rajen said impatiently. "I said, 'Nimmi is soon to be married, her family have arranged it for her.' "

"And he, what did he say?" For she wanted to hear it again; Rajen must have left something out in her first recital.

"He said, 'You must please congratulate her for me'—I told you—and then he called for another lime water and asked me was I sure I did not want to drink anything."

That really was all, then. She did not know what she had hoped for. She only knew that all her hopes had been centered on him.

"And he is not at all interesting to talk with," Rajen said. "Really, Nimmi, I do not know why you like him."

Nimmi was in no mood to defend him. She was hardly listening to what Rajen was saying. Now she admitted to herself that she had hoped that he would say, "I will not allow it; she must not marry anybody else." She found it hard to believe that he—he who had kissed her!—should be willing to lose her altogether; and harder still to believe that the escape she had been expecting almost confidently should after all be denied to her.

"I will tell you the truth," Rajen said coyly, scratching her fingernail along the table and looking down at it, smiling a little. "I left him so quickly because I thought the one with the spectacles would think Pheroze is my boy friend." She looked up and laughter trembled on her lips, spilled out of her eyes; but there was no response in Nimmi's face. "Oh, yes, and the one with the pink scarf was with him yesterday. Only he wore a blue scarf. And he also looked while I talked with Pheroze. I think perhaps he was asking himself, 'Where is Nimmi?' "

"He does not know my name," Nimmi said.

She thought of the young man in the pink scarf and wondered how it would have been if it had been he and not Pheroze who had taken her out dancing and had kissed her at Kutb. She asked herself whether he, too, on hearing the news of her impending marriage, would have sent her his congratulations.

"I think he is nicer than Pheroze, the one with the pink scarf," Rajen said. "Why did you not let him be your friend? Of course he is not so handsome as Pheroze, but he has more style and I am sure he knows how to make better conversation."

"I do not know what to do," Nimmi said, and tears came into her eyes.

"I wonder if he would be interested in Indira? Nimmi, do you think he would be interested in Indira, the one with the pink scarf?"

"There is no one to help me, and my family will not allow me to go out of the house. They would not let me come even here to college, until I said I would hunger-strike."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 183

NEW Chux®
DISPOSABLE
DIAPERS

Softer to wear,
yet never tear!

℞ Waterproof panty built right in!
℞ Medicated to prevent diaper rash!
℞ Absorbent as cloth diapers!
℞ Protective underpad—for nursery or sickroom!

MADE BY Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

CHIX BABY PRODUCTS DIV., Chicopee Mills, 47 Worth St., New York City

New treat for kids–Mom 'n Pop-ular, too–

SIPABANANA!

Mash a banana and shake with cold milk — banana milkshakes are extra-nourishing, and you'll love the flavor!

Bananas . . . wholesome—and then some!

Multi-sundae — crazy, mixed-up treat, loaded with health-giving fruits. Slice a banana over ice cream. Add what's handy: peaches maybe, or pineapple, or strawberries — fresh or frozen.

Banana crush. It's a refreshing drink, a satisfying snack. Just mash a banana with a fork and shake with cold, cold orange juice. Or do the whole job in your blender. To your good health!

I'm Chiquita Banana and I've come to tell
Of a new banana milkshake
You will think is swell.
There are loads of vitamins
In this new shake —
It's zesty and delicious and a cinch to make.
Serve 'em up when school is over . . .
Kids'll praise 'em to the sky — aye!
In a drink or peeled and eaten
Bananas' flavor can't be beaten.
And there's a hundred ways to fix 'em:
You can broil 'em, bake 'em, mix 'em
In a puddin'—
But any way you eat bananas
Is sure to be a good 'un!

To be sung to the tune of Chiquita Banana

UNITED FRUIT COMPANY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 181

"That is a good idea," Rajen said, her interest stirred. "Why don't you hunger-strike? Why do you not tell your family, 'If you arange this marriage I will kill myself by not ting'?"

"What do they care if I die?" Nimmi replied bitterly. "Even when I am lying there ying, still they will make a marriage for me, nce it is their wish."

"I think it is better to be dead than marry meone you do not want to marry."

Nimmi remembered how she had imagined erself jumping down from Kutb or throwing erself into the Jumna for love. Perhaps, after l, if everything else failed, she would have to that. "Yes," she said, "I think so too," and ore tears came into her eyes as she thought herself floating dead in the Jumna.

"Or why do you not run away from home?"

"But where can I ay if I run away from me?"

"You can go to stay a hotel. Only you ust not give your real me. Then if people ad your family's advertisement in the newsaper, nobody will ow it is you."

"I have no money to to a hotel, it is very stly."

"But you can get ork and earn money," ajen said on a new inpiration.

"What work can I do r which people will y me money?"

"Really, Nimmi," ajen said, quite anoyed, as who would t be to have all these rilliant suggestions untered in such humum fashion, "I did t think you had so litle spirit of adventure."

"It is easy enough talk," Nimmi said ith trembling lips, and en she burst outright to tears.

Rajen looked at her ncomfortably and ked, "You want a ndkerchief?"

Whereupon Nimmi ew out her own and bbed it against her es. "What can I do," e said, dabbing, when I have to marry d nowhere to go and one to help me? You can talk, but how es that help me? They will still make a marge for me, and I do not want—oh, I do not nt it."

Perhaps until now she had not fully underood herself how much, how completely she longed to her family. She had wondered w Usha could submit so meekly to the marge they had arranged for her; now she unrstood that there was nothing for it but to bmit. The independence on which she had prided herself, her differentness from the her women in her family, were only an illun. In reality her position was no different m Usha's and, ultimately, from Shanta's.

"Poor Nimmi," Rajen said and patted her nd, and after a while she said, "Will you me to the library? I have to speak with Inra to fix this evening's tennis program."

Kanta arranged her sari gracefully over her oulder and said, "It is finished now. Do not ink about it any more."

"I cannot help thinking about," Chandra id gloomily. "Even in the night I lie awake d think about it. But what else could I do!" cried.

"Nothing else, of course. Anybody in your sition would have had to do the same ing."

"If they find out, that will be no excuse."

She sat down rather quickly and said, "There is no chance of anyone finding out. You told me so yourself."

"I did not say there is no chance. I said it is not probable. But it is possible—everything is possible, especially in a government office, where so many records are kept and no one can tell when someone will not make a check of the records. Suddenly they will ask, 'Where is this letter?' "

"You told me yourself there is no chance ——"

"I did not tell you! I never told you so!"

"Please do not shout at me," she said, quiet and severe, which made him hold his head in his hands and reply in a weak voice, "I did not mean to shout at you, of course not, but my nerves—Kanta, the strain is terrible." She moved nearer to him and laid her hand soothingly on his knee. "Now, darling, let us sit quite quiet and you tell me everything."

"What can I tell you? You know everything," he told her. "It is only the worry that is eating me up." Limply he held out his hand for her to fondle and, as she did so, told her, "My nerves are so bad, this affair has made me quite ill."

"I know, darling," she said, cracking his finger joints, which always gave him pleasure. "You are so sensitive and also so honorable, you cannot bear to be involved in anything that is dishonest."

"I have done nothing that is dishonest," he said, not so much stating a fact as making an appeal to her.

"Of course not," she hastened to say, "nobody will ever say such a thing about you. It is only your father who has acted dishonestly. There are such people in the world," Kanta said with a resigned sigh. "If one has to have dealings with them, the only thing to do is to say yes to everything they want, otherwise God alone knows what they will do to you."

Chandra wanted to hear more; he hoped she would be able to convince him.

"They know you are a family man and that you had to do as your father said, because otherwise he would have ruined us all. They will understand that—everybody knows what kind of a man your father is."

"Yes," he said, and had to add reluctantly, "But you see what people think in private is not always what they think officially. In private they will know that I was not to blame, but officially, as public servants, they may think it is their duty to investigate the whole matter and then perhaps," and his face fell into deeply worried folds again, "there will be an official inquiry and my career ——"

"There will never be an official inquiry!" she cried.

"How can you know?"

"Darling," she said, "of course it is very bad that things are so and that a man like your father should have so much power through bribing people ——" She sighed and smoothed her sari over her lap, looking down at her hand as it smoothed.

Her idea very swiftly communicated itself to him. It made him almost a happy man, but he owed it to his conscience to look displeased. "It is true," he said in a voice which conveyed a gloom he did not feel. "He has much power, even in government circles, so if it should come

CONTINUED ON PAGE 185

MY DREAM WAS REAL

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

Come, kill our love, but let illusion live.
Do not destroy yourself as I believed you,
For if I dreamed too deep, if I believed you
Sum of all things the heart can ask or give;
If I declared you constant, though you roved;
Kind, though you hurt me; certain, though you faltered,
Say not that I was wrong, but that you altered—
Do not deny that image I so loved.
While we could trust, we mirrored each for each
A truer lie than ever truth could be,
Our faith made real each unreality,
Our hearts found heights no grounded feet could reach.

Then do not judge me blinded or deceived,
But swear my dream was real, while I believed.

grow with Jockey Jr.®
BRAND
underwear
made only by Cooper's®

Active, growing boys of all ages need the security and comfortable coverage of Jockey Jr. underwear. Specially designed for your boy's body and activity. Sitting, walking or running there's no gap, bind or chafe. That's because of the special long-lasting Jockey elastic in waistband and leg openings, and the same careful attention to trimness and comfort that's tailored into Jockey underwear for men.

Undershirt Briefs T-Shirt Midway

known the world over by this symbol ® Cooper's, Incorporated—Kenosha, Wis. Licensees and registered users: Canada: J. R. Moodie Company, Limited; Australia: Speedo Knitting Mills; British Isles: Lyle & Scott; New Zealand: Lane, Walker, Rudkin; Switzerland: Vollmoeller; France: Verdier; Colombia: Textiles, Ego; Italy: Sacit; Denmark: Taco; South Africa: Ninian & Lester; Germany: Volma; Austria: Josef Huber's Erben; Ireland: Dublin Shirt & Collar Company; Mexico: Rinbros, S.A.; Venezuela: HRH.

Give youngsters 12 gifts in one...

a subscription to JACK and JILL

The Better Magazine for Boys and Girls

For birthdays, holidays and surprise occasions . . . give boys and girls their very own magazine. JACK and JILL is a friend children welcome 12 times a year—even through the summer months! Each colorful issue is jam-packed with exciting stories, cutouts and games to bring many happy playtime hours. The puzzles and riddles are fun, too! It's so easy to order your JACK and JILL gifts. Just fill out and mail the coupon below. We'll send a special gift card signed in your name . . . and bill you later. Order today!

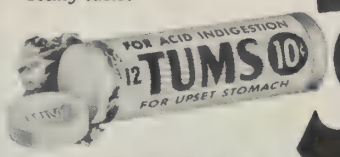
Prices (U. S., U. S. Possessions and Canada) 1 year—$3.50; 2 or more 1-year gifts from the same donor—$3 each.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTEE: The publishers agree, upon request direct from subscribers to their Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

JACK and JILL Dept. 7303 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Penna.

My name_____
Street or R.D._____
Town_____ Zone____ State_____
____Bill me. ____Payment enclosed.
Please send a JACK and JILL gift subscription to:
Name_____
Street or R.D._____
Town_____ Zone____ State_____
____Birthday. ____Just a gift.
Sign my gift card:_____

Additional subscriptions may be written on a separate card or paper.



A Curtis Magazine

Don't let your trip be spoiled by Acid Indigestion Heartburn Gas!

Carry TUMS Ideal Relief.. "People-Tested" by Satisfied Millions!

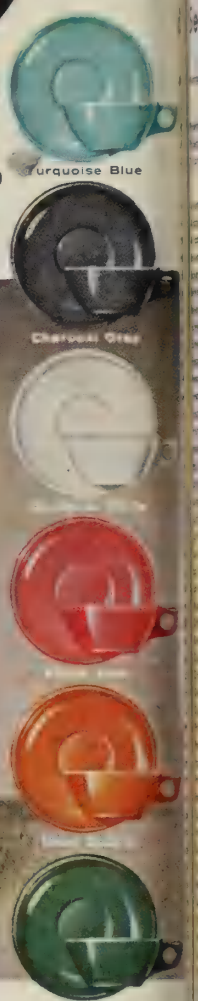
- TUMS work faster, safer, surer than soda or alkalizers . . . which may upset digestion, prolong discomfort.
- TUMS are ideal because they neutralize only the excess stomach acid . . . safely, instantly, wherever you are! And TUMS relief really lasts!

TUMS

FOR THE TUMMY

STILL ONLY 10¢ A ROLL, 3-ROLL PACK 25¢

Save Over Half! $1.00



cup'n saucer sale

for one month only made of beautiful, accident-proof MELMAC® yours at less than half-price...reg. ~~$2.30~~

(INCLUDES CUP & SAUCER)
price returns to full retail of $2.30 after May 14th

Companion Special! $1.00
Eight inch
Luncheon Plate reg. $1.60

Buy Both...Save $1.90
Complete Luncheon Place Setting
Cup, saucer and plate, only $2.00
(price goes back to $3.90 after May 14) world's most famous brand of MELMAC® with "OPEN STOCK" matching pieces for a complete table setting!

Everybody loves a bargain . . . and this one's fabulous! Imagine, both the cup and saucer of this luxurious new kind of dinnerware for only $1.00. We know you've heard about the wonders of Melmac. So beautiful, so lustrous. Yet so practical we dare you to break it! You see, it's one of the hardest man-made materials. And ROYALE • COLOR-FLYTE is the best known, quality brand of Melmac on the market. Surprise your family with this dramatic dinnerware tonight! Add the plate, and you have a perfect party setting for brunch, luncheon, bridge or snacks. 8 decorator colors to mix or match. And your store has a complete line of matching open stock pieces, too. Offer ends May 14, so hurry!

GUARANTEED ACCIDENT-PROOF won't break, crack or chip
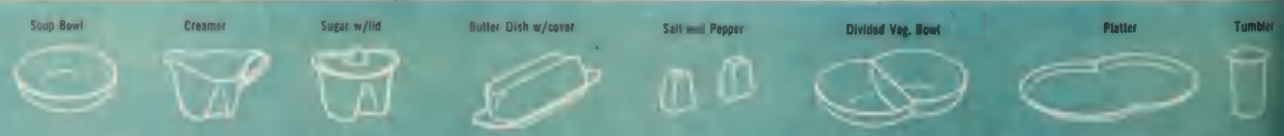
Every piece guaranteed for one full year against breaking, cracking, chipping.



Royale
Color-FLYTE
DINNERWARE
by BRANCHELL
world's largest producer of finest quality Melmac products.

Styled by Kaye LaMoyne

© 1957 • The Branchell Company, 4417 Oleatha, St. Louis 16, Mo.

Stock Up NOW!
More opportunity to buy this dramatic, durable new kind of dinnerware...
at a bargain price!

Plates, cups, saucers and all pieces shown above are available in "OPEN STOCK" at your favorite store!

Royale
Color-FLYTE
DINNERWARE
by BRANCHELL

$1.00 cup 'n saucer
SALE

ee these fine stores listed below:

ALABAMA
ntgomery, Montgomery Fair

ARIZONA
enix, Bostrom's enix, Korrick's son, Steinfeld's

CALIFORNIA
ambra, Butler Bros.
heim, Broadway Store
adia, Henshaw's Dept. Store ersfield, Malcolm-Brock Dept. Store ersfield, Weill's keley, Hink's
erly Hills, J. W. Robinson
eka, Brizard's eka, Buhne's sno, Walter Byde Co.
sno, Cooper's sno, Ennis China & Glass
sno, Fresno Ag
sno, J. C. Penney Co.
sno, West's lywood, Broadway Store
ewood, Butler Bros.
g Beach, Buffum's Dept. Store
g Beach, Walker's Dept. Store
Altos, Broadway Store
Angeles, Broadway Stores
Angeles, Coulter's Dept. Store
Angeles, J. W. Robinson Co.
desto, Turner's
kland, Breuner's
kland, Montgomery-Ward kland, J. C. Penney Co.
kland, B. Simon Co.
rario, Butler Bros.
rario, Nash's Dept. Store
ific Grove, Holman's orama City, Broadway Store
adena, Broadway Dept. Store adena, Bullock's
adena, Nash's Dept. Store
ramento, Dolan's ramento, Emigh's ramento, Hale's
ramento, Montgomery-Ward
ramento, Rhode's
Bernardino, The Harris Company
Diego, Walker-Scott Dept. Store
Francisco, Butler Bros.
Francisco, Chas. Brown & Son Francisco, City of Paris
Francisco, J. C. Penney Co.
Francisco, White House
Jose, L. Hart & Son
Mateo, Levy Bros.
ta Ana, Buffum's Dept. Store ta Barbara, Ott's Dept. Store ckton, Breuner's
ckton, Montgomery-Ward
lejo, Carithers
Nuys, Butler Bros.
stchester, Broadway Store
ittier, Henshaw's Dept. Store
ittier, Nash's

COLORADO
nver, Daniels & Fisher's nver, Denver Dry Goods Co.
nver, The May Co.

CONNECTICUT
dgeport, Howland Dry Goods
dgeport, Edw. Malley Co.
dgeport, D. M. Read Company
w Haven, Shartenberg's, Inc.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
shington, D. C., The Hecht Company

FLORIDA
Lauderdale, Burdine's, Inc.
cksonville, J. C. Penney Co.
ami, Burdine's, Inc.
ami, Jordan Marsh Dept. Store
lando, J. C. Penney Co.
Petersburg, Maas Brothers Dept. Store
st Palm Beach, Burdine's, Inc.

GEORGIA
lanta, Rich's
gusta, J. B. White's con, Dannenberg's
vannah, Levy's

IDAHO se, Falk's

ILLINOIS
cago, Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co.
cago, Marshall Field & Co.
oria, P. A. Bergner & Co.

INDIANA
lianapolis, L. S. Ayers & Co.
lianapolis, W. H. Block Company

IOWA
venport, M. L. Parker Co.
s Moines, Younker Bros. ux City, Martin's terloo, Black's

KANSAS
Topeka, Crosby Bros.
Wichita, Innes Dept. Store

KENTUCKY
Ashland, Marting's
Louisville, Stewart Dry Goods Company

LOUISIANA
Baton Rouge, Rosenfield's
New Orleans, D. H. Holmes Co.
New Orleans, Krause Company
New Orleans, Masion Blanche

MAINE
Day's Jewelry Stores
Portland, Porteous Mitchell & Braun

MARYLAND
Baltimore, The May Company

MASSACHUSETTS
Boston, Jordan Marsh Co.
Springfield, Carlisle Hardware Co.
Springfield, Forbes & Wallace
Worcester, Barnard Sumner and Putnam
Worcester, Denholm & McKay Company

MICHIGAN
Albion, Miller Jewelry
Ann Arbor, Daniel's Jewelry
Ann Arbor, Wm. Goodyear & Co.
Battle Creek, Miller's Jewelry
Dearborn, Montgomery-Ward
Detroit, Crowley, Milner & Co.
Detroit, Demery's, Inc.
Detroit, Federal Department Stores
Detroit, J. L. Hudson Co.
Detroit, Montgomery-Ward
Flint, Hubbard Hardware Co.
Flint, McLogan & Austin
Grand Rapids, Herpolscheimer Co.
Grand Rapids, Paul Steketee & Sons
Grand Rapids, The Wurzburg Co.
Hastings, Miller Jewelry
Jackson, Miller's Jewelry
Lansing, Daniel's Jewelry
Lansing, J. W. Knapp Co.
Monroe, Stadleman's
Mount Clemens, Priehs Department Store
Pontiac, Waite's Department Store
Port Huron, Sperry's Department Store
Royal Oak, Montgomery-Ward

MINNESOTA
Duluth, Duluth Glass Block
Mankato, Landkamer's Bros.
Minneapolis, Dayton Company
Minneapolis, Powers Dept. Store
Rochester, Dayton Company
St. Paul, The Emporium
St. Paul, Montgomery-Ward

MISSISSIPPI
Jackson, Kennington's

MISSOURI
Kansas City, Emery-Bird-Thayer
St. Louis, Famous-Barr Co.
St. Louis, Scruggs Vandervoort Barney

MONTANA
Billings, Hart-Albin
Great Falls, Duvall's

NEBRASKA
Lincoln, Gold's
Lincoln, Miller & Paine
Omaha, Orchard & Wilhelm Co.

NEVADA
Reno, Gray, Reid & Wright
Reno, Home Furniture
Reno, Reno Mercantile

NEW JERSEY
Newark, L. Bambergers
Patterson, Meyer Bros.

NEW MEXICO
Albuquerque, Fedway Stores

NEW YORK
Lincoln Stores
Albany, John G. Myers Company
Buffalo, Adam, Meldrum & Anderson
Buffalo, J. N. Adams
Danbury, Genung's
Elmira, S. F. Iszard Company
Jamaica, B. Gertz
Long Island, B. Gertz
Long Island, Gimbel's
Long Island, R. H. Macy
Mt. Vernon, Genung's
New York, Gimbel's
New York, R. H. Macy
Niagara Falls, Jenss Brothers
Peekskill, Genung's
Plattsburgh, Sharron's
Poughkeepsie, Taub's
Rochester, E. W. Edwards & Son
Rochester, Sibley, Lindsay & Curr
Saugerties, Kelly's
Syracuse, C. E. Chapell & Sons Dept. Store
Syracuse, E. W. Edwards & Son
Tonawanda, Twin-Ton Department Store
Troy, Denby's
Troy, William Frear's & Co.
Utica, Berger's Dept. Store
Westchester, Gimbel's
White Plains, Genung's
Yonkers, Genung's

NORTH CAROLINA
Charlotte, Belk's
Raleigh, Belk's
Wilmington, Belk's

NORTH DAKOTA
Bismarck, A. W. Lucas Co
Grand Forks, Norby's Dept. Store
Minot, Ellison's Dept. Store

OHIO
Akron, M. O'Neil Company
Cincinnati, H & S Pogue Co.
Cincinnati, The John Shillito Co.
Cleveland, Halle Bros.
Cleveland, Higbee Company
Cleveland, May Company
Columbus, F & R Lazarus Co.
Columbus, Moorehouse Fashions
Dayton, Denton's, Inc.
Dayton, Home Store
Dayton, Rike Kumler
Toledo, LaSalle Koch
Youngstown, Strauss-Herschberg

OKLAHOMA
Oklahoma City, John A. Brown Co.
Tulsa, Froug's

OREGON
Eugene, The Bon Marche
Portland, Lipman-Wolfe & Co.
Portland, Meier & Frank Co.
Portland, Olds & King
Portland, Roberts Bros.
Salem, Meier & Frank Co.
Salem, Roberts Bros.

PENNSYLVANIA
Allentown, Hess Brothers
Altoona, Gables Dept. Store
Butler, Troutman's
Erie, Boston Store
Greensburg, Troutman's
Lancaster, Garvin's
McKeesport, The Famous
Philadelphia, John Wanamaker
Pittsburgh, Gimbel's
Pittsburgh, Kaufmann's
Pittsburgh, Rosenbaum's
Wilkes-Barre, Fowler, Dick & Walker
Wilkes-Barre, Lazarus Store

RHODE ISLAND
Providence, City Hall Hardware Co.
Providence, Outlet Company
Providence, Shepard Company

SOUTH CAROLINA
Charleston, Condon's
Columbia, Belk's

SOUTH DAKOTA
Sioux Falls, Shriver's, Inc.

TENNESSEE
Knoxville, Rich's
Memphis, John Gerber Company
Memphis, Lowenstein's
Nashville, Gastner-Knott Dry Goods Co.

TEXAS
Amarillo, Bagot Hardware Co.
Austin, E. M. Scarbrough Co.
Dallas, Titche Goettinger Co.
El Paso, Popular Dry Goods Co.
Galveston, Plantowsky's
Houston, Joske's of Houston
San Antonio, Wolf & Marx Co.

UTAH
Ogden, The Bon Marche
Salt Lake City, Auerbach's
Salt Lake City, Z. C. M. I.

VERMONT
Middlebury, Midd-Way Shop

WASHINGTON
Seattle, The Bon Marche
Seattle, Butler Bros.
Seattle, Rhodes of Seattle
Spokane, The Bon Marche
Spokane, The Crescent
Tacoma, Rhodes Dept. Store
Yakima, The Bon Marche

WEST VIRGINIA
Charleston, Coyle-Richardson
Huntington, Bradshaw-Diehl

WISCONSIN
Madison, Wolff, Kubly & Hirsig
Milwaukee, The Boston Store
Milwaukee, Gimbel Brothers

...and at many other retail stores in your area!

THE BRANCHELL COMPANY, 4417 OLEATHA AVE., ST. LOUIS 16, MO.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 183

to an inquiry —— Unfortunately, Kanta," he continued in a severe lecturing tone, "there are always officials, people in high places, who care more about money than about their duty and responsibility, and it is just these people who put so much power into Pitaji's hands."

"It is a terrible thing," she said. "Bribery and corruption." She laid her hand lightly on his shoulder. "Of course you and I and all the people we know are very much against it, but what can a few honest people do when it is so deeply rooted in political life?"

For the women of the three families—of Lalaji's, of Dev Raj's, of Amar Nath's—the picnic was no different from sitting home in their own courtyards. They thought of the food which was now being unpacked by the servants; they spoke of pregnancies and relatives. Lalaji's wife could not remember when she had felt so light of heart. There was still Viddi, but Lalaji had promised that he would provide for him; and besides, with a boy it was never of such great urgency. She had not felt so free from worry since her children had come to maturity.

At a little distance from the women, the men joked and laughed together. It was always the same jokes they made, but they enjoyed them always with the same relish. Om slapped Viddi on the back and shouted, "Look at my little brother here! He has become a great sahib. Soon he will be such a big contractor, he will eat us all up!" and everybody laughed. Viddi also laughed; he felt himself to be a man and liked it that the others should feel it too. He had been most pleasantly surprised to find that Kuku was to be his brother-in-law. He thought, What times we will have together! and felt that now indeed he belonged to the world of clubs and parties. He poked Om in the ribs and said, "Soon I will teach my eldest brother what it is to be a great sahib!"

Lalaji was very pleased by this new accord between his eldest son and his youngest. This was how things should be between brothers. It filled him with a proud and pleasant glow. Altogether life seemed very good to him just now. He could hardly contain himself when he thought of the marriage he would make for his Nimmi. A hundred cooks and confectioners would be sitting in his house day and night to prepare for the feasting; six bands in red-and-gold uniforms to serenade the guests; Delhi drained of chickens and rice and spices and sugar and ghee; all traffic blocked by the cars bringing the guests; the women of the family in saris stiff with gold, bent under the weight of their jewelry; all the richest men in Delhi thronging to honor his daughter. And after the wedding—for he could not stop there—after she was married, he would make her life a paradise. She should have a motorcar of her own, every day a new sari, lacs' worth of jewelry, dozens of servants. At every step someone to attend her, every wish to be fulfilled before she had wished it. And when she went out, all the world should turn its head and ask, "Who is this queen?" to be answered, "She is the daughter of Lala Narayan Dass Verma." His eyes filled with tears as he thought of the happiness he would make for her.

Then he saw her. She came stepping out of the pavilion with the boy behind her. They sauntered over the plain, through the sunlight, he in his gaily flowered bush shirt, young and jaunty and curlyheaded, skipping as he walked, she slender and slight and very proud, in a pastel sari of pale green. Lalaji watched them and was very moved.

Kuku said, "You will see, we will have jolly times together." Nimmi's lips twitched irresistibly into the shadow of a smile; this was the only indication—and she tried hard to suppress it—that she was very happy. For it was almost as good as having a proposal of marriage; almost as good as choosing one's own husband. Of course Kuku did not ask her, "Will you marry me?" He only told her all the things they would do when they were married. But he looked so nice, so young, so charming—he was wearing a gaily flowered bush shirt and suède shoes—that it was quite easy to imagine they were young lovers and their marriage of their own choosing. And he told her, "Once I saw you at a wedding, and then I said to my father, 'If you must arrange marriage for me, then please arrange it with this girl only.'" Again Nimmi tried hard to control the twitching of her lips, and she gave a little tug at her sari to make it fall more gracefully round her feet.

He was leaning against a pillar of the pavilion, which was not really a pavilion but a mausoleum with three dateless gray stone tombs down the middle. He leaned there quite at his ease and smoked a cigarette through a holder. It was cool and dark inside, but through the pillars they could see the patches of sunlight. Their families sat in the distance, within the shadow of an old wall—they could see them framed between two pillars. They could not hear them talking, but from time to time a burst of a man's laughter or a woman's shrill command to a servant came across the sunlight. Kuku smoked and looked at her and smiled. He said, "You do not regret?"

She assumed a pout and replied, "I wanted to finish my college education."

"College!" he said. "What use is that to you? You will learn nothing there."

She could not help feeling that he was right. What, in the end, had she to do with English literature and John Keats? They did very well to pass away the time till one could begin to live in earnest, but beyond that there was nothing in them.

"And your Parsi friend?" Kuku asked and smiled again.

"Oh, that one," she said scornfully. "He is so boring, he does not know how to make conversation at all. Are you a member of the club?"

"Of course."

She tried to look indifferent; but she was jubilant. She would be, at last, a member of the club in her own right. She and her husband would drive up in their car, he sober in evening clothes, she gorgeous in sari and jewellery. They would dance in the ballroom and eat dinner on the lawn. Afterward they would go on to a night club and dance some more.

"And my father promised me," he said, "that after I am married he will let me go to Europe. We will go next year, we will go to England and also to the Continent and live in hotels."

Green parrots flew in and out of the sun and a gush of bright orange blossoms flowed down the length of the crumbling old wall. The sunlight was bright but gentle, winter sunshine full of the sound of the birds. In the distance, out on the barren plains, the broken flight of steps of a vanished palace led to nowhere. END

Everything is funny as long as it is happening to somebody else. WILL ROGERS

MRS. JOHN WEYLAND AND HER SON JOHN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 77

be emphasized or suppressed, how they arranged their draperies, and so on.

The survey complete, he returned to England and applied his formulas. His success was immediate. "Ladies," wrote a contemporary, "who wished to be transmuted into angels and gentlemen who wished to appear as heroes and statesmen" flocked to his fashionable studio and paid his soaring prices without a murmur. His procedure was invariable; he made six one hour appointments a day, and it took four hours (arranged at the sitter's convenience) to paint a face.

How was it possible for an artist with such a cold-blooded approach to paint such warmhearted family groups with their charming grace and winning smiles? Surely he must have represented his own yearnings, for Sir Joshua, following yet another eighteenth-century theory about the freedom of the artist from domestic worries, remained a bachelor all his life. HEREWARD LESTER COOKE

"Heavens to Betsy, Betsy—why not do it the easy way with 'Lysol'?"

Betsy doesn't know that "Lysol" brand disinfectant added to suds saves scrubbing — makes Spring housecleaning easier. Gets into cracks and crannies. Deep cleans, deodorizes, disinfects. Protective action lasts 7 full days — 168 times longer than bleaches! Nothing else is as good! Use it regularly. Ask for the new handy-grip bottle!

Let Lysol Brand Disinfectant do the dirty work

Also available in Canada

The makers of RCA Whirlpool say

Calgon® solves washday problems!

The makers of RCA Whirlpool put a box of Calgon into every washer . . . and put an end to laundering trouble caused by water. No more yellowing or graying. Now, no stubborn film forms when soaps, detergents and soil meet minerals in the water. Only water-conditioning Calgon chases film for keeps—and oh, the beautiful difference in your clothes. Try Calgon!

The makers of RCA Whirlpool and other leading washer manufacturers place Calgon in their machines. Fabric makers recommend it too. Fine for Orlon, nylon and Dacron.
Try Calgon in the silver-and-blue box today for laundry, kitchen and bath.

Calgon Company • Pittsburgh, Pa

TASTE OF SPRING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 99

slits in the fat—but not too deep. Then insert little slivers of garlic in the slits, using not more than 1 large or 2 small garlic buds. Mix together 1 teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon powdered rosemary, and anoint the lamb withal. If you wish to use a meat thermometer, remember that this modern marvel should not rest on the bone, but should nonetheless reach the center of the roast. Roast in a slow oven, 300° F. Remove when the meat thermometer registers 180° F. Or roast 30 to 35 minutes per pound. With this method, drippings will be few and far between—all the precious juice remains inside—which brings us to our caper sauce.

But before we leave the object of our affections—and we have grown inordinately hungry for this leg of lamb merely by describing it to you—we conjure you to add buttered bouncing new potatoes to the platter. Allow a baker's dozen or so for six people, and be sure to peel a riband ½" wide around the center of each one before cooking them in salted water.

And now to cut a new caper. (A caper, by the way, is a plant that grows wild in the Mediterranean countries. And like all good things cut off before their prime, capers preserve a special vernal quality even in their customary pickled state.)

CAPER SAUCE

Add 1 teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon sugar and ½ teaspoon salt to 2 unbeaten egg yolks. Beat together, using either a rotary beater or a silver fork. It doesn't really have to be a silver fork, but it's a pretty idea. If you use a fork, always beat in the same direction. Gradually add ½ cup salad oil to the egg-yolk mixture, drop by drop; continue beating until thick and creamy. Finally beat in 3 tablespoons lemon juice. Chill. Just before serving, add 3 tablespoons coarsely chopped capers, 2 teaspoons finely chopped pimiento, 1 teaspoon onion juice, and 1 tablespoon juice from the capers. This makes about ¾ cup of sauce.

Asparagus is really a lily: first cousin to lily of the valley, in fact. More importantly, it is one of the great delicacies of the gustatorial year. Robert Louis Stevenson could barely refrain, each spring, from rushing out into his "linnet-haunted" garden to make a feast on asparagus alone. On the whole, however, we think you can make do with three pounds for six. Cook only until tender, and serve it glistening with butter and paper-thin lemon slices.

As for dessert—first of all, we must confess that a peach is a peach, and a good thing it is too. The very word itself has become—and quite rightly—synonymous with excellence. Of such is our

PEACH DEVONSHIRE PIE

Prepare 1 nine-inch graham-cracker pie shell, using your favorite recipe or the packaged variety. Drain 1 No. 2 can cling peaches, saving the sirup. Scald ½ cup milk, to which 1 envelope unflavored gelatin and 2 tablespoons sugar have been added. Beat 2 egg yolks slightly. Gradually add the milk-gelatin-sugar mixture to the yolks. Pour into the top of a double boiler and cook, stirring calmly and constantly, until it coats the spoon—in about 10 minutes. Remove from the heat and stir in ½ can frozen orange-juice concentrate, ¼ cup sirup from the peaches and ¼ teaspoon almond extract. Set ½ cup peaches aside for a garnish. Coarsely chop the rest and stir into the gelatin mixture. Cool until thickened. Stir in ½ cup commerical sour cream and 1 teaspoon lemon juice. Beat 2 egg whites until stiff with ¼ teaspoon salt, and gradually beat in 1 tablespoon sugar to make a silky meringue. Fold into the peach mixture. Then spoon the filling into the pie shell. Chill and garnish with spoonfuls of sour cream and peach slices.

After such pleasures, we sense again the eternal, peaceful and pastoral scene that recreates itself each year anew. We are not as far as we might think from the world of Robert Herrick, who summed it up for once and all:

I sing of Brooks, of Blossoms, Birds and Bowers:
Of April, May, of June and July-Flowers.

I sing of times trans-shifting, and I write
How roses first came Red, and Lillies White.

I sing (and ever shall)
Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all.

END

"We're not trying to talk you out of going to college, but your mother and I had dreams of you in an unskilled job where you make loads of money."

Really new taste discovery!

IMPERIAL-REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

imperial

has real natural taste!

The instant you taste it, you know. Imperial has real natural taste. And natural aroma, too. On toast or muffins, melting over hot vegetables—any way you use it, Lever Brothers Company guarantees complete satisfaction (or your purchase price refunded). Imperial costs a little more, but adds so much more to your enjoyment of good food. Serve Imperial—always in good taste.

P.S. To keep it fresh, always keep it refrigerated.

CLEAN CLEAR THROUGH

—and Deodorized Too!

THAT'S A FAB WASH!

DAZZLING WHITE, OF COURSE, BUT SOMETHING MORE . . . Your FAB wash gives you a glorious bonus . . . it's deodorized! Clothes washed with old-fashioned products may look clean, but may actually have hidden dirt left in them. But modern FAB washes clothes clean clear through . . . not just bleached white or blued white. And FAB's deodorizing action leaves everything you wash the freshest possible.

It's as if suds and sunlight had pierced through and cleansed every single thread in the fabric. FAB-washed clothes . . . FAB-washed towels . . . FAB-washed bed linens are fresh and sweet-smelling because they're really washed, not just whitened. So let your next wash be clean clear through—and deodorized, too. That's your FAB wash.

FAB Is The Hard-Working,
Heavy-Duty Detergent
For The Whole Family Wash
... And Dishes, Of Course!

California, Here We Come!

From St. Louis to San Francisco with our not-quite-3-year-old, driving by day, pitching camp at night, combining the mountain glories of the West with dress-up fun in the big cities—we did it camping and visiting relatives in 22 days, on a budget of $15 a day for the three of us.

By JIM WORTMAN as told to Neal G. Stuart
Photographs by the Author

When I was a boy in St. Louis my father used to take my mother and my brother and sister and me out camping in Missouri state parks. My father didn't fish and he didn't hunt; the sportiest gear he took along was a copy of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam, regarded in those days as an exciting new book, to read aloud under the trees. He just liked the out-of-doors.

So I was bitten early, and the responsibility for encouraging camping in my family must rest with me. In the beginning it received absolutely no encouragement from my wife, Gloria. I would like everyone to know that Gloria has many, many assets, including important ones of sweetness and looks, but she had never camped in her life at the time of our marriage in 1947. Furthermore, camping didn't sound at all interesting to her. Her attitude was summed up in two unanswerable words: "No bathrooms!"

About three months after our June wedding I persuaded her to give it a try one weekend, but our first night out she wandered alone in the dark ("feeling all shivery *any*way," she says) and bumped into a cow. The experience jarred her so that we didn't try camping again until two years later.

In 1949 I tried diplomacy. It was our vacation, and I chose a trip to Devils Lake, Wisconsin, because I knew there was a place to dance right across the road from the park. I further baited her with a stop in Chicago to visit friends. The camping was a great success. Gloria discovered that our system of parks can provide a beautiful setting in the open air, at a low cost, with a minimum of "roughing" it. The park had hot showers; in the evenings we could dress up and dance if we wanted to. There were no cows. And Gloria began to succumb to the charms of living out-of-doors.

She says helplessly now, "I don't know how I got involved. It just comes. You suddenly realize that the fun of it overbalances everything else." And as her enjoyment grew we both became more serious about one feature of camping that can't escape the dullest eye: anyone who likes to travel, as we do, can go farther and see more on much less if he is willing to camp along the way.

For example, the first two summers of our marriage, in 1947 and 1948, I tacked on my two weeks' vacation to the end of my required two weeks' annual maneuvers as a reserve pilot in the marines. In those years our St. Louis squadron went to CONTINUED ON PAGE 191

NOW AMERICA LIVES

Meet Jim, Gloria and Mary Wortman

loria and Jim Wortman grew up on the same street St. Louis, Missouri, but when Jim was in high hool Gloria, four years younger, was a kid in short esses, and if they passed in the street neither of them ticed it.

Jim was a Marine Corps pilot during World War II, d when he came home from the South Pacific in 1945 e had been shot down, saved at sea, and awarded ven Air Medals and a Distinguished Flying Cross) e of his first discoveries was Gloria, now 20 and well rth noticing.

They were married in June, 1947, right after Gloria's aduation from Fontbonne College in St. Louis as a me-economics major. Jim had taken some extra art dy at St. Louis' Washington University, and was th the Gardner Advertising Company, where he is w an art director.

Their married life s interrupted in 50, when Jim was called to active duty

Jim, Gloria and Mary have camped weekends since California trip. Mary is now veteran nearing 4.

Korea. There blond, iet-spoken, art-lov- Jim received his hth Air Medal and old star and citation ieu of a second DFC.

Home again in 1952, he and Gloria bought their nch-style house in the attractive subdivision of estwood, outside St. Louis. In 1953 their daughter ary was born.

Gloria used to do some modeling, and she still gets lls from time to time. They usually find her dressed in ns, in the act of putting something in the oven, and e always turns them down. "I haven't got the figure the posture any more," she says. "I'm just a housewife d mother, and that's the way I want it." Anyone else uld add that she still makes a beautiful housewife.

Jim used to model occasionally, too, but now, with mesticity and a mildly receding hair line, he is usuy at the other end of the camera. He brought two rgain cameras home with him from Japan (a 35 mm. d a twin-lens reflex), and since then has documented nily activities with literally hundreds of rolls of film. ice he and Mary are fond of each other, she is usually the picture somewhere. "Just call me a baby phographer," he says.

Gloria is a good cook and loves to sew. Jim's other bbies are golf and—oh yes, camping.

We entered Fantasyland...

We were more interested in scenic sights (free) than in tourist spots (expensive), but we couldn't skip Disneyland. We ran through $5 in three hours there, found it a picture-taking man's heaven, saw only part of the huge grounds. Mary found it a little bewildering.

Laguna was special for us...

This is the view we had of our favorite town, Laguna Beach, from window of famous Victor Hugo restaurant. Gloria and I had honeymooned at Laguna the summer we were married, dinner there was one of trip's high lights. We found Southern California in early May breath-taking with spring.

Missouri girl meets ocean...

Sand on the food, sand on the tent floor, but we didn't mind because we were seeing some of the magnificent Pacific Coast beaches for the first time. California has many parks along the coast; we found campsites to choose from in the spring. Warning to summer travelers: in season, it's first come, first served.

You can go farther and see more for so much less if you camp...

Housekeeping was light...

Canned dinners, steaks, hamburgers, plus family teamwork, kept housekeeping light. Mary's job was picking up litter.

We stopped when we felt like it...

Our trip up the coast to San Francisco was made at half our usual speed because we dawdled along the way, lunched on beaches, pulled up and stopped when the view was something special. This is Pigeon Light on Point Sur. We saw sea lions, big ships going by, and sheer cliffs with surf thundering below.

My camera made me a family nuisance...

This is probably the most photographed tree in the world. It is on a spectacular bit of coast between Carmel and Pacific Grove, and when we came to it, naturally I had to get out and take its picture. Film was one of the big frills on our budget, and Gloria and Mary got used to my cry of "Hold it!" But to us the record is worth every penny.

Spanish mission, 1786...

This is the mission in Santa Barbara; generations of Indian women doing family laundry at the fountain have worn the stone smooth. Gloria and I fell in love with color and charm of old Spanish towns we passed through on our coast drive from Los Angeles to San Francisco.

Mary took morning and afternoon naps in the car, found each new park a treasure of streams and stones and fellow campers. The things she will remember longest: the ocean, and all going to bed together in our tent.

Mary made a wonderful camper...

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 189 El Toro Marine Air Station in Southern California. Gloria came out, too, rented a cottage in nearby Laguna Beach, and each year we had a memorable month in an idyllic setting, with some side trips by motel and restaurant. Cost: around $700 each year, supportable because we were neither parents nor householders yet, and got along in a little flat in St. Louis.

The development of our camping was interrupted by two years in Korea. When I returned in 1952 we acquired a house, and in June of 1953 our daughter, Mary, arrived. By 1954 our vacations would have to cost less—a lot less. And yet we were incurably romantic about California, and there was a lot of the state we had yet to explore.

Camping, of course, was our answer, and last year we managed it, with Mary, then a month and a half short of three, as an enthusiastic partner. We had three weeks, which we took in the spring, driving 5816 miles through seven states at such a low cost that we were able to splurge a little on restaurant meals and sight-seeing during five days in Los Angeles and three days in San Francisco. Our trip included high life and camping life, seeing friends and seeing sights. We spent $333.32 in twenty-two days, or $15.15 a day. And this included the frills we wanted, such as $20 worth of camera film and three days in a motor court in San Francisco. Minus frills, our basic costs for gas and groceries, tolls and small miscellaneous items amounted to $214.23, or slightly less than $9.75 a day.

You'll notice that it took us two years before we were ready to say "This year let's camp in California." Camping equipment is an CONTINUED ON PAGE 192

WHAT WE SPENT

Basic

Gas and oil for car	$148.35
Groceries and ice	43.52
Miscellaneous	18.86
Tolls (road and camp)	3.50
	$214.23

Frills

Film	$ 19.02
Tourist cabin (rain!)	6.50
Presents for us	5.55
Presents for others	18.80
	$ 49.87

The Big Cities

Los Angeles	$ 32.32
San Francisco	36.90
	$ 69.22
Grand Total	$333.32

We were gone 22 days, drove 5816 miles. Our food expenses, not counting a few meals out in Los Angeles and San Francisco, were almost exactly $2.00 a day. Our car expenses averaged 2.5 cents a mile in cash (average cost of gasoline, 36 cents a gallon; average miles per gallon, 14.8). Luckily, we had no repairs.

OUR CHECK LIST AND HOW WE PACKED IT

On roof luggage rack

Suitcases (1 each);
tent, with mosquito bar, poles, small rug and toy broom rolled up inside;
camp stove; gasoline can; coal-oil lamp;
raincoats and rubber boots.

In station wagon

Mary's cot;
2 air mattresses and pump; pillows;
3 camp chairs, 1 junior chair;
grocery box (see below); icebox (see below);
cook kit, including table utensils;
water can (5 gal.); cosmetic case (see below);
parachute bag (see below);
large zipper diaper bag (see below);
dishpan; washbasin;
tools (ax, nails, saw, machete knife);
camera equipment; rags (for damp wiping);
old newspapers (for dry wiping);
Mary's potty; garment bag.

In grocery box

2-day supply of canned goods, No. 2 cans;
bread, fresh fruit;
staples (sugar, mustard, etc.) in small containers;
plastic salt and pepper shakers with lids;
nested plastic refrigerator dishes with lids;
plastic drinking cups.

COOKING UTENSILS:
Spatula; drain spoon; wooden spoon; paring knife; can and bottle opener; kitchen scissors; carving knife; egg beater.

Quart vacuum bottle;
waxed-paper bags (for garbage and litter);
paper napkins; paper towels;
plastic wrap; aluminum foil;
dishcloth; dish towels.

In icebox

Milk; butter; fruit juice.

In cosmetic case

Face cloths; soap; mirror;
toothbrushes, hairbrushes;
toiletries (tooth paste, shaving kit, shampoo, etc.);
first-aid kit; sewing kit; alarm clock.

In diaper bag

Tissues (facial and toilet);
sunglasses; toys; children's books;
maps; insect bomb.

In parachute bag

6 wool service blankets;
3 cotton blankets (1 adult, 2 child's sizes);
tarpaulin; towels; bathing suits;
1 clean change of clothing for everybody;
2 dozen disposable diapers;
clothesline and clothespins;
duffel bag (for dirty laundry).

We headed for the Rockies...

This was our first view of Colorado's Chimney Rock, near Cortez, as we came over the state's southern border on our way north. In same area is Mesa Verde, 8000 feet high, where we camped after driving through breathtaking mountain passes. Ahead of us lay the Rockies.

Fishing, anyone?

We had three days in San Francisco, and of course they included a lunch at Fisherman's Wharf. We also visited Chinatown, shopped, took Mary for a ride on the sole surviving cable car. We had our own tourist court with view of Bay Bridge and kitchen, so expenses were not high.

THINGS WE ADD FOR NEARBY CAMPING IN ONE SPOT

Deck chairs: traveling iron: shoe-polishing kit: cast-iron skillet; cooler (for pop): gasoline lamp (brighter than coal oil): playing cards and books (in case it rains): portable radio.

Suitcase-table (a special, but very useful piece of camping equipment; we don't own one, but our best camping friends do).

WHERE TO WRITE FOR INFORMATION ON CAMP SITES . . .

In national forests: Forest Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C., for their booklet, National-Forest Vacations.

In national parks: National Park Service, U.S. Department of Interior, Washington, D.C., for booklet, Camping Facilities in the National Park System, and handsome large-scale Map of National Parks.

In state parks: the names of state agencies in charge of parks vary from state to state, but the National Park Service's Map of National Parks lists all the correct state addresses on its reverse side. Watch out! The states will deluge you with information.

PRACTICE MAKES PERFECT

Anyone who goes off into the wilderness without having planned, prepared and gone on earlier camping trips is asking for trouble. It takes practice to . . .

Draw up a final and satisfactory check list. If you go without a check list you are sure to forget something.

Find out how much clothing you as an individual require to keep warm.

Learn how to use a camp stove.

Feel at ease at night in the out-of-doors.

TAKE GLORIA'S WORD FOR IT . . .

The many kinds of canned main dishes on the market are delicious, and just right for camp menus.

You will save not only space but weight if you stick to small sizes of things, tubes instead of jars and bottles, dehydrated mixes wherever possible.

A shallow open box for groceries is more convenient than a deep one, because you can see what's in it and pull things out of it more easily. Ours is wooden, and Jim bored holes and put stout rope handles at each end. I stand tall things, such as a roll of paper towels, on end. I leave my long-handled utensils till last, then stick them vertically in the cracks, handles up in the air.

A sweat shirt will be more useful to you than a wool sweater, but take both.

If you buy a frozen cake at 3 P.M. it will be thawed in time for dinner, fresh for all the next day.

Bread can be toasted on a gas cookstove by holding it on a fork directly over the flame. Gas burns blue and clean and will not smoke the toast. The toast will be darker than usual outside, but soft inside.

I use aluminum foil by the ream for camp cooking, and plastic wrap for storage.

Most cereal companies put out kits of ten small-sized cereal boxes especially packaged for eating right out of the box.

The tail gate of a station wagon makes a fine luncheon table.

We have a family rule: no shoes in the tent. A child's toy broom is handier to sweep out a tent floor with than a whisk broom.

Children under 3 are often upset by changes in the mineral content of water, which has nothing to do with its cleanliness. A 5-gallon can of home water will solve the problem.

Any clear water is safe after it has been boiled for 20 minutes. River-water coffee is delicious. Extra plastic cups are nice. The aluminum cups provided in most cook kits are too hot to hold when filled with hot fluids.

A bag for litter in the car is a must. If we lunched where there were no trash cans, Jim buried our garbage after flattening the cans.

Most state roadside picnic sites do not have water, and consequently do have sticky picnic tables. We carried wiping rags and a supply of old newspapers for dry wiping. Newspaper also makes a wonderful windshield wiper.

We took a peek at frontier architecture . . .

Three days in Colorado were enough to make us want to come back another year for a longer stay. This picture was taken in Buena Vista, a little town high in the Rockies that still has many of the frame houses of early mining days. When Mary saw it she said, "Why can't we have a pretty red house too?" We found both snow and lilacs.

So many places to come back to another year . . .

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 191 investment that pays off over many years, but the initial cost is a lump that has to be swallowed before you can even begin, unless you are a tireless borrower. We spent our 1954 vacation money on equipment and on weekend expeditions to Missouri state parks (Mary is blessed with two sets of grandparents in St. Louis, so we did not try to take her as a baby). A tent and bedding for three, our camp stove, cook kit, coal-oil lamp, icebox and water can cost us about $200. I think the ordinary-sized family would have to go out of its way to get the costs above $250, for most of the things one takes along (from a vacuum bottle to pillows) are things most households have already. An adequate tent can be had for as little as $50 (ours cost $100), and one should allow about $20 a person for bedding that will be satisfactory in all weather. These two items—shelter and bedding—make up most of the initial cost. CONTINUED ON PAGE 195

Mary met a real live Indian . . .

Camilio Tafoya, whose forebears were basket weavers and planters rather than hunters, is glad to play host at the Garden of the Gods, near Colorado Springs. He looks fierce, but he loves to have his picture taken. At this point in our trip, Mary had stopped being suprised at anything.

In all, half a continent, nearly 6000 miles . . .

This is a backward look at the Garden of the Gods, a region of red, surrealist sandstone formations at the edge of the Rockies, with Pikes Peak towering a few miles to the west. It was the last of our big scenery. Here our road descended to Eastern Colorado, the plains of Kansas. Destination: home.

What could be sweeter and fresher than milk right out of the bottle?

Cool, clean, pure—a bottle of milk is as welcome as a beautiful morning. But looks are only part of it. There's also the plain fact that glass is so pure it can't possibly alter milk's own fresh, sweet flavor. Glass brings you nature's best food with all its natural goodness. Why not tell your dairy you want all the milk your family uses safely sealed in glass?

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK

Invest in fresh beauty for your table . . . and get

TWO 6-PC. PLACE SETTINGS FREE

IT'S A "DOUBLE DIVIDEND" WORTH $22!

A regular $97.50 service for 8 for the price of 6–$75.50 including chest

Whether you're a bride-to-be, or a knowing hostess longing for new silverware—now is the time to look into Community.* Not only will you get a complete 52-pc. service for 8 for the price of service for 6—but Community will add a wealth of warmth and sparkle to your home . . . as only fine silverware can!

Hurry though! Offer is good for a limited time only. See your jeweler or silverware department now! Choose from all five Community patterns, plus choice of blond- or mahogany-finish chest. Or, if you prefer, service may be purchased without the chest—in convenient buffet-drawer trays—for just $66.00 complete.

52-pc. service for 8 (including the two free place settings) consists of 16 teaspoons, 8 knives, 8 forks, 8 salad forks, 8 soup spoons, 2 serving spoons, butter knife and sugar spoon.

COMMUNITY

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

©1957 Oneida Ltd.

*TWILIGHT *SOUTH SEAS *WHITE ORCHID *MORNING STAR *CORONATION

*Trademarks of Oneida Ltd., Oneida, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 192

In 1955 we were ready to introduce Mary to amping. We took her to Indiana Dune State ark on Lake Michigan for two weeks, and ound that small children make natural campers. We camped weekends that summer, too often with friends), and became more sure of urselves every trip. We knew exactly what essentials to take, and what to add for our enyment or comfort. After we set out for our ake Michigan trip leaving the center tent ole behind (I had to go to a lumberyard and uy a long 2 x 2) I wrote down a permanent st of things to pack. We call it our check list, nd it has proved invaluable.

If novices ask us about camping, about the rmest bit of advice Gloria and I give them is: Don't go off on a long trip until you've been hrough several short ones first. It takes expeience to find where, for your family, fun ends nd inconvenience begins. It pays to take long the extras that keep it fun. Gloria likes o camp with a mirror, soap, lotions, and a bit f clothesline out back, and she's found that othing works so well as red flannel underear for keeping her arm at night. Early youts can make all he difference beween cold, damp isery and successul camping.

In 1955 we also aded in our car for station wagon, and guess with that step e hopelessly comitted ourselves to aking California. While it was still winer in 1956 I wrote o the states we were nterested in for tate-park informaon, and Gloria and began hashing over ur itinerary. High ghts of our trip ere to be Los Aneles (where we ould camp at one f the coastal parks outh of the city), the amous Pacific Coast ighway as far as an Francisco (U. S. oute 101 to Calirnia Highway 1), an Francisco itself, nd Montrose, Colrado, right near the ontinental Divide, here we had friends ho planned to camp with us a night or two.

D day was Saturday, April 28th. By then e had visited Mary's pediatrician, who had iven her her first two polio shots as an extra recaution, and had made only one special uggestion to us—that we spray her arms and gs with insect repellent once a day (it's the osquitoes he doesn't like). Our plans had hanged in only one respect: Gloria has an unt in Los Angeles who had offered us the ospitality of her apartment while we were here; we had accepted the invitation with lacrity and thanks.

We stayed up till midnight the night before, loria making intricate rearrangements in our tout old, lovable old open wooden grocery ox (handier than any number of wicker ampers with lids and dark depths), and I aking intricate rearrangements in the car. oading up for such a trip is like doing a Chiese puzzle, but you feel just fine when it all omes out—or, rather, goes in. We went to ed feeling just fine.

At 4 A.M. we were awakened by the sound f many voices singing "Happy vacation to ou" outside. This was a great joke on the art of friends who were returning from a parsh dance from which we had virtuously stayed ome. After their gay departure Gloria and I ound ourselves wide awake. We looked at ach other and said, "Well, why not?" And o, in the small hours, our vacation began.

Our early start that morning became a routine that we were to follow every morning that we broke camp, and because Mary is a first-rate sleeper it worked fine. In loading the night before, I had placed Mary's child-size canvas cot, with pad and blankets, right behind the front seat of the station wagon, running parallel to it. We had bought it for our Lake Michigan trip the year before, and I had fitted extensions on two legs so that they rested perfectly down beside the wheel wells in the back of the station wagon. It made a firm bed for Mary to nap on, and placed her right behind Gloria's head and mine. Underneath it was storage room and, in case Gloria and I had to sleep in the car, foot room for us.

Last thing before closing the house we carried Mary gently from her bed to the cot; she opened one eye and said, "Go see Aunt Ya-ya?" and closed it again the moment she hit her cot. It was 5 A.M., the moment of sunrise. We rolled down the driveway, picked up U. S. Route 66, which goes within a mile of our house, and headed west in the dawn.

Route 66 is the national highway which runs from Chicago to Los Angeles, and we put a good many miles behind us on the fine, empty road before Mary woke up at about 8 o'clock, and we stopped for breakfast.

People have sensitive views about breakfasts, I notice, so I won't push our system on anyone else, except to say that it enabled us to cover a lot of mileage in by far the best and most beautiful part of the day. I happen to be the kind who would rather wait awhile for breakfast than not. Gloria is the kind who reaches for that morning coffee fast. We settled this by keeping a vacuum bottle of hot coffee from the night before, and some kind of fresh fruit, on hand. As we made our dawn starts Gloria could pour herself a quick cup of coffee from the vacuum bottle, and nibble away at fruit in the car.

Another breakfast policy we stuck to while touring was to cut out the kind of bacon-and-eggs breakfast we love when we are camping in one place. Occasionally we bought eggs for hard boiling, but we did not try to carry fresh eggs with us. Our icebox was filled up with milk, butter and juice; and besides, we liked to get in most of our day's mileage by lunchtime so that we could relax in the afternoons, and we didn't want to fool around cooking an extra meal. Even Gloria got used to our simple breakfasts of cold cereal or coffeecake.

Our breakfast stop was the beginning of the day for Mary, who came down off her perch on the cot, was washed and dressed, and when we got started again was delighted to sit in the front seat with Gloria and me. Mary is one of the best riders I know. For one thing, she would obligingly take two naps a day in the car. But when awake, she was so charmed at being right in the thick of the family that she never got bored. We brought a small bag of toys along—a magic slate, blackboard and chalk, balloons, color books—and produced one each day. When time dragged, Gloria would read aloud to her or tell her a story.

We usually lunched between 12:30 and 1:00. If we couldn't find a roadside picnic area, we could always stop at any pretty spot and put down the tail gate of the car. At lunch that first day we noticed Oklahoma was in early leaf, although our yard at home had still been in its winter bareness that morning.

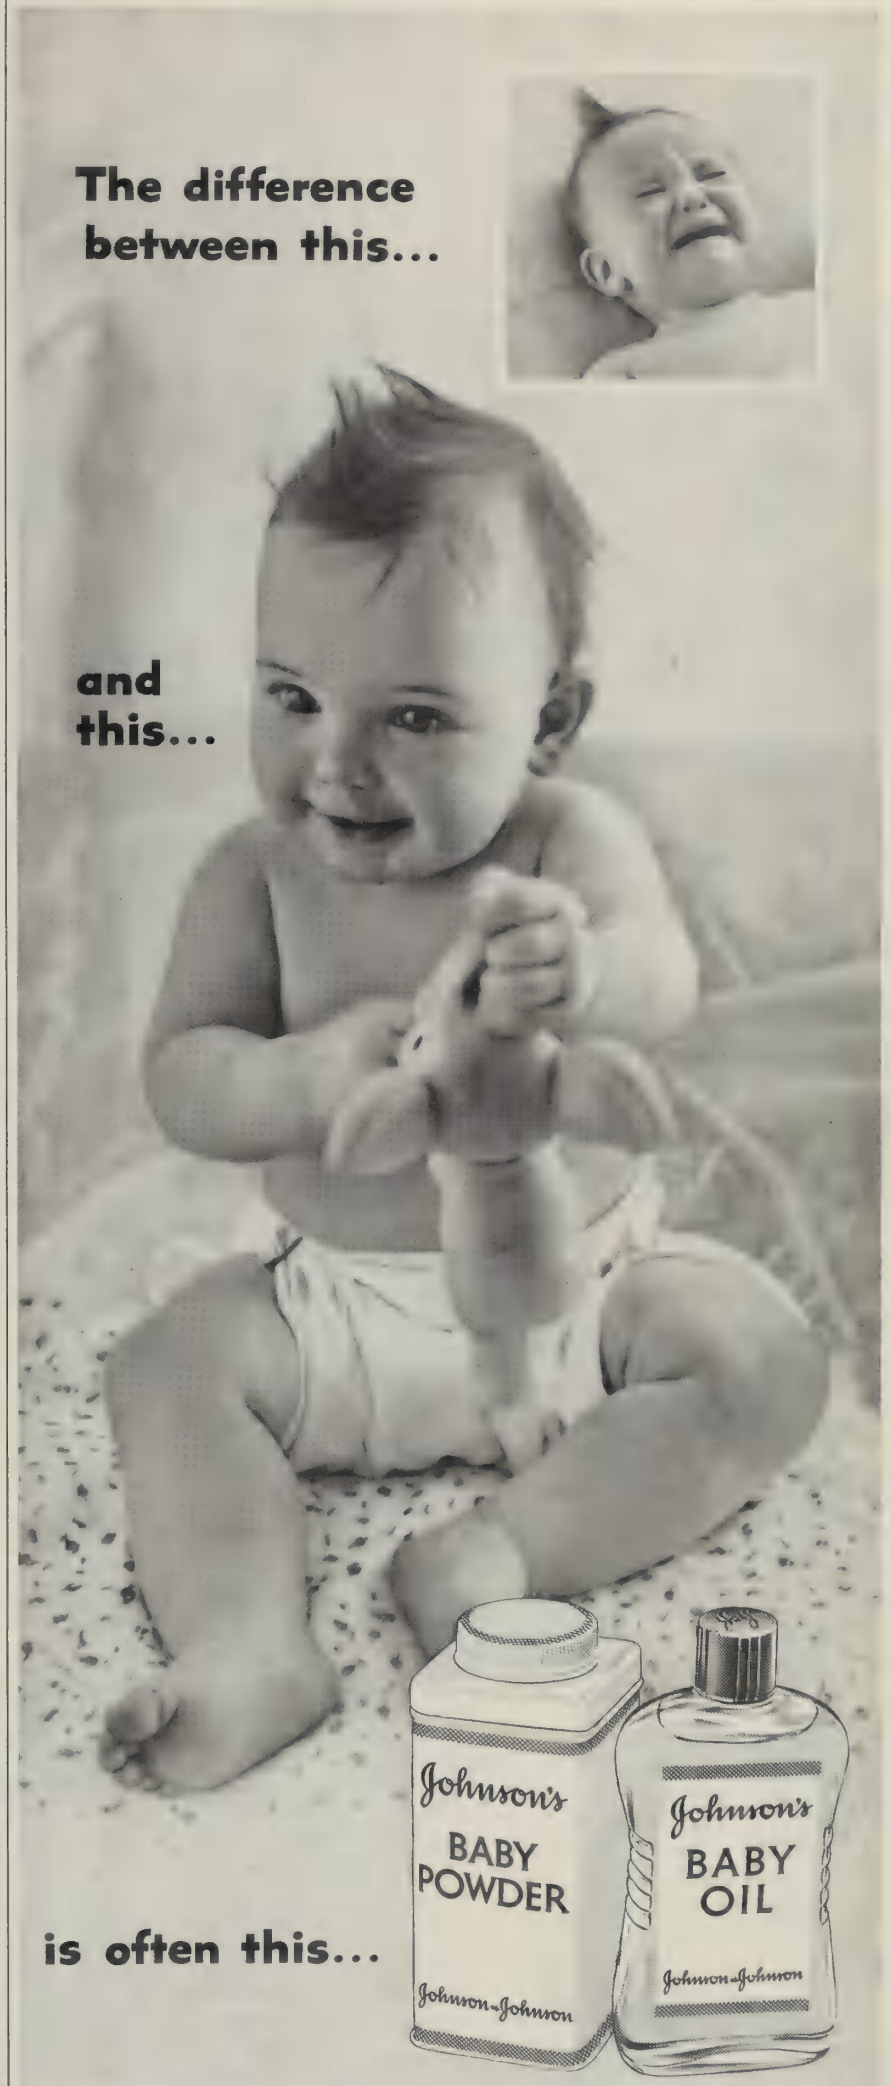
We called it a day when we reached Heyburn Lake Recreational Area (west of Tulsa)

NEXT MONTH

"WILL YOU HAVE ENOUGH MONEY WHEN YOU RETIRE?"

Robert Peterson suggests a step-by-step plan for your safety. And we ask four households what they did, find answers as varied as people.

"We pooled our resources"— In Basking Ridge, N.J., ex-news dealer Thomas Flynn and his wife share a home with married daughter and her family.



"I didn't want to retire"— In Tucson, Arizona, Hazel and Arthur Wales cut down from $35,000 a year to $300-$400 a month.

"I was laid off at 70"— In Rutland, Vt., Philip Dashner worked 50 years, was fired with $115 Social Security a month to stretch for two people.

"Everybody can do something" In Coral Gables, Fla., Petra Davis started earning a living at 60 by baby-sitting, sewing, renting a garage.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

In the June JOURNAL

CHAFE-GUARD your baby . . . with the powder that protects baby skin even when wet! It contains a special ingredient that neutralizes the irritants in diaper moisture.

SAFE-GUARD your baby . . . with the purest baby oil there is. It's specially blended with soothing lanolin to guard against irritation, cleanse delicate skin thoroughly yet gently.

Millions of women can reassure you

Millions of women have used billions and billions and billions of Tampax since the day it was first invented by a doctor—over twenty years ago.

For every one of these women there was a "first time." Many may have shared your doubts about the product; many may have thought Tampax® internal sanitary protection would be difficult to use.

Yet really the most delightful discovery to be made about Tampax is its simplicity. Inserting, changing, disposing take only seconds. Once you've passed that hurdle, you can relax and enjoy all the many, many advantages of Tampax.

It's invisible in place. Unfelt in place. So made that the wearer's hands need not touch it at any time. It prevents odor. Prevents chafing and irritation.

It's convenient to carry, unembarrassing to buy (on display wherever drug products are sold)—and it comes in a choice of 3 absorbencies (Regular, Super, Junior) to suit your individual needs.

Why deprive yourself of a product that so many women use, so many doctors approve of? Tampax is the better way! Try it and see! Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Invented by a doctor—now used by millions of women at about 3 o'clock, soon after Mary woke up from her afternoon nap. Ten hours of driving was enough, and we felt our early start entitled us to some relaxation at the end of the afternoon—a policy we held to all the trip.

It was at Heyburn that we ran into our worst weather—a hail-and-wind storm followed by a very wet rain. One moment we were quietly eating supper, the next all our dishes were blowing off the table and we were being pounded by hailstones as big as golf balls. We heard later that it was the edge of a tornado that went through Oklahoma that day. Weather is undoubtedly the biggest risk you run in camping, and you're bound to get a certain percentage of bad, so Gloria and I did not feel too downhearted as we made our bunks in the station wagon that night instead of the tent. I remember Gloria's saying as we settled down, "Honey, at least we have our bad weather behind us now," and she turned out to be pretty nearly right.

We had two more nights of camping before we reached Los Angeles. The first was outside Tucumcari, New Mexico, where we put up at a trailer court (fee $1.25) with the ulterior motive of hot showers. If you are out of reach of a large park and want hot water and electric outlets, a trailer court is a good secondary source of supply.

We crossed most of New Mexico and Arizona the next day, and spent the night in Western Arizona, at Garland Prairie Camp Site, near Flagstaff. At home Gloria and I tend to be night owls, hating to get up in the morning but hating to go to bed at night. But by now we were used to our shift to the sun's time, and it's a feature of our camping that we wouldn't change for anything. When we stopped at Garland Prairie it was about 4 o'clock, and the thin spring air and the snow-capped mountains still sparkled in the sun. Mary ran about like a puppy, collecting twigs for our campfire and enjoying her liberty after the car.

Other campers began arriving later in the afternoon and the atmosphere soon became sociable. Mary would be asked half a dozen times, "What's your name, little girl?" and Gloria and I would exchange camp and highway tips with our neighbors. Campers are almost invariably friendly.

When darkness fell, with supper dishes washed and the tent up, we would call Mary back to home roost and light our campfire. This was the final ceremony of our day, and included some stout family singing for Mary's benefit. Her favorite is Hush Little Baby, and she joins in even though no one could call her good at it. Her share is to contribute joyful amounts of volume.

Mary slept in the tent with Gloria and me (her cot was never moved from the car), and by 8:30 all three of us would be divinely drunk with sleepiness. We would set our alarm clock for 4 and sleep the sleep of the just.

We reached Los Angeles the next day, and there we found spring at its peak. The dry brown hills we thought we knew from past summers were green and fertile, and our eyes were filled with the sight of flowers and orange groves in bloom. Our memory of our five days in Los Angeles seems to begin and end in flowers, although actually I guess the first thing we tackled was the dust we had brought with us—on our shoes, in our hair, in the car; next, laundry at the launderette around the corner from Gloria's aunt's and an hour of ironing for Gloria; next, fun. We saw the city, we saw friends, we saw Hollywood. We spent one day south of the city visiting first Disneyland, then our old haunt, Laguna Beach, where Mary had her first open view of the ocean. We spent the afternoon on the beach and had dinner that night at Gloria's and my favorite restaurant of bygone years. Our whole day was a little extravagant and a lot of fun, and it was one of the things we had come across the country for.

Two days later we were on the road again, this time heading north. California Highway 1 hugs the rocky Pacific coastline on its way to San Francisco, and is certainly one of the stunning sights of the world. It doesn't need me to describe its beauties, so I'll say only that we gave up our old pace of 450 miles a day and settled for 200. It took us two days to reach San Francisco, and when we rounded a mountain and saw it all at once, spilling gloriously all over the hills, Gloria was so excited that she almost burst into tears.

We spent three enchanted days and nights there. We left on May 11th and retraced our route to another of Highway 1's state parks, New Brighton Beach. It was really time for us to think of heading east and home again, but we camped at New Brighton Beach for two days of just pure beachcombing. We had to pay for it in some night driving later, but you have to remember that we are from Missouri, and an ocean isn't easy to come by in those parts.

On May 13th we began the trek home by way of Colorado. We had planned to drive over the Sierras through Donner Pass, but news bulletins had been warning for several days that snow had fallen up there and only cars with chains could get through. Chains were one item we had not thought to pack for May, so we headed south on Route 99 instead, through Fresno, to our old U. S. Route 66. At Gallup we headed north for Colorado and our visit with John and Vivian Clark in Montrose.

In all we spent three nights in Colorado, our first camping in Mesa Verde Park, our two others with the Clarks in Montrose. John was a former marine squadron member, too, and we had all shared summer maneuvers at El Toro together before Korea. He was now a grazing-land manager for the Department of Agriculture, a job that meant he knew every rugged mountain road in this part of the Colorado Rockies. With Mary and the Clarks' older child, Johnny, along, we drove 200 miles through timber-line country. Snow was still on the ground, and we were surrounded by tremendous snow-capped peaks. At every turn in the road we came upon a mountain meadow more beautiful than the last. It was country that would drive any camper wild with joy.

This was the region of our most impressive scenery, and before we left I was pondering secret thoughts about coming back next summer, and wondering what Gloria would think. I can't help adding here that this is one of the beauties of being a camper—you can let your schemes roam freely all over the map.

When we left Montrose, Gloria was pointing out the purple lilac bushes in bloom in every yard. Irrigation ditches were rushing in the thaw. We had come back to the beginnings of spring again. We left on Friday morning, May 18th, and since we wanted to be home on Saturday (so we could have Sunday to settle down in), we faced up to some night driving. Gloria and I have a system for this, and neither of us finds it a chore. We take turns driving in four-hour shifts, and when the nondriver needs sleep he can stretch out on one of the air mattresses in back. We drove all day Friday, all Friday night, and most of Saturday, covering 1100 miles at a clip.

We reached home in daylight the next afternoon. And there was Missouri's spring waiting for us on the doorstep. Our grass was up, our roses were blooming, and the neighbors' children were swarming about. In about forty-five minutes we had the car cleared and the camp gear stowed. We were home.

Gloria's and my idea of a vacation may not be everybody's, but I can't think why it shouldn't be a lot of people's. Even people Mary's age. Our first week back she could hardly be persuaded to go out and play, because right by Gloria's side seemed nicer. She felt it was not quite cricket for me to go to work; my place was as a member of the wonderful family trio we had been on our trip.

Gloria and I have often talked about our camping from her point of view, because every now and then I feel guilty about a woman's work never being done—even though it's only a camp stove she is standing over, and a tent floor she is sweeping up. You have to allow for Gloria's good nature, but she just laughs at me. She says, "Camp housekeeping is so much simpler that there isn't any comparison. And it's never lonely work either. And I appreciate my kitchen and my bathroom for two solid weeks after we're back. As for the roughing it, I'm still snake and bug conscious, but since we've yet to run into a snake I'm beginning to relax. The rough part just isn't there."

The way we do it, it really isn't. Today, camping has become a civilized sport for the whole family. Gloria and I see it as both a means and an end. It is a means of seeing parts of the country that we could not otherwise afford to see, and also the deepest kind of pleasure. To me, the most rewarding part of camping is getting up with the sunrise. There is something about witnessing a sunrise that makes me want to use the word goodly. It's a nice part of the day—a goodly part of the day. Part of it is the colors, part of it the feeling of being the first up to start the world over again. And part of it, for a city man, is a mental and spiritual relaxation that comes over you, and seems to stay.

END

"What could Noah have had in mind bringing two of those along on the ark?"

Beautiful Hair

BRECK

8 ounces $1.00

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOOS FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITIONS

The hair of a little child has a natural softness and lustre. A Breck Shampoo helps bring out the natural beauty of your hair. There are three Breck Shampoos. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is for normal hair. Select the Breck Shampoo for your individual hair condition. A Breck Shampoo gives life and body to the hair and may be used often without causing dryness. A Breck Shampoo leaves your hair clean, soft and naturally beautiful.

The Three Breck Shampoos are available at Beauty Shops and wherever cosmetics are sold.

Copyright 1957 by John H. Breck Inc.

H N H BRECK INC · MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS · SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS
W YORK · CHICAGO · SAN FRANCISCO · LOS ANGELES · OTTAWA CANADA

IS COLLEGE EDUCATION WASTED ON WOMEN?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 79

must decide what they will do with their lives from now on. For many students it is the first important decision they have had to make. Since, for many, the idea has somehow become implanted that they must choose between marriage and serious work, they hesitate to commit themselves to a career. On the other hand, they suspect—not without foundation—that there is no real place in our society for the liberally educated person who is not identified with some accomplishment or activity. And they suspect that the values gained in college will be out of place in the social world they are about to enter. The conflict is likely to be strongest for more serious students, since those not deeply committed to a discipline can abandon it more readily. In fact, anticipation of this kind of conflict is a major reason why many students avoid serious commitment to any interest throughout their college career.

Many observers have commented on the "flight into marriage" that so often takes place at this time. Some of these marriages are very good ones. They are based on a long acquaintance, and the girls are ready for the demands of married life. Many seniors, however, rush into marriage, hardly knowing the man involved, as a way of resolving the dilemma thrust upon them by graduation. Our alumnae samplings indicate that marriages undertaken for this reason have not worked out very well.

The majority of those who do not marry immediately work at something, usually something well below the level of their ability. Or else they attend graduate school for one or a few years, as a way of marking time until the "right man" comes along.

Students with professional ambitions often fare best during the senior year. Although virtually all of them plan to marry, marriage is for them an activity in which they will voluntarily choose to participate rather than something that is necessary for any sense of personal identity. Such students have a clear sense of direction, a greater degree of independence and self-confidence than most.

But preparation for a professional career is not the primary aim of liberal education. It aims, rather, to train the individual so that she can be intelligent in whatever she does. Above all, it aims to develop the individual so that her sense of herself as a real person does not depend on her being in any particular social role, such as wife and mother or working woman. The expectation today is that almost all college girls will, at one time or another, be wives and mothers and work at something outside the home. The hope is that as wives and mothers they will maintain a high level of culture and have a keen sense of being alive and worthy; and that when they work, they will do something important and interesting. The evidence is that, in general, the abilities and qualities that make for success in one of these areas also make for success in the other.

College is crucial for the development of these abilities and qualities. If a girl feels that she is "not living" now when she is in college, the chances are she will feel the same way ten or twenty or thirty years from now. The notion that things will be different when her circumstances have changed, when she is married or when she is engaged in "interesting work," is probably an illusion. Boredom in college is associated with boredom later on. The student who is not enjoying the academic aspects of her college life right now is not just headed for trouble; she is already in trouble.

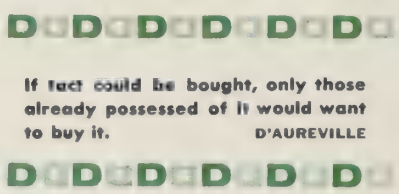
This is a major conclusion from our intensive study of a group of Vassar alumnae twenty to twenty-five years out of college. Close acquaintance with this group of women would be enough to renew anyone's faith in the aims and processes of liberal education. These were women who had improved everything they had touched, and they had touched a great deal. But we are here talking about problems and difficulties. Everybody knows about the problems, and the achievements, of the career woman who does not marry. What concerned us particularly was the type of woman whose children had more or less grown up and who, now that external demands on her were withdrawn, was hard put to it to escape a sense of emptiness and boredom. Her inclination was to fill her time either with trivial social activities or with some routine "job" which though essentially meaningless gave her a sense of being busy.

We were concerned because we believed we saw here the probable future of today's social-minded college girl. The women of whom I speak had entered college because it was the thing to do, immersed themselves in the student culture, treated their academic work as an imposed nuisance, assumed vaguely that as soon as they were married to a good provider everything would be rosy. The resemblance to the majority of today's students is too close for comfort.

Another conclusion from the study of alumnae: even those in whom education had taken well had found it difficult to maintain the values and interests developed in college. Those who had kept up either had professional careers or had married men who shared or admired the college-bred outlook.

The evidence is that the problem that concerns us is pretty general the country over. A recent large-scale survey of student attitudes and values reports a general pattern very similar to the one I have described. This pattern is said to prevail from coast to coast, at state university or denominational college, for the Ivy League as well as for the city-college commuter.

A dozen years ago when the GI's were returning from the war and filling the colleges and graduate schools, young women had all sorts of imaginative designs for married living. Today, and in more recent years, their ideas are more traditional and conventional.



In the time of the Cold War the crisis has not been great enough to require that all hands pitch in and do useful work. But it has been great enough to place accent on the "manly virtues" in men and traditional virtues in women. Not only is feminism dead; we have passed into a phase of antifeminism. Clever writers berate women for exercising their new-found rights and privileges. Psychologists and psychiatrists issue grim warnings about mothers' responsibilities to their young children. Thus it is that we have an upsurge of the attitude that one must not appear too bright or too competent, lest this threaten one's ability to take traditional feminine roles.

It ought not to be necessary to say that if a woman is too assertive and bossy, too demanding and overactive, this is not because of woman's freedom. These things come, rather, from frustration and self-doubt. They are not to be cured by turning the clock back a hundred years, even if we could.

It ought not to be necessary to say that it is not unfeminine to be intelligent, to use one's head, to have deep interests. Leaving aside biological functions, real femininity does not consist any longer in what one does; it consists rather in the way one does things. It may be granted that our society, unlike others, France, for example, does not have any prominent image of a type of woman who is very, very feminine and very intelligent, highly educated and highly cultivated. But I see no reason why we cannot create one.

It is because of a lack of clarity about these matters that many of our most able young women waste their time, or use it inefficiently, at jobs far below the level of their abilities, while the need for trained people, particularly in the fields of health, education and welfare, grows every year more acute.

The problem is even more serious in the case of the girl who is sure that she wants to be a full-time homemaker. It is not only that she is taking on a job that requires more wisdom, more depth and breadth of understanding than most professional ones; the nation depends more and more heavily upon women of her type for maintaining a high level of culture and humanitarianism. Her education could not be neglected for long without a serious deterioration in our national fabric.

What is to be done? The colleges, we may be sure, will go on trying to find ways to motivate the students, to set up forces in opposition to the kinds of social pressure that have been described. Probably the best approach is to work toward the establishment of a community in which the student's prestige and sense of belonging depend on the development of scholarly interests, rather than on how well she fits into an unintellectual student culture. It seems that, in general, a college can proceed in two ways: it can change the make-up of its student body through its admissions policy, and it can deliberately reconstruct the social organization of the college community.

Change in the make-up of the student body may be brought about by selecting for admission more students of the kind who can be counted upon to take full advantage of their opportunities. Of course colleges have always tried to perform this difficult feat, but now their chances are better than ever. For one thing, they have many more applicants to choose from. For another, more and more is being learned about what the potentially good student is like. This is not so much a matter of grades in school or scores on entrance examinations as has been commonly thought. Factors of attitude and background loom large.

For example, we made a study to find out what distinguished good students from poor ones; and we found that the most important factor among good students was that their mothers had intellectual interests and aspirations. Their fathers either had similar interests or, at the least, did not disapprove of intellectual women. In the best cases of all, the mothers had performed or were performing some activity that required a high level of education. The poorest academically had mothers who had urged college purely because of the social prestige it conferred; and their fathers were either dubious about higher education for girls or contemptuous of it, and had expressed a distaste for intellectual women.

If the colleges should change their notions about the kinds of students they want, then the schools would have to change their ways of preparing students for college. At the present time, parents and schools are engaged in a kind of conspiracy to "get them into college," almost at any cost. Too little thought is given to what they will do after they get there. And too little attention is paid to the costs to the student of these often rather desperate maneuverings. Often enough their chances of developing a love of learning are spoiled at this time.

One might hope that the schools could devote themselves, each in its own way, to the general development of our youngsters, free from pressure to mold them according to other people's requirements. They should be free to act on what they know: that people in their teens develop at widely differing rates; that after four years of high school some students are ready for college and some not; that among the latter are students who would be ready after another year or two of school and some of whom actually have the stuff to go farthest in the end. Such reform would require a great deal of support from parents.

Changing the social organization of a college is probably a more difficult undertaking. But it can be accomplished. The major aim would be to break up the common arrangement according to which we have a student society and student culture on the one hand and a faculty society and culture on the other, with each managing to keep the other at a distance. A suggestion is offered by some of those small, isolated colleges in which the lives of faculty and students are so closely integrated that the former are able to take the role of leader, rather than that of official or head in a single society.

Returning to the question of whether college education is worth while, the conclusion is that it can be very much worth while from the point of view of a young woman's self-development and that it is indispensable from the point of view of society's needs. Our whole focus should be on how to improve college education. This calls for research directed especially to how personality develops in late adolescence and how it may be influenced in desirable ways by the social and intellectual environment. Leadership will have to be assumed by established schools with courage and self-confidence to examine themselves.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

marriage. I asked him the name of the other woman. At first he wouldn't say. It took me a week to find out. Jack's choice of a second wife might be amusing to some people, and yet it is pitiful too. He insists he is determined to marry a woman named Ida, who is six years older and not nearly as good-looking as I am.

"Ida, a widow, works as a filing clerk in the manufacturing plant where Jack is assistant to the production manager. Ida is the mother of five children, four are boys, ranging in age from three to fifteen. Jack couldn't bear the noise of our twins when they were younger; the girls always had to tiptoe around him or else his head would ache. His salary is adequate to cover our normal expenses, but I still do part-time stenographic work to pay for extras.

"I didn't have the heart to ask Jack how he proposed to finance a family of seven; it was patently impossible. I did ask how he expected to find any peace and quiet among four growing boys. Jack was silent. When I pressed him, he doubled up with stomach cramps and had to go to bed. I believe Jack got sick because he couldn't face secret doubts of his own. Any uncertainty, emergency or unpleasantness in our household almost inevitably results in a visit from the doctor.

"Up to date Jack has never held a job worthy of his talents and intelligence. His absentee record is only partially responsible. He is supersensitive and he is also disinclined to stand up for his own rights. Instead of throwing off a grievance as quickly as I do, the way I do, he builds up the tinies[illegible] to the height of Mount Everest. Then he hugs his injured feelings to himself until he gets sick. Not long ago he was blamed for a fellow worker's expensive blunder. I forget the details, although I received a full account of the episode at the time. But the top brass didn't hear the story. Jack refused to explain to the big boss. He accepted the injustice in silence, had an attack of asthma and was obliged to stay away from work for three days. I was disgusted.

"Eighteen years ago, when Jack and I married, I thought we had everything in our favor. We came from similar backgrounds. Both of

CONTINUED ON PAGE 200

Hunt-for the best

the paste with the Sunny Italian Flavor

SPAGHETTI SAUCE with meat

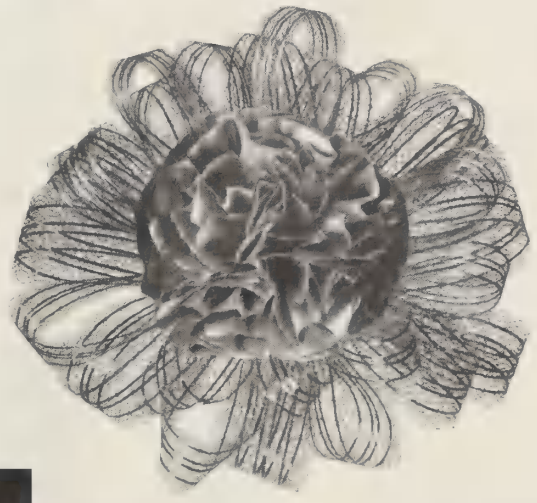
"You never dreamed you could make an authentic Spaghetti sauce recipe as easily as this! It has that real, sunny Italian flavor because it's made with Hunt's Tomato Paste. Hunt's is so rich and smooth—it's paste as paste should be. I recommend it to you for delicious results whenever you cook Italian-style."

- 2 Tablespoons cooking oil
- 1 clove garlic, minced
- ¾ cup chopped onion
- ½ lb. ground beef
- 1 6-oz. can Hunt's Tomato Paste*
- 3 cups hot water
- ½ teaspoon sugar
- ½ teaspoon oregano
- 1 teaspoon salt
- ¼ teaspoon pepper
- ¾ lb. spaghetti, cooked and drained
- Parmesan cheese



Heat oil in heavy skillet. Add garlic and onion; cook until soft. Add meat. Cook and stir until crumbly. Mix Hunt's Tomato Paste, water and seasonings. Stir into meat. Simmer over low heat 35 to 40 minutes or until sauce thickens. Serve over hot spaghetti, and sprinkle with Parmesan cheese. Makes 4 to 6 servings. Note: Without the ground meat, this recipe becomes a basic Italian-style sauce...excellent for macaroni, noodles, rice, ravioli.

*Hunt's Tomato Paste is pure tomato in its most concentrated, most economical form, like a very thick puree. Use a spoonful or a can, depending on the recipe. Generally, add it to the liquid, then to the other ingredients.

FREE! Send for folder of best-loved Italian recipes. Hunt Foods, Inc., Dept. J5, Fullerton, California

Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . .
with versatile Sasheen®
the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

To make a Carnation Bow bloom atop your Mother's Day gift, first you make a "Magic Bow" of Sasheen Brand Ribbon, following the directions on the roll. Then, simply crush the loops together and cut off the ends. Result? A colorful carnation! Give it a lovely background by centering it in a lacy Decorette "Magic Bow". (Make boutonnieres, too!) Choose Sasheen and Decorette in spring's prettiest pastels at your favorite store.

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE 23835

"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons

PRODUCTS OF 3M COMPANY RESEARCH

MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, St. Paul 6, Minnesota © 3M Co.

Earn EXTRA CASH NOW!

YOU can easily earn extra money by selling magazine subscriptions in your spare time. Thousands of our representatives made their start by asking for our generous commission offer. No obligation. Address a postal today!

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
960 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

"Just love this chair it's Luxury's LADIES ROCKER"

— Especially designed for you — Miss and Mrs. America

The LADY SUZANNE
Closed Arm Model with Swivel Base

★ FOAM RUBBER CUSHION, Back and Arms, for lasting comfort, on both models.

★ ALL STEEL SWIVEL BASE on either model, (at slight extra cost).

★ WEAR TESTED FABRICS, a beautiful selection of decorator styled fabrics.

You are invited — to see these chairs at your local dealer — we promise you a new seating thrill. FREE — a beautiful full-color brochure that fully describes these chairs — write to—

The LADY CATHERINE
Open Arm Model with standard base.

FULL FIVE YEAR WARRANTY BACKS Every LUXURY CHAIR

Luxury
FURNITURE COMPANY
GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 198

us grew up in the Western cattle country. Both of our fathers were ranchers, both our families were hard hit by the national depression. Jack was fourteen years old and a high-school sophomore when his people lost their ranch and moved to our county as renters. I saw him first on the school bus; it was a bitter November day. He needed a haircut and he wasn't wearing a sweater. I remember thinking he looked like an orphan, and I hoped he would sit down by me. He didn't.

"I was just thirteen, but I thought I had fallen in love on sight. I deliberately made Jack's sister, who was younger, my special friend. Every time I could escape my mother's vigilance, I saddled my horse and rode over to Jack's home on the pretext of studying with his sister. When she and I finished our lessons, we spent hours writing verses that we called poetry. One evening I composed a poem dedicated to Jack; I slipped the paper into his school satchel. He didn't speak of the poem to me and I supposed he hadn't found it. Years later I learned that shyness had kept him quiet. Long after our marriage I came on an old billfold of his and in it was that schoolgirl poem of mine. Jack has some very sweet and appealing qualities.

"My mother objected vigorously to my fondness for him, just as she objected to my being interested in any other boy. My mother wasn't strong, and she demanded a lot of my help at home. I was the oldest of five, the only girl. My daughters rejoice in school vacations. To me every holiday represented a battle of wits between my poor mother and myself. Unless I could get out of the house very early—sometimes I went through my bedroom window—I was assigned to washing diapers, preparing formulas, taking care of my baby brothers. It seemed to me my mother did nothing except lie on the sofa, complain of her back and give me orders. Both Jack and I worked harder than youngsters nowadays, but I had one definite advantage over him. My father was partial to me.

"My mother seldom felt fit to go out socially. My father went everywhere—to the square dances, to barbecues on neighboring ranches, to the spring rodeo—and often he took me with him. He loved to play the guitar and sing. He taught me to ride before he taught my brothers, and still declares I was the best and most fearless rider in the family. The truth is I was ashamed to show my fears in his company. Once my father was thrown and broke his leg; he crawled two miles without a whimper to reach our home. It was my mother who had hysterics. I drove him to the hospital.

"After our high-school graduation Jack and I were separated for a while. My father saw to it that I had a taste of the world and sent me to an out-of-state business college. Jack had a year at the state university and then joined the Army. When he received his discharge and returned to the county—he looked very dashing in uniform—I was doing secretarial work for a wealthy Eastern woman who owned a big ranch adjoining my father's ranch.

"I had practically forgotten my schoolgirl crush. Indeed, I was engaged to another man. Inside a few weeks I broke the engagement and eloped with Jack. My father liked Jack—as he would have liked any man I chose—and found him a job. Jack lost it. To make matters worse, the ranch where I worked was sold and I, too, was jobless. One of my father's West Coast friends offered Jack work in California. Just before we moved, my employer auctioned off her household goods. As a sort of consolation prize she gave me a steel-stringed guitar. I automatically passed the guitar along to my father. Jack can't play any musical instrument. Nevertheless, he was terribly upset I hadn't given the guitar to him—so upset he got sick and we had to postpone our trip. Looking back, I believe that incident marked the beginning of my disillusionment. Instead of marrying a real man, it seemed to me I had married a grown-up baby.

"Our first years in California strengthen that impression. Jack's job did not pan out. found work in a chain store and induced r boss to hire him. Somebody else, usually r father, has had to find nearly all Jack's jo for him. It's true Jack tracked down his pr ent job, but I'm sure his employers harc know he is among those present. Jack is stan offish and too backward about blowing l own horn. Like a child, he waits for praise a then is bitterly disappointed to discover oth people are busily praising themselves. He too self-centered to be a good father. He sa he loves our daughters, but he never tak them anywhere. In the first place, he didn even want children. He dreaded the financ responsibility, and to be honest I guess dreaded it too.

"I don't see how on earth Jack can make o with a brand-new family. The other day I g up my courage and called on Ida. She seer to be a very sensible woman, not at all t ordinary home-wrecker type. I gathered th the welfare of her youngsters came first wi her and that she, too, was dubious abo Jack's success as the stepfather of five. (impulse I told her that I wouldn't agree to divorce for at least a year. Ida said that in h opinion the delay would be wise for all co cerned. In short, I think I have a pretty go chance to salvage my marriage.

"For a long while I've considered Jack unsatisfactory husband. I now think I have been an outstanding success as a wife. I do know whether I want a divorce or not. I know this: I would like to find out where, a wife, I went off the rails. I hate to be a fail at anything."

God can do no more without us than we can do without him.

MEISTER ECKHART

JACK TELLS HIS SIDE:

"I didn't know it w possible for a married m to be as lonely as I' been," said Paula's hu band. Jack was of mediu height, hollow-cheeked a thin but not unattractive. "Four months a when I met Ida—she rides to the plant our neighborhood car pool—I realized I h been lonely for years. Paula has no genuin interest in what I do, what I think, how I fe

"Ida is the exact opposite. She is warm a friendly and has the eyes of a noticing woma On her first day of work in our plant, s stopped at my desk, commented on my pa color and asked if I felt ill. When I told her had a headache she stepped over to her de and brought back a glass of water and a aspirin. At breakfast that morning, when mentioned my headache, Paula's response w to pour herself another cup of coffee.

"Probably she didn't intend to seem unfe ing. She just can't help it. Paula thinks ever body should possess perfect health and be strong as her father. She won't take care herself when she's sick—two years ago s walked around a week with pneumonia and she interprets any nervous ailment as sign of weakness and lack of character. Wh I'm around her I try to control my nerves, b I haven't had much luck.

"In fact, at times she has subjected me almost intolerable pressures. I used to enj taking her to the movies, provided we were late. Unless I'm in my seat at the beginni of the feature picture, the pleasure is spoil for me. Going to the movies with Paula w always strictly a gamble. Whenever we starte off, she had to run back for her handke chief, her gloves, her cigarettes. The way s jumped in and out of the car, her agitate rushing up and down in the apartment elev tor, the suspense of wondering if we woul ever reach the theater, often gave me such blinding headache I could hardly see t screen. So I quit the movies.

"Through the years my headaches ha grown steadily worse. It's partly my own faul For a long while—too long—I was in th wrong type of work and business tensions g the best of me. At the time of my marriage was in no position to choose a career, an with my father-in-law's assistance I fetche up in a selling job. Salesmanship might suit m

CONTINUED ON PAGE 203

A NEW ADDITION TO THE FAMOUS PHILLIPS' FAMILY!

FLAVORED

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA

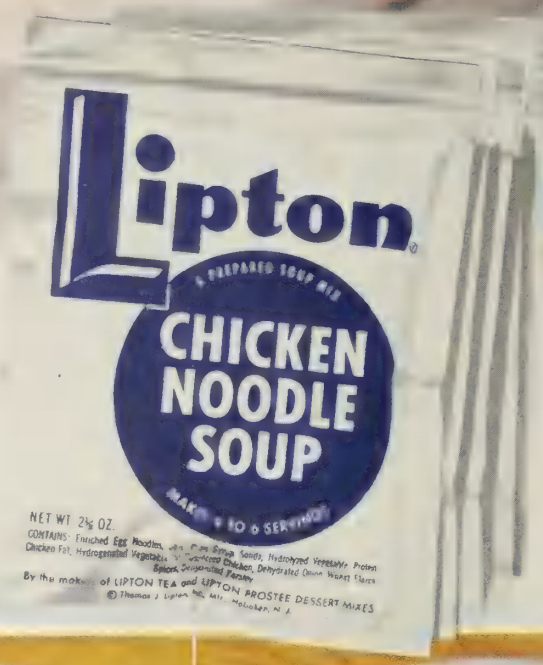
AT THE SAME PRICE AS REGULAR!

Now the World's Best Milk of Magnesia is yours in this new mint-flavored form that tastes wonderfully clean and refreshing.

As a laxative, Phillips' gives more complete relief!

Phillips' gives more complete relief than laxatives which act only on constipation. This is because Phillips' is actually more than a laxative. It also relieves the acid indigestion which frequently accompanies constipation. Works leisurely, too —without embarrassing urgency. Three tablespoonfuls of Phillips', taken with water at bedtime when necessary, not only help you get a good night's sleep, but when morning comes, bring you the relief you need to start your day feeling bright and refreshed.

As an antacid, Phillips' settles your stomach in seconds!



Scientific tests show that—in just a matter of seconds—Phillips' neutralizes the excess stomach acids which cause upset stomach, gas, heartburn and other symptoms of acid indigestion. The reason Phillips' works with remarkable speed is because it is one of the fastest, most effective stomach acid neutralizers ever discovered. Almost before you know it, Phillips' eases away that hot, gnawing sensation in your stomach—and you're feeling fine again.

REGULAR PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CONTINUES UNCHANGED!

Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in the new flavored form does not replace regular Phillips'. For the innumerable people who wish to continue using regular Phillips', it will, of course, always be available—in exactly the same high quality form you've known for years.

NEW, FLAVORED PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA

Soup tastes best when it's fresh home-cooked

And Lipton Mixes make home-cooking easy!

Wonderful, isn't it? You no longer have to spend hours at the stove to enjoy chicken noodle soup that has that unmistakable home-cooked touch. See how easy home-cooking can be with Lipton Chicken Noodle Soup Mix!

Just add mix to boiling water. In minutes you're dishing up rich chicken broth and golden noodles, fragrant and delicious as the old-time slow-simmered kind.

Promise yourself a Lipton Soup treat this week. Taste the difference in soup that's fresh home-cooked!

LIPTON SOUP MIXES

FOR FRESH HOME-COOKED SOUP, QUICK AND THRIFTY

Chicken Noodle
Green Pea
Onion
Tomato Vegetable
Beef Vegetable

Tomato Vegetable Soup gives you tasty vegetables, tender enriched egg noodles in hearty tomato broth.

Green Pea Soup, a rich, velvety pur of specially grown green peas, season to smoky perfection.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 200

er-in-law, who is breezy, hearty and always ws the latest joke. It did not suit me. I 't meet the public well and I'm ill at ease in vds. However, I held one sales job after her. About a year ago I decided to prove uld go out on my own and land a satis- ory job. Without too much trouble, I ted a place in production in a big syn- cs plant. Paula didn't seem overly im- sed with my initiative. But at first every- g on the job went fine and dandy. Then e was a company shake-up and a new ager was installed. Before he learned his around the organization, he bawled me in front of everybody for a mistake made nother department. Instead of sympa- ng with me when she heard the story, a sided with the new manager. Then, ging viewpoint, she lectured me for not ing a fight. I thought it would be foolish me to tell the manager how to run his ness. A few days proved I was right; the er was straightened out and the truth was lished without my making a spectacle of lf. I didn't ever bother to tell Paula.

aula rides roughshod over my feelings. I to spare hers. Her unsentimental, no- sense ways are tough on both me and our hters. These days I don't feel especially to the twins—twelve-year-old girls n't much need of a father—but Janis and could certainly use a tender, understand- nother. Paula is undemonstrative. Affec- seems to embarrass her. She hardly ever or kisses the girls. I've seen her push the gsters off when they throw themselves in arms. She isn't like the average woman, delights in her children while they're es. Paula could hardly wait to get back to ob after the twins were born, although by it was no longer necessary for her to . Most of her salary went into extra es and a nursemaid's wages. Recently a percentage of her earnings has been spent xpensive power tools and flying lessons. Ve have always rented an apartment. To partment living isn't living. Technically rent is low, but Paula constantly seems e scurrying around with a hammer and v. She considers me a complete dub with . Otherwise I would have helped her keep apartment in shape, even though I be- d our arrangement was a better deal for andlord than for us. If Paula had ever d in the cost of her labor and the supplies bought—our hardware bills were sky- —she would have found our apartment not a bargain. We could have met the ents on a house with the amount we've spending to improve somebody else's erty.

Our four rooms don't allow the twins much e to entertain their friends. Both girls are ing up with no knowledge of cooking, ekeeping, sewing. They would like to . Paula doesn't believe it. She herself is an ent and speedy housekeeper. She de- s quite a bit on frozen foods, but is a cook. If the girls step in the kitchen while a is at the stove, she complains of their g underfoot and shoos them out. Neither an fry an egg. They are permitted to clear able and use the dishwasher. And that's Paula takes our daughters' ignorance ly. She explains that she had an overdose omesticity in her own childhood and s our children to grow up with pleasant ories.

here isn't the slightest doubt that Paula our daughters—in her own way. Last she spent hours in the basement of our tment house sweating out a pair of beau- desks for them. The girls were overjoyed hristmas Day, but they're now afraid of the desks for fear of marring the finish displeasing their mother. I, too, was proud aula's skill in the first place. But then a olimentary article on her was published e newspaper. Everybody read it. I had to so much kidding from neighbors and aintances, asking if they could hire my as a carpenter and what would be my mission, that I got fed up with the subject. Whether she intends to or not, Paula has a ive talent for making me look like an in- tive dope. When I took up flying, I'm sure she was honestly thrilled. Her father was a flier in World War One. But to encourage me she took lessons too. She then proceeded to beat me to a pilot's license. For years Paula has nagged at me to participate in sports. When I became manager of the company base- ball team she was too busy manufacturing furniture to bring our girls to any of the games. Ida and her four sons came to every game, in and out of town. It was through Harold, the oldest boy, that she and I got well acquainted.

"One morning on the ride to work Ida got to talking about a nonfunctioning, second- hand motor scooter the kid had bought. Next Sunday I dropped over to her place and Harold and I together put the scooter in oper- ating order. He's a nice companionable kid, not at all smart-alecky. Another weekend he and I cleaned and whitewashed their garage so the younger children would have a place to play. Ida thinks I'm skillful with my hands. Unlike Paula, she is very feminine and can scarcely replace an electric fuse without as- sistance.

"Working with Harold makes me wish I'd had a son of my own. Before Paula and I were married, we agreed to postpone our family and limit the size. I'm sorry now. But I was for it then. My boyhood experiences didn't sell me on the combination of a large family and a small income. When my father lost his ranch he went into dairy farming. At fourteen I was milking twenty-seven cows. My duties kept me occupied from four A.M., when my father would pull me out of bed, until I bolted break- fast and ran for the school bus. I was always sleepy. At that I guess I minded the hard work and the perpetual tiredness less than I minded my small stature. My father and my mother were both six-footers. My three brothers towered over me and so did my sis- ters. They were handsome and loud-voiced and they loved to shout at each other. Even now occasionally I have a nightmare where I'm backed up in a corner and all of them are yelling at me and I can't get away.

"I was a quiet kid and I agonized in silence. Wearing my brothers' castoff clothes was an ordeal that I still recall with a sinking sensa- tion in the pit of my stomach. The coats swallowed me and the trousers always had to be shortened. Just pulling on those hand-me- down pants could make me feel almost sick. Sometimes I was sick and had to stay home from school, to the acute annoyance of my mother. Everybody else in the family was strong and healthy. In my teens I used to tell strangers I was adopted and I halfway be- lieved my own tale.

"When I went to the university Paula knitted a sweater and a pair of Argyle socks for me. I wore the sweater through the entire year and carried it into the Army with me. During my service days Paula was often in my mind. When she threw over another man to marry me, I could hardly credit my luck. It was as though suddenly I had found the kind of home I'd never known before. A home where I amounted to something. I thought Paula loved me. Very soon I discovered her father was the important man in her life. She listened to him in everything and saw that the two of us heeded his advice. My wishes counted for nothing.

"Long before I met Ida, Paula and I had drifted apart. When I suggested to Paula that we split up she reacted as calmly as though I were suggesting a walk around the block. When I moved out of our bedroom and began sleeping in the living room, she didn't protest. She is indifferent to my absence or my pres- ence. If we're divorced I'm sure she won't miss me. Actually, Paula and I have nothing in common."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Paula and Jack had put eighteen years into their marriage. Despite their deep estrange- ment, it wasn't especially difficult to help them to a closer understanding of themselves and the reasons for their faltering marriage. Both were intelligent.

"I believe Jack was instinctively aware of the unlikelihood that levelheaded Ida would ever marry him. Although I didn't meet Ida, I gained the distinct impression from Jack that she regarded him almost as the sixth child in her brood. This situation was exactly to his liking. It was Ida's maternal quality that attracted him, just as originally he had been attracted to Paula by sensing a similar quality in her.

"During his early youth, a very small frog among a crowd of big frogs, Jack suffered from a lack of maternal affection. In my opinion he adopted the habit of making the most of every trivial illness to win attention from his mother. The technique is not un- common with sensitive, insecure children. 'Poor little me,' they say in effect. Jack carried the pattern into his manhood.

"Receiving too little appreciation and sym- pathy as a child, he demanded an inordinate amount as an adult. On occasion he virtually expected Paula to read his mind. In his busi- ness dealings he was the kind of man who stands back with an impassive face and waits for the other fellow to step forward and shake hands. When the inevitable disappointments occurred, Jack retreated into illness or with- drew into silence and brooding. By pretending he was indifferent to what others did and thought, he spared his battered ego the possi- bility of a fresh rebuff and walled himself into ever-deepening loneliness. This behavior might be described as 'self-protection by the isola-

In these days, when it is so hard for busy mothers to leave young children and get out occasionally for a few hours, older women who love chil- dren and have time on their hands could have all their spare time grabbed up if they would let it be known that they were available for a few hours of baby sitting.

The other day I was reading of the thoughtful woman who, having little money to buy Christmas gifts for her young relatives, gave them an en- velope containing a "certificate" en- titling them to so many hours of kindly help in their homes. And the girls prized these gifts of service dearly. DR. WALTER C. ALVAREZ tion mechanism.' Jack was not only dissatis- fied with his marriage; he was dissatisfied with his life.

"It was small wonder that Paula found him gloomy and spiritless. Of course she was not guiltless in the matter. Paula, too, had been unfavorably affected by her early environ- ment. As a boy, Jack failed to identify satis- factorily with his father or with anybody who might be called an 'authority figure.' (His Army days were a torment to him.) As a girl, Paula felt no admiration for her querulous, complaining mother.

"She took her blustering, physically power- ful, highly masculine father for her model. To live up to what she imagined her father ex- pected of her, Paula learned to choke back her fears and to hide from the world any feel- ings that seemed weak. For his sake, she tried to excel in everything. So great was her scorn of her mother that she deliberately smothered the feminine, tender, yielding side of her nature.

"Paula had long supposed that she wanted a husband like her father. Yet when she and I discussed the man she jilted to marry Jack, she realized that particular man, an athlete a college football player, had been very much like her father. Paula had married Jack be- cause she loved and wanted to look after him. But then, mistrustful of her own femininity and accustomed to suppressing it, she had gone into active competition with him and thus had lowered his slender store of self-confidence and made him miserable. Few husbands are encouraged by being outdone by their wives.

"When Jack recognized that his loneliness was self-imposed and that Ida wasn't the answer to his personality problems, he broke their association. She offered no objections when he shifted to another neighborhood car pool. The two still speak when they meet at work, but Jack now speaks to other people too—and speaks first. After he understood how the touch-me-not attitude acquired in his childhood was damaging him years later, he forced himself to drop his reserve and chilly aloofness. By sheer practice and determina- tion he became more cordial and outgoing, less suspicious and sensitive. Nowadays, if it seems wise in the case of a business dispute, he explains and defends his position and thereby he has earned increased respect from his employers.

"Paula was very helpful to him in the change-over. In the first place, she stopped drawing invidious comparisons between him and her father. Her demands on a man of Jack's temperament were unrealistic and un- fair. She learned to accept him for what he was. When she acknowledged that Jack was high-strung, both of them profited in numer- ous small ways. On the movie question, for example, by imitating her father's practice of racing into the theater at the final minute, Paula had unnerved Jack and deprived herself of an escort. It wasn't difficult for her to col- lect her hat, purse and gloves ten minutes earlier and adapt to Jack's more leisurely pace. They then began to enjoy stepping out to- gether.

"With self-understanding Paula was able to change the whole pattern of her thinking, feeling and acting. In her girlhood she had felt abused and resentful at the necessity of tend- ing her baby brothers. This old, outworn re- sentment still clung on and colored her rela- tionship with her own daughters in their in- fancy. She stayed with a mediocre job rather than remain at home and look after babies. Another legacy from her childhood was her brisk, brusque approach to cooking, cleaning, homemaking. She was unwittingly teaching the twins to be contemptuous of feminine skills. Paula opened the kitchen to her young- sters. To her surprise she discovered that pre- paring a meal with an assisting cast of two twelve-year-old girls can be very rewarding She had curbed her real affection and with- held impulsive caresses from both Jack and her daughters lest she seem gushing and silly. By yielding to her true inner feelings as a woman, she found and gave joy. And she learned to be herself.

"In the midst of our consultations, Paula's father arrived in town for his annual visit to the family. The next day, in some excitement, Paula reported to me that when her father expressed admiration for his granddaughters' desks she told him that while doing the cabinetwork she had been mortally afraid she might lose a finger to the electric saw. Her father, not surprisingly, took this revelation in his stride. To Paula, however. her open con- fession of fear to the parent she adored and considered fearless had a very special signifi- cance. It was the first time in her life, she said to me, that she had ever felt mature and like an independent human being in her father's dominating company.

"To me there seemed to be more maturity in an announcement she made shortly after- ward. She decided to let her pilot's license lapse, abandon her expensive flying lessons and save her earnings toward the down pay- ment on a house. Paula still does part-time secretarial work. As yet she and Jack don't own a house, but their bank account is swell- ing and the purchase is in the cards.

"It would be pleasant to say that Jack's hy- pochondria has disappeared, but it wouldn't be a fact. He still has nervous headaches and stomach upsets but much less frequently. He keeps too busy to nurse a minor ailment over- long. Jack is flying again every Sunday the weather is good; his hours in the air cost nothing. He rejoined the Civil Air Patrol, a very active organization in the Los Angeles area, and he is now an officer. The promotion gave quite a boost to his self-esteem. He still manages the company baseball team. Paula's present schedule is designed to allow time for her and the twins to attend most of the games. These days he and his daughters, who do have need of a father, are closer.

"Paula and Jack no longer work at cross purposes but work together. By throwing off the habits of the past they learned to comple- ment ea h other and build a united family."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

NEW IMPROVED GOLDEN-LIGHT MAZOLA® OIL

...now 3 ways better than ever!

No fresher oil available! Protected by a new process, golden-light Mazola is a superior salad oil for all homemade dressings. Here's lightness you can see...freshness you can taste!

Mazola won't smoke or burn even up to 440° F. This means clean, smoke-free frying you just can't get with solid shortenings. Crisp golden-fried foods look so good...taste even better.

Lighter, more delicate flavor. New, improved Mazola is the best liquid shortening for all baking. Look for Mazola in the clear glass bottle...see the golden-light quality of this pure corn oil.

Mazola

PURE GOLDEN CORN OIL

This is a Conversation Piece

STUART

Fillets of sole "epicure," peas and water chestnuts, a crisp salad and garlic bread sticks . . . superb food to enjoy and remember.

Guacamole-and-red-caviar canapés and ripe olives stuffed with cheese: what could be a more appetizing prelude?

DI PIETRO

By RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

Delicious food that will adapt equally well to buffet or at-the-table service is often a good idea. Sometimes I've planned a dinner party for eight—all our dining table will hold—and learned at the last minute that someone had weekend guests I would like to include. With one of these versatile menus, it's a cinch to change my plans.

All right—here goes. The hors d'oeuvre will be guacamole-and-red-caviar canapés and stuffed ripe olives. The guacamole (mashed avocado) is highly seasoned with lemon juice and finely chopped onion to complement the caviar taste. These canapés are good and look pretty. You might want to remember them for a Christmas party because of the red and green colors. The pitted ripe olives are filled with a mixture of cream cheese and Roquefort.

For the main dish, fillets of sole epicure. The fillets are rolled around a stuffing of crumbs, bacon crumbles and chopped hard-cooked egg and fastened firmly with toothpicks. They are first browned on all sides in butter, then baked in a slow oven in a sauce of sour cream and green grapes. This is quite a dish, if you'll pardon my saying so. An added advantage, it's comparatively inexpensive. Peas and water chestnuts or button mushrooms will be the vegetable. They are cooked in chicken broth for added flavor. For a salad that will go well with the other dishes, we'll have greens combined with grated carrots and raw-cauliflower flowerets. Crisp raw cauliflower with its nutty flavor is wonderful in a salad. And I'll give a recipe for jar French dressing which has a stronger taste than true French dressing. It's right for this salad, I think. The windup of the main course will be toasted bread sticks rubbed with garlic and spread with butter. I don't mean Italian bread sticks—these are made from a loaf of unsliced white bread and are crisp on the outside and soft in the middle.

Now the dessert: butterscotch Bavarian, topped with coarsely chopped nuts. It has a real butterscotch flavor, which, in the department of sweets, is hard to beat. For this meal, I suggest Here's a delicious dinner menu that can be adapted to all forms of service . . . a handy item for the files of any hostess!

pick a

DAZEY

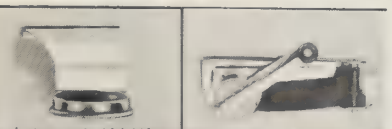
ULTRAMODERN

Canaramic

T.M. Reg.

CAN OPENER

IT NEVER LEAVES A RAGGED EDGE



The wall can opener with the Super-Honed lifetime cutting wheel

Now Dazey gives you a modern can opener that opens every kind of can faster, easier and better. It is precision-engineered to give you years of trouble-free service.

The Dazey "Canaramic" comes in a variety of modern kitchen colors as well as golden-hued copper and gleaming chrome finish. From $4.95 at better stores everywhere.

Other Famous DAZEY Can Openers from $1.79.

Dual Magnetic Lid-Lifter. Swings flat against wall.

USE-TESTED by McCall's

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Before it's a DAZEY.

MANUFACTURED BY THE DAZEY CORPORATION, ST. LOUIS 7, MO serving the butterscotch Bavarian as a pudding, but it can be used in other ways which I'll discuss in the recipe.

These recipes will serve eight, but you can increase quantities if you want a larger party.

GUACAMOLE-AND-RED-CAVIAR CANAPÉS

Cut 2 ripe avocados in half: remove stones and scrape out fruit with a spoon. Be careful to get all the bright green fruit just inside the skin. At once add the juice of 1½ lemons—about 4 tablespoons—and mash with a wire potato masher. Season with 1 teaspoon salt and 3 dashes hot pepper sauce. If you have an electric blender, buzz the avocado in that until smooth. There's so little liquid involved that you'll have to stir a bit. If you don't have a blender, press the avocado through a fine sieve. Add a few drops of green vegetable coloring if you like. Chop a medium-sized onion very fine, add it to the avocado and taste for seasoning. Slice dark bread—Swedish rye, whole-wheat or pumpernickel—about ¼" thick and cut into rounds with a small cooky cutter. Spread rounds lightly with butter and heap with guacamole, covering entire surface. Put a dab of red caviar in the center. Don't make it too big a dab—red caviar is delicious, but a little goes a long way because it is so salty. The guacamole can be made several hours in advance. But don't spread the canapés more than an hour before serving.

STUFFED RIPE OLIVES

Cream together until completely blended 3 ounces cream cheese and 3 ounces Roquefort. This is enough to stuff 2 nine-ounce cans of pitted ripe olives. I use the point of a slender knife and my fingers to accomplish the stuffing. Put in a little cheese, press with fingers and repeat until hole is completely filled. You are apt to do a bit of smearing, so it's a good idea to wipe olives with a damp paper towel after they are filled. They look quite pretty and taste even better. Sometimes I put finely chopped nuts in the filling, but since we're having nuts with our dessert I've left them out.

FILLETS OF SOLE EPICURE

Real fillets of sole are hard to come by here, but fillets of flounder are fine and available practically everywhere. Get 3 pounds frozen or fresh. If frozen, let them thaw. Spread them out on a board. The fillets are a bit unpredictable as to size and thickness, but don't worry. If they are too thick, take off a slice. Sometimes you will find a few bones, and of course these should be cut out. The slabs of fish should be about 7" long and 4" wide. These measurements are approximate—they won't look exactly alike, but when finished they will be pretty uniform in size. Some will be whole and others will have to be pieced together with toothpicks. When fitting pieces together, let them overlap so that you can pin securely.

For this quantity make a stuffing of 12 tablespoons dried bread crumbs, ¾ pound bacon, fried, drained and broken into crumbles, 9 tablespoons finely chopped parsley, 3 hard-cooked eggs, finely chopped, 3 raw eggs, 1½ teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon freshly ground black pepper and 1½ teaspoons monosodium glutamate. Mix thoroughly. Press about 3 tablespoons stuffing into a cylinder, place it near the end of a flounder fillet and roll. Pin with toothpicks, the old-fashioned kind, in as many places as needed. Don't spare the toothpicks—they come out later and we want the rolls to be neat.

All this can be done the day before. The afternoon of the party, dredge the rolls generously with flour and sauté on all sides in butter over low heat until lightly browned. Transfer rolls to a baking pan or casserole large enough so that they need not be stacked.

Put 1½ pounds green grapes in the skillet. Seedless grapes are fine, but if you can't get them remove seeds from the larger variety. Let grapes sizzle in the skillet 1 minute and add 1½ cups commercial sour cream. Turn heat off and season with salt and pepper and 1 teaspoon paprika. If you like the taste of Madeira, you can add ¼ cup to the sauce. Spoon sauce into casserole or pan with rolled fillets and bake, uncovered, in a slow—300° F.—oven until hot—35 to 45 minutes. The sauce should not boil or it will curdle. Remove toothpicks and serve fillets in casserole or transfer to a platter and garnish with lemon, parsley and red grapes.

PEAS AND WATER CHESTNUTS OR BUTTON MUSHROOMS

Thaw 2 packages frozen peas and slice thinly about 15 water chestnuts and add to peas. If water chestnuts are not available, substitute 2 four-ounce cans button mushrooms, drained. Heat 1 can chicken broth to boiling point, add peas and chestnuts or mushrooms and cook, uncovered, until peas are done. Add 2 tablespoons butter, salt to taste and serve.

CAULIFLOWER-AND-CARROT SALAD

The day before, wash salad greens. Cut 1 small head of cauliflower into tiny flowerets, cover with water and store in refrigerator. Peel 8 carrots, cover with water and store in refrigerator. The next day, drain carrots and grate them, shred greens coarsely and drain and dry cauliflower. Mix all ingredients together in a salad bowl. This can be done fairly early in the day if the salad bowl is kept in refrigerator. Before serving, toss with jar French dressing.

JAR FRENCH DRESSING

Into a jar put 1 cup olive or salad oil, ¼ cup wine vinegar, ¼ cup catchup, 1 teaspoon prepared mustard, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon paprika, 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, ½ teaspoon garlic powder and 1 clove garlic cut in half. Shake well and put in refrigerator. This can be done several days in advance. It improves with standing. Before mixing the salad, remove garlic clove. If you like to have this dressing on hand, you can make a triple batch, but remove the hunks of garlic after three days.

GARLIC BREAD STICKS

Get a loaf of unsliced white bread, remove crusts and cut into slices 1" thick. Cut each slice into 3 sticks. Toast on all four sides and rub with cloves of garlic. The rough surface of the toast acts as a grater and you'll use quite a bit of garlic—but is it good! Spread with butter on all sides, put on a baking sheet and cover with wax paper so they won't dry. Before serving, remove paper and put the bread sticks into oven with the fish until hot.

BUTTERSCOTCH BAVARIAN

Put 1¾ well-packed cups light brown sugar and ¾ stick butter in a heavy saucepan and cook over low heat. Stir constantly, preferably with a flat-ended spoon, scraping bottom and turning mixture over. When butter has melted, turn heat up just a little, but watch carefully. It should not darken or it will have a burned taste and that's the end. This phase of the cooking takes about 8 minutes. Soak 2 envelopes and 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin in ½ cup milk 5 minutes. In a separate pan heat, but do not boil, 3½ cups whole milk, add gelatin mixture and stir occasionally until gelatin is dissolved. Add milk to butterscotch and stir and heat until sugar is completely melted. Cool until it begins to thicken and beat with rotary beater until fluffy—about 5 minutes. At the last you can fold in 1 cup heavy cream, whipped, but this isn't necessary. The cream makes a smoother mixture, but it does add calories and the butterscotch Bavarian is very good without it. Transfer at once to bowl in which it will be served, or fill individual dessert dishes. To serve, sprinkle with plenty of coarsely chopped walnuts. You can serve this dessert as I have suggested or you can use it as a filling for a pie shell, for tartlets or between layers of cake. If so, be sure to pour into shells or spread on cake before it sets.

Service. With help so difficult to find, we're having to become more and more inventive about graceful ways of doing without it, and we're succeeding. I think the biggest help to the solo hostess is to have all the food set out on a buffet. From there on, the pattern can vary, whether you're seating people at the dining table, at small tables, or using trays. Everyone can serve his own plate, or you and your husband or a friend can do the serving. Of course there's the matter of keeping hot food hot, which is so important, but the market is loaded with gadgets for this purpose, from expensive to quite inexpensive. For instance, with this meal an electrically heated tray or large candle warmer for the fish platter and a chafing dish for the peas would solve the problem.

And, if it appeals to you, don't forget the idea of serving the dessert in the living room. I have one friend who always does this. We leave the dining room, she wheels in a cart with dessert and dessert plates and it's as smooth as molasses. Anyhow, whatever your plan, work it out carefully and let your guests know what's expected of them. They'll be eager to co-operate, and if a delicious meal is the reward you'll get no complaints, no matter how much self-service is involved. END "Of course I'm too old for your daughter. I'm calling on your wife!"

A Flavor Feast...ready in minutes!

America's Largest Selling Brand

VAN CAMP'S PORK & BEANS

The secret savory sauce is cooked in . . . so heat, eat and enjoy!

A WORLD FOR MY SON

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 91

hands and arms. We had been told to continue the underwater massage, to turn Ben on his stomach and rub his arms, back and leg muscles with olive oil, to give him as nearly as possible the positions, the actions which a child of his age would use. Ben liked the exercises and co-operated as best he could.

Shortly after his third birthday in Fabens Mrs. Jim Surratt brought over a walker. "My little girl has outgrown this," she said, "and my husband thought that if you cushioned it Ben might be able to use it."

We stuffed pillows in front, pillows behind, and placed Ben in it. The walker swerved backward, forward, angrily to the sides.

Mother spoke quietly: "Come on, Paul. Let's roll Ben into the sunshine."

This day marked a new beginning for us all. This was Ben's introduction to the everyday outside world. The people who passed along the street were Mexican, Indian, Austrian, American, all yelling "Hi" to the small boy, stuffed to his nose in pillows.

Now there were trips every week down the valley to the Japanese Gardens, where we had fun with pink-nosed rabbits, quacking ducks, and bought our weekly supply of vegetables and flowers. Miss Stoddard, the history teacher, packed Ben on a pillow, placed pillow and Paul on the seat ledge of her coupé. Nonie and I sat in the seat with her.

Cottonwood trees met above the highway. Ben would watch the roof trees and cry. Wind seemed to affect him strangely. Paul, now going on five, would pat him and hold his hand.

Carrying Ben and leading Paul, we visited the Ysleta Mission. Faded brown grass clumped the entrance. But the images inside had stayed serene for hundreds of years.

Gradually Ben's sense of direction improved. But we saw the pillows slip and his head hit the front piece of the walker over and over again.

"He'll just have to learn," Nonie said, "to hold his head up."

"We'll have tea parties in our yard, Paul. You can fix them. Then Ben can share your playmates too."

As Paul's playmates always saw Ben as one of them, he was accepted normally and naturally.

"Can't he sit up?" A four-year-old pointed to Ben's head.

"No," I answered. "But he likes to have you come."

Happily Ben watched the antics of the three- and four-year-olds with their toys—the wagons that tinkled, the motorcycle cop who tripped himself, cars, trains, and all manner of animated cats, dogs and horses that he could see, hear, touch, but not hold.

But he did not improve, and there was no sign of speech.

It was a Sunday morning when Ben was almost four. Golden-flecked light steeped the West Texas adobe and I was setting the table for lunch. Nonie and Paul were at church.

Ben, in his walker, was still stuffed to his nose in pillows. His little head bobbed back and forth while his shuffling feet sought no direction. I was thinking, I must hurry, hurry. Lunch won't be ready.

Slowly Ben shuffled toward the third drawer down left. The impounded muscles seemed to give a little as his hands reached inside. Torn with an overflow of movement, he found the cloth we used for the Sabbath, pulled and, with a spilling motion, dropped it on the floor.

My voice leaped upon him. "Ben, Ben darling, you knew which cloth we use for Sunday. Oh, Ben, I'm so happy! You knew!"

Now it was Christmas of the same year. Aunt Kate had sent Ben a drum—red and silver and stanch to his touch. The drum was big enough to balance on the front pillow of the walker, and if Ben tried slowly, wristed the sticks carefully, he could make a sound! Paul would turn and look at him. Joy, unspeakable joy, shone in Ben's face.

Nonie and I held his hands tight. You are my lucky star. We beat the drum. "Beat it with me, dear"; over and over, day after day, we held the sticks in his hand.

If only words would come to give him water when he was thirsty, food when he was hungry, or his ball. Because of Ben's lack of words, Nonie, Paul, our friends and I gave Ben all gifts at our command. Weekly jaunts in the walker to the post office and grocery store with Nonie while I babbled on, "Look, Paul and Ben, that tall man is a Texas Ranger. See, Ben, a real cowboy—the best cowboy in El Paso County, but also a first-class deacon in the Baptist church.

"Now let's watch the Agriculture boys brand calves—and Coy Cox incubate white leghorns. Coy will be over after supper, Ben, to sing cowboy songs to you and Paul."

If I had a program—if anyone had a program—at school, Ben was always there, propped in his pillows. He was present for the special school assemblies following the steps of the Indian, glimpsing the true story of bare ground, bare houses and bare skies in the story of the pioneers. Most of my students still worshiped in a mission built in the sixteenth century.

Twenty-three-year-old businessman Ben photographed last summer in a romp with Brownie. Clients of his newspaper-clipping service, which he began and runs himself, include Russian delegates to the United Nations.

In time Ben outgrew the walker. The El Paso Surgical Supply Company sold mechanized adjustable chrome walkers, but they were for larger children. The firm, however, suggested the names of several cabinetmakers and mechanics who might be willing to undertake building a walker.

A mechanic in the twenty-fifth garage I visited promised to make a walker on the lines of the first one, but longer, wider, and with adjustable screws to raise the walker as Ben grew.

Now he could ambulate himself without the pillows. Mother and I hovered near, thinking one thought: He'll never have to be left out now. He can follow Paul to the corner or across the street.

Our reward was the rapturous look in Ben's eyes, saying so clearly, I see and understand it all, but I cannot speak.

No words came. And words became more meaningful, held more interest for us as we uttered them shyly, prayerfully, for this small boy Just a few at a time—just a few words spoken simply and clearly. Over and over.

Night after night passed, and Ben's only voice was a chortling sound that doused hopes rather than strengthened them. But his facial expressions of amusement, approval, disapproval were unmistakable.

Nonie and I were too anxious, too speech-conscious: "Say Ben, dear, Ben. Ben is your name."

Ben, his world falling apart, tried, but the ugly sound came spilling out in an unruly chant.

"Try again, dear ——"

Ben would try, but the world of words seemed to be beyond him.

One day in the spring of 1938 the superintendent called me to his office. "The Scottish Rite Hospital in Dallas will take Ben," he told me. "He's getting too large for you and your mother to handle. He will have to pass the physical examination, but it is just routine."

The Scottish Rite Hospital in Dallas? Would I be able to get a teaching position in Dallas? Did Mr. Lakey think that Ben could be in Dallas and mother and I here? We'd grown to love the range country and we would miss it.

"Thank you, Mr. Lakey," I said. And good-by, Mr. Lakey, good-by.

"There are no vacancies in the Dallas school system." The superintendent smiled. "If you had applied earlier—perhaps next year ——"

That evening at dinner in suburban Oak Cliff, my Cousin Sally suggested, "Why don't you try Highland Park?"

Highland Park. Thoughts of green-bordered Turtle Creek, the luxurious homes, the blossoming gardens of the rich bounced off my plate.

"Make an appointment at my beauty shop," Sally teased. "Take a trip to Neiman Marcus." She was seeing desert-colored me with hair sand-bitten from many dust storms. "It's worth trying," Sally insisted.

The Highland Park superintendent, Mr. Gable, was very pleasant. "What about the coyotes?" he asked, smiling, after I told him about my teaching in the range country.

"Plenty of coyotes," I said, but I didn't laugh. If only I could say the right words, smile the right smile. I was wearing the right kind of clothes. Every penny of last month's salary was applying for this job in a severely tailored navy-blue linen dress and a rose straw hat. Dollars tapped with my expensive heels and jangled on my wrists.

"What makes you think you would like to teach in Highland Park?" Mr. Gable asked.

Glancing out the window, I saw a campus with orderly shrubs and blossoming flower beds. A few blocks away were the libraries and shops of one of the nation's most prosperous industrial cities. I was talking to the superintendent of one of America's wealthiest school systems. But I couldn't tell him the real reason why I wanted to teach here.

I couldn't say, "My son has been accepted by Scottish Rite Hospital—I have to be where he is."

Instead I answered, "Who wouldn't want to teach here?"

"Well"—Mr. Gable eyed me quizzically—"we're quite old-fashioned here in Highland Park. The school board hires the teachers. I do give certain applicants the chance to see them. Here's a list of the members of the scho board. If you really want a place here, try see all these gentlemen today."

The seven on the list were men with address at Southern Methodist University or in dow town Dallas. I went to S.M.U. first and th downtown. All day I walked from one buil ing to another: Magnolia, Santa Fe, Gre Southern Life. Each man asked different que tions about my education, background ar experience. Not one asked if I had children. each office I reached the door to leave before astonished myself by turning and saying, have two small sons."

It was Friday night and we were finishin the black-eyed peas at the dinner table whe my brother called me to the telephone. "Tel gram." The operator spoke gaily. "It say 'Elected teacher of the high fifth grade, John Bradfield School, Highland Park West.'"

Opening day arrived for the Highland Par schools and the teaching staff assembled. Th supervisor in charge of teachers through th fifth grade arose to recount his impressions a summer spent inspecting the West Coa schools. "Some are frankly progressive. Othe are traditional." He paused. "On the whol practice seems to stay pretty close to our ide here of teaching the facts by pupil activit centered around the integrated unit."

My heart sank. Years of teaching ninth grade verbs and tenth-grade adjectives—to sa nothing of Shakespeare and Milton - t eleventh-graders—had failed to prepare me t handle an elementary integrated unit.

The supervisor went on. "Before Monday (this was Thursday) I would like to see th plan of your units in science and socia studies. As you know, we are partial to fou core areas."

Core areas—what on earth? My hands wen cold. But you'll have to do it. Think of Ben.

Our home world at 3205 McFarlin, Univer sity Park, seemed big outside and small inside Paul, not yet old enough under Texas law t enter school, had met a little boy neighbo named Richard. None of us knew his las name. But when Richard and his mothe knocked on our door on Halloween and in vited Paul to go for "trick or treat," we hac found our first neighborhood friend.

"Tell everyone we have treats here too," told Paul.

Nonie and I rushed to the kitchen to se what we could find in the way of crackers, cake or candy. I made lemonade; and in a jiffy we'd lit a sober candle to witch our windows. An suddenly Paul, Nonie, Ben and I had friend wearing sheets and riding broomsticks.

Nonie and I realized that Paul and Ben's universe lay within the range of daily contacts We felt this keenly, for any day now the hos pital might call. We wanted these last days be fore Ben went to the hospital to be especially pleasant and happy.

The hospital called at the end of three months. As it was a school day, a cousin went with Nonie and Ben to the hospital.

All that day long I talked about a social-studies project on the Pan-American confer ence then in session. My voice went on, but my tongue was heavy. Ben will be gone when I reach home. Ben will be gone.

But Ben was waiting for me at the door. I grabbed him. "Oh, Ben!"

Nonie spoke quietly. "They want you to bring Ben and leave him in the hospital for a few days. They want to make him a head brace."

Then she repeated what the doctor had told her: "You see, this is primarily an orthopedic hospital. We have to make room for positive cases, cases we can help and send on their way!"

I burst out, "Where should children like Ben go, then? How can they be treated?"

Several days later when I saw Doctor Carrell, the senior doctor at the hospital, he told me, "It would take years of effort to try to do

CONTINUED ON PAGE 211

The Picture of Health for May

by MAXINE DAVIS

May! Garden-time for Mom! Peonies are in bud, Iris fanning tall. I've seeds to plant, phlox to divide, weeds to pull.

The very soil smells deliciously of Spring. I dig too long too hard for my winter-bound muscles and rheumatic joints. But I don't fret. 've learned to apply warm moist towels when work's ver and then massage in SURIN. I know it gives mazing relief for the pains of arthritis and rheumaism—unique because it reaches to the point of pain.

SURIN also helps those early-season gardening aches o well that I can hurry out with trowel and spade the ext morning—and start getting some new ones!

My husband too loves these sweet May days and kes to leave home soon enough for a pleasant walk o his office.

So, before I even put the coffee on I always check to ee that he has a pair of clean socks and that the ottle of OCTOFEN LIQUID is close by. The reason:—

His feet perspire and the fungi that cause athlete's ot seem to flourish on them. He's had several acute ttacks. OCTOFEN LIQUID stopped them but we've arned that it also prevents them. He keeps OCTOFEN OWDER at the club too—after exercise he washes and ries his feet thoroughly, between each toe, and dusts CTOFEN POWDER on them and into his fresh socks. hat's a little trouble, but it's well worth it!

"I was as lively as a colt" said Grandfather. "Now y trouble has made an old old fellow of me." He as in the dumps.

His "trouble," I learned, was all in his mouth. His ew dentures wouldn't stay in place. As usual, I went o our druggist—and brought home ORA-FIX, an adesive that affixes them so firmly from morning till edtime that he forgets his teeth are new. Now he alks naturally, eats literally anything, and once more eels young as the Springtime.

He also uses its companion, ORA—½ teaspoon in a lass of water—to keep them and his breath clean nd fresh.

Before I get back into my gardening apron, I find oung Janie home from high school, flung across her ed, weeping.

A quarrel with her date? No. Then I see—pimples ll over her forehead and her cheeks ominously plotched. I've coped with this before, with her older ister, and go out for a tube of UTOL.

"Here darling" I tell her. "Smooth this on as you o foundation cream and put your makeup over it. hat will hide those spots, even in bright sunlight."

UTOL, I know from experience, has more than one irtue. An antiseptic antibiotic ointment, it kills erms, and helps prevent new infection, and relieves he minor irritation and itching of acne as well. This nakes her forget the condition. Altogether UTOL proides help for this trial and a great lift for morale—oth very important factors in treating either mild r severe cases. Now Janie looks—and feels—better!

Ben's handicap must not overily.

Dexter had spoken to me
just doesn't eat enough.
n desserts, mashed o chew."
after-school ly proved ites of c-

Now from the laboratories of McKesson co...

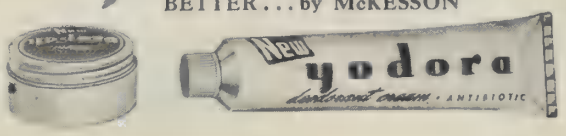
first antibiotic deodora...

...used over 2 years by thousands of women to give longer, safer protection!

Fluffy, white Yodora won't irritate delicate skin. So mild, so gentle you could actually use it for underarm shaving.

AMONG the great medical discoveries in recent years is the use of antibiotics to wipe out bacteria.

Now, for the first time, an antibiotic is used to end perspiration odor. For what causes odor in perspiration, is the bacteria that breed there—and remain in your clothes, to make them objectionable too.



McKesson scientific research now ends this old problem with New antibiotic Yodora. New Yodora stops perspiration bacteria up to 48 hours. And gives this lasting protection without harsh chemicals so it does not injure clothing or irritate your skin. In fact, it is so mild and gentle that you could actually use this fluffy, white cream for underarm shaving.

It is only natural that McKesson laboratories, after years of dedicated research, should pioneer this amazing new principle to take care of unwelcome perspiration odor.

Ask your druggist, whose professional training you can trust, about New antibiotic Yodora. He can tell you why New Yodora is years ahead . . . why it does a better job, naturally, to keep you and your clothes fresh and odor-free. New antibiotic Yodora, in jars or tubes, is economically priced. It is just another example of McKesson's great conscience for perfection, which always strives to "make it better—better for you." © 1957, McKesson & Robbins, Inc., N. Y.

NEW* yodora

BETTER . . . by McKESSON hands and arms. We the underwater stomach and cles with possi ch

nes the 209

ED HYTOP CAPS PROTECT THE QUALITY OF THESE FAMOUS BRANDS

Our cap's off to this "By-You" shrimp sauce!

(9 to 1, you'll take off an Alcoa cap, too!)

Your Guide to the Best in Aluminum Value

Whisk off that Alcoa® HyTop cap—and suddenly, all over the house, appetites appear! It happens because Alcoa HyTop caps lock in saucy flavors, keep them fresh for inspirations like tangy Bayou Shrimp sauce. (Delicious details at right).

No other catsup or ketchup cap is made from pure non-rusting aluminum. No other ketchup or catsup cap has snug-fitting threads that seal in flavor at top and sides. That's why 9 out of every 10 people who tilt ketchup or catsup into anything are, at that same tempting moment, holding an Alcoa HyTop cap in their spare hand!

ALCOA

FREE — RECIPE BOOK

Write: Aluminum Company of America,
1501 Alcoa Bldg., Pittsburgh 19, Pa.

Tangy Bayou Shrimp Sauce

1 cup ketchup or catsup	1/2 tsp dry mustard
2 tablespoons horseradish	1/2 tsp salt
Juice 1/2 lemon	1/4 tsp freshly ground pepper
2 tsp Worcestershire sauce	4 dashes Tabasco

Dissolve mustard and salt in lemon juice. Add to other ingredients in mixing bowl. Stir thoroughly.

THE ALCOA HOUR Television's Finest Live Drama Alternate Sunday Evenings

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 208

ing for your son, a spastic with athetoid ments, and even then we might not be o help."

when Ben was five years and one month heard the word "spastic" for the first e head brace which was made for Ben down the sides and held his head steady

. Doctor Carrell had also told me, g your son to the Scottish Rite for out-nt treatment every Thursday."

these treatments the neurologist, stress-elf-activity, made Ben push a baby car-though his pushing position was a ling mass. He could not stand alone, but fused to help him when he fell.

suggested ball throwing, ball squeezing,
s, large and small, no matter how unssful the attempt on his part. She said, us squarely, unsympathetically, "You all help. You must be his bulwark—his base in the conquest of his world. But ust teach him to be independent."

e neurologist recommended two hours half of rest each day, and said that Ben d be allowed no toys at this time. "These en are different from other children," ent on. "They will seem to improve when is no improvement. One day you will they are capable of anything; the next here is a slump."

ring the Thanksgiving holidays shortly that Paul came running to me. "Mamma, na, Ben said ball!"

rn with amazement, I listened and I
it. The word came again.

all!"

ddenly I was swept with the thought of s that had never been spoken, words I aited for Ben to speak. I pounced, prodnd prompting, when I should have been His beautiful eyes ignored me. His eyes fixed on the red-white-and-blue-striped "Ball," he repeated.

knew he would talk," Nonie spoke ely.

rtly after the beginning of my second n the Highland Park school, one of my s came shyly to my desk. "Are you Miss rs.?" he asked.

hy, Joe, you called me 'Mrs.' all last
You know I'm 'Mrs.' Why?"

ell"—he grinned—"my mother's having y for the class; and if you're not married, going to invite a gentleman for you."

hoops and hollers awaited me in front of palatial home. And there was everything e party that could be expected except a for me. I don't know yet whether Joe's er or Joe made up my gentleman.

most as if in recompense, one of the par-came to me at P.T.A. the next Tuesday.
at's wrong with George's spelling?"
ge's mother asked.

ot anything, really," he explained.
rge is new here. He'll be all right in a few ell, the Highland Park schools aren't like cala, Florida, schools."

ala. In a moment the room of beautifully ned women had vanished and I was back llulah Falls, Georgia, at the age of thir-

y very first love came from Ocala," I
"Dexter Phillips. Do you know him?"

ertainly," George's mother, who still d to talk about spelling, answered. "His lied several years ago. Dexter has a small who lives with his mother in Ocala."

e prints-and-pottery exhibit, the lace cloth, the tea service, the exploring of parents were forgotten. I was back again e Maplewood Inn in Tallulah Falls in 1919, piling my hair high upon my head lipping back down to the lounge after my was asleep for one more look at my —who was himself in love with a sund beauty named Inez.

e're going back to Ocala this spring," ge's mother said and closed the subject.

here's a letter for you on the table," e greeted me.

e postmark froze my fingers. My hands
n to tremble, for the writing was Dexter's, he postmark, Tallulah Falls, Georgia.

Opening the letter, I found a line to vouch for fairy stories: "I wanted to wait until I could mail this to you from Tallulah Falls."

A reserve officer, Dexter had been on active duty with the Army since 1934. Might he fly to Texas to see me? Might he?

A report from Doctor Carrell, written on June 30, 1939, said: "We tried keeping patients of Ben's type in the institution, but found that hospitalization was so little better than home care that we came to the decision that we could not in justice to other children who need treatment accept them for long periods.

"Personally I would like to see an institution of this kind in Texas and several times have suggested that this state should have a place for training these children."

Ben sat alone without falling for the first time at the age of five in the summer of 1939. He had been building a block house. We removed the pillows from around him, and he kept on building the block house. We stood waiting for him to fall as he had so many times before. But he did not fall.

"All that I can ever do for Ben, we will do." I recognized in Dexter's words the promise, the integrity that had kept a memory long and fair.

"There are other things you should know," I said, laughing, seeking to lighten the moment. "I can't sew a stitch or cook a biscuit. And I have to have flowers in the house."

"You can grow the flowers."

"Can I?"

"You shall have flowers."

Dexter and I were married January 27, 1940, in Dallas' Highland Park Presbyterian Church. And on the honeymoon Dexter reassured me, "You really won't need to sew for our ready-made family. Just so, and I quote—'Just so your heart doesn't grow dusty on my sleeve.'"

Nice words, I thought, for an electrical engineer.

If Ben were writing this he would say, "Tear up all the first part, mother. My life really began that morning in Dallas when daddy ——"

When Dexter bought the high chair, sawed off the legs, fastened it with belts and straps to the back seat of the car and said, "This is a honeymoon, Ben, and you're going on it!"

The map of that trip to Atlanta, penciled in time, is a succession of snow-etched roads in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, with Paul and Ben grinning at every river, every gasoline pump, every subdued city. Ben, at last, was really going somewhere.

Dexter and I were old friends, new lovers, and frightened. Please make it right, our eyes said as we looked down the road and prattled gaily about white houses, public parks and low farmhouses in cream-brown silhouettes all through the gulf route south.

"We'll get Bill next week." Bill was Dexter's nine-year-old who had lived with Dexter's mother in Ocala since Bill's mother's death in 1936. "The sooner we get our family together, the better."

The better. Ben bounced and sprawled in his cut-down high chair, making big words we could not understand. Paul kept up the endless chatter of the seven-year-old.

Bill. What would Bill think of his new brothers? What would he think of me?

We came to a tourist court outside Birmingham. Together Dexter and I undressed Ben, heard Paul's prayers, and faced our own low, white-washed walls. The temperature outside the court stood at seventeen above. A mass of piny woods seemed lost beyond the window, and our words were suddenly careful in a maze of planning this and that we'd do for our sons.

"There's a drive-in movie in Atlanta." Dexter's voice was measuring our life ahead. "Ben will like that. You know there isn't a thing that we want from Ben that we don't want from the other boys. And there isn't a thing that we want from the other boys that we don't want from Ben."

We looked at each other, asking in one solemn glance, "Could we do it? Could we prove to my doubting brother and Dexter's questioning mother that a new family, one with a cruelly handicapped child, could live a normal life? Could be happy?"

Perhaps the unity which our family seemed to achieve in so short a time was due in part to the strangeness, the general "glad to know you" attitude which we all seemed to adopt. Events which might have been ordinary in other households were festive occasions in ours.

"Mamma," Paul would yell, "Bill has boots. I don't have any boots."

"You aren't as old as Bill either."

"Look at the games, daddy, that Paul and Ben brought with them."

Daddy would look and exclaim. He'd see war games, junior chemical sets, quiz games, large tumbling balloons, tool chests. To Bill these weren't just games; they were Paul's and Ben's games and, beginning at the moment, Bill's, just as his were theirs.

There were many opportunities in our daily life to promote self-esteem in our sons. Who could teach Ben to play this game first? Who could help him to find what's new in the tangled back yard and the neighborhood? Could anybody gather enough of those wild strawberries in that vacant lot for a pie?

Ben, with a father and a new brother, must not be overwhelmed by his handicap. Now, more than ever, he must have his turn at the game, the ball or the strawberry—his share of listening to good man talk. And, in this helping period, Ben's handicap must not overwhelm the family.

Before Bill came Dexter had spoken to me of one problem. "He just doesn't eat enough. Likes hamburgers, gelatin desserts, mashed potatoes—just doesn't want to chew."

We bought beef bouillon for after-school four-o'clocks. Here again our family proved the answer. Watching the healthy appetites of Paul and Ben, Bill was soon asking for a second helping too.

The very roof of the house seemed tender and precious as Dexter and I sought to ferret out the essentials and nonessentials for three small boys aged six, seven and nine. We worked at uniting our family the way other families work at arriving in a community.

In our house, we realized, there would have to be time—plenty of time—for choices, many choices, so that each of the boys could find out what he liked most to do. Right now, besides school, we could begin to give them games, books, music, picnics, picture shows, rides, friends, neighbors, Sunday school on Sunday, and small introductions to community life. For us, more than for the more average family, our children must have a chance to help plan all family projects.

My life that spring was a succession of more cookies for all, pick up this toy, turn that radio down, Ben; and just one more hour, Ben, and your brothers will be home from school!

"Yes, Bill, you may study in the living room, if you can stand the noise. The living room's the common room for all. It's really better to go where it's quiet."

After school was outside-play time while Ben held on as best he could, mostly in watching his new brother's preoccupation with football, basketball or baseball.

He was taught by us and his squealing brothers that he must take his part in the family routine—on time for meals, naps, teeth, bath—and that he must take his turn at selecting the game we would play.

As Ben had to be fed, it would have been easier to give him his meals first; but our family conservation, we were learning, began here and now—in the way daddy waited to eat his dessert with mother, and that Ben, with assistance, should hunt hearts on Valentine Day and select his new Easter clothes just as Paul and Bill did.

For though Paul had always accepted his handicapped brother, it was our job to teach Bill by example the understanding that comes from the effort to accept those who are in some way different from ourselves.

It must have been hard for Bill, though he never said so—has never said so to this day.

Paul saw the black box coming up the sidewalk first. "Oh, mother, hurry quick. A man's bringing in a coffin!"

I hurried to look. True, four men were bringing up our sidewalk a huge flat object that looked like a coffin. "Which way, madam?" one of them asked.

"Which way with what?"

"Captain Phillips' radio transmitter."

"Is he moving Fort McPherson in here?"

"No, ma'am. Hasn't he told you about his ham station?"

"Oh, yes, but I didn't know ——"

I didn't know anything; I was to learn. Our house suddenly buzzed with such words as oscillator, XYL, logbook, handle, 80 meter—10 meter—20 meter. How many times I've bitten my lip, pouted, resented the hours my husband spends at amateur radio. But Ben was completely fascinated; and from that day another new world opened for him.

There were small weekly allowances for all three boys, shows on Saturday for Paul and Bill and a gift of like monetary value for Ben, selected by Paul and Bill.

And what wonderful selections. We met cars, trucks, blocks, trains, paste-in books, color cube designs, paints, funny faces, toy carpentry and garden tools, puzzles, monkeys climbing and not climbing strings.

There were rides on Sunday afternoons with the decisions where to go made by the boys, with Dexter and me also taking our turns. We chased kites in Piedmont or glimpsed bears in Grant. Tiring of kites and bears, we squabbled

"I only asked if you are married!"

over popcorn at the Atlanta airport while the boys saw gliding in the makers of the noises which kept us awake at night.

"Mother," I would hear a boyish voice exclaim at the end of each Sunday ride, "I want six jellies!" We had a family agreement that the boys could make their own choice and have as many sandwiches as they wanted for Sunday-night supper.

"Give them all they can eat!" Dexter admonished. "Most parents just don't know how hungry a boy can get. I remember!"

And Dexter, realizing that we were Ben's life line for the rest of the world, insisted that work, however monotonous, must also be respected. The boys were expected to hang up their belongings, pick up toys, and keep their room in order on Susie Q's day off (Susie Q being Dexter's name for every full- or part-time maid we've ever had). The boys were to set and clear the table and wash the dishes. If they were late for breakfast, they were to cook their own breakfast. They were to polish their shoes for school and Sunday, straighten their own room and do any errands mother and daddy asked.

Ben's handicap did not allow him to follow through with this program. But he learned by observations and was never to need prompting in later years for orderliness or neatness.

Suddenly it was summer and school was over. The boys were at home and there were twenty-four hours in a day, with three months of days stretching ahead.

I knew well enough what the boys needed—interesting experiences, not just on Sunday afternoons but every day of the week, a schedule, camp! But Bill was the only one old enough to go to camp and he simply couldn't leave us our first summer together. Camp—with hours for work, hours for rest, hours for play. My mind began to mark a board with quiet chalk. We had a huge basement. Our boys needed to know more of the neighborhood boys. Why not?

I rushed to the telephone and dialed McPherson. When Dexter answered, I ye "Honey, hurry home after work. I've a derful idea! We can fix up the basen You'll have to paint the chairs, the floor the table—there's already a badmintor down there. We're going to have can home. Right here in our house. Then can have it too."

"Will we have to feed the other boys?"

"Oh, no, they'll all go home at noon."

We had camp.

Our schedule was written down in black white, and carried out to the letter:

9–10 A.M. Outdoors. Leaf, flower, rock, or gardening project—may plan individu or in groups. Plan must be approved.

10–11 A.M. Basement. Indoor games; personal project—may be a scrapbook, o activity in music, arts or crafts. (The c boys went home at 11.)

11–12 A.M. Bath and free play in- or ou doors.

12–1 P.M. Lunch.

1–1:30 P.M. Free.

1:30–3 P.M. Rest. May work individu if quiet.

3–Bedtime. Free.

Special days were celebrated and each was given the opportunity to learn to give take orders by directing camp. All the helped Ben. Ben in turn helped all of the the love and interest that overflowed his and speech.

Dexter and I agreed upon one rule of cipline. If disagreements arose, we settle arguments, took no sides. Inflexibly we "You boys go home and our boys must into the house and be quiet. Later, perl

Next to God, we are indebted to women, first for life itself, and then for making it worth living. BOVEE you'll adjust your own problems and war play and work together again."

It was our privilege to hear many ti "Sh-h—don't fuss. Don't you know, if do, she'll make us go home!"

One night at dinner Dexter asked, "V don't we send your mother a ticket to c visit us?"

"Oh, honey," I squealed. "Could we?"

We did and Nonie arrived for a two we visit. And has stayed for sixteen years to us the understanding and faith that she garnered from eighty years' experiences. boys adored and adore their Nonie! She k so much more and had known so much lo than mamma and daddy. And was so n calmer about it!

Suddenly our house was full of new st and new games from an older era. Ben, and Bill learned to play dominoes, fl and forty-two. Ben's cards had to be held, he could flip over his domino on the tabl the right time.

And suddenly, with Nonie there, I had n leisure to meet and know my six-month band who said quite simply:

"Let's go on a new honeymoon—to lulah Falls!"

Our lunch was packed, there was gas in car and suitcases were in process of b loaded for a trip to Texas when the teleph rang.

It was the grapevine, a true grapevine the form of a radio operator at Fort McP son telling my husband, "Orders have c through for you to report to MacDill F in Tampa, September eight, as base si officer."

The house at 3205 Santiago in Palma C Tampa, had a jacaranda tree in the f yard and a tulip or mountain-ebony tree at back.

We had three new additions to our fam a white cat, Pzozia; a white canary, Tw and Bosco, a white Spitz. They were all coming gifts from Florida relatives friends.

NOW-French Dressing that starts with Real Mayonnaise! Delicious on Tossed Salads

At last—an ideal French dressing made with creamy, smooth Best Foods Mayonnaise—perfect as is, yet so easily varied. Simply mix ½ cup Real Mayonnaise, 1 tbsp. vinegar, 2 tbsp. milk or water, ¼ tsp. sugar, salt and pepper. To vary this basic dressing for any tossed salad, follow suggestions under the picture. Idea: make all 4 variations now. They keep beautifully . . . and m-m-m, what they'll do for your salads!

TRY THESE 4 EASY VARIATIONS, TOO

A For a zesty Star-Kist Tuna Salad dressing, add 3 tbsp. chili sauce and 2 drops Tabasco.

B Serving Vegetable Salad? Add 2 tbsp. crumbled Roquefort or bleu cheese to the basic dressing.

C To make the dressing sweet and tart for Fruit Salads . . . add 2 tbsp. heavy cream and 1 tbsp. grated orange rind.

D For an extra-special Cole Slaw . . . add 1 tbsp. mustard with horseradish to basic recipe.

You bring out food's whole flavor when you use Best Foods Mayonnaise. For a "golden touch" with dressings, sauces, sandwiches, with so many good foods . . . use the mayonnaise that's made creamy smooth with whole eggs—whites, yolks, even extra yolks.

Best Foods® REAL MAYONNAISE

ALSO AVAILABLE IN CANADA

hree pets in a row became our boys' per-al projects, and eased their beginnings in ool, church and community.
en was seven now and I allocated two rs a day regularly for lessons. He learned to use a color book, copying as best he ld an already colored picture. He learned ecognize his letters, figures and simple ental words. He did not learn to read, writing was impossible.

Operated jointly by the American Legion and the Hillsborough County school board, Ben's first school was one room for cerebrally palsied and orthopedically handicapped children in a basement of the W. B. Henderson School in Tampa the fall of 1941.

Transportation was not provided. Since Dexter needed the car to drive to MacDill in the beginning, we depended upon taxi drivers. Later, we ran an advertisement and hired a driver for $5 a week. At school Ben sat in the honeymoon high chair, now equipped with a bib of plywood, and rollers on the legs. He still could not sit straight in a chair.

There was no special equipment, no therapy. Nevertheless, it was a real school and Ben was with other boys and girls. He left in the morning, returned in the afternoon and began to make friends, special friends of his own outside the home.

The WPA matron brought meals from the school cafeteria and fed the children who could not feed themselves.

Ben's school gave him stature with his brothers. Paul was in the third grade now, scuttling under footballs, always bringing home stray cats.

Bill, in the fifth grade, was building a castle with drawbridge and moat; he was practicing tunes on a toy flute, a miniature xylophone, any metal or instrument that was sweet in its sound. He was also studying geography, fractions, and making friends with boy neighbors.

"Come to our house to play!" seemed natural enough, since our house afforded the largest corner lot. The boys brought their own baseballs, bats and mitts—we furnished the noninterference, the games and the ice water.

THER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 86 AND 87

Vogue Design No. 8908. Shirt and slacks; 12 to 20 (30 to 38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 8971. Blouse; 10 to 20 (31 to 40). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 9089. "Easy to Make" cape; small (31 to 32), medium (34 to 36), large (38 to 40). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9139. Shirt, slacks, and apron; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9143. One-piece dress; 10 to 16 (31 to 36). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9165. "Easy to Make" shorts. 24 to 32 waist measure. 50c.
Vogue Design No. 9177. "Easy to Make" skirt; 24 to 34 waist measure. 60c.
Vogue Design No. 9178. One-piece dress; 10 to 20 (31 to 40). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9179. Peignoir and gown, small (31 to 32), medium (34 to 36), large (38 to 40). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9180. One-piece dress; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9181. One-piece dress; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.

Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . .
with light, lacy
Decorette®
it's the glamorous
"Magic Bow"

For a bride's gift, a lacy Decorette "Magic Bow" adds the perfect touch of feminine flattery . . . and so easily! You simply follow the "Magic Bow" directions on any roll of Decorette Brand Ribbon. Bows combining Decorette and Sasheen Ribbons are lovely, too . . . like the luxurious twosome at the left. Choose from a glamorous bouquet of colors at your favorite store.

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE23835

"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons

PRODUCTS OF 3M COMPANY RESEARCH — MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, St. Paul 6, Minnesota ©3M Co.

Thomaston Sheets

Available at your favorite store in dream-pastels and snowy white —a quality for every purse and purpose.

A product of Thomaston Mills • Thomaston, Ga.

"You may always invite a friend to dinner," we told the boys. "But let us know in time to get his name in the pot."

Later, to encourage play with Ben, we bought a toy telephone extension set with yards of wire that reached all over the lot. Ben, stationed in his walker at one corner, could yell signals and actively participate in three-, four-, five- or six-corner conversations.

While we struggled with housework, new friends for ourselves and the boys and the ever-present problems of speech and physical therapy, Dexter, now a major, had less family time as he struggled with the signal problems of a brand-new, sprawling air base.

At two o'clock in the morning he'd whisper, "Have to go to MacDill, honey—have to decode a message."

"I'll go too."

"Oh, no ——"

But I would and did every single time. I'd sit in the car outside the signal office, watching bows and arrows of stars flitting across the close Florida sky. Fog would drift—pausing, eluding—while I waited.

In thirty or forty minutes Dexter would join me and we'd drive back home.

While Nonie boy-sat, we called on the general, and the lieutenants and captains called on us. Our sons helped plant the shrubs around the signal office, met the PX and the commissary, and watched big silver boats float in and off the line.

Then it was a quiet Sunday afternoon, December 7, 1941. Pleasant boy sounds called upon our ears. The talk was of the drive to the lakes coming up, the sandwiches for supper and tomorrow's school.

The news from Pearl Harbor melted the air in our bedroom. Dexter rushed to the base, the boys huddled near making breathless sounds, not completely uncomprehending.

Then everybody was at war, or going to war. Friends we'd loved were transferred here and there. But at our house there was a momentous, nonwarlike event. Slowly, painfully, Ben was beginning to learn to read.

Our thoughts and words were prideful but not so satisfying as the holy light in Ben's eyes as he accomplished a little more day after day.

Yes, Ben is sitting alone now, for longer and longer periods, and is really learning to read, we would write the West Texas neighbors. If only he could write—but there seemed to be no way to teach him to hold a pencil.

Eight to eleven is the age for much physical exertion. Ben was given the same opportunities as Paul and Bill in turns with an archery set (daddy helping Ben), a joint rock collection and three small cameras.

Dexter, something of an amateur photographer, guided the boys in a few principles of making good pictures: simple subject matter, location, right camera distance and elevation. Paul and Bill made their own pictures. Dexter, Paul or Bill made Ben's for him and helped him place the prints in his snapshot book.

The boys were growing older now. There were many questions to be settled. Dexter and I decided upon two points of discipline which I believe earned us our children's respect. Discipline for our sons should always be agreed upon jointly between us, and should never be discussed publicly with them. Under no circumstances would we correct our sons in front of strangers.

"Paul, Bill, Ben, come to the bedroom!" always meant there was a problem to solve, an adjustment to make. Sons stated their side (Ben, if not involved, always on his brothers'); parents, theirs.

"Talking it out," healed all our differences except one. When Pzozia had babies under the house, fearing mold, water, germs, we forbade the boys to crawl through the small opening to find the kittens.

Driving up one afternoon, we saw Paul's feet sticking through the hole and knew that Bill was already gone. With Ben trying to whi him, Dexter whipped the boys, then spanke Ben for his interference.

"You can jump off to India here," Bi smiled, gazing out past deep Miami in March 1942, on the way to Pompano. Here were blu water, trimmed bougainvillaea and a continua sky—the road to Fort Lauderdale.

Corraled by Nonie, the boys were deep i funny books in the back seat.

Dexter and I heard nothing, saw nothin but the sign, "Lago del Mare," which marke Dr. Earl Carlson's winter school for cerebrall palsied children.

We sent Paul and Bill off to the beach. Dex ter, mother and I went inside with Ben.

After the doctor had examined him, h turned to us. "A fine boy, a very fine boy Your son should be able to take a colleg education."

Tears flooded my eyes as I listened.

"Get Ben leg braces—build up his shoe three quarters of an inch," Doctor Carlso told us. "Fasten his plate in a wooden groov and see that he starts now to feed himself. Re member that motor control comes throug mental control. The nerve impulses mus begin to form new patterns to take th place of those that are gone."

RUSKIN SAYS:

It is more difficult to be simple than to be complicated.

When love and skill work together, expect a masterpiece.

Never omit an opportunity of doing a kindness, speaking a true word or making a friend.

The doctor took through his school. We sa electric typewriters whic moved at a touch, micr phones that recorded whisper. There were speci exercise rooms and speci tutors, special bars f walking, special rooms f learning to crawl.

But Ben was too big crawl.

Doctor Carlson contir ued. "As Ben learns t control his emotions, h will likewise learn to cor trol his motion." As Be learns to control his emo tions ——

We came home from Pompano to insta long walking bars. Today we are told to pair the steps where the feet should go, but the we did not know such a book as Edmun Jacobson's Progressive Relaxation. But w did know that at last we had found tangib things that might help: a wooden board wit a deep groove for Ben's oven-glass plate; typewriter fastened to a table for his use and long braces with hip support.

Still, with or without the braces, after tryir month upon month Ben could not stand witl out support, walk, dress, attend to his toil needs or successfully feed himself. He couldn play ball, no matter how large the ball or h hard he tried. And he couldn't go anywhere himself.

Strange Army people were still a maze faces gathering to look at him—asking in th brooding glances, "Does he really know an thing?"

And by now Ben, who had never been le out of a picnic, a party or a game in his lif knew almost everything: that grace at th table, prayers at bedtime were the streng source of a family; that there was a time work, a time to rest and play. He could pl flinch, bridge, dominoes—if someone el played the cards, he could pitch the dominoe

Hours of being a spectator in his walker ha brought him a keen perception of birds, s ting quietly on telephone wires and singi just for him. He observed that it was the bl jay that ate the grain in the bird feeder.

He had felt silence ease a young wound words; and he knew how to persist until l got almost everything he wanted.

But Dexter and I grieved for the physic therapy that he needed every day at the sar time. And no book, no reference source w specific on this point. He could walk stumble; stumble—walk in the bars; but Dc tor Carlson's words were too general. W needed a therapist and the right exercises f this arm, this leg, this hour, this day.

The exercises from Denver's Dr. G wc all we had. They had given strength and vigc

CONTINUED ON PAGE 216

The problem of fatigue in reducing diets

Why do so many people on diets feel tired . . . lose mental alertness?

Can energy stay up while pounds go down?

What kind of foods do you need to keep up your energy?

Recent scientific findings show how sugar can help you lose weight with less hunger—less fatigue

Most people who diet want to do it fast.

Do it and get it over with, they say. In their zeal, they often fall prey to one or another of the bizarre, unbalanced "wonder" diets. Sometimes they eliminate all sugar, and slash many important foods to a level that wouldn't satisfy the nutritional requirements of a small child.

Soon after, fatigue—both physical and mental fatigue—becomes a daily problem for them. Science says this is Nature flashing a red light.

Why Do You Get Tired?

Diet or no diet, energy is the first need of the body, even taking precedence over maintenance and repair. Whenever energy reserves fall, Nature signals to the mind and the body to slow down. And so any physical effort becomes tiring and mental performance falls off.

The trouble is, few people can afford to slow down. The businessman keeps on driving himself, growing irritable and hard to please. The tired mother nags at her family, and often finds herself becoming unaccountably depressed over trifles.

It is no wonder these people quit dieting—and go back to their old eating habits.

Is there any real answer? Can you keep your energy up while the pounds go down?

What To Do About It

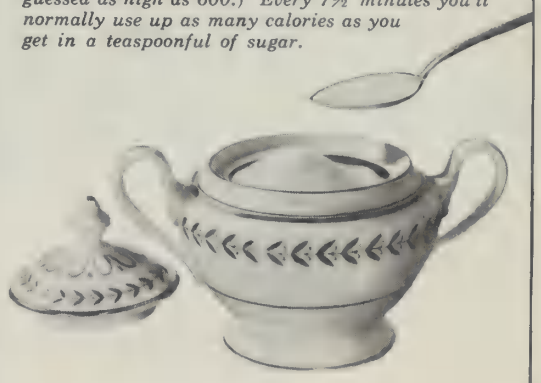
The most authoritative scientific thinking today says the best plan, if you want to control your weight, is to continue to eat a normal balance of foods—keep on eating the foods you have been accustomed to having. Don't cut them out, simply cut down on the portions.

All foods have calories. Calories are the units of energy your body needs for every action, even breathing. However, in normal eating, about two-thirds of these energy calories are in the form of starches and sweets. Easy to understand why cutting out either of these foods can cause the body to send out fatigue warnings.

How Sugar Helps

Easy to understand, too, why the newer reducing diets call for mid-morning or mid-afternoon "energy breaks" in the form of a sugar-sweetened beverage, or a cookie, or a piece of candy. These have been called "Scientific Nibbles."

The reason is simply that sugar supplies Nature's "top priority" calories. Ounce for ounce, no other food supplies energy so fast. (And, of course, calories consumed as energy can never be deposited as fat.)



Sugar can help you live with your diet in other important ways, too. It helps keep your appetite satisfied on less food. And it makes what you do eat more enjoyable.

The newer knowledge of nutrition now says there isn't a basic dieting reason in the world why any normal, healthy person should have to use artificial, imitation sweeteners (with no energy value) instead of the natural sweetener, sugar.

These are the facts. In their light, why would anyone with a choice to make—particularly anyone on a reducing diet—short-change himself on the sugar which supplies the vigor and quick energy his body needs?

18 CALORIES!

Surprise you that there are only 18 calories in a level teaspoonful of sugar? (Some people we asked guessed as high as 600.) Every 7½ minutes you'll normally use up as many calories as you get in a teaspoonful of sugar.

SUGAR INFORMATION, INC.

New York, 5, New York

All statements in this message apply to both beet and cane sugar.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 214

but no pattern for the large muscles necessary for writing or walking.

Trying to make up for lack of physical knowledge, we searched again for interests that Ben might share with the two other boys.

In the fall of 1942 we began our "family evenings." We had quizzes with such simple questions as, "Where's Baton Rouge, Nonie?" "Where's Pine Bluff, Paul?" Around the family circle went questions on the geography of the United States. When Ben's time came, each of us understood that we must make the question simpler, nearer home but just as authentic.

On another evening the subject would be arithmetic, addition or subtraction in question form. Or a "make-it-up" evening when each could muster his own kind of quiz to try to stump the others.

Between "family evenings," school and Sundays, we pounced on fiddler crabs on Gandy Bridge, listened to the Kentucky Derby at Indian Rocks, rented Fourth of July cabins on the glistening gulf where Ben in an inner tube was waddled like a duck and dipped like a calf.

During that school year of 1941–42 Ben learned to read well, though there was much difficulty in pronunciation. He was excellent in arithmetic and far below the average in spelling because of his inability to write.

In January, 1943, Dexter was promoted to lieutenant colonel and ordered to take a signal battalion to the Far East from Oklahoma City.

We hurriedly rented our bedroom to a young Army couple, so that Nonie and the boys would not be alone at night. I left for Oklahoma City with Dexter.

January, February, March, April passed. Snow turned to lilacs and still no final overseas orders came through.

One day as we passed a surgical-supply house I glimpsed the same walker I had seen in El Paso years ago. But now Ben was la enough to use it. We bought and shippe to Ben.

The next day Dexter was ordered to ope signal school in Birmingham, and I retur to Tampa.

Nonie, the boys and I were on the tr from Tampa to Shreveport, Louisiana, in M 1943. Dexter had been named signal officer the Third Tactical Air Division at Barksc Field, and we were on our way to join him

Ben loved the train, the hustle, the bus this home for now where mother didn't co and Nonie spent all her time pointing rivers, towns, switch engines, marines, s ors, and the cute little blond girls three se away.

Our thoughts of and dreams for Ben mad partially peaceful pattern in the transfer-he go-there years of World War II.

Dexter was soon on maneuvers at Ridder, telephoning mornings and evening see how we were.

"I caught Paul striking matches," I had report one night. "I'm sure he won't do again. Bill's lost the key to his woodw locker. Ben's lonesome. There's no school h for Ben."

Then Nonie talked to R. H. White, sup intendent of the Caddo Parish schools, ab a school for cerebrally palsied children. S reported, "He was very pleasant. He said t if there were enough children—if we co show him there is a need for the school– would see what could be done."

That very morning we began our teleph ing, listing the names of cerebrally pals children who should be in school. But we s realized that this project would take mont We had to have a more immediate me to continue Ben's schooling.

"Put an ad in the newspaper," Dexter t me, "and hire a tutor. Be sure that the tu is also qualified in speech."

Ben, Nonie, Paul, Bill and I wrote the a vertisement together. As it finally appea in the Shreveport Times it read: Wanted, qua fied tutor in elementary grades and spe therapy for cerebrally palsied boy aged ni Mornings only. Apply in person.

Then I talked to Ben. "She or he is to your teacher," I said. "Nonie and I will sit when the applicants come, but you will be t one to make the decision."

Twenty-five applicants came, eying B with pity and compassion. Lads like statu women with questioning eyes.

All that I might say could never bring Be choice, Josephine Flowers, to the printed pa Her tiptilted smile completely overlook Ben's gestures of agonizing flesh.

"See here"—she spoke in the way she lift her head—"we'll have none of this. You a I will walk these Shreveport streets on c mornings and warm sunshiny days and w ring bells, too, wherever we walk."

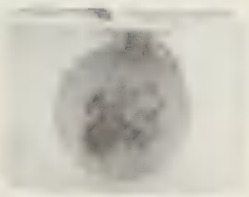
Nonie and I would slip to the front door watch them. Ben in his walker, Jo with co colored hair and laughing eyes, on their w to the nearest elementary school so that at cess Ben could have a part in baseball, fo ball, marbles and laughter.

Ben and Jo gathered leaves for a simple l collection, filled fruit jars with live inse studied cement, streetcars, and visited t Louisiana State Fair.

Together they counted wild geese and co posed rhymes upon a shadowy rock. A though his hands couldn't hold the boo Ben was reading better. "As for arithmetic" Jo laughed—"he's an honest-to-goodne whiz at figures!"

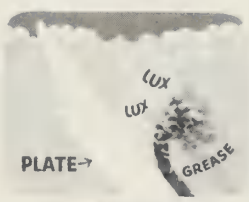
On a search for educational toys, Dex and I found a puzzle which Ben worked befo Paul or Bill did. Known as the "15" Puzzle, consisted of a square box with fifteen numera and one blank square. The numbers cou thus be shifted one by one. The object of t game was to get the numbers arranged proper sequence from 1 to 15. Ben quick became adept in solving this puzzle. Then h incentive was to see how quickly he cou work it.

One day Mrs. Flowers said, "Ben's teac ing me to play chess."



"Is he really?" I asked incredulously.

For taking the work out of dishwashing



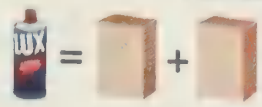
there's no liquid or powder like Lux Liquid

COMPARE! We guarantee you'll find it better for dishes than anything else.
(Incidentally, you can have your money back if you don't.)

Old-fashioned powders waste time

—are slow about dissolving, slow about removing grease! And you have to rinse thoroughly to get rid of the powder residue that streaks your china, glasses.

Lux Liquid cuts under grease instantly



—splits it up into tiny particles that disperse immediately. Grease can't settle back, rinses away fast. Glasses, china come sparkling, hygienically clean.

Treats hands right—Lux-mild Lux Liquid!

No powder—no other liquid—is Lux-mild. You'll see and feel the wonderful difference on your hands, as soon as you start using Lux Liquid for the dishes.

Fast... thrifty...  no other liquid is Lux-mild on hands!

1 can does the work of more than 2 boxes of the leading powder

Lux Liquid is concentrated for economy. Just a teaspoonful does a whole dishpanful—saves you money!

Another happy milestone in his life, and in our lives, had come. For though Ben could ot take part in physically competitive games, e all knew how much excitement there is in ess. He had watched us playing for years. nd though Ben could not move the men, he uld direct the moves and was soon able meet the other members of the family on ual ground.

But the lessons with Jo Flowers came to an d when Sergeant Flowers, Jo's husband, was nsferred.

The Caddo Parish superintendent having en supplied with the lists he had asked for d having received the approval of the hool board, the Cottage School for Cereally Palsied Children was opened in Janu- y of 1945.

The Cottage School was one of a unit of ildings in the Louisiana State Fair Grounds posite Fair Park High. There Miss Sara ay taught all ages and all classes. There were speech, occupational or physical therapists. nch was brought over on trays from the gh-school cafeteria. A maid assisted the ildren getting on and off the bus.

Then it was Christmas again. Snow covered eples, the streets, the windy trees outside.

The postman arrived and Ben, eyes shining e stars, held a card in his hand picturing a Life is like playing a violin solo in public and learning the instrument as one goes on. SAMUEL BUTLER ange-looking Santa Claus. The postmark s Bergen, Norway, and the message read: "Ben, you can tell as much about what these nta Claus men are doing as I can. Norgian things are still all so new to me.

"We are trying to learn Norwegian, but alost everyone speaks English. The country is autiful, mountains, seas, strange houses.

"Merry Christmas, my favorite American.

JO FLOWERS."

Mrs. Frank Wilkerson, a friend we had met rough our interest in cerebral palsy, asked if e might come three afternoons a week to e Ben the physical therapy which she had ed to teach her son, Frank, to walk. Frank, o had had cerebral palsy, had died the nter before from a bronchial infection.

When we offered to pay, Mrs. Wilkerson used. "No, no, I couldn't. I really couldn't. ank didn't have a school."

Mrs. Wilkerson taught Ben slowly and ietly, how to stand, achieve balance, and en to walk as best he could, while she held n from behind.

And Ben improved. One . . . two . . . three . . . ur . . . five . . . six . . . seven . . . eight . . . ne . . . ten—we counted the steps across the om, with Mrs. Wilkerson following slowly hind him.

"I've made you some jingle-bell slippers, n," she said one day. Red slippers, croeted in love, slipped upon his toes and tined merrily as he lifted his feet.

Paul and Bill joined the First Methodist urch in Shreveport, on Easter Sunday, 45.

The teacher in me, more than the mother, manded talks at our continuing family eveings for fun, for pronunciation, for poise on e's feet.

Ben listened delightedly while Bill told us How to Make a Table," or Paul spoke on A Trip to Russia," Russia being his parular social-studies unit in the Barret School venth grade. Ben, pleased to take part, oke as plainly as he could on "My Bus Trip oday," or "My Friends at the Cottage hool."

Magazines and books were an important rt of our lives. Ben's span of attention was t long enough yet for book reading. But his terest in newspapers and current events was r above the average.

In October, 1945, we left Shreveport and ere on our way back to Tampa. The wartozen years were over.

Dexter had been offered a splendid job in Pensacola, but we both knew that there was no school for Ben there. Without the colonel's salary there would be less money in Tampa—income from two small orange groves and an independent telephone company at McIntosh—but a way of life we could choose and maintain for ourselves.

Paul and Bill faced adjustments at Wilson Junior and Plant high schools and Ben, sans speech or physical therapy, went back to the basement at Henderson School.

Our family joined the Palma Ceia Presbyterian Church in January, 1946. Startled eyes met the preacher's announcement: "Mrs. Vining and Mrs. Phillips' letters come from the Highland Park Presbyterian Church of Dallas, Texas; Bill Phillips and Paul Pinckney's letters from the First Methodist Church of Shreveport, Louisiana; Colonel Phillips' letter comes from the First Methodist Church of Ocala, Florida; and Ben Pinckney comes to us on profession of faith."

At twelve Ben began his first regular church attendance. He was just now able to sit upright in a chair without falling. Nonie's teaching and Bible stories had readied him for the experience. Dexter and I joined in the women's and men's groups at the church, Paul and Bill joined the Westminster Choir and all three boys attended youth meetings on Sunday afternoons.

On Saturdays we rediscovered Florida, camping for fish with homemade bamboo poles at Hillsborough River, searching for new bird trails at Lowry Park and the Singing Tower. Eagerly we all traipsed to Silver Springs to see through glass-bottomed boats dazzling seaweed decorated with whole museums of elegant-mannered fish.

"Listen, honey," Dexter, who had been reading, called to me one evening. "Here's a sentence about cerebral palsy: 'The group of children affected by cerebral palsy is larger Ironed...pressed...and dressed...

in 9 minutes!

with the

GE STEAM & DRY IRON

$15.95*

It took just a few quick minutes to iron this little girl's cotton blouse and wool skirt with the new General Electric Steam & Dry Iron. Fast? Wait till you see how it whips through a whole week's wash!

You see, General Electric's Even Flow steam penetrates deeper. Turns out crisp, satin-smooth ironing in seconds.

Saves sprinkling everything except heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics. Lets you press like a tailor, too, without a damp cloth!

Use it as a dry iron. It changes instantly from "steam" to "dry." No scorching! "Dial-the-Fabric" control keeps the temperature right for every fabric.

And these are only a few of the many laborsaving features. Why not take a few minutes and save yourself hours? Visit your dealer's right away! General Electric Company, Portable Appliance Department, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.

Handy Cord-Lift keeps cord off fabric—allows you to iron with right or left hand. The light weight of this iron saves time and work.

Even-Flow Steam System gives you a steadier flow of steam . . . better penetration. Does a thorough ironing job every time.

Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price.*

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

NEW cooking magic is yours when you get the NEW Sunbeam®
AUTOMATIC SAUCEPAN and DEEP FRYER with
Simmer-Safe Controlled Heat

Easy-to-see Cook Guide gives correct temperature and cooking time.

Exclusive
Simmer-Safe Controlled Heat
No more pot watching. Foods can be cooked and kept at just the right temperature.

PERFECT FOR DEEP FRYING
Fry basket is available for preparing all your favorite deep-fried foods.

The perfect companion to the Sunbeam Controlled Heat Frypan
The amazing New Sunbeam Electric Saucepan with Simmer-Safe Controlled Heat will open a whole new world of cooking magic. Seven utensils in one—completely replaces the ordinary saucepan, deep fryer, double boiler, dutch oven, corn popper, chafing dish and bun warmer. Has the most accurate thermostatic control ever developed for a utensil of this kind. Reaches Simmer-Safe temperatures quickly and maintains them with amazing accuracy. Makes all foods taste and look better. Available in 3 qt. and 5 qt. sizes. Complete with cover.

DOUBLE WALL CONSTRUCTION
Exclusive double wall gives cool, economical cooking.
Water-sealed heating element for easy washing.

EASY-TO WASH
New water-sealed element allows Saucepan to be immersed up to signal light for easy washing.

ROAST SHRINKAGE REDUCED UP TO 23%

Gravy from Sunbeam
Gravy from Ordinary Pan.
There is less shrinkage in meat prepared in a Sunbeam Saucepan. Delicious, natural meat juices are protected from evaporation.

No more of this
Sunbeam gives perfect results
Soups, rice, cereals; all foods can be cooked without boil-over with exclusive Simmer-Safe Controlled Heat.

Be sure you get the original and genuine Sunbeam Saucepan
Look for the MARK OF QUALITY
Sunbeam
Sunbeam Corporation, Dept. 50, Chicago 38
for Mother on her day MAY 12

than the group affected by tuberculosis, or crippled by polio.'"

"I know," I said and tried to speak casually.

Ben was getting some knowledge at Henderson School, but he wasn't learning to walk or speak any more plainly. Typing was a laborious, cruel achievement.

His first year in a real school for cerebrally palsied children was at Bayside School, opened the fall of 1946 and sponsored by the Hillsborough County Association for Crippled Children. Dr. Earl Carlson had agreed to act as supervising doctor, commuting from Pompano several times during the year.

The school was a great, green building loaned by the Navy and overlooking the bay. But there weren't enough teachers. There was only one physical therapist and no occupational or speech therapist. Equipment was needed. Furthermore, Minnie, the one maid, couldn't possibly feed all the children who had to be given lunch.

I said to Paul, Bill and Ben, "Ask all your friends. Nonie, you and I can ask the church circles. We have to—we simply have to have these things."

"What y' want?" Paul asked.

"Tables, bookcases, pillows, mirrors, a small dolly, steam tables, bed restrainer jackets, infrared lights, carpenter tools."

In a few months Bayside became a full-time community project. The Junior League and the police force joined in transporting the children to school. The Doctors' Wives' Auxiliary took on the job of painting the furniture; the garden clubs began beautifying the landscape. Volunteers from church circles, the A.A.U.W., Penwomen, Tampa Women's Club and other women's organizations came from eleven to two to help feed the children. Silver teas for Bayside sprang up like mushrooms. Parents who lived in the same neighborhoods organized car pools to bring their children.

Nonie and I worked on alternate Wednesdays at Bayside. I looked with joy at this clinical school, different in practice and tone from Henderson and Cottage; more professional in purpose than Mrs. Flowers' tutoring.

In time there were ramps, handrails, wide hallways, adequate lighting. This could come true in any city, I kept thinking, as the city's best-known carpenters built the ramps without pay and the city's most celebrated artist painted a mural of Peter Rabbit and Whimsy to take the place of the Navy design still shining above the bar. Then a nationally known bus company gave the school a bus.

The kindergarten children learned to grasp and build blocks, to choose colors, to fit wooden pieces into puzzles, to stimulate individual finger work in many ways. Posts with rings were used for flexion of fingers and wrists. There were large jumbo crayons, Roly-Poly tops, large pegboards.

There was a music period when the children played a rhythm band to my Baa, Baa, Black Sheep on the piano.

Even with skillful class management by a resourceful teacher, the work in the multiple-grade classroom was difficult. In addition to the usual personality variants, there were different burdens to bear and fellowships to win. But there was one thing in common: the children had loving eyes—all tried very hard.

Doctor Carlson visiting Bayside School in May, 1947, recommended new braces for Ben to go up between the knees and the hips with free-motion joints at the ankles; and free-motion joints, with stops, at the knees. These braces seemed to retard Ben more than to help him, but we fitted them faithfully each morning.

Ben and I together marveled at all the things he was trying to learn to do. And it seemed that the world was at last discovering its crippled children. For what was happening in Tampa was suddenly happening all over the United States.

Ben's teacher had long hair and warm eyes that always smiled. Her name was Katherine McFaul, and she came from Syracuse, New York. She didn't forget to make jokes with the children.

"They tell me you're a weather prophet," she said to Ben.

That was because he read the newspapers and reported his findings—accidents, deaths, weather, Bergman, Stromboli, Pegler, Forrestal—to his teacher.

Bill in his second year at Tennessee Wesleyan wrote that he'd joined a junior-college social fraternity, was singing in the chorus, and was on the staff of the school newspaper.

Paul was in the eleventh grade now, member of a national honor society and spending much of his time with a girl friend named Pat.

One evening Ben said, "Paul, I took ten steps today." All the pride of Bayside was in his voice. For Bayside was Ben's school, just as Plant High was Paul's; and Ben loved it all: the proper circles and triangles; the day treatment rooms; the steps to climb; the standing table; the long, long bars with mirrors at the end; Mrs. Smith, the matron, who helped him with his food; Minnie, the maid, bringing laughter, fun and love to these children on all the ramps.

A doctor from Birmingham recommended a large tricycle, the kind used for rehabilitation of veterans, for Ben, and Dexter and I journeyed to Bay Pines Veterans' Hospital near St. Petersburg to buy it.

The huge tricycle had standard bicycle wheels. The brake was on the grip of the right handle bar. The clutch would let the pedals turn backward without any movement of the tricycle. Braces ran from a curved ring above the seat to brace the rider's back and keep him from falling. A strap across the front completed this protection.

Three one-inch pieces of wood cut in the shape of shoes were fastened to each pedal to build it up. Straps across the toes, a heel well at the back and another strap across the instep completed the "strap in."

Ben did not seem to be able to pedal over the top of "dead center." "I cannot turn it," he said, the laughter in his eyes gone.

Then Dexter had an idea. By resting the rear axle on a box, the wheels were held clear of the ground and could turn easily. By forcing Ben's feet past this "dead center" hundreds and hundreds of times, we finally put over the idea and everything was clear sailing.

Bill and Paul earned some of their college spending money by summer jobs. Bill worked as a stock boy at supermarkets, Woolworth's and Penney's. He was also employed in the Tampa Tribune advertising department. Our almost-adult family shared mail, telephone calls, discussions of the budget.

Paul and a friend established a mowing service by placing ads in the Sunday paper. Dexter had our old lawn mower electrified by motor and cords. Two other summers Paul worked as pickup boy at Maas Brothers.

Early in 1949 Bill wrote, "I believe my interest in music will always be with me." He wanted to be a concert singer. Dexter, electrical engineer from Georgia Tech, exploded in a torment of objections. Finally, after many arguments, Dexter agreed to compromise, and we wrote, "We cannot finance a career as a concert singer, but you may major in voice. After you've taught music for a while, if you still want a concert career, you can finance it yourself!"

The bus was waiting. This was in 1949–50. Ben's next-to-last year at Bayside. Paul was to graduate from Plant High School in May.

Ben wore the long braces, clutching and clamping his spindling legs. As Frank, the bus driver, lifted him into the bus, he said, "Hey, boy, I've got a new idea on that whistling." Frank fixed his lips. "Now keep your tongue quiet and press hard. Now!"

Ben pursed his lips and the sound came—thin as flame.

The big bus lumbered on. Though the braces were heavy on Ben's thin legs, the heartbeat of my spastic son was strong and regular.

"Frank," Ben squealed, "I've learned to whistle!"

Ben finished the eighth grade at Bayside to the best of his ability. Then there was the question whether we should hire a tutor to educate him further.

Guidance-center experts and the principal of Bayside had told us that the New York itute of Physical Medicine and Rehabilita- did a complete job for the handicapped vidual; that the latest developments in licine, surgery, therapeutics, psychological psychiatric assistance, social service and ational planning were available at an in- out-patient rate.

wrote to Dr. George Deaver, and after his y came Dexter and Ben and I made the to New York.

en was smiling that morning as the elevator d us from the institute's reception room he third floor. I looked at him and, for a nent, all the effort, trials, failures and ories shone in his face. What had been mplished?

here was walking with timid steps, if sup- ed. There was a slow, tedious typing. All sing except buttoning or tying. Toilet in- endence except adjusting of clothes. There academic progression of a sort to the th grade. There were the parties, the pic- , the shows, the pets. There were all the nents, hours, days, weeks, when our ily had united to Ben a little of the nantment, some of beautiful sights and nds that make our ld.

eventeen years. I ced at Dexter and at Ben, still smil- Was the institute answer?

he receptionist on hird floor was kind. n's schedules will n this afternoon," said and handed us pink slips. "He will iven muscle tests in physical-therapy de- ment at one o'clock. tor Deaver's assist- will see Ben at two. other appointments or tomorrow. Now would like for you ee the institute, ev- floor, and then to lunch with us."

exter, Ben and I saw apists giving danc- o graceless feet, and to artists whose ds had lost their h. The atmosphere informal, friendly. en saw the dormi- rooms for inpa- ts, the physical- apy and occupa- al-therapy rooms. With our assistance, he ed past the psychological- and sociologi- esting laboratories, heard the guide say, is is our center of daily activities. Here we h a man to rebuild his body to meet the ical demands of daily life from bed b."

Look, mother!" Ben's eyes were fixed, al- t prayerful. A war veteran who had lost legs was walking across the floor.

ver there was a swimming pool into which retcher could be lowered by overhead ey. Here was the children's ward where all iture, aids and appliances were built to s we found our way to the lunchroom, whispered, "Mamma, it's a wonderful e."

Yes, Ben, it is a wonderful place." But will lp us, I wondered, will it help us ——

w ways of building strength were being ssed at tables all around us. Suddenly own talk dissolved into silence. We had one boy we had hoped to help; our hbors had guided and were giving thou- s of groping individuals help.

he muscle tests lasted an hour while Dex- and I waited outside the door. Finally came out.

What did they do?"

They made me move my legs, my arms, heck."

e were shuttled down the hall to Doctor ver's assistant.

With Ben's history before him, the doctor asked many questions. Voices from other doctors in other places kept winging in: "arrested hydrocephalis"; "congenital myatonia"; "a cerebral hemorrhage."

Dr. H offered no diagnosis. But he did say, "After each of the departments of the institute has examined Ben, Doctor Deaver will give you his evaluation at the conference on Thursday."

So many years, so many doctors—all of them riding with us in the taxi back to the hotel. We knew that Dr. Howard A. Rusk, chairman of the Department of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation at New York University, and Dr. George Deaver, professor at the New York Institute for Crippled and Disabled, had organized the Veterans' Administration rehabilitation program after the war and put their proposed program for the institute before the New York University College of Medicine. The result was the establishment in 1946 of the first Department of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation in any medical school, largely as a result of a grant from the Baruch Committee on Physical Medicine.

Rusk and Deaver, in 1948, set up wards at Bellevue and Goldwater. In 1948 the institute was started for patients with the aid of New York University and the Milbrook Memorial Fund. Today there is a $2,000,000 building and a staff of more than a hundred to assist in- and out-patient treatments.

We were sitting in the hall on the second floor of the institute, waiting for Doctor Deaver. The evaluation conference was about to begin.

Perhaps Doctor Deaver walked the floor of the narrow hall, his shirt wet with perspiration, his hands restless, because his summary was better suited to motion than to the interior of this room.

"I suggest weighted crutches to give him balance," the doctor told us. "There's no use educating him beyond high school. Yes, he has a better-than-average I.Q., but who would hire him? He has neither the speech nor the physical ability to work anywhere except alone or with animals."

I saw the shock in Dexter's eyes, felt the hopelessness of the moment in Ben's shoulders.

"You say he's finished the eighth grade?" From afar off I heard Doctor Deaver's voice.

"Yes." Finished it the way a boy could who couldn't write except on a typewriter—that writing with one hand whose every finger twisted and collapsed as he tried to reach the key. Finished it in a hoarse-whispered voice that never said quite the proper word or the proper phrase the way a boy wanted to say it. Finished it in a jerk, wet with perspiration for the trying. Finished it in desperate thoughts, hoping against hope.

Ben's eyes clung to Doctor Deaver. I knew that he couldn't say, I just never have time. If I stand on the ground, it seems to rustle; if I hold my toothbrush, it jerks before my hands.

The doors to the gymnasium had swung wide open. A voice was saying, "Doctor Deaver, are you ready?"

"Bring him in," Doctor Deaver said. Dexter, Doctor Deaver, Ben and I marched into one of the institute's famous evaluation conferences.

Ben was walked round and round while words, questions fell upon our ears. Sociologists, psychologists, doctors spoke while

GRANDMOTHER'S GRANDDAUGHTER

By ELIJAH L. JACOBS

I do not know, I do not care,
Where Emily gets her red-brown hair
In a family otherwise thatched.
Her eyes?
They slant in an unancestral guise.
These are graces, whatever the source.
But her volatile temper, a certain force
In her infant demands, a degree of guile
With masculine kinsmen, a cryptic smile,
Hands slender and deft—all these traits tell
That she's grandmother-marked; she'll turn out well.

Eliminate the "guess" and the "work" from meal making with

Sunbeam®
AUTOMATIC FRYPAN with Perfect
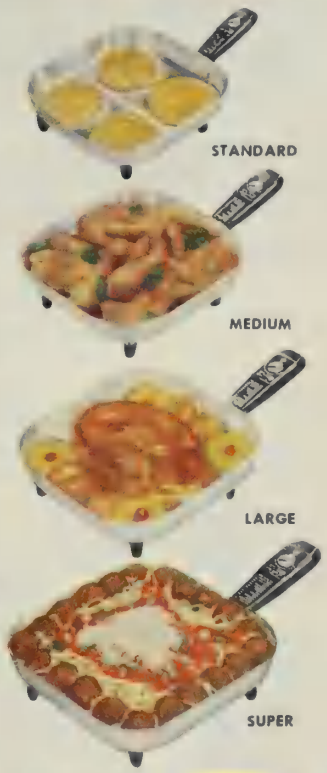
Controlled Heat

EASY-TO-SET DIAL
Right in the handle where it is easy to see — easy to set. Signal light indicates when proper temperature is reached.

EASY-TO-SEE FRYGUIDE
Gives recommended temperatures. Eliminates guess work and failures.



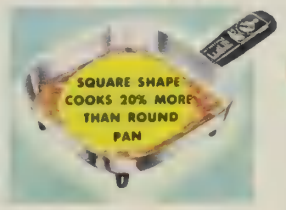
You get eggs like this every time in the Sunbeam set at 300°.

HERE IS WHAT HAPPENS WITH UNCONTROLLED HEAT
Eggs are seared around edges, leathery on the bottom, with uncooked white around the yolks.

The perfect companion to the Sunbeam Controlled Heat Saucepan

Only the Sunbeam Automatic Electric Frypan gives you all the advantages for perfect cooking results the easy modern way. It Fries • Braises • Bakes • Stews • Pan broils • makes delicious pancakes, omelets, french toast and heats "frozen dinners." Controlled heat eliminates cooking failures. Results are always perfect. Its square shape gives you 20% more cooking area too.

Available in four sizes to meet every family's needs; Standard, Medium, Large and Super. High dome vented aluminum covers or heat resistant glass covers are also available.



Water Sealed Element

The entire pan can be immersed in water up to control panel for quick, easy washing.

Square Shape Cooks More

Because of Sunbeam's square shape a full ½ lb. of bacon will lie flat in the pan—will cook flat because of the Sunbeam's Controlled Heat. No curling or burning.

Be sure you get the original and genuine Sunbeam Frypan.

Look for the MARK OF QUALITY
Sunbeam
Famous for Lady Sunbeam Shavemaster, Toaster, etc.
Sunbeam Corporation, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois—Canada: Toronto 18

for Mother on her day MAY 12

perspiration poured off Ben and tears flooded my eyes.

Sentences from Doctor Deaver's official report are more easily understood:

Your son is a cerebral palsy, atheroid in type, has secondary disease processes which consist of allergies and diathesis, myopic-astigmatism and eighth-nerve deafness to clear tones.

He has a dysarthria, which means difficulty in controlling the muscles which are used in volume control, pitch, phrasing and controlling the voice quality.

In view of Ben's age, prognosis for speech retraining is poor; however, Ben is well motivated but has been exposed to an insufficient amount of speech therapy. A trial period of intensive training is indicated.

It was the opinion of our psycho-social and vocational department that from the verbal part of the Bellevue-Wechsler Intelligence Test his verbal intelligence quotient is 96.

In view of the patient's limitations, the educational and vocational goals are considered limited. It was the opinion of our psycho-social and vocational department that a suitable vocational objective, considering his good social and arithmetical abilities and need for society, would be a vending stand.

After the evaluation conference we were asked to return to the institute the next morning for final psychological and speech testing and a visit to the gadget room.

While Ben went through his speech tests, Dexter and I were interviewed by the psychosociologist, who left no stone in our family history unturned.

Then we were suddenly speaking of Doctor Deaver's philosophy about the severely handicapped cerebral palsy—why educate—people will not accept ——

"I shouldn't have minded so much," I confided, "if Doctor Deaver had not spoken in front of Ben."

The sociologist looked at us. "Please don't feel hurt. You must only feel pride in your great accomplishments. Parents who h worked hard enough to give a boy so seve handicapped as Ben the information and happiness that he has shown in our tests c teach all of us—plenty!"

"Thank you." Dexter and I were hun

"Continue to give your son status and f tion. The cerebral palsies' emotional needs the same as anyone else's. They must h self-expression, security, social integrat You are giving Ben all three!" She clasped hands. "Now let me show you our ga room."

The institute uses the word "gadget" m ing so much more—aids for the handicap which we had not seen or heard of: der cleaners, eating utensils, celastic knife hol feeding splints; telephone holders for art ics; leather writing devices; remote contro electric typewriters, automobile-driving rangements for person with limited use o lower extremities; kitchen utensils, card h ers, and holders for knitting and cro needles.

There were wheel chairs with full recli backs and headrests, detachable arms, arms and upholstered arm seats. There one-arm wheel chairs, skirt guards for w chairs. There were foot blocks and ru hand grips.

Nearer to true gadgets were Paulo pi sticks; joined forks and spoons; knives forks. There were tie clasps, and nail bru with clips, and retractable key chains. there were elastic shoelaces and Kant cups.

Suddenly I knew that, whether Ben c be helped or not, my faith in humanity strengthened. We paid our bill, a negli one for the services rendered, and said goo to the institute.

Ben had made friends with all the peop our midtown hotel. Magazine girl; the e tor man, Joseph; even the room clerk—al become his fast friends.

Joseph, the elevator man, slipped to dining-room door next morning and wat us at breakfast.

Ben could not feed himself away fron plate in a groove, so we chattered gaily as him spoons of oatmeal, helpings of bacon eggs.

"The speech references will help," I sa

"Yes," Dexter answered slowly.

"Do you think the weighted crutches w I asked.

"I don't know." Dexter's tone was tive. Suddenly he looked at Ben. "Fe where do you want to go today? You nam and we'll go."

"Everywhere," Ben answered. "All o

"That's a big order."

I waited for Dexter to take Ben up t room.

When they returned Ben's voice was a as moonlight. "Good morning, Joseph. H what? We're going to see New York to "Where?" Joseph asked.

"All over." Ben smiled. "Uptown, d town—even to the Statue of Liberty."

"A tour?" Joseph asked.

"An elegant tour," I answered.

"That's wonderful." Joseph beamed.

The wheel chair thumped to the entr and we were gone in a taxi.

The taxi was to take us to the building which the sight-seeing buses departed.

Oh, New York, my mind raced awa beautiful today. Make your buildings glist they reach heavenward. Stay the plunderin pilfering; be beautiful, today, for Ben.

"Joseph," Ben said that evening, " leaving tomorrow. We're going to Was ton."

Icy hands gripped my bag. Tomorrow morrow—and what had New York's Reh tation Institute done for Ben? We'd sp great deal of money in railroad fare, bills—money that could have been appli his college. I swallowed hard. But colleg not recommended for Ben.

Because aim is feeble, and feet cannot s does this lessen a dream, a desire? Is a capable of learning to be denied because are too broken to succeed physically?

CONTINUED ON PAGE 222

ARCHITECT: CARL KOCH; PHOTOGRAPHER: RODNEY MC CAY MORGAN

Space to spare in THIS TWO-STORY PREFAB HOUSE

It can be finished one room at a time, to grow as the family expands

By CAROL L. CRANE

Attractively designed, carefully built, this house has the handsome low lines of a one-floor house, the living space of a two-floor house, and the popular appeal of a split-level. Its post-and-beam construction means that no interior partitions are load-bearing; only stairs, baths, chimney and four posts are fixed in place. The space within the house may be arranged to suit the family's needs; with a simple adjustment of interior walls, the second floor can contain as many as five bedrooms. When the children are grown and gone, the same space may be rearranged to become fewer, larger rooms, or, with minor alterations, the house can accommodate two separate family units.

The manufacturers have used this basic plan in models of five sizes and four exterior finishes, varying in cost accordingly. Our photos show one of the largest; with 1½ tiled baths, wall oven, countertop range, dishwasher, cabinets, exhaust fan, garbage disposer, all utilities, window screens, storm and screen doors, lighting fixtures, painting and landscaping allowance, it sells, without land, for $23,500 in a New York City suburb. The master bath-dressing room, an "extra" provided for an additional $500 to $750, is shown here to illustrate the versatility of the plan. This house may be purchased for $20,000 to $30,000 depending upon location, appointments and finishing materials selected. Write to us for further information.

New idea! VINYL in a floor wax

and the beauty of it is — *it's childproof

Never before such a high gloss!

New Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl in it, gives you higher gloss than you've ever known. On any kind of floor—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile or finished wood! Throughout the house!

No wax easier to apply!

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. No buffing. No rubbing. It spreads evenly —without streaks—quickly sets to a tough, beautiful, vinyl gloss!

Wet spills won't harm gloss!

Splashes and spills—so common with children—won't hurt the tough vinyl surface —or shine. Simply wipe them up. New Simoniz Floor Wax is water-repellent.

Never before such protection!

The miracle of vinyl—and only Simoniz has it—gives you the toughest floor surface. The kids won't scuff it, or harm the gloss with their roughhousing. No doubt about it—it's childproof!

No finish so easy to maintain!

Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl has a gloss that lasts and lasts. You can even damp mop your floors freely without dulling the shine. Without spoiling the wax finish.

Good news about re-waxing!

Here's the one floor wax you can remove evenly before re-waxing. Simply use your regular household detergent and warm water. The beauty increases with re-waxing. You'll be amazed, once you try it.

Simoniz® Floor Wax

For all floors—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile and finished wood

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 220

Ben had known physical, emotional, spiritual and mental suffering. And as his parents, Dexter and I knew that his life had been enriched, even as ours, by each defeat, each victory. His faith had survived, shining, everlasting—surely ours could do as much.

"Any flowers, any specials, any telegrams while we were away?" It was August third, and we were home again in Tampa.

Alice Murray, our niece, down from an Air Force base in Savannah with Mark, her one-year-old son, and Paul had met the Silver Meteor. We were lunching now on molded salad and a special new tuna concoction of Alice's.

"What happened at the institute? What did the doctors say?" Nonie's, Alice's and Paul's voices arose in a babel.

Ben kept spooning his salad upside down, asking questions, glad, glad to be home.

"Too much to tell you here; but we have to weight Ben's crutches ——"

"Weight—his—crutches?" Nonie's voice creaked at the edges. "He doesn't use crutches."

"Ben's to finish high school with a tutor. After that, the institute recommended a business of his own."

"Paul, I had television in my room in New York."

"And," Dexter edged in, "in the lobby of the hotel in Washington."

"Nonie, Joseph was my friend in New York."

Then we were recounting New York, uptown, downtown and the trip to the Statue of Liberty. We were flying down to Washington, visiting Mount Vernon, and the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

"Paul"—Ben's voice was important—"we rode the monorail from the Senate Building to the Capitol, lunched in the Senate press room, and I heard Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., answer 'Present' in Congress."

Ben did not mention the institute, or the doctor's words. In a few moments Paul had bounced him out of the house to the car and they were off to visit friends.

As the front door slammed, we recounted Doctor Deaver's words to the others.

"And he said it all in front of Ben." Dexter's voice shook.

Nonie smiled serenely. "But did the trip help you? Do you know things that you didn't know before you went?"

I recounted the speech helps—the books of aid for the handicapped that had been placed in our hands, keys to so many seemingly locked doors.

"Yes."

Nonie's eyes were calm. "The doctor may be very wise—wiser than we," she said. "Ben may have to work alone or with animals. But if he does, Ben won't mind, because he's been loved and wanted all his life. And Ben will succeed."

From sixteen applicants, Mrs. W. Parks Miller was Ben's choice of a tutor. We converted my bedroom into a schoolroom and there Mrs. Miller and Ben studied the junior-high subjects he had not had at Bayside, with emphasis on typing. I taught him speech and English. The principal of Woodrow Wilson Junior High furnished the textbooks, workbooks and spelling lists.

By getting up at 6:30 and everyone pitching in, I could start teaching Ben at 8:30. The routine was simple. Dexter made the coffee, set the table for breakfast while I straightened the bedroom and prepared materials for the morning's school. I cooked breakfast while Dexter dressed. Dexter cleared the table while I assisted Ben in dressing and cooked his breakfast. Nonie helped him with breakfast while I dressed to be a teacher.

The institute has recommended short, frequent drills in speech instead of longer periods. The English and speech lessons ran until nine, the tutor's lessons from nine to eleven. Dexter took Ben for the physical therapy recommended by the institute at eleven.

For two years Ben and I struggled with the naming noun, the acting verb, and all the other parts of the sentence. Still Ben's written words fell apart. Yet I knew and Ben knew that he must master typing, and the practical written constructions that are essential in the everyday world for such tasks as preparing Christmas lists, signing checks, writing friendly business and thank-you letters, and addressing envelopes.

Finally Ben and I hit upon a plan which has proved successful. Ben writes a double-spaced paragraph, any paragraph on any topic that interests him. I note Ben's mistakes in spelling, grammar or punctuation in red pencil over the exact word or punctuation mark where Ben has made the mistake. Ben, in turn, rewrites, and corrects these mistakes. Almost miraculously Ben and I have watched stricken sentences become whole.

Often in the evenings Ben would demonstrate the amateur radio to his friends. From the back bedroom came strange sounds: "Xray, Able, Able, Mike, Xray, Able, Able, Mike, calling CQ, calling CQ, calling CQ."

Ben had long before learned how to throw switches and watch the meters on all the radio equipment. Dexter had often commented to other hams on the air, "Ben, the junior operator, can handle the receiver well on all amateur bands. He understands danger and value of meter reading, position of switches."

But when Ben asked Dexter about writing to the FCC to secure a license, Dexter rushed to me. "He can pass the written part of the examination, but he hasn't enough control to operate the key."

We decided it would be best to let the FCC tell him.

Ben composed and typed his letter to the FCC, explaining his difficulty, painting a clear picture of his disability.

The reply was courteous and as Dexter had predicted: "We'll grant you a license, even if you can operate the key with your toes."

FOR THE DEFENSE

By MAURA BAIRD

(Inspired by the question: Do you work—or are you only a housewife?

Change the baby; feed the cat,
(How dare she ask a thing like that?)
Pick up scattered clothes and toys,
(Oh, shades of easy office joys With coffee breaks at ten and two.)
Shopping now, and beds to do.
Change the baby; sweep the floor.
(Darn it! Someone's at the door.)
Laundry's washed—one hour flat,
Put out dishes; burp the cat.
(Oh, I'll not spoil a good digestion, Brooding on her stupid question!)

Ben swallowed his disappointment, for he knew his toes had no better control than his fingers. But at least he could help his father operate, and collect many foreign stamps from his radio contacts.

Since school was at home, and Paul and Bill were both in college, Dexter, Nonie and I tried in every way we knew to keep Ben from being lonely—to broaden his world.

There were once-a-week visits to the public library. Ben read all the books on chess, some biography, autobiography and travel; but he refused to read fiction.

Ben had long been interested in the weather and we encouraged this interest. Dexter told Ben to write the U. S. Weather Bureau for more information. Soon our living room was bulging with publications with such titles as: Storm Warning Manual; The Weather Bureau: Seasonal Broadcasts, Weather Reporting and Forecasting; Fighting Cold Weather With the Fruit and Vegetable Men; Climate of the States; Florida Hurricanes.

Then Dexter ordered a free weather map from Station WALT in Tampa. He and Ben mounted the map on a thin block of wood. With pins holding a string on either side, Dexter and Ben traced the course of the hurricanes or would-be hurricanes.

After Bill was graduated and came home from Peabody, he and Ben made a weather station. Using Schneider and Bendick's Everyday Weather and How it Works, the boys found that a simple weather station could be made with a hammer, knife and materials around the house. They constructed a hair hygrometer, a rain gauge; anemometer, wind vane, barometer.

And suddenly Ben found another new interest for himself. "Mother," he said one day, "I like Mr. Morgan Beatty and Mr. Chaplin very much. I would like to write to them."

"I think it would be nice, Ben. Why don't you?"

Messrs. Beatty, Chaplin, Murrow and all the other news commentators were living-room friends whose words helped make the pattern of Ben's days. His interest in names and news was growing steadily. The answers to Ben's letters proved the kindness and understanding of these famous men. They all sent photographs which Ben treasures.

It was March, 1954. Five red poinsettias, left over from Christmas, were staring at the sun.

"Mother," Ben called, "you and daddy ought to water these poinsettias."

"You should know daddy and me by now, Ben. Daddy's hammyaming, and I forget—you'll have to water the poinsettias."

I turned the water on and Ben watered the poinsettias. It was his junior year in high school. Ben's tutor for the three last years had been Prof. A. S. Berghauser, former head of the language department at Furman University. Professor Berghauser represented so much more to Ben than the bookkeeping ledger sheets which Ben meticulously typed, the literature, the history or the science-survey course.

Poetry was in every recitation, as Professor Berghauser read and loved it. In his given hours with Ben, Brahms and Chopin walked our boards, keeping fast company with sturdy figures and marching historical dates.

I served tea at ten in the morning to make a break in the long two hours. We talked of many things—Ben's and the professor's evening before, their plans for the weekend. And have you seen Three Coins in the Fountain at the Palace Theater? Was it a plausible film, Ben? Did you like the plot? And did the characters really come alive?

After lunch Ben sat in the easy chair by the telephone, acting as business secretary for dad, social secretary for mother and studying tomorrow's lessons between times.

The United Cerebral Palsy Clinic had just been opened and Ben, at the age of twenty, was having physical therapy administered regularly by a professional therapist for the first time in his life.

"If only," Nonie said when she saw the therapy rooms and the special equipment, "if only Ben could have had these when he was younger! He would be walking now."

Would he?

Our oldest boy, Bill, master's degree and all, was teaching music in Madison Junior High School in Tampa. And Bill was married to a lovely young bride.

Paul wrote from Davidson, "I was elected to Phi Beta Kappa."

Later in the day after that letter came Ben eyed me squarely. "I could be Phi Beta Kappa!"

I looked at the faltering hands, the wavering head, the motions still jerky beyond control. I remembered that in twenty years I had never heard a cruel suggestion, a word of prejudice, a lie or a syllable of deceit. I remembered Ben's co-operation with every doctor—every nurse—his great love for all his teachers. I saw courage, quiet, unshakable, shining in my son's eyes. "You are Phi Beta Kappa, Ben," I whispered, "in ways beyond the founders' dreams."

It was March, 1956, and Ben, still full of love for the world, was waiting for his friend, Mr. Hall, the postman.

Mr. Hall stepped upon the porch and handed Ben a sheaf of letters. "Well, Ben, you really made it this morning."

Ben grinned—"Thanks, Mr. Hall"—and turned to his desk and typewriter. "Pinckney Clipping Bureau" is the address on the envelopes in his hand.

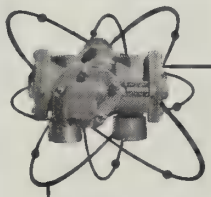
Nonie and I smiled. Dexter opened the door from the radio room and called, "How many did he get?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 224

Spencer's are made by folks who make only baby wear. Choose from a complete line of expertly tailored, thrifty-priced garments for your baby's own special layette. Spencer's is the name you can trust.

For helpful folder on planning your baby's wardrobe, send 10¢ to Spencer's, Mount Airy, N. C., Dept. M-2.

SOFT SPUN
Spencer's
BABY WEAR
COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping



AT POPULAR PRICED STORES EVERYWHERE
MOUNT AIRY KNITTING CO., Mount Airy, N. C.

Culligan announces new way to have unlimited soft water! Automatically!

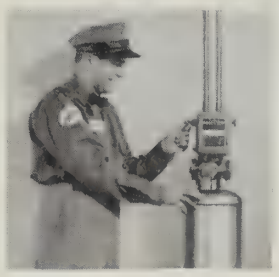
On a service basis, or own it yourself...new Culligan water softener provides an unlimited supply of soft water regardless of family size or water usage.



Electronic Regen-a-rator

REGENERATES WHILE YOU SLEEP!

Culligan's exclusive electro-hydraulic control smoothly, silently, automatically activates the cycles of backwashing, brining and rinsing at night . . . while you sleep! It's as automatic as your water heater.

Select from two low-cost ways to have soft water

AUTOMATIC SOFT WATER SERVICE

Only your Culligan dealer presents this entirely new way to have unlimited soft water on a service basis. There's no equipment to buy, no work to do. After the simple original installation, all that's required is a visit from your Culligan Serviceman just once or twice a year.

AUTOMATIC HOME-OWNED MODEL

The Culligan Automatic, with its distinctive styling and gleaming white enamel finish, gives you the pride of owning the finest water softener made. Available with Culligan's Dealer-service Plan, and Salt Delivery Service. Ask your dealer about easy terms; approved for F. H. A. financing.

w you can enjoy the pleasure, efficiency and nomy of pure soft water every moment of ry day for every household use. For laundry, hing, dishes, shampooing, shaving, house-clean- . . . and you never run out of soft water! If rs is a family of eight, you can invite house sts and still have an abundant, unending sup- of wonderful, filtered soft water at the turn ny hot or cold water faucet. If you've waited for something completely new, completely automatic in water conditioning, then here is the most modern water softener you can buy. Its superb quality and foolproof performance are guaranteed by more than 1,100 Culligan dealers in the United States and Canada who serve a million homes with internationally famous Culligan Soft Water Service. See your telephone directory and call your nearby Culligan dealer today.

Culligan® SOFT WATER

Culligan, Inc. and its franchised dealers • Home office, Northbrook, Illinois

Water softeners, filters, self-service units, chlorinators . . . for home and industry

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 222

"Eleven," we answered, all glad, all prayerful that Ben's business is doing well for another day.

Suddenly we are grateful that the tree of life has given our family so much for which to be thankful.

As Ben typed his cards speedily, meticulously, I remembered an evening in May, 1954.

Dexter, in the living room, had been reading a long list of titles. Brightly colored booklets, Government bulletins, letters from many organizations were scattered across the coffee table and on the divan. "Have you looked these over, Ben?" Dexter asked.

Ben read aloud, "Appliance Store, Auto Parts, Bakery, Barber and Beauty Shop, Children's Wear, Gift and Novelty Shop."

"Have you and Mr. Berghauser studied these different kinds of businesses?"

"Not much. Too much bookkeeping work."

"Look here, Ben. You are going to graduate from high school next year. What sort of business are you interested in?"

Ben grinned. "I want a motel."

We all giggled. "If you had enough money to buy a motel, you wouldn't need a motel. You could just live on the money."

Mr. Ruggles, the principal of Plant High School, had recommended bookkeeping for one of Ben's subjects; and Ben had made straight A's with his beautifully typed ledger sheets.

After Ben went to bed that evening, Dexter talked seriously to me. "I don't believe Ben is physically able to handle any of the businesses we've been considering. Honey, what we have to find out is what business a boy as badly handicapped as Ben actually can run. Has anyone made a survey of the employed spastic adults?"

We both glanced at the notebook titled Ben's Business. We remembered the summary of ideas, the outlining of titles. The reference librarian at the Tampa public library had recommended the booklets from the U. S. Department of Commerce: Establishing and Operating a Letter Shop, Book Store, Gift and Shop, Beauty Shop, many others.

"Honey"—my voice shook—"I'll write many letters—I'll ask our U.C.P. clinic if anyone has made an accurate survey of the employed spastic adult."

The U.C.P. clinic said Hunter College had made such a survey in 1953—had contacted 200 employed cerebral palsies in the Manhattan area.

We read Hunter's survey. As we read, it was easy to separate, easy to place. These he could not do because of lack of co-ordination of hands; these he could not do because of lack of clear and distinct speech.

Suddenly as we watched the long list dwindle, Doctor Deaver's words came back: "will have to work alone or with animals."

But it couldn't be, we thought, it could not be. The success of Ben's socializing nature was evident in the stream of friends who overflowed our living room, the busy, busy teenagers who always had time to take Ben to Plant City or Lakeland, or the football game across town.

"We can keep looking," Dexter said, "but he must concentrate on his high-school subjects now."

I remembered Ben's doctors, our trips to the hospital. And then from somewhere a thought came that helped to clear my mind. Progression rests with society. If you and if other parents do all they can for the handicapped child, all you can to make him a useful member of society, he will find a job. But, had we done all we could?

"Dexter"—I smiled wanly—"you have been a wonderful father to Ben. Don't worry—he will find something to do."

The evening of June 10, 1955, was clear and beautiful. Paul, having graduated from Davidson, now home from Fort Benning for Ben's high-school graduation, gave his grandmother a few pointers: "Now, Nonie, of course you must go. You don't have to walk all the way down the grandstand. You can sit at the end nearest the car—and I'll help you."

Ben had attended all the social functions, gone over for the cap-and-gown fitting, the graduation practice, and had been told where to sit during the academic procession.

The lone figure in the white cap and gown sat quietly in the huge stadium, waiting for the other members of his class.

Dexter and I, in our seats, were tense. We watched Ben's cap shake, his bodily contortions to hold a safe, a sure position in his seat.

How, we wondered, had he, had we done it? And we both knew that fun, family fun shared together in faith, love and purpose, had cemented the knowledge that had brought us to this happy day.

The academic procession was filling the chairs. Student after student stopped to speak to Ben.

Then Dean O. M. Schlichter rose.

"In every class," he said, "there are individuals of special worth—individuals who go far beyond the usual in academic achievement—in worth—in work for their school. I have seven merit awards to give tonight—all to students who have served themselves, served their school exceptionally well."

A name was called, then another, then Bennett Vining Pinckney, our son.

Doctor Deaver had said there was no use in sending him to college, but he was among the first seven in a class of 284.

Dexter touched my arm. "Did you know anything about this?"

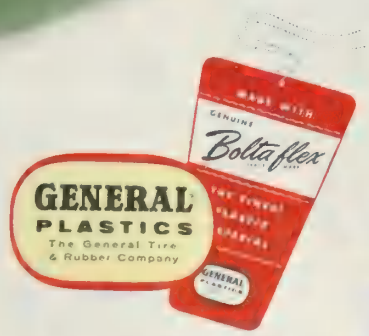
"Not a thing."

But only the two of us knew how much Ben deserved it. We had taken the slight figure in his walker to sell tickets for every important Plant High School occasion where tickets were to be sold. We'd walked him in the shuffling crowds to the football and basketball games. We'd witnessed his fierce loyalty to his school, his unswerving purpose to learn to stand straight enough to accept his diploma.

The huge crowd was deafening with applause. Ben made it clear that what he wanted from us as a graduation present was a trip to Texas.

The six weeks' vacation was punctuated with visits from friends, relatives, meal

No harm done... it's covered with...



Boltaflex®

supported vinyl upholstery

Dirty hand prints like this would be a big problem on most furniture. But because this chair is covered with Boltaflex there's no harm done. Just a swipe with a damp cloth and the dirt disappears. Once again the chair is bright and sparkling clean.

Things that are usually disasters, like spilled milk or muddy shoes, are just small mishaps with Boltaflex covered furniture.

And the smart modern colors come in a variety of patterns to fit every decorative scheme. Soft and supple to the touch, Boltaflex rivals much more expensive materials in appearance and has no rival in service. When you buy new furniture, or if you are planning on having the old recovered, insist on genuine fabric supported Boltaflex.

For further information on any of these products write: Bolta Products, Dept. LHJ-5, Lawrence, Mass.

BOLTA DO-IT-YOURSELF PRODUCTS FOR EASY LIVING

Bolta-Wall® vinyl tile... washable... easy to apply ... prepasted back... cuts with scissors.

Bolta-Top® flexible counter top... available by the yard in 32 and 46 inch widths.

Bolatflex Decor-eze® self-adhesive vinyl. New color for old furniture, shelves and other household areas.

THE GENERAL TIRE & RUBBER COMPANY
BOLTA PRODUCTS DIVISION ▪ LAWRENCE, MASS.

brimming with fried chicken and peach cobblers; and mail from Florida to Ben, one letter which bore the executive seal of the State of Florida, and read:

Dear Ben: Just before Mrs. Collins and I left for the Governors' Conference in Chicago, my sister, Sue Evans, who is a great admirer of yours, told us about the fine record you made at Plant High School.

I want you to know that I am very proud of you, Ben. You are sure to have a full, useful, happy life ahead because of your courage and ability, and I want to add my congratulations and good wishes to those of all your other friends.

I would also be very happy to have you accept the enclosed picture as a token of my friendship and appreciation for the fine help you gave me during the campaign last year.

With warmest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,
LeRoy Collins,
Governor

Governor Collins' letter served to remind Dexter and me that the vacation would soon end and that by September some useful work would have to be secured for Ben.

Afternoons and evenings in the farmhouse in Texas we discussed the problem, and finally made a list of the things that Ben could do which might earn him a living.

He could, of course, run a vending stand to sell fruit, soft drinks and magazines—and there was money in the bank to start one. He could type—but his uncertain movements would not allow the inserting of material.

"International Business Machines might have a machine he could learn to operate," Dexter suggested.

We went to see the Tampa manager of I.B.M. He was courteous and kind, but said

True courage is like a kite; a contrary wind raises it higher.

J. PETIT-SENN

that employment to operate a machine would necessarily come from the firm that bought the machine. But," we asked, "is there a machine Ben could use?" He showed us the machines—there was nothing.

Someone suggested the Goodwill Industries, specializing in work for the handicapped. We went there. The lady in charge spoke from behind an assortment of made-over hats, worn dresses and reconditioned rockers. "I need someone right now who can put dresses in hangers and hang them up."

Could Ben stand up—long enough? Did his arm have a sure-enough reach?

"Ben," we challenged when we got home, can you put a dress on a hanger and hang up?"

"Certainly," Ben answered.

"There's a job at the Goodwill Industries for you then."

Ben spoke emphatically. "I don't want to hang up dresses at the Goodwill Industries, or anywhere else!"

One Saturday afternoon about a week later we thought of the newspaper-clipping service. Ben's interest—and we should have known all along—was news, news about anyone and everyone. It was Ben who furnished the weather information, the political color, the reports about accidents and deaths and marriages at our dinner table. It was Ben who had called Dexter to tell him that the overseer of his orange grove had died the night before. It was Ben who always set the radio or TV for the right church, the right preacher, for Monie's stay-at-home Sunday sermon.

Why couldn't he sell personal, political, human-interest clippings to out-of-town customers?

Dexter and I worked on the idea of an introductory card, planned the file system, discussed the newspapers to clip before we talked to Ben. He could handle all the details except the clipping. We'd help with that now. Later, if the business was successful, he could hire the clipping done.

Ben was delighted with the idea. He bought 1000 cards with $20 of his graduation-present money, reclaimed four newspaper files from a closet and set up business.

He clips the Tampa, Miami, Jacksonville, Atlanta and Mobile newspapers. The introductory card informs the prospective client that an item about him or her has been clipped from such-and-such a newspaper, and will be forwarded for 25 cents. Ben's clients to date include many famous and illustrious names, including the Indian and Russian delegates to the United Nations.

He hopes, within a year or two, to rent a small space in a regular office and to offer local and out-of-town subscriptions to his service.

"Mother," he grins, "my best customers are Ph.D.'s and policemen."

"Don't forget mothers of the grooms," I answer.

Paul and Bill smile approvingly at their businessman brother.

And we are all suddenly familiar with the details of Ford stock, Saks' new bonnets, atomic professors, prefabricated houses and the best Kappa Alpha stunt at the University of Oklahoma.

Quite happily, and almost without knowing it, the world is my son's; and letters from near and far prove the fact every weekday morning!

We realize that the volume of the life of a family is never complete. Pages from this year must be shuffled with pages from last year and twenty years before. But there are certain things of which we are sure. Of all the pride that we have witnessed on this earth, the pride of the handicapped is the most fierce. We are a better family for having known it—better neighbors to all the world for having walked with it thus far.

And Ben, we know, is a better individual for having stood where words alone could never go. END

The kids wouldn't let me wrap it!

The youngsters got all excited about Mother's Day. Signed their own cards, helped wrap a few gifts, even helped arrange the flowers on the table.

And when they saw the Quaker Lace tablecloth* I brought home, ...well, the kids just wouldn't let me wrap it.

"Let's surprise her," they shouted. "Let's put it on the table right away." So I did.

Happy Mother's Day, sweetheart . . . from all of us.

*Easy to launder . . . stays fresh looking longer

Cloth #5500
Design patent applied for About $14.95

QUAKER LACE Tablecloths

Philadelphia 33, Pa.

Hard-to-dust places made easy-to-reach-

"Magic-Action" Swivel Socket steers to any position

O cedar "Every-Which-Way" Mops in colorful Nylon or Cotton

- Saves dusting time—saves work
- Removable pads wash out quickly

Available where you buy cleaning supplies—only $2.29.

Now dusting is so much easier! O-Cedar's exclusive "Every-Which-Way" action lets you steer around chair and table legs—even under low furniture. Just a flick of the wrist and the mop dusts a 50% wider path. "Magne-Static" Action of the nylon yarn attracts dust like magic—holds it until you shake it free. Insist on a genuine O-Cedar Mop. Choice of attractive pink, blue or white nylon, $3.95. In yellow, turquoise or white cotton, $2.79.

O-Cedar Nylon Duster speeds daily dusting chores

This attractive new household helper seeks out dust, high and low—speeds cleaning of furniture, woodwork, venetian blinds, etc. "Magne-Static" Action of 100% nylon pad picks up and holds more dust. Pad removes easily—washes and dries quickly.

O cedar O-CEDAR
Chicago, Illinois—Division of
AMERICAN-MARIETTA COMPANY
O-Cedar of Canada, Ltd., Stratford, Ontario

Defense Program against Moths and other household invaders...

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

Moths are a trouble—there is no doubt. That's why many sensible housewives nowadays keep their wools down to a precious minimum—using in many instances synthetic fibers which do not attract moths. They learn, too, not to hoard old rarely used woolens. Keep the good ones carefully, give the others away is a good rule.

CLEANING IS HALF THE BATTLE

Once spotless, woolens, cashmeres, alpacas, mohairs and furs are well on their way to all-season protection. Valuable items are best guarded by dry cleaning and being held in cold storage during the summer months. Washables can be laundered with a new pestproof liquid added to the rinse to make them immune to moths. If neither washing nor dry cleaning is needed, garments should be aired in the sun several hours, vacuumed with special attention to hidden areas, steam-pressed for extra safety.

What about home cleaning?

Some compounds are toxic and flammable, and best used outdoors. For home-cleaning furs and synthetic pile coats, a spray is available that forms a frosty film on contact, is brushed away and takes soil with it. Antimoth protection is still needed after this step.

What about freezing?

Clean fur and fabric items, if small, can go in the freezer for forty-eight hours at zero temperature, wrapped in sealed plastic bags. Taken out unopened, they'll be safe for the rest of the season.

GUARD AGAINST MICE

Country homes and some city dwellings will have to vary containers if there's a mouse in the house. Storage boxes or trunks should be metal. If these aren't available, wire netting can be folded around containers. Or a sheet of aluminum can be placed on supports 12" or more high, with aluminum extending 6" beyond the supports and kept well away from walls. Storage boxes get stacked on it.

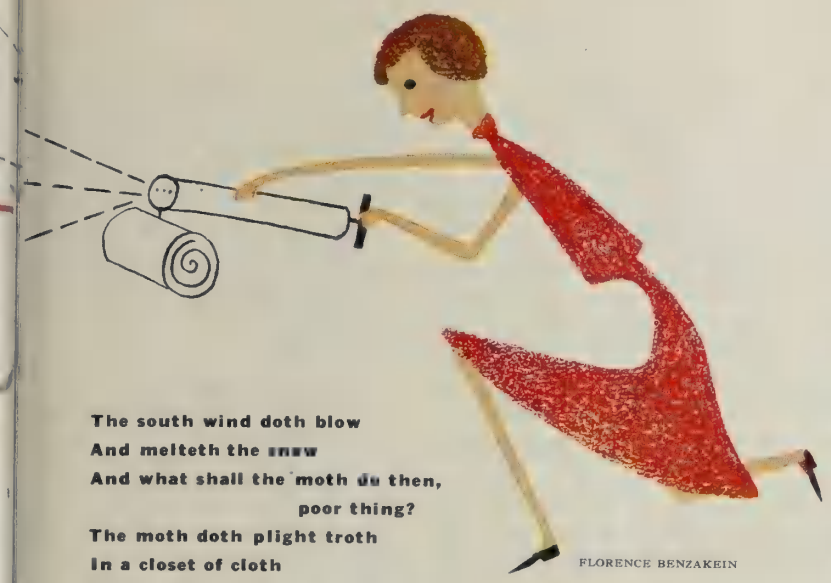
SECURITY-WISE STORAGE

All furs and fabrics not protected by pest-proof rinse or sealed freezing now need treating on their own. This step calls for moth repellents and storage containers.

What kind of moth repellent?

You take your choice. Most common are sprays or moth balls or moth crystals such as paradichlorobenzene or flake naphtha. Garments to be stored should be treated generously. Allow about a pound of moth balls for each small chest or trunk—it's more economical than replacing a damaged favorite dress. Since gas from crystals is heavier than air, and sinks, best spread crystals between tissue paper in layers, or tie them in cheesecloth or use a special hanger placed high in closet or storage container. Vacuum whatever space you use so it's lint-free—insects lurk in crevices.

What kind of storage containers?



For dresses, suits and coats, garment bags serve you with least work year after year if closures are tight and there are no openings around the hanger top. (Openings can be sealed with stick-on fabric tape.) We like a bag with arrangements for inserting a vacuum hose, so moth crystals can be vaporized inside the bag. Hose removed, the bag is ready to seal shut.

For folded or small articles, cardboard boxes provide safe storage; so do packages of heavy brown wrapping paper or some of the durable freezer wraps. Other containers are trunks and chests. And for socks, scarves, skating caps, and so on, kitchen canisters and fruit jars are convenient to use and yield up their contents without fuss if the weather changes unexpectedly.

One rule for all containers: seal them tight with gummed tape.

Is a cedar chest good antimoth storage?

A new chest is, if the cedar is at least ¾" thick, regardless of what wood veneer is used on the outside. But when the chest is two or more years old, even if the cedar fragrance lingers longer, it has to be treated like any other storage con-

The south wind doth blow
And melteth the snow
And what shall the moth do then,
poor thing?
The moth doth plight troth
In a closet of cloth
And wageth a holey wing-ding!
Anon.

FLORENCE BENZAKEIN

tainer—that is, it should be sealed for airtightness, or the packages inside it should be sealed.

How can rugs and carpets be stored?

They are safest in cold storage, but can be kept home if necessary. First they need an all-over vacuuming, then a moth spray or hearty sprinkling of crystals. Roll them up, wrap in heavy paper or special rug packages, seal with gummed paper, store on end, and all's well.

SPECIALS

Fabric blends

If there is any wool in the blend, they need mothproofing.

GUARD AGAINST MILDEW

If excess moisture is a problem, choose a dry day for packing. A wire-protected trouble lamp or a small special rod heater in a closet will help dehumidify the space. Heat should be applied continually during the damp humid months.

Wool blankets

If electric, the blanket can be washed but not dry cleaned because the solutions used in dry cleaning may injure the insulation around the wires. Some are mothproofed in advance and need no care but cleanliness. Nonelectric blankets will need moth crystals. All should be folded into large boxes and sealed, or wrapped in brown paper and sealed, stored with "breathing space" around to prevent crushing the nap.

Pleated skirts

A full and bias-cut skirt should be rolled up over crushed tissue paper so there are no crosswise folds; if hung up, the weight of the fabric would pull into scallops. But a straight pleated skirt can be left hanging in a garment bag, and the main precaution is to secure the waistband straight across the hanger so it won't sag.

Synthetic pile-fabric coats

No synthetics attract moths—they're immune. Clean coats can simply be hung in storage. (If packed into a box, permanent creases could set in.)

Rubbers and boots and overshoes

All they need is washing, and it can be done in a machine. Wool- and fleece-lined ones should be sealed into a plastic bag or a tight container. Happiest storage space for rubber is a dry spot, away from heat.

TIPS AND CAUTIONS

Aerosol sprays, so effective against flying insects, don't penetrate deeply enough to guard against moths over the long months. Liquids applied with a pump-type spray or a vacuum attachment go deeper, are more dependable.

Labeling is a step not to skip. And there is much to be said for storing lightweight, middleweight and heavyweight clothes separately. Then you can unpack in sequence as the mercury drops.

When local dry cleaners offer mothproofing service, it's wise to read the guaranties in advance.

Some dyes stain onto neighboring fabrics, so when packing it pays to watch your color companions. The best guard is to separate garments by layers of tissue paper to keep the darker from marking the lighter.

Plastic hangers are a danger in some cases because moth crystals affect them and they may stain garments. Wire hangers are safe if covered by tissue paper to prevent rust stains. Wood hangers are always safe.

GUARD AGAINST RUST

Ice skates, tools, other metal surfaces can be kept rust-free with special coatings now on the market. One such coating is a liquid that forms an airtight seal, can later be peeled off in large sheets. An alternate protection is to coat the metal with a good-quality oil.

Beautiful bargain for your bathroom!

SAVE $3.00

on this gold-embroidered snow-white chenille bath set by Dixie Craft

Only $2.95 when you buy any model

COUNSELOR

BATH SCALE

What a wonderful gift! An unusual, practical, beautiful gift for Mother's Day, for June brides, for yourself! Quality Bath Mat and Seat Cover of snow-white chenille, with embroidered design in gold Lurex. Oval mat is 30" long. A perfect complement to any Counselor scale! Remember—these high-fashion scales are America's most popular and easiest-to-read—and lifetime-guaranteed in writing! Many models, and in many lovely colors. Here's all you need do: get a sales receipt from your drug, department or hardware store for any price Counselor scale you purchase. Use the order form below. Send it to us with only $2.95. We will send you promptly, postpaid and insured, your $5.95 value Dixie Craft Bath Set. The Brearley Company, World's Largest Producer of Bathroom Scales, Rockford, Illinois.

USE THIS CONVENIENT ORDER BLANK WHEN YOU SEND FOR YOUR BATH SET

Counselor, Dept. 1
310 W. Washington Blvd.
Chicago, Illinois

Send me Dixie Craft Bath Set. I enclose $2.95 and sales slip showing purchase of Counselor Scale. (Offer good only in continental U. S. Void where prohibited, taxed, or otherwise restricted.)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... Zone ..... State .....

(Hurry! Offer expires June 30, 1957.)

For upset stomach—indigestion, nausea, diarrhea—Pepto-Bismol's special medicinal formula soothes with a gentle coating action. It works both in the stomach and the intestinal tract—where soda and alkalizers never help. For children or adults, this wonderful pink liquid helps calm upsets and control simple diarrhea without constipating.

A Norwich Product

Take Hospital Tested Pepto-Bismol® . . . and feel good again!

NOW . . . A LOVELY
FULL-POINT MANICURE

RECENTLY . . .
SPLITTING, BREAKING NAILS IMPOSSIBLE TO MANICURE

AT YOUR GROCER'S

In fruit juice, bouillon or water, each day drink one envelope (115-120 grains) of

KNOX Gelatine

MORE PEOPLE USE
Sugarine
America's original and oldest calorie-free liquid sweetener
1916 - 1957

SWEETER THAN SUGAR - YET NO FOOD VALUE

doctors recommend SUGARINE for diabetics, overweights, low calorie diets

PURE-HARMLESS-ECONOMICAL

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz. bottle only 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW

Dr. Scholl's Super-Sheer

ELASTIC STOCKINGS

NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops, Drug, Department, Surgical Supply Stores. For leaflet and booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Illinois.

JOANNE IS IN THE KITCHEN COUNTING OUT HER CALORIES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

bars, and then at noontime I was first in line at the school cafeteria for macaroni and cheese, or scalloped potatoes with ham, or peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches, pudding and milk. I could "hold out" until dinner with potato chips and more candy. Dinner always included two helpings of meat with potatoes and gravy or a rich casserole, vegetables, hot homemade buttered bread, two slices of mother's fresh-baked pie or a few of my own cream puffs. In the evening, our crowd used to drink cola-with-peanuts. You pour a bag of peanuts into the cola and gulp it all down together. Doesn't it sound awful?

DOTTIE: How did you rate with the crowd you speak o.?

JOANNE: I always felt like an outsider—as though I were imposing on the other girls, taking advantage of the friendship they offered. And I literally dragged behind—I was too fat to keep up with them.

DAWN: And the boys?

JOANNE: I hated boys. Now that I'm slim, I realize I pretended to dislike them in an effort to keep from having my feelings hurt by them. Each morning I'd have to board a school bus bringing teen-agers from neighboring towns to our school. They'd always talk out loud about the way I looked, and then burst into laughter. Or they'd think of the goofiest-looking fellow in town and say, "Joanne, you and he would make a good pair." They'd never sit next to me, exclaiming there wasn't room for a midget on the same seat. I used to go home and cry afterward. I didn't want to go back to school.

DOTTIE: Then you never had a date?

JOANNE: Sometimes a boy would get stuck with me at our roller-skating parties. We'd drive to the rink. When the car was crowded, girls would sit on boys' laps. The boy I was with always sat on my lap!

DAWN: It isn't funny to be the only teen-age girl in the class who is never asked out for her own sake!

JOANNE: I did have a blind date once. I was so excited about it, I spent hours getting ready. But when my escort arrived, he was so startled at the sight of big me, he acknowledged our introduction by saying, "Gosh, you're big—I mean tall!" It spoiled everything. We went for a walk—and that was the beginning and end of my first date.

DOTTIE: No beaux, no pretty clothes, no pride. Joanne, weren't those things enough to start you on a diet?

JOANNE: The sorrier for myself I became, the more I ate to make up for it. I had always wanted to be a cheerleader, but fancy 223-pound Joanne out there jumping up and down for the home team! I loved swimming, but I wouldn't have been caught in a bathing suit at the swimming center where most of the young people met. Instead, I settled for a little out-of-the-way lake where there were mostly older folks.

DAWN: What did make you decide to reduce?

JOANNE: I finally realized that my being fat was unfair to everyone I knew. Girls were always walking on a sort of conversational tiptoe around me, to avoid saying things that would hurt my feelings. My parents were t happy. I felt that I was headed toward po health.

MRS. MAGORIEN: There was a letter th came one day ——

JOANNE: Yes, from a boy in the Army st tioned in Korea. I had had a crush on hi and when I got his letter I was walking clouds (poor clouds!). I wanted to send h my picture. But I had to reduce first!

DOTTIE: How long did it take to lose pounds?

JOANNE: A little over six months. I start dieting in December, 1955, and by Jun 1956, I had lost 65 pounds. The extra fi have come off since. I'll continue to mainta my present weight of 153 for another fe months, and then gradually bring it down a other ten pounds or so. My doctor and I b lieve 145 pounds will just about ideal for me I'm tall, 5′10″.

DAWN: Your doct must have been please

JOANNE: He was accustomed to my bei fat, he automatica handed me a calor chart every time I l his office. When he alized that I was goi to use it, he was lighted.

DOTTIE: Was it ha to stick to your diet?

JOANNE: Only for t first two weeks. I ke on eating what I us ally ate, cutting wa down on portions. Th is, with the exception sweets and betwee meal snacks, which cut out completely. continued to bake f my family and friend but I assigned m brothers and sisters official "tasters." The loved the job, and kept me from beir tempted.

DAWN: What please you most about losir all that weight?

JOANNE: Being ab to feel I belonged; th I was being asked o because I was real wanted. Naturally it w a thrill to step into a si 16 dress as compare to a 40—and to be able to belt my waistli into a comfortable 27″ instead of the tigh squeeze 34″. I gave my fatty clothes to frien who used them as maternity dresses—and cut up the cotton dresses and made pret aprons out of them.

DOTTIE: People must be happy for you!

JOANNE: There are some who still can believe it. One evening last week I stood cha ting with a girl friend on the sidewalk when car went by with two boys I had known all m life. I waved to them. They looked, but didn wave back. Then they turned the car aroun and drove by us again. I waved for the secon time. No response. Then the car turne around again and drove by us s-l-o-w-l-y. On of the boys leaned so far through the windo I thought he'd fall out. "Is that you, Janet?" "No, Dennie, it's me—Joanne—you've on known me eighteen years!" Brakes screeche the car jolted to a halt and the boys bounce out to see for themselves. "Gosh, Joanne, Dennie exclaimed, "you're terrific! Where the rest of you?" We all laughed—they ac tually had not recognized me.

DAWN: How about the boy from Korea—did you send your pictures to him?

JOANNE: Oh, yes, he loved them. In fac (complexion turning more peaches than cream he's already proposed! EN

HIS GOING

By ALBERT STEWART

Singing he went, and whistling down the wind,
With soft blue shadows lagging in his eyes,
Whither the violent sunset at day's end
Seemed like God's burning brush piles in the skies.

The loitering light of skies now fading dim
Awoke a strange excitement there in him,
And ever his heart kept budding into song
Fresh as the springtime, as he went along.

The wind was sighing, and the moist-toned frogs
Fluted the darkness with the wakeful birds.
Earth was a throat whispering flowers up by old logs,
And the wind and the leaves and the stars were words.

SCHOOLS AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND LITERATURE. WRITE THEM DIRECT, STATING YOUR SPECIFIC INTERESTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Colleges

Brenau College edited A.B. Degree and B.S. in El. Ed. Liberal Arts, Journalism, Secretarial, Physical Ed., Home Ec., Nutrition, Music, Art, Drama, Speech, Broadcasting. 1250 ft. elev. In Atlanta. All Sports. National Sororities. Attendance 46 states. Address Brenau, Box 503, Gainesville 5, Ga.

Emerson College Specialization in radio, television, drama, speech, speech and hearing therapy within a broad liberal arts program. B.S., B.S., M.A., M.S. degrees. Coed. College owned theatre, radio station and completely up-to-date electronic television production studio. Dormitories. 77th yr. Catalog. Admissions Dean, 126 Beacon St., Boston 16, Mass.

Junior Colleges

GREENBRIER FOR GIRLS

Junior College & 2 yrs. High School. In healthful Alleghenies. 144th year. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Personal guidance. Outstanding social, sports programs. Fireproof suites. Addah B. McClaskey, Dir. of Admissions, Box L, Lewisburg, W. Va.

Cliff Park By The Sea Fully accredited. Jr. College, 2 yrs. H.S. Strong Liberal Arts program prepares young women for college entrance or transfer. High academic standards. National patronage. Music, art, dance, home economics, secretarial, speech. Water sports on Gulf of Mexico. Trips. Catalog. William G. Dwyer, Ed. D., Box J, Gulfport, Mississippi

Averett College girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 98th yr. Catalog. Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Bayatford College Accredited Junior College and Preparatory. Develops aptitudes and abilities. Liberal Arts. Fine Arts, Vocational courses. Healthful location in foothills Blue Ridge Mts. Campus of 15 acres—all sports. Social program. Write for "Intimate Glimpses" and catalog. John C. Simpson, LL.D., Pres., Box L-5, Danville, Va.

Nichols Junior College For Men. Executive Courses in Business Administration, leading to degree. Conservation & Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment. James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols Junior College, Dudley 6, Mass.

Girls' Schools

Kent Place

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS · SUMMIT NEW JERSEY

Since 1894 a school of distinctive purpose—to graduate alert, poised girls, well-trained in every respect for college life. Spacious dorm on extensive campus 20 miles from NYC—country and cosmopolitan living. Music, art, dramatics, sports, riding, all activities. Catalog. Miss Florence A. Wolfe, B.A., M.A., Headmistress

Bradford School for Girls Accredited college preparation in ideal 'round climate. Open air classes. Music, art, dramatics, secretaryship. Character and personality development in friendly home life. Sports, riding. Endowed. Limited enrollment. Catalog. Lucinda de L. Templin, Ph.D., Principal, 4701 Austin Terrace, El Paso, Texas

Oak Grove A Friends' School for Girls. Emphasizes Preparation for College and Graduation, Purposeful Living. Music, Art, Speech. Grades 7-12. Broadening interests of international enrollment. Riding included. Indoor ring. Expert from Norway teaches Winter Sports. Beautiful new fireproof Quadrangle. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Hewlett School Island School for Girls 8–18. Est. 1915. Thorough college preparation. Balanced general course. Dramatics, art, music. Small classes. Complete sports program. Riding. Country campus. Homelike. Accredited by N.Y. Bd. of Regents. Colette J. Sullivan, Headmistress, East Islip, L. I., N. Y.

Holden Hall for College and School for Girls. Cultural and Vocational, Music, Home Economics, Secretarial Studies. Fine Arts, Commercial Art. Dramatic Art. Preparatory and General Courses. All sports. Riding. Swimming Pool. Moderate tuition. Address: Byron K. Horne, D.D., Box 75, Lititz, Pa.

The schools, colleges and camps whose announcements appear on this page will be glad to supply information. In writing to them for catalogs and details concerning their courses, mention the age and present grade of the prospective student.

Camps, too, will appreciate knowing something about your child's special interests when you write for booklets.

Boys' Camps

CULVER SUMMER SCHOOLS ON LAKE MAXINKUCKEE

8 HAPPY WEEKS

Three separate camps. Regular Academy instructors. Excellent recreational, living, health and dining facilities. Neatness, promptness, courtesy emphasized. All land and water sports. NAVAL (boys 14-18). Naval training, sailing, boating, shore drill, optional tutoring. HORSEMANSHIP (boys 14-18). Equitation, jumping, polo under expert horsemen. WOODCRAFT CAMP (boys 9½-14). Indian and Nature lore; handicraft, campcraft, coaching athletic activities. Nationwide enrollment. Separate catalogs. 52 LAKE SHORE AVENUE CULVER, INDIANA

Idlewild The Oldest Private Camp. 67th year. Lake Winnipesaukee, N.H. For boys—3 divisions. 8 weeks $465. No extras. Riding. Sailing, canoe, mountain trips. Golf, riflery, archery, speedboat, water skiing, aquaplaning, music, tutoring. Mature staff. Doctor, nurse. Cabins. Booklet. Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Roys, 375 Otis Street, West Newton 65, Massachusetts

Boys' Schools

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY

"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep, School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band. Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

Croydon Hall
For boys, Grades 3 through 12. Sound college preparation. Small classes. Strong remedial education program. Individual guidance and testing. Team sports. Riding, tennis, golf. Field trips. 45 acres. 40 miles from N.Y.C. Summer Session. Dr. John J. Carr, Pres., Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

Carteret School
Superior College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. Small classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Shops. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop Orange Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. Request booklet E-16. Carteret School, West Orange, N.J.

Lakemont Academy
Accredited. Ninth grade through high school. Excellent record preparing boys for college. Small classes. Homelike atmosphere. All sports. Boating. Riding. Speech training, dramatics. 160 acres overlooking beautiful Seneca Lake. Also Summer School and Camp. Box W, Lakemont, N. Y.

Peddie A college preparatory school with a tradition of outstanding success preparing boys for college and for life. Grades 6–12. Endowed; fully accredited. Guidance; remedial reading; public speaking required. Separate Junior School. All sports, golf, tennis. Gym, swimming pool. 280 acres. Summer session. 92nd year. Catalog. Dr. C. O. Morong, Headmaster, Box M, Hightstown, N. J.

Peekskill Military Academy
124th Year. Personal interest in each Boy. Prepares for all colleges. Small classes. High Achievement Records in College and Life. All sports. Rifle Team. Swimming pool. Grades 6–12. Enroll now. Illustrated Catalog. Address Headmaster, Box 405, Peekskill 4, N. Y. Tel. 7-4520

Carson Long
Boys' Military School. Educates the whole boy—physically, mentally, morally. How to learn, how to labor, how to live. Prepares for college, life or business. 121st year of character building. Overall charges $1225.00. Box 10, New Bloomfield, Pa.

Bordentown Military Institute Fully accredited.
College preparatory. Business, general courses. Aviation. Outstanding record of college entrance. ROTC. Boys taught how to study; small classes; individual attention. All sports. Junior School. 76th yr. Summer session. Write for catalog. Registrar, Box 405, Bordentown, N. J.

Rumsey Hall
Junior School for Boys. 80 miles from N.Y.C. Grades 1 thru 8. Small classes. Boys learn to study. Country environment. Well coached team sports. Fishing, Skiing. Skating. Riflery. Mention age & grade. For booklet address: Mr. David J. Barr, Headmaster, Washington 6, Conn.

Special Schools

The Training School at Vineland, N. J.
Summer session, July 1–Sept. 1. An adventure in happiness for retarded and slow-learning children. Internationally noted. Medical, psychiatric, psychological, speech programs. 1600 acres; swimming pools. Minimum enrollment—4 weeks. Write: Registrar, Box L.

Binghamton Training School
Specialized programs for retarded children. Small groups. Excellent facilities. Experienced staff. Established 1881. Dr. W. H. Boldt, Director, 120 Fairview Ave., Binghamton, N. Y.

Fine & Applied Arts

Moore Institute of Art 113th year. Professional College for Career Women. Internationally known artist-instructors. State accredited 4-year B.F.A. or B.S. degree courses. Advertising Art, Art Ed., Fashion Design & Illustration, Interior & Textile Design. Painting & Illus. New residence hall. Catalog. 1384 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia 21, Pa.

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art. Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design. Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter each month. Write Registrar, Room 5B. Specify course. Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Boys' Schools

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY

Health and interest assured by Spring and Fall in Georgia mountains. Winter at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida—two complete school plants, each with all facilities. Outdoor sports year round.

Fully accredited preparation for all colleges. Also Post Graduate Dept. Constant association with selected teachers who live and eat with cadets. Weekly reports. ROTC program. Progress GUARANTEED. Reasonable All-inclusive fee. Outstanding record. Athletics for all. Separate Junior High, grades 7-8. For illustrated catalog, address:

GENERAL SANDY BEAVER, Pres., Box 505-J, Gainesville 5, Georgia

6 MONTHS IN BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS • 3 WINTER MONTHS NEAR MIAMI

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog. Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog. Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 90th year. Catalog. Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8–12. Small classes. 144-acre campus. 84th year. Catalog. Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

Miami Military Academy
Disciplined training for successful manhood. Fully accredited. Grades 1–12. College preparatory, general. Tutoring method assures maximum progress. Sports, teams for all. Pool. 35 acres. Moderate all-inclusive fee. Catalog. Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

Greenbrier Military School
145th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-605, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Roosevelt Military Academy
"Builders of Men." An outstanding educational institution. Fully accredited; Noted Guidance Department; small classes; personal supervision; free tutoring; all sports; band; riding. Moderate rate. Grades 5–12. Catalog: Colonel Glen J. Millikan, Box J, Aledo, Ill.

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 79th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog: Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-5, Alton, Illinois

Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 113th yr. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, 1657 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Missouri Military Academy and Separate Junior School.
69th year. Grades 4–12. Fully accredited. Senior ROTC. Friendly and inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong remedial reading and guidance program. All sports. Riding. Golf. 5 athletic fields. 226 acre campus. Catalog. Col. C. R. Stribling, 757 Main Street, Mexico, Missouri

Home Study Schools

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME

You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.

I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS SCRANTON 9, PENNA. DEPT. 39112D

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 51st year. Catalog. Give age, school grade. Calvert School, 855 W. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet. Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 1375, Chicago 14

Vocational

Be a Hotel Hostess

Enjoy Your Work! Fascinating positions in hotels, motels, clubs, apartment house projects as Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Manager, etc. Alice Behr writes: "Am Hotel Hostess-Housekeeper and my position is well-paid." Write for FREE book, "Your Big Opportunity." Approved for ALL Veteran Training. Lewis Hotel Training School, Sta. CE-501, Wash. 7, D. C. 41st Yr.

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5–12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influences. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog: Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration.
★ Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, pool. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym. Housemothers. 59th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:

Dr. J.C.Wicker, Box 865, Fork Union, Va.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

McDonogh One of the Nation's leading preparatory schools for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges and service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses. 2 gyms, indoor pool. Near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog. Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1250. Catalog. Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Gordon Military College
Accredited. Grades 8–12. Also two years college. ROTC trains for military or civilian leadership. Supervised study. Stimulating activities program. 350 acres. Golf, all sports, pool. $895 inclusive rate. Founded 1852. Catalog. Col. C. L. Harris, President, Barnesville, Georgia

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1000. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 79th year. Catalog. Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. New dorms and pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Summer Camp. Catalog. Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1757 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. Sports. Summer Camp. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, Box 357, Delafield, Wisconsin

Coeducational School

The Arnold School Trains boys and girls, 6–18, for self-reliant living. Work, study, play program. Stress on fundamentals. Thorough college preparation; also general, agricultural courses. Guidance. Family atmosphere. 165 acres. Operating farm. Sports, hobbies for all. 26th year. Write for catalog. Nathan H. Arnold, E. Pembroke, Mass.

Business & Secretarial

katharine gibbs secretarial

BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.

Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

Berkeley School Train for key secretarial positions. Intensive, comprehensive courses for H.S. graduates, college women. Distinguished faculty. Guidance. Effective placement service with leading business organizations. 2-yr., 1-yr. courses. New term June 24. Write for catalog J. 420 Lexington Ave., New York City 17. Also: White Plains, New York; East Orange, New Jersey

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Easiest to learn, write, transcribe. Lowest cost. Over 350,000 graduates. Typing available. 34th Year. Write for FREE booklet to:

Speedwriting® Dept. 9905-7, 55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36, N. Y.

Medical Technology

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for excellence of training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Write for Catalog L. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Does standing on your feet all day give you tired aching legs?

If you come home from work "out on your feet"... if standing up all day has become downright agony... here is what may be the matter, and what you can do about it

Millions of people suffer needlessly every day as they go through their jobs standing on legs that throb and swell and ache.

Are you one of them?

Probably it's been getting worse over the years. Or maybe you are just beginning to have trouble . . . and you are wondering why. First, we must consider how the blood stream circulates from the central pumping station of the heart.

One cause: bad circulation in the legs

When the blood leaves the heart, it flows freely to every part of the body through a series of blood vessels (arteries). Then it returns again along another interconnected network of vessels (the veins).

On this return journey through the veins, the blood gathers waste materials to be discharged into the lungs. If, however, it cannot carry the waste materials as fast as they are accumulating, you may begin to experience a chronic condition of fatigue.

Naturally this problem becomes most acute in the extremities of the legs. Here the blood stream grows sluggish, especially during long periods of standing on your feet.

The relief doctors recommend

For years doctors have recommended the use of elastic stockings for circulatory conditions in the legs.

Today's elastic stockings have proved to be indispensable in aiding the circulation of blood through the veins. They do this by gently applying the support necessary to restore enlarged veins to their normal size. The blood circulates faster . . . the pain subsides . . . and your legs feel a thousand per cent better. (Yet no one will ever know you're wearing elastic stockings.)

The stockings we have been talking about are the sheer, new Bauer & Black Elastic Stockings. We suggest you see your doctor first. Chances are he'll recommend these stockings, too. You will find them at drug, department, and surgical supply stores . . . or send the coupon for full information.

Bauer & Black, Dept. LH-5A
Division of The Kendall Company
309 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago 6, Illinois

Send me a copy of your free booklet on the relief of leg fatigue with sheer new Bauer & Black Elastic Stockings.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

MEMORIAL DAY, 1900

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 145

town on Penobscot Bay; and it was known far and wide for the superior quality of its citizenry. My father could ill afford not to accept its gracious invitation; and we straightway began to prepare for his appearance there in its First Unitarian Church.

He always mercifully wrote his oration in his dingy law office, located throughout his life above our one substantial grocery store; yet since he was frequently given to muttering portions of it at home or to pacing back and forth through the house or barn, clearly lost in the throes of further composition, my mother was never unaware either of its progress or of those periods of desperate barrenness which always accompany all literary endeavor. Nor were we children unaffected during those three months between Town Meeting and Memorial Day, for, whenever my father began his muttering or his pacing, we, like King Hezekiah in the Old Testament, went "softly" about our various occupations or, if possible, cleared out altogether.

Once the Castine oration was completed and read aloud many times to my mother, more for her approval than for her advice, she became immensely helpful to my father in the matter of gestures. For at that period gestures in any public address were both expected and carefully noted, and to omit them would have been unthinkable. My mother maintained that gestures should be effective, but in no sense ostentatious; and my father, with the awful example of William Jennings Bryan before him, entirely agreed with her. She favored a graceful wave of either hand until the arm should be at a right angle to the body, and at especially fervent moments of both hands in unison. She did not object to the elevation of the right arm to an almost perpendicular position if sentiment and eloquence demanded, or even to the clenching of the two hands before one; but she deplored the pointing of index fingers at the audience, any pounding upon the speaker's desk, and all bodily contortions whatsoever. These invariably sacrificed dignity, she said, and dignity, never divorced of course from sincere feeling, was the essence of a speaker's appeal.

The gestures at last decided upon between them, at least two rehearsals were held before us all, my father by this time having memorized his address. These took place in the kitchen and were truly awesome affairs, during which we children sat, tense, spellbound and worried. My father's final appearance before his family was in the nature of a dress rehearsal, for, because my mother thought he might feel awkward in Castine out of his usual business suit, he donned his Prince Albert, striped trousers and stiff shirt and in this attire solemnly delivered his oration. Needless to say, no suggestions from his children were solicited. We were there solely to admire.

Fortunately I do not have to rely only upon my memory in order to describe my father's appearance in Castine. Some months ago I discovered his address in a bundle of family papers and can now read it precisely as it was delivered with but one paragraph out of place. The paragraph in question came to the Castine audience as a triumphant innovation on my father's part, a bit of extemporaneous composition which established his reputation as one able at an unexpected crisis to rise to incredible heights of eloquence. It was, in point of fact, nothing of the kind.

This excerpt from my father's address had been the subject of much discussion and even of argument between my mother and him. It was a brief tribute to the men in gray, our enemies of forty years before; and my father had written it with charity and care and favored its inclusion. He had, however, been reluctantly persuaded by my mother to omit it, since, as she pointed out, Memorial Day was distinctly a day of commemoration for our men in blue and since the oration was already of generous length. That he had thoroughly memorized this excluded paragraph was merely one of those happy circumstances which one can attribute either to Chance or to Providence.

Our drive to Castine on May thirtieth in our surrey behind our two well-groomed black horses was an anxious one. My brother and my elder sister occupied the front seat with my father; my mother, my younger sister and I sat behind them. My father wore a linen duster over his Prince Albert, and my mother had taken the added precaution of inserting a piece of white druggist's paper between his immaculate linen and the duster in order that he might arrive in perfect condition. In her lap she carried his top hat swathed in a clean napkin. I had the honor of carefully holding his gold-headed cane. The weather was mercifully fine though unseasonably warm.

Although on any other day I should have been blissful over an excellent dinner in a real hotel and proud beyond words of the attentions of the hotel staff, I was swept by waves of homesickness as two o'clock drew near. There, but sixteen miles away, our own procession was forming; here, as all the Castine children gathered with their flowers, my brother and sisters and I could but watch from the side lines. To see my father take his place behind the Castine clergy was but small comfort. I obtained far more, in fact, from observing that the Castine procession possessed no captain of cavalry, no horse, no flashing sword.

There was some compensation, it is true, in our grave entrance as a family into the crowded church, the polite ushering of us all into a front pew; but there dread quickly over-

S S S S S S S

Men who fight about religion have no religion to fight about, since they do in the name of religion the thing which religion itself forbids.

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON
Living Every Day
Harper & Bros.

S S S S S S S

came distinction. Suppose my father did not acquit himself well? Suppose he fumbled in his delivery, misplaced his gestures or forgot his words? He himself could not lend us security by his dignity or calm, for he was being kept behind the scenes, presumably in the church vestry, until the moment came for his dramatic entrance.

I looked toward my mother at the far end of the pew. She was clearly agitated, for she had unfolded her pale blue fan and was fanning her perspiring face. Folded on her lap was my father's oration, which, although she knew it by heart, she would follow as surreptitiously as possible so that she might leap into the awful breach by prompting him in case of failure.

Our fears proved groundless. My father's entrance was more impressive than any he had yet made, at home or abroad. With his top hat and gray kid gloves carried against his left breast, he proceeded slowly up the aisle and ascended the stairs leading to the platform.

Once in the pulpit, he surveyed his audience, his eyes seemingly missing no one except his nervous family, until they came to rest upon the pews directly opposite our own where Castine's soldiers of the Grand Army sat together. Upon these he now bent his solemn, admiring gaze, for it was to them that he was first to speak. Then his familiar opening words burst forth:

"Gentlemen! Defenders of the Republic! Preservers of the Union! Two score years have well nigh sped since you performed with dauntless heroism your sacred mission upon the hallowed earth of this nation. So swift, indeed, has flowed the ever-rolling stream of Time that he who now addresses you can but dimly recall the martial music of your homecoming."

From prologue to epilogue my father's lofty periods rose and fell, every intonation designed to arouse emotion, every telling gesture perfectly performed, every pause weighted with eloquence. We relaxed. My mother folded her fan. Her hands forgot to turn the pages in her lap. She sat entranced and confident. Was she, too, I thought, wondering how this superb presence in the pulpit could be the same man who milked our cow twice daily, was often fretful over trifles, and occasionally cut himself while shaving and bellowed for hot water?

When, after a spellbinding hour, my father concluded his oration and with his arms outstretched assured the men in blue of eternal glory in that they had kept our nation one and indivisible, the applause which rose in a mighty swell throughout the church was overwhelming. We alone did not clap our hands since my mother had thought it unseemly in view of our close connection with the speaker. Then as an added ovation the audience rose and we, after some hesitation and the exchange of many questioning glances, rose also. Tears were by this time visible on my mother's eyelids, and I saw that she was holding her lower lip firmly between her teeth.

If my father was overcome by this flattering reception of his oration, he did not show it. He stood in the pulpit for some moments bowing with great dignity, to the front, to the right, to the left. As the applause increased he walked to the edge of the platform and continued bowing, now bringing his shoulders and chest into dramatic action. When the clapping had at last died away and that moment of silence which always marks the failure to leave one world quickly for another had transfixed the audience, he turned to descend the pulpit stairs and to make his triumphal way down the main aisle.

Then an unexpected thing happened, a thing unprepared for in a day prepared to the least detail. Before my father had reached the stairs, an old man rose from his seat near the front of the church, from the farthest corner beneath a window. That he was a stranger was evident from the curious stares leveled upon him. He stood for an instant in his place and then called out clearly in a high, quavering voice:

"A remarkable oration, young man! But have you no tribute for the boys in gray?"

My father hesitated for but the fraction of a minute, but in that fraction I saw him look toward my mother with both reproval and elation. Then he slowly walked back across the platform until he stood facing the old man before an audience tense with confusion, excitement and indignation. His voice rose in the quiet church:

"In this solemn hour, on this most sacred of days, let us not forget or, indeed, be callous toward those brave men who likewise yielded up their lives, even if for another principle and for another purpose. Only God in His omnipotent wisdom can judge the right and reward the just. Yet heroism in whatever cause is forever glorious, and life sacrificed for that cause forever hallowed."

Only his family in the front pew knew that my father's tribute to the men in gray was not extemporaneous. Yet even we were unprepared for his final act. For when he had descended the stairs, he moved impulsively toward the stranger, took him by the hand, and with him at his side paced slowly down the aisle. The men in blue followed, two by two, and not a few in tears. In the year 1900 the public display of emotion was not so curtailed as it is today, and handkerchiefs were much in evidence throughout the First Unitarian Church of Castine.

We drove home through the spring twilight in silence. My father seemed remote and inaccessible. He had declined to wear his linen duster and sat erect and august in his top hat and Prince Albert, holding the reins in his left hand and the tasseled whip across them high in his right. The thrushes and whippoorwills sounded plaintively in the distance. And I, sitting beside my mother in the back seat, compared my father not unfavorably with Capt. Augustus Stevens and his flashing sword.

PIER ANGELI LOVES LUSTRE-CREME SHAMPOO

Cream or Lotion

never dries it beautifies

thick and creamy . . .
blessed with lanolin!
needs no after-rinse!

of course, it leaves hair more manageable!

NO WONDER IT'S THE FAVORITE SHAMPOO OF 4 OUT OF 5 TOP HOLLYWOOD MOVIE STARS

=

What a Peanut Butter! So nourishing a sandwich equals a square meal!

Comes in exclusive "Early American" goblets and sherbets, in addition to the handy refrigerator jar.

BIG TOP

It's naturally fortified!

NUTRITIONISTS AGREE: One Big Top sandwich has as much basic nourishment—proteins, fats, carbohydrates, food energy—as this meal of juicy beef, potato, carrots.

We're not suggesting that you give up hot dishes and serve Big Top sandwiches for every meal. But at lunch or snack time, it's wonderful to know: Big Top is naturally fortified—a powerhouse of nourishment. 1½ ounces of Big Top between two slices of bread has as much basic food value as the meal above, with normal portions shown. All this plus important vitamins and minerals.

No other peanut butter packs this essential nourishment with Big Top's extra golden-good flavor. So serve sandwiches of creamy, easy-spreading Big Top with milk, fresh fruit—a perfect snack!

Kids are eager as beavers each time that you spread Creamy, golden-good BIG TOP on slices of bread!

© W. T. Young Foods, Inc., subsidiary of The Procter & Gamble Co.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

JOURNAL

June
1957 - 35¢

The Magazine Women Believe In

DR. GRANTLY D. READ Tells His Long Struggle to Win for Women
the Right of
NATURAL CHILDBIRTH

NDENSED NOVEL COMPLETE-IN-THIS-ISSUE ESCAPE TO THE M N

CYD CHARISSE AND TONY MARTIN AT HOME

HOW TO HAVE ENOUGH MONEY TO

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...you know by Ipana's distinct taste

• New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly.
Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.

• Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste.
So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

Look for the BIG cap
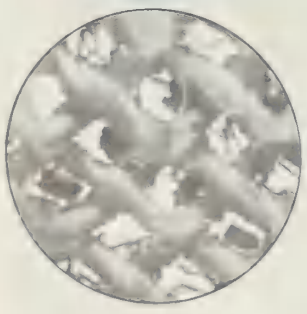
—only on NEW Ipana

ipana®
TOOTH PASTE

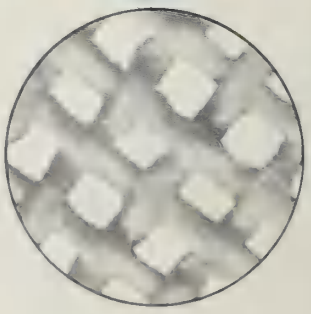
Product of Bristol-Myers

CLEAN CLEAR THROUGH

—and Deodorized Too!



THAT'S A FAB WASH!



Microscope, magnifying fabric 100 times, shows how FAB gets clothes clean clear through, not just whitened on the surface. Your clothes may look clean when washed with a less effective product—but enlargement (Picture No. 1) reveals hidden dirt left behind. Hidden dirt can cause odor. No such danger with FAB-washed fabric (Picture No. 2). It's not just bleached white or blued white, it's clean clear through—and deodorized, too!

Old-fashioned washday product left hidden dirt in clothes. Dirt can cause odor...

PICTURE NO. 1

Clothes washed with modern FAB are clean clear through—and deodorized, too...

PICTURE NO. 2

FAB Is The Hard-Working, Heavy-Duty Detergent For The Whole Family Wash... And Dishes, Of Course!

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

JUNE, 1957

JOURNALITIES

Dr. Read and family at home.

DR. GRANTLY DICK READ, here photographed with sons Ian and Leigh and wife Jess near their home in Sidlesham Hampstead, has devoted a lifetime to the cause of natural childbirth: published three books, lectured in several countries, established a natural-childbirth clinic in Johannesburg, and won the respect and gratitude of women all over the world. As a child, he first became indignant over the mystery, fear and dread that surrounded the birth of a child; but his mother told him, "Childbirth is a very dreadful danger." Unconvinced, he went on to become a doctor and crusader; some of his struggles and triumphs are described in Childbirth Without Fear and Without Pain (p. 72).

Hope Dahle Jordan

HOPE DAHLE JORDAN, author of Heat Wave (p. 64), has a married daughter, a college-age son, and a husband who once hugged her so hard he broke a rib. Wisconsin-born, she lived in many different cities after her marriage. "But I can only write about a place that affects my emotions, so every story has to be located in Wisconsin." Now that it's summer, Mrs. Jordan says, "I golf and golf, dreaming about next winter and the wonderful stories I intend to write. Next winter, I'll glue myself to the typewriter and dream about summer and golf. So the two most frustrating occupations in the world can't get me down; for when I'm doing one, I'm thinking of the other!"

Joe Di Pietro

Equally well-known at the JOURNAL for his irrepressible high spirits and his excellent photography is JOE DI PIETRO, whose assignments take him to all parts of the United States, to Europe, even to India. One morning he may be in New York, photographing a visiting writer or film star for Journal About Town; that same afternoon flying down to a small town in Georgia, to spend a week taking the casual, relaxed shots that show How America Lives. Off-duty, Joe lives with his wife, son and daughter in Long Island, where he keeps busy transplanting fruit trees, gardening, building, boating—living that he describes as "typically exurban."

Condensed Books Complete in This Issue

ESCAPE TO THE MOUNTAIN (Fiction), Thelma Strabel . 62
CHILDBIRTH WITHOUT FEAR AND WITHOUT PAIN (Nonfiction), Dr. Grantly Dick Read . 72 Stories

HEAT WAVE, Hope Dahle Jordan . 64
END OF THE ROAD, Paul M. Fitzsimmons . 66
LOVE'S OLD SWEET SONG, Dorothy Black . 68
THE DURABLE FIRE (Fourth part of five), Howard Swiggett . 74
DETOUR IN SUMMER, S. W. M. Humason . 83

Special Features

A MORAL EQUIVALENT FOR WAR, Dorothy Thompson . 11
NO, MAMMA, NO!, Marjorie Riddell . 16
BETTER LIVING FOR ELDER-AGERS . 23
HINTS FROM A PATIENT TO HER VISITORS, Ernesta Barlow . 34
WHAT CAN PARENTS DO WHEN THEIR CHILDREN QUARREL?, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 36
I WOULD LIKE TO TEACH ANOTHER SEVENTY YEARS!, Frederick E. Bolton . 44
SOME PEOPLE'S CHILDREN, Paula Reed . 44
WANTED—WOMEN TO HELP, Virginia C. Gildersleeve . 82
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 88
MRS. WEST AND HER SON RAPHAEL, Painting by Benjamin West, Description by Hereward Lester Cooke . 89
WILL YOU HAVE ENOUGH MONEY WHEN YOU RETIRE?, Robert Peterson . 159
HOW AMERICA LIVES:
"I DIDN'T WANT TO RETIRE," Betty Coe Spicer . 160
"I WAS LAID OFF AT 70," Betty Coe Spicer . 161
"WE POOLED OUR RESOURCES," Betty Coe Spicer . 162
"EVERYBODY CAN DO SOMETHING," Betty Coe Spicer and Jeanne Holmes . 163
A CLIMATE OF FREEDOM, Jean Todd Freeman . 174

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 20
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY, Gladys Taber . 41
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 50
"WE AGREE ON ALMOST EVERYTHING EXCEPT SEX," Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 54
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 61
THIS IS A FOOT-SITTER, Munro Leaf . 103
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 123
THE THINGS I DON'T KNOW, Margaret Parton . 171

Fashion and Beauty

DON'T GIVE UP YOUR FAVORITE DRESS, Wilhela Cushman . 76
YOUNG-TIME CLOTHES, Ruth Mary Packard . 78
OH, WHAT A BEAUTIFUL SWEATER!, Nora O'Leary . 80
ALL SET FOR SUMMER, Dawn Crowell Norman . 84
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING, Bet Hart . 111

Food

"WHEN I ENTERTAIN," Mme. Hervé Alphand, as told to Nancy Crawford Wood . 86
SUMMER GARDEN BUFFET . 90
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: VEGETABLES . 92
SUMMER SALAD DAYS . 130
OUR FAVORITE RECIPES, Hazel Wales . 164

Architecture, Gardening and Interior Decoration

YOUNG HOLLYWOOD AT HOME, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland and Eileen Sharpe . 70
4-BEDROOM PREFAB ERECTED IN A HURRY, Carol L. Crane . 146
WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN SUMMER? the Gardener's Assistant . 152

Poems

Elizabeth Graham 14 • Elizabeth Henley 44 ▪ Elizabeth McFarland 94 • Mary Wedemeyer McCarthy 101 ▪ Alma Roberts Giordan 118 • Mary Kennedy 120 Eleanor Halbrook Zimmerman 141 ▪ Thomas Carnicelli 155 • L. V. Francis 181 ▪ Wilfrid Thorley 191 ▪ Georgie Starbuck Galbraith 201

Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before ▪ change is to take effect please send your complete name, ▪▪▪ address and ▪ mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send ▪▪ with the ▪▪▪ one, including ▪▪▪ number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot ▪▪ sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1957 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U. S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U. S., U. S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Walter D. Fuller, Chairman of the Board; Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

TENNIS, ANYONE?

If this picture looks ridiculously old-fashioned to you, consider how far women have come—in dress, in attitude, in opportunities, in freedom.

Today's woman even shrugs monthly difficulties aside—and one thing that helps her do it is Tampax! Tampax® sanitary protection absorbs internally—right away you're freed of all those constant reminders—belts, pins, pads, the whole cumbersome contraption.

What has given Tampax world-wide popularity is its complete comfort. Physical comfort—you can't even feel Tampax when it's in place. Mental comfort—you don't worry any more about odor problems or disposal problems.

Millions of smart women are using Tampax right now. Why not join them? Why put off gaining the poise and freedom Tampax brings? Get your choice of 3 absorbencies (Regular, Super, Junior) wherever drug products are sold. The economy package gives average 4-months' supply. Look for Tampax Vendor in restrooms throughout the U.S. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Invented by ▪ doctor—now used by millions of women

TAMPAX INCORPORATED, Palmer, Mass.
Please send me in plain wrapper ▪ trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Size is checked below.
( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____
(Please print)
Address_____
City_____ State_____

family safety

begins with a Rubbermaid® Bathtub Mat

Firm footing for the small fry—yes, and for Grandma, too. Over 100 Safti-Cups grip the bottom of tub, help prevent accidents. Make bathtime safe-and-sure-time for everyone with Rubbermaid.

Sizes from $1.98 to $2.98 (U.S.A.). Wherever housewares are sold. For free folder, write The Wooster Rubber Company, Dept. L-37, Wooster, Ohio, or Cooksville, Ontario.

Rubbermaid Toilet Top Tray—Keeps bath powder and other toiletries safe and handy. Ribbed to stay in place. High rim prevents spill-overs. $1.29.

Rubbermaid®

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Over 60 fine products in your choice of fresh, home-fashion colors

Our READERS WRITE US

Thanks to Dr. Montagu!

Sioux Falls, South Dakota

Dear Editors: I am glad to be among those mothers who had their babies at home in response to Doctor Montagu's Babies Should be Born at Home (August, 1955). My doctor would not agree in advance to come, but I was determined not to give in—and it was one of the happiest experiences of my life.

It may be helpful to many women to know that information on preparing for a home delivery may be obtained from the Maternity Center Association in New York (48 E. 92nd Street). I also found Louise Zabriskie's Mother and Baby Care in Pictures, 4th Ed. (J. B. Lippincott) and, of course, Doctor Read's book, Childbirth Without Fear, invaluable.

"Natural" babies.

Having everything carefully prepared by the seventh month left the last weeks free of concern. In addition, I went over the details of delivery with my husband, in case our doctor didn't come in time (he did). For my own use I made lists to refer to when labor started, and which also gave phone numbers that might be needed—the doctor's, friends who would keep the children, and so on.

Enclosed is a picture of my two "natural childbirth" babies. The little fellow is the one born at home—not the least bit puny, as you can see!

Very truly yours,
HELEN WESSEL

Two American Boys Go to School in England

Eastbourne, Sussex, England

Dear Editors: By far the brightest highlight of our stay in England has been the boys' schools. Jay, who is eleven, has been attending a "public" school, not of the same rank as Eton or Winchester, but still quite good. They begin Latin, French and what seems to me to be higher mathematics at age nine!

Johnny is attending a place called the Dolphins, which is a pre-prep school, and since he is so much smarter than his father, and always has been, it is no surprise that he is near the top of his form. Jay, who had to jump from the multiplication tables (which he didn't know very well) to algebra and geometry and to second-year Latin and French, I was more worried about. I needn't have been. He is mad about his work and does it incredibly well. He has been at the top of his form of ten for the past three weeks. Of course the very small classes account for a lot (and the six-day week with school until six in the evening on Saturdays!), but the fact is that a ten-year-old can be taught almost anything. I wouldn't have believed it if I had not seen it.

Our conclusion is that we shall send both boys to private schools when we return. At least a boy will not be allowed to sit idle in a small class. I have been somewhat reluctant to criticize the public schools in the United States, chiefly because I felt it reflected on the teachers—and most of them should have many stars in their crowns. But the fact is that standards throughout the public-school system in the United States have dropped to the point where even mediocre accomplishments seem excellent. Obviously, many, many boys can be taught the traditional "hard" subjects—languages, math and science—at an age far younger than high school. Indeed, ten is about where they should start. I know it is not saying much for me, but I have visited in the scholarship form (thirteen-year-olds who have a chance to win a scholarship at a public school) and they were doing work in math and language superior to that for which I was awarded a master's degree in an American state university.

Sincerely,
GLENN WHITE

One Vote for Socialized Medicine

Port Washington, L.I., New York

Sir: Why don't you campaign for something worth while, like socialization of medicine? Don't you think we taxpayers should carry the burden of all the sick

CONTINUED ON PAGE 57

HELP!

Do you own a December, 1883, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL?

When Mr. and Mrs. Curtis started the JOURNAL way back then, perhaps they didn't realize how important that first issue might be to us someday. Anyway, they didn't save it. If you did (and are willing to sell), will you write us, PLEASE?

Over a year ago, we suggested that any readers who wished to do so might contribute old issues of the JOURNAL to the Radcliffe College Library. Due to the interest and co-operation of many of you, Radcliffe now has one of the finest JOURNAL collections in the United States, already in valued use by students of social history. Some issues are missing, however. If you have any of these magazines which you wish to sell for $1 each, write to Elizabeth B. Borden, Women's Archives, Radcliffe College, Cambridge 18, Massachusetts. Please do not send magazines. Missing numbers are:

December 1883 through November 1885
1886 February, April, May
1887 February, June, July, September through December
1888 February, April, May, June August, September, November
1889 July, August, September
1892 November, December
1896 December
1902 February, March
1905 September
1914 March
1924 June, July, September
1926 January, July

=

What a Peanut Butter! So nourishing a sandwich equals a square meal!

Comes in exclusive goblets and sherbets in "Early American" design. Also in the handy refrigerator jar.

BIG TOP

It's naturally fortified!

NUTRITIONISTS AGREE: One Big Top sandwich has as much basic nourishment—proteins, fats, carbohydrates, food energy—as this meal of chicken leg, rice, beets.

Of course we aren't proposing that you replace all hot meals with Big Top sandwiches. But at lunch or snack time, it's wonderful to know: Big Top is naturally fortified —a powerhouse of nourishment. 1½ ounces of Big Top between two slices of bread has as much basic food value as the meal above, with normal portions shown. All this, plus important vitamins and minerals.

No other peanut butter packs this essential nourishment and Big Top's extra golden-good flavor. So serve sandwiches of creamy, easy-spreading Big Top with milk and fresh fruit—a perfect snack!

"What's for lunch?" ask your lambs
And they're happy to see
Creamy, golden-good BIG TOP
"Tastes great," they agree.

© W. T. Young Foods, Inc., subsidiary of Procter & Gamble

BAYER ASPIRIN makes you FEEL BETTER FAST!

And it's one thing most everyone can take any time—WITHOUT STOMACH UPSET!

MINOR PAINS OF SCIATICA? FEEL BETTER FAST—Grandfather amazes everyone with the active life he leads, despite the minor pains of sciatica. His secret is taking Bayer Aspirin. Millions of people use Bayer Aspirin regularly to get quick, temporary relief not only from minor pains of sciatica, but those of arthritis, bursitis, and rheumatism, as well!

HEADACHE? FEEL BETTER FAST—Now there's no need to call off the date! Bayer Aspirin came to the rescue and relieved Joan's headache in a hurry! And Sue knows one reason why: When you drop a Bayer Aspirin tablet in a glass of water, it starts to disintegrate instantly. What happens in the glass also happens in your stomach, so Bayer Aspirin is actually ready to go to work instantly—to make you feel better fast!

ACHING MUSCLES? FEEL BETTER FAST—Steve and Joe rely on Bayer Aspirin, too—especially for quick relief from backache or aching muscles. Like countless others, they take it with complete confidence. You can always depend on Bayer Aspirin to bring you the fast relief you want, and the safe relief you need!

NEURALGIA? FEEL BETTER FAST—When it's time to relax, Mom and Dad don't let neuritic or neuralgic pain stand in their way. Two Bayer Aspirin tablets bring relief with remarkable speed! Besides being fast, Bayer Aspirin is gentle, too! In fact, it's so gentle that doctors prescribe it even for small children.

Don't Pay Twice the Price of Bayer Aspirin for ASPIRIN "IN DISGUISE"!

What is aspirin "in disguise"? . . . a pain relieving product that attempts to belittle straight aspirin, yet combines aspirin with such non-pain-relieving ingredients as magnesium carbonate or aluminum compounds—and it costs you twice the price of Bayer Aspirin!

Why pay more for extra ingredients that can't relieve pain? Instead, get Bayer Aspirin. It's all pain reliever—100%—and medical science has never discovered a safer and more effective pain relieving agent!

Doll by Madame Alexander

dley products for America are created in England, and finished in the U.S.A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C.

To make you feel so fresh and feminine

YARDLEY dusting powder... of course

The freshest, most feminine thing you can slip into after a bath or shower is a fragrant cloud of Yardley dusting powder. Fluff it on generously with its own big velvet puff to smooth your skin, to scent it delicately . . . delightfully! It's a wonderful basic way to capture the fresh, feminine feeling that only Yardley can give you. Choose from five delightful fragrances—April Violets, Bond Street, Red Roses, Lavender, Lotus. Generous box, $1.85 plus tax.

The 25th in a Series of Advertisements Presented by New York Life to Help Guide America's Children to a Better Future

Should your child make a career in the Armed Forces?

Members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff prepare for a regular meeting. L to R: Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, Chief of Naval Op tions; Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chief of Staff, U. S. Air Force; Adm. Arthur W. Radford, Chairman of the Joint Chief Staff; Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, Chief of Staff, U. S. Army; and Gen. Randolph McC. Pate, Commandant, U. S. Marine Co

by Admiral Arthur W. Radford

Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff

(As told to Donald Robinson)

IT HAS taken real men—with courage, initiative and dedication—to keep the United States free. There was John Paul Jones who wouldn't surrender though his ship was sinking beneath him. "I have not yet begun to fight," he declared. There was that tough Virginia frontiersman, Daniel Morgan. He rallied his handful of raw militiamen after everything seemed lost at the Battle of Cowpens and smashed the most dreaded cavalry unit in the British Army. There were Captain Meriwether Lewis and Lieutenant William Clark, the doughty explorers who dared the wilderness to blaze a path to the Pacific. There was Captain Alfred Thayer Mahan. In the face of serious obstacles, he developed new concepts of naval warfare that helped guide the United States to preeminence at sea.

Brave, able and patriotic men like these have been the backbone of our Armed Forces since the founding of the Republic.

They still are.

I know of a Navy pilot in World War II who found himself alone in the Pacific skies against nine enemy planes. He didn't make a run for safety. Instead, he attacked the nine enemy planes single handed and shot down five of them, thereby saving his carrier from probable destruction. I know of Army men and Air Force fliers in Korea who fought beyond the limits of human endurance. Short of guns, ammunition, even food, a few thousands of them in the Pusan beachhead stood off the entire weight of the North Korean invasion army. And think of the Marines who were surrounded by the Chinese Reds at Chosin Reservoir. In sub-zero weather, they battled clear of the Communist trap although they were outnumbered by five to one.

"Retreat, hell!", their commander said at the time. "We're just attacking in a new direction."

Nor is it only the men of the Armed Forces who have served this country so well. The women of the Armed Forces have performed as gallantly. I am reminded of the tiny—she was scarcely five feet tall—WAC supply sergeant who pulled a husky soldier out of a pool of burning gasoline in North Africa and smothered his flaming clothing with her own body. There have been many like her.

It is a magnificent tradition that the men and women of the Armed Forces have established. For 181 years, they have been the bulwark of the nation.

Those of us who belong to the Armed Forces derive an intense inner satisfaction from carrying on this tradition and adding to it. To our minds, military service in defense of our country and the cause of democracy is one of the most honorable professions possible for an American.

It is also, we believe, one of the most constructive. Though our prime concern in the Armed Forces is preparing for war, our chief mission is to prevent war.

Can there be a more worth-while objective?

The Armed Forces serve the country in other ways, too—big ways. Army engineers built many of our largest dams and flood control systems. Army and Navy doctors pioneered in the use of penicillin, sulfa drugs and blood plasma. Some of our most important navigational aids were perfected by Navy scientists. Radar, for example. And loran.

All of the Services work closely with civilian scientists to expand human knowledge. At this very moment, the Navy has an expedition down near the South Pole, probing the Antarctic icelands. The Air Force and the Navy both are actively exploring outer space.

As you can see, there is more to military service than combat. It is an exciting, challenging profession with something in it to interest virtually every person.

What are the advantages to a military career?

Many, I believe. It offers adventure, the physical fitness that comes from an outdoor life, the magic stimulus of travel to far-off places. Many a military person who scoffed at the old cliché, "Travel is broadening," has changed his outlook after the wonderful things he's seen all around the world.

A military career brings you the comradeship of finest men and women in America. Service friendsh are renowned for their long-lasting loyalty and devoti They lift military life out of the ordinary.

Best of all, the Services afford young men and wom excellent opportunities to better themselves, so that t can meet the needs of modern technology.

A Navy bluejacket can learn one of more than si skills in aviation, electronics, engineering, ordnan photography, music and other spheres. The Army ma tains fifty-five different schools, teaching soldiers eve thing from cryptography and cooking to the lat infantry tactics and the operation of guided missi Air Force and Marine training is just as extensive.

Girls in the Army's WACS, the Navy's WAVES, Air Force's WAFS, and the Women Marines have eq opportunities. They can become meteorologists, cont tower operators, X-ray technicians, intelligence spec ists, laboratory workers. Or dozens of other things.

"I never knew how much there was to learn," a wrote the Defense Department recently, "until I s how much the Services were willing to teach me."

The career officer has available to him some of most outstanding military schools in the world to h him improve his professional qualifications.

There are yet other advantages to a career in rmed Forces. You do not have to worry about seasonal y-offs. Medical care for you and your dependents is ovided. And your future is protected. You are guaran-ed a retirement income after twenty years' service.

What are the possibilities for advancement?

They are good. This holds for officers and enlisted rsonnel alike.

At last count, there were 350,000 officers and warrant icers, and 2,430,000 enlisted personnel in the Armed rces. Forty-five percent of them have been in the rvice less than two years. Only one-fifth have been in ten years or more.

That means that the upper grades, both in the comssioned and enlisted ranks, are not overloaded with d-timers. It means that young men with ability and tiative can look forward to steady sailing up the prootion scale. There is no dead end in military life. It mpares favorably with almost any civilian field in its ope for individual advancement.

Much as I love Service life, I admit that it does have a mber of drawbacks. You are sometimes separated m your family for long intervals. We have been try-g, as best we can, to cut down on these separations, t the demands of the Service occasionally make them avoidable.

It is also true that considerable moving about is nec-sary in the Service. Just as you are settling down in a w home, orders may arrive transferring you. This can use serious interruptions in your family life, and partgs from old friends. Still, you become accustomed to it. Many families even enjoy the changes of scene, especially since most of our military installations have their own happy community aspects.

Furthermore, military families often have an opportunity to serve together in fascinating foreign lands. They get to know foreign friends, foreign customs, foreign languages. They act as unofficial American "ambassadors"—and, incidentally, do a splendid job of it.

Some people claim that the discipline in the Services is a drawback. Personally, I have never regarded it as such. We are all subject to discipline of some kind. There is a discipline in the home, the school, the church and in business. As a matter of fact, good discipline, equitably administered, can make life easier rather than harder. I found that out forty-five years ago as a midshipman at the United States Naval Academy.

Some feel it a drawback that the men of the Armed Forces may, one day, have to risk their lives for their country. I disagree with them.

To my way of thinking, this is not a drawback but a privilege. In a democracy like ours, every able-bodied man is expected to bear arms and risk his life, if need be, in defense of his country.

I cannot say that anyone will become wealthy on Service pay. No one ever has. However, I can say this. Military pay rates are established by law and legislators are conscientious about providing enough for the decencies of life. Service men are certainly able to support their families and educate their children. In this connection, the "fringe benefits" that Service men and women receive over and beyond their pay cannot be forgotten. In addition to medical care, vacations and pensions, these benefits include certain insurance coverage, disability payments, legal assistance, and the use of commissaries and post exchanges. Such items mount up.

All young people can profit from military training but, naturally, not everyone is suited to a military career. Only the right type of boys and girls can make a success and a happy life in the Armed Forces.

I have given this subject much deliberation. In my opinion, such boys and girls must first have a genuine interest in matters military. They must be loyal to their country, be proud of its history, and feel a duty to its future.

Secondly, it is essential that such boys and girls have a high degree of adaptability, be able to adjust to changing circumstances. Third, they must get along with other people. Fourth, they must want to be leaders, and have a keen sense of responsibility. Fifth, they should be amenable to discipline. This does not mean that they cannot think for themselves. The Services encourage individuality and original thought. But the unruly lad who delights in rebellion against constituted authority will not prosper.

A sixth requirement is a quick, agile mind. A facility for mathematics would be especially helpful. Seventh is a liking for adventure. Eighth is, understandably, good health.

How do boys and girls resolve upon which Service to join?

I would suggest that they read everything they can on all four of the Services, that they question veterans and, if possible, that they talk with men and women now on active duty. Each Service has its own mission, its own traditions, and its own attractions.

No prior training is required of boys and girls interested in a career in the enlisted ranks. They can sign up for periods ranging from two to six years, and obtain their training while they draw their pay.

A boy with the ambition to become an officer can seek an appointment to the U. S. Military Academy, the U. S. Naval Academy or the U. S. Air Force Academy. He can, if he wishes, apply for pilot training in the Air Force, the Navy or the Marines. Or he can win a commission in a variety of other ways. Training programs range from a few weeks to four years. A girl, with the proper qualifications, can obtain a commission in the women's Service in as little as eight weeks.

To any boy or girl who decides on a career in the Armed Forces, I would say, "Continue your civilian education as long as you can. The more your schooling, the better you'll do in the Services."

I would particularly emphasize this to boys and girls who want to become officers. Today, a college background is virtually a pre-requisite for most officer training schools.

To parents and teachers I would add this. For any career, education begins in the family and is continued in the church and the school. It is up to you to instill in children an understanding both of the rights and responsibilities of a citizen. Teaching them to recite the Bill of Rights from memory is not enough, for you could teach a parrot to do that. Rather, teach them to understand its meaning. Give them a "Bill of Responsibilities" to go along with the "Bill of Rights" and inculcate them with a spirit of service. Then you can be sure that they will shoulder their share of responsibility to our nation.

Democracy, patriotism, discipline, courage, professional competence, honor and integrity, logic and common sense, patience, loyalty and faith . . . these are the guiding principles in the Service man's creed. I hope they will be guideposts for your children, too, whether in military service or civilian life.

Today, the United States is confronted with the menace of militant international Communism. This danger is apt to continue for long years to come. Only by remaining strong can we preserve our freedoms. Your son and your daughter can help us stay strong. And free.

nylic

HOW TO HELP YOUR CHILD HAVE THE CAREER HE WANTS

Many factors will enter into your child's choice of a career: his interests, his ambitions, his abilities, the counsel he receives from teachers, friends and family. But, most of all, it will depend on his opportunities to get the training he needs to enter the field of his choice.

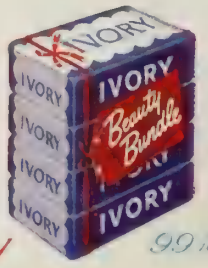
Even though his college days are still years away, it's never too soon to start making sure that your child will have the opportunity to continue his education when the time comes.

Your New York Life agent has chosen as his career the business of helping families plan for the future—for education, for retirement, for all the things which life insurance helps make possible. Through training and experience he has become a highly qualified specialist. You'll find him both able and willing to help you.

Booklets available on many careers

This article on Armed Forces is one of a continuing series on career opportunities for young men and women. Thus far, similar articles have been prepared on Newspapering, Law, Medicine, Accounting, Teaching, Architecture, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronic Engineering, Public Service, Farming, Chemistry, Selling, Nursing, Starting a Business of Your Own, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Banking, Printing, Home Economics, the Mineral Industry, Personnel Work, Retailing, Atomic Science and Librarianship. Each is available in booklet form and will be sent to you on request. You'll also find additional help in our free booklet, "The Cost of Four Years at College." Just drop a postcard to:

NEW YORK LIFE
Insurance Company
51 Madison Ave., Dept. 25-J, New York 10, N. Y.



The New York Life Agent in Your Community is a Good Man to Know
Copyright 1957, New York Life Insurance Company

4 Cakes of Personal Size Ivory

COST NO MORE THAN 3 OF OTHER LEADING BRANDS!

Take a look at prices of leading toilet soaps next time you shop. Isn't it amazing how much less Personal Size Ivory costs—4 cakes for no more than you'd pay for 3 of other brands. Why, that makes the 4th cake pure savings! And such a beautiful way to save, because Ivory is the finest soap you can buy —so pure, so mild, so right for your skin. Advised by more doctors for skin care than any other soap. Yes—take a look—That Ivory Look for your skin. So radiantly fresh and clear—so economically yours!

Personal Size Ivory is your best beauty buy

99 44/100% pure*...it floats

A MORAL EQUIVALENT FOR WAR

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

HILLTOP VISTA, serigraph, 15½" x 19⅝", by Leonard Pytlak, is of the countryside near Westport, Connecticut. Pytlak, born in New Jersey, is represented in the Philadelphia Museum of Art, the Boston and Denver Museums of Art. Courtesy the Weyhe Gallery, New York.

Way back in my student days I read an essay by Prof. William James that left an indelible impression on my mind. It was entitled A Moral Equivalent for War.

The distinguished philosopher who greatly influenced American thinking was of the opinion that war has, throughout history, supplied something required by every society, through its demands for service and sacrifice. Free nations and societies tend to stagnate or disintegrate as each member and interest group pursues its own ends, more or less regardless of the whole. War demands a sacrifice of personal interest, it calls for service without commensurate personal compensation, and thus performs a moral function. He argued that if mankind is to abandon war, a course which he believed to be highly desirable then—and certainly would find much more so in the atomic age of today—a moral substitute for war must be found, something to enlist an equal concept of service and sacrifice.

He thought it should be sought by enlisting young men to serve for a specified length of time in essential activities of an onerous and poorly compensated kind, necessary, nevertheless, to the building of the nation—in short, to do for a limited time those things as a national service that they would not otherwise choose to do.

This idea has actually born fruit in several parts of the world, sometimes as a response to a national crisis of depression, sometimes as a purely ethical concept.

During the great financial and economic depression in Germany, for instance, prior to the rise of Hitler to which it greatly contributed, a group of dynamic German leaders formed the Voluntary Work Service for unemployed youth, who were being demoralized (in the exact sense of that word) by the fact that there was no call for their talents and services, and no outlook for them except long-continued unemployment relief. Thousands rallied to the appeal to work for a prostrated nation for no compensation beyond a bed and their food. For there was much work to be done for a country whose treasury was depleted but whose roads, state forests and other national assets still needed maintenance, enlargement and repair.

Hitler's Third Reich stopped this movement, by channelizing the basically idealistic desire for sacrifice and service into preparation for war.

In America, the Civilian Conservation Corps was a response to a similar economic situation, unhappily without any clear philosophical concept. Designed wholly for the unemployed, it set the members of the CCC apart from other young men, in a form of work relief, rather than a conscious national service. The William James Camp in Vermont, largely inspired by the Dartmouth philosopher, Prof. Eugen Rosenstock-Huessy (an exile from Hitler's Germany who had been active in the pre-Hitler work service for youth), struck the real Jamesian note.

Dartmouth students who were not on relief, most of them exceptionally brilliant and socially sensitive young men, joined the camp with a view to contributing to make the CCC a real and permanent part of American life and American rebuilding, physically, morally and spiritually. They failed in the immense organization that the CCC had become, and as, under the threat of Hitler and a militant Japan, America, too, introduced universal military service and prepared for war.

Quietly, and with little publicity, the American Friends Service Committee has, for years, been recruiting young men and women for tasks at home and abroad performed for the love of God and man, in sacrifice and without remuneration.

Universal military service has, in one respect at least, a moral foundation, in that it assumes that equal rights entail equal responsibilities for service and sacrifice. Every year new classes of young men are called up to interrupt or postpone for two years their normal ambitions and way of life, to serve America in hundreds of places throughout the globe.

But one may question whether their compulsory service and sacrifice is always used in the most constructive way.

An army stationed at a base in peacetime (or in the absence of hostilities) has little to do. Many talents and capacities rust and rot during two years of doing little but stand on guard. Among the million men that make up the American Army—physically the pick of the nation—is every kind of talent and capacity, and every craft, trade and profession is represented.

So one asks oneself: Is it possible to build a real peacetime army that will, at the same time, be an instrument of peace, beyond the function of "deterrence," by the fact of its existence?

Can there not be worked out, more extensively than at present, a system of services rendered to and with the people of the communities where our troops are stationed, that will leave a lasting mark on those countries, that will create a new concept of an army of peace, and that will lend an increased feeling of sense and service to the men themselves?

I do not know the answer to this, but I do know that officers high in our armed services are thinking about it—and should be encouraged to think further.

Then there is the question of foreign aid, which is largely a matter of technical advice and co-operation.

It is extremely difficult to find competent people, willing to take on jobs that are relatively poorly paid, and that will keep them abroad for a minimum of two years, often in "hardship posts." Yet, in our effort to help new nations, and old nations emerging from centuries of colonial rule or stagnation, we are extending rather than diminishing our commitments. We are doing so under the apprehension that if these states break down, Soviet-inspired CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor: Mary Bass Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Richard Pratt, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Contributing Editors: Gladys Taber, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Virginia Price, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Babette Brimberg, Carol Crane, Liane Waite, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth Hart
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Casparian, Alberte Wright, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Laura Date, Patricia Corrigan, Corinna Cunliffe, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Abbot Mills, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles

I love Summer!

...because maple sundaes are so good—and I can make such scrumptious ones at home with Log Cabin Syrup. It has real maple flavor, you know, because it has real maple sugar in it!

...because summer-style waffles are so inviting . . . served with cool ice cream and Log Cabin's real maple goodness. Golden brown Aunt Jemima waffles—the crispiest, lightest ever!

June Is Dairy Month

...because summer's fruit and ice cream make such an elegant excuse for serving my favorite little Aunt Jemima pancakes. So easy to fix—and so light—they're just right for dessert.

A product of General Foods

A product of The Quaker Oats Company

PARTY TIP:

When guests arrive, have refreshments ready to roll!

Get a COSCO Tray Cart

Let this cart come to the aid of your party! It holds a whole evening-full of refreshments, and the top doubles as a serving tray! Chromium or black enamel legs and handles; five-ply COSCOAT woodgrain finish in blonde, gray, green and charcoal black. At department, furniture, hardware stores. Choose yours now, and be a modern hostess!

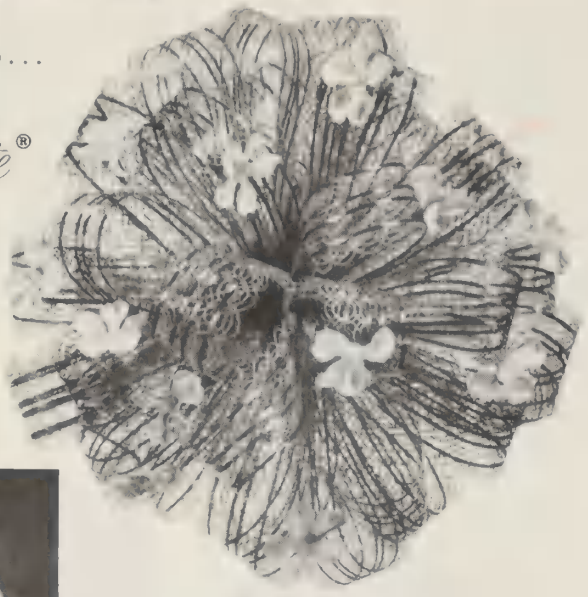
Model 8-WB, $15.95 ($16.95*)
Also 8-F: Fixed top. $13.95 ($14.95*)
Others low as $6.75 ($7.45*)



*Colorado and west.

HAMILTON MANUFACTURING CORPORATION • COLUMBUS, INDIANA

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . . with lacy Decorette® the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

The Bouquet Bow—delightful for a bride's gift—is crisp and frothy as a wedding veil. Follow the "Magic Bow" directions on a roll of Decorette Brand Ribbon. Then, with "Scotch" Cellophane Tape, add a sprinkling of dainty, make-believe flowers to the crisp, lace-like Decorette loops.

Idea! Make a Kissing Ring for the shower or wedding party. Cover embroidery hoops with white Sasheen; trim with flowers and bows.

"Magic Bow" and ...ethod of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE 23835

"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons

3M COMPANY — MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, St. Paul 6, Minnesota • 3M Co.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

Communism may sweep the Middle and Far East.

These countries need, and are ready to welcome, every kind of technical, vocational and educational help. But where to find it on a voluntary basis, without depleting ourselves?

Why not out of the Army?

The Army is being cut down in numbers, because of the technical developments of modern war. Also, the concept of universal service is watered down because many are rejected for minor physical ailments that make them incapable of combat service, though they are otherwise able to perform the normal duties of civilian life.

Why could not such of the surplus as have been permitted to complete their education before being called, and are especially fitted, be assigned to such technical-aid tasks, on regular Army pay? If a man can be compelled by law to serve his country for two years in one capacity, why should he not be assigned to serve for an equal length of time as a mechanical or vocational trainer, a laboratory technician, a physician, a schoolteacher, a business-administration expert, an engineer, in the work that the United States has undertaken in all the underdeveloped countries? Why must he necessarily serve only in the armed forces?

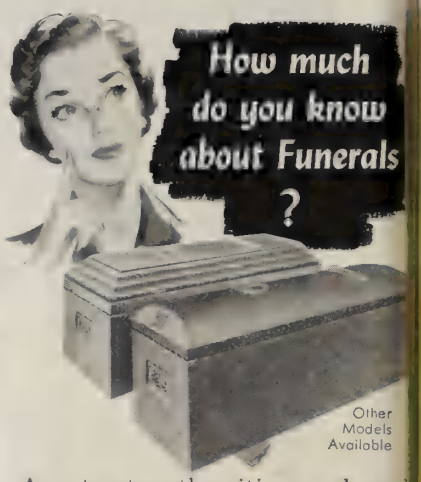
Actually the work we are doing along these lines is a "moral equivalent for war." It is a fight on hunger, malnutrition, ignorance and disease. It assumes that if men and women of whatever race or color foresee a better future for themselves and their children, they will not be swept away by demagogues, promising what cannot be fulfilled in a few years, and paying for the false hope the price of all personal and national liberty.

Perhaps sometime all armies will be devoted to the sacrificial tasks of peace: to irrigating deserts; reforesting barren hills; joining remote communities by roads; exterminating parasitic diseases; warring upon locusts; constructing schools; building sewage systems; piping fresh water into towns or decontaminating the existent supply; and thus bringing the blessings of civilization to all on this little planet.

Then the idea of sacrifice and service will have been diverted from killing to building, from destroying to conserving. The soldier will be able to say, "I did my tour of duty, and the world—or a little place in it—is better off thereby."

For we shall then have found a moral equivalent for war. END

OH, I RODE RIGHT THROUGH CHILDHOOD



By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

Oh, I rode right through childhood
With the wind in my face,
On my wild-pony steed,
At a blood-highing pace!

Oh, we conquered some miles
In that strong sun's path!
Oh, a sudden storm coming
Made us laugh, made us laugh!

We were fast, oh, fast
Through the blackest of woods,
We were hoofbeat and heart
Down the bluffs we subdued!

Ah, my pony! red roan
That I dreaming remount,
When my suns burn like brands,
When the dark winds shout!

As a trustworthy citizen and good neighbor, your funeral director is professionally qualified to supply competent advice and counsel. For peace-of-mind protection you can rely on him when he recommends the WILBERT burial vault, made of thick, precast asphalt and reinforced concrete. Over 1¼ MILLION interments have been made in . . .

Wilbert® BURIAL VAULTS

Write WILBERT, Box 147-J, Forest Park, Ill., for FREE booklet, "Facts Every Family Should Know . . ."

WILBERT—the foremost name in burial vault

®Trade Mark Wilbert W. Haase Co.

MORE PEOPLE USE Sugarine®

America's original and oldest calorie-free liquid sweetener 1916 - 1957

SWEETER THAN SUGAR - YET NO FOOD VALUE

doctors recommend SUGARINE for diabetics, overweights, low calorie diets

PURE-HARMLESS-ECONOMICAL

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING

4 oz. bottle only 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

Summer's Sauciest Sauce

ADD 5 DROPS FOR THRILLING FLAVOR

Here's new zest for cook outs, barbecues, sandwich spreads, salads—any food.

Write for FREE booklet. Dept. J
The Frank Tea & Spice Co.
Cincinnati 2, Ohio

Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

Salad Secret

Bring out all the natural, delicate flavors with

POMPEIAN
Pure Virgin Imported
OLIVE OIL

2 oz. to 1 gal.

Insist on POMPEIAN . . . oil from choicest olives.
Free recipe book. Dept. L-6 Pompeian, Balto. 24, Md.

Sumptuous supper, California-style —with 4 Fishermen® Fishsticks

THE PREMIUM BRAND

Look at this colorful, delicious way you can fix fishsticks. Start with 4 Fishermen Fishsticks—the premium-quality kind, cut from snow-white center fillets. (Takes 3 pounds of fresh fish to make our half-pound package!) Each flaky, quick-frozen fishstick is crisply, tenderly encrusted in our golden egg-batter... ready to heat and serve simply when you're busy... worthy of sumptuous recipes when you're in a gala mood. Look for 4 Fishermen Fishsticks, in the 8-ounce or 14-ounce economy package, in your store's frozen food cabinet. Cost a bit more, but they're certainly worth it. Fulham Brothers, Inc., Boston, Mass.

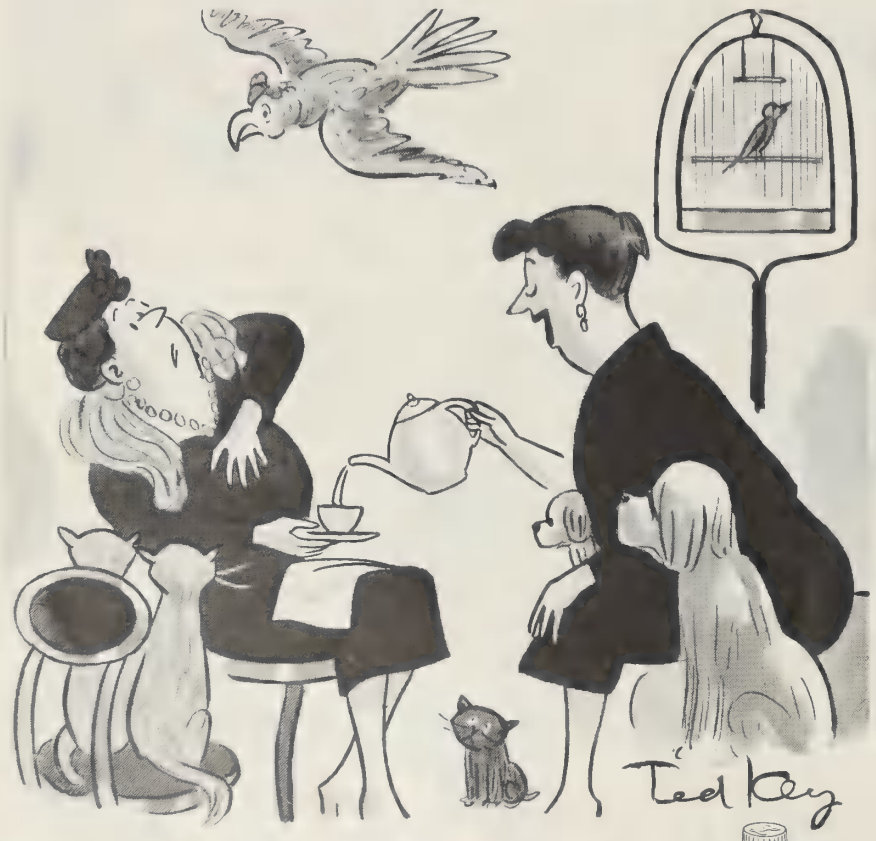
Fishsticks CALIFORNIA

2 8-oz. packages 4 Fishermen Fishsticks
2 green peppers, finely sliced • 2 tablespoons oil
½ cup finely chopped onion
1 clove minced garlic (optional)
1 cup whole canned or stewed tomatoes
¼ teaspoon oregano • ⅛ teaspoon chili powder
½ teaspoon salt • ½ cup sliced black olives

Heat fishsticks according to directions on package. Cook green pepper in oil over moderate heat in an 8″ frying pan until slightly tender, about 5 minutes. Remove from pan. Add onion and garlic to oil and cook for 5 minutes, or until soft. Add tomatoes, seasonings and olives and cook over low heat for 10 minutes longer. Pour tomatoes into oblong baking dish (11½ x 7⅜ x 1½) and place fishsticks on top. Top with green pepper. Heat in moderate oven, 375°F, for 5 minutes. Makes 4 servings.



"NO-COOK" MARSHMALLOW FROSTING

1/4 teaspoon salt 1/4 cup sugar
2 egg whites 3/4 cup Karo® Syrup, Red Label
1-1/2 teaspoons vanilla

Add salt to egg whites and beat with electric mixer or rotary beater until mixture forms soft peaks. Gradually add sugar, 1 tablespoon at a time, beating until smooth and glossy. Slowly add Karo Syrup, beating thoroughly after each addition, until firmly peaked. Fold in vanilla. If desired, tint with food coloring. Enough to frost two 9-inch layers or 10-inch tube cake.

When your recipes call for corn syrup . . . that's Karo

"But they're nary a mite o' trouble— not with 'Lysol' to deep-clean for me!"

Whenever there's mess, muss—add "Lysol" brand disinfectant to suds, save scrubbing! "Lysol" deep-cleans, deodorizes, disinfects. Protective action lasts 7 days—168 times longer than bleaches. Ask for "Lysol" in the new handy-grip bottle!

Let Lysol® Brand Disinfectant do the dirty work

Also available in Canada

NO, MAMMA, NO!

The pen is not only mightier than the sword— it's sometimes even sharper. Especially when two women and a man are concerned.

By MARJORIE RIDDELL

My mother wrote and said she was glad I had enjoyed the party. Who was George? What was his surname? Where did he live? What did he do? How long had he been doing it? How tall was he? How old was he?

I wrote back and said that I didn't know who George was. He had just been at the party.

My mother wrote and said why did I talk about him then?

I wrote and said I was only telling her about the party and George just happened to be there. Why was she harping on George?

My mother wrote and said she wasn't harping. But even Sarah was engaged now, and she was two years younger than I. She had always liked the name of George, they had intended to call me George, and it was a pity I didn't like him.

I wrote back and said I did like George. I just didn't know anything about him, he didn't know anything about me, and we would probably never run into each other again.

My mother wrote and said what kind of spineless creature was I? If I wanted to meet him again I would have to do something about it. It wasn't any good just sitting down and hoping for the best like my father when he helped with the housework. Only that very morning my father had dusted the dining room and it was nearly an hour before she realized that he had gone to do it without a duster. Why didn't I get busy and find out more about George?

I wrote back and said I didn't want to find out any more about George. I wished I had never mentioned him.

My mother wrote and said why didn't I want to find out any more about George? Why did I wish I had never mentioned him? What was the matter with him? She was going to worry about it now. I must write immediately and tell her all about it or she wouldn't sleep. She remembered a girl she knew years ago who had a bull terrier, who got engaged. This girl began to get things for her trousseau and suddenly her fiancé, who lived in another town, simply stopped writing, and she never heard another word. His name was George. That was funny, wasn't it?

So I wrote and said there wasn't anything the matter with George. She was getting all worked up over nothing.

My mother wrote back and said she wasn't getting worked up over anything. If there was nothing the matter with George, what was the matter? The trouble with me was that I wanted too much. It was no good expecting to meet someone who looked and acted like a film star. I was old enough to have got over that now. She got over it when she met my father. Everybody did.

I wrote again a few days later. I had met someone called Andrew who knew George, and George was married. So my mother could forget all about it.

Then my mother wrote and said who was Andrew? What was his surname? Where did he live? What did he do? How long ——

But that's where you came in.

END

how to make chicken taste even more delicious

Don McNeil says on Breakfast Cl... "Next time, co... your chicken w... Ac'cent. Brings o... more delicious natu... flavor than you ever knew was there!"

Foods lose some of their good fresh ta... by the time they reach your kitchen. Ac'ce... is pure monosodium glutamate—the natu... way to restore food flavors and bring ... their full tastiness.

Famous chefs use Ac'cent on all th... meats, poultry, vegetables and seafood. P... ducers of canned and frozen foods depe... on it to enhance and protect natural flavo...

When you use salt and pepper, ado... few shakes of Ac'cent. You won't taste ... Ac'cent, but you'll really taste those w... derful food flavors! Look for Ac'cent in ... red package with shaker-pourer top, at a... food store. Available in Canada also.

the secret of better cooking

Ac'cent®

BRAND
Pure Monosodium Glutam...
Ac'cent comes in 1-oz., 4-... 8-oz., 1-lb. sizes.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AC'CENT · INTERNATIONAL, 20 N. Wacker Drive, Chicago 6, Illi...

Can You Use Extra

MONEY?

Here's an income plan that can help you earn up to $1.50 an hour. Write today for details on our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
978 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

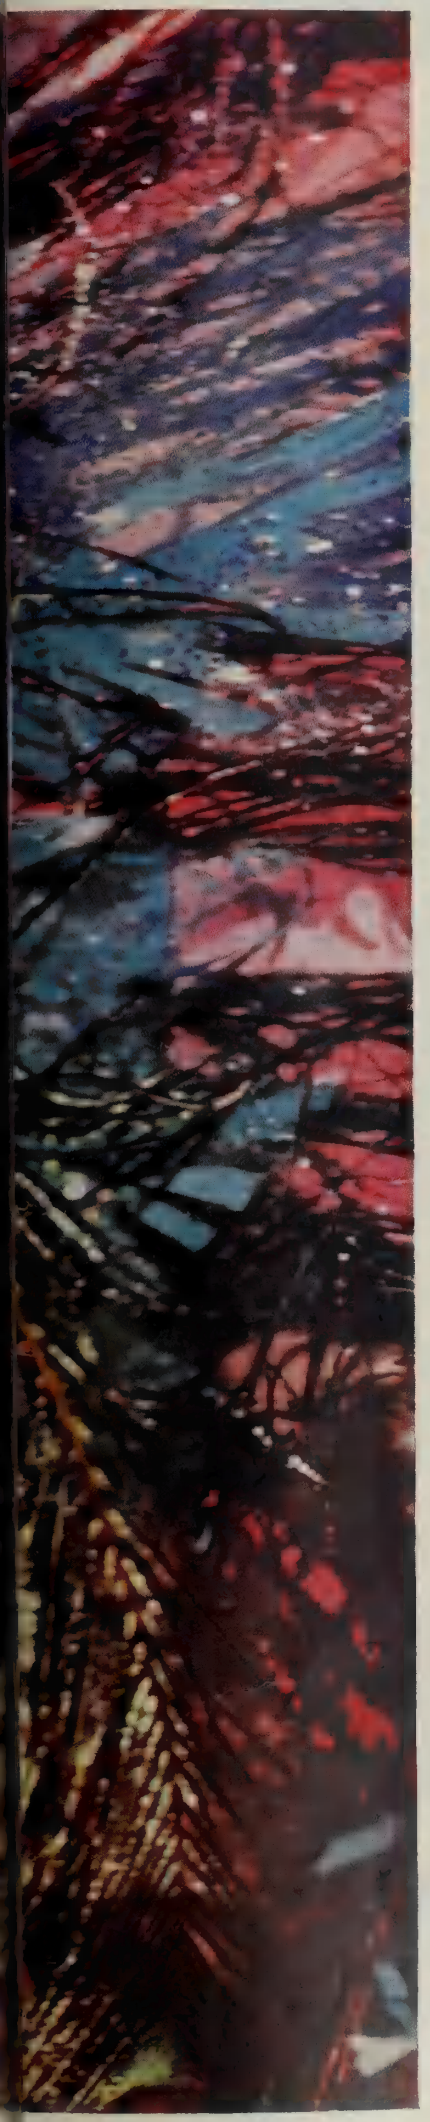
Wonders never cease when you start with Lipton Onion Soup

From dip . . . to soup . . . to main dish . . . this talented mix gives meals more zip!

Lipton's party-going California Dip. Tastiest appetizer ever "dipped" up with golden crisp potato chips . . . and so quick! Blend 1 package Lipton Onion Soup Mix, as it comes from the package, into 1 pint commercial sour cream. Keep leftover "dip" (if any) under refrigeration.

Lipton Onion Soup—add mix to boiling water—and in minutes you have fragrant onion soup as deep-down good as the true "Continental" kind. For a festive touch: sprinkle each serving with golden grated cheese. Then—happy spooning!

Spunky onion gravy: Add 1 package Lipton Soup Mix to 2½ cups boiling water. Cover and cook 10 minutes. Gradually add 2 tablespoons of flour mixed with ½ cup water. Cook, stirring constantly till thickened. Makes about 2¾ cups.



Lipton's easy "company" meat loaf. Beat 2 eggs lightly in large bowl. Stir in ⅓ cup catsup, ¾ cup warm water, 1 package Onion Soup Mix. Add 1½ cups soft bread crumbs, 2 pounds ground beef. Mix well. Bake at 350° F. 1 hour. Serves 6-8.

Now! The lipstick you'll love to put o in the case you'll love to show off!

NEW
DU BARRY
LIPSTICK

'Show Case'

Only lipstick case that looks so beautiful while you use it ...it almost flirts for you!

You'll adore Show-Case . . . the first case as lovely with the top off—as with the top on! It's different from any other refillable case because the works aren't seen while you use it! All that shows is Show-Case, topped by the lipstick itself! And it works like a dream . . . swivels smoother with one hand than other cases do with two!

DuBarry fills new Show-Case with a new lipstick—Lustre-Life! There's never been a lipstick like it . . . you'll know the instant you touch it to your lips. Lustre-Life positively creams on . . . and the lustrous color's on to stay—all day. The creamy formula can't dry . . . it actually softens your lips! And Lustre-Life comes in heavenly custom shades . . . shades that look imported! There's no lipstick like this lipstick—and look around —there's no case like Show-Case!

Show-Case comes in Black, White and Golden finishes. Why not buy all three—then mix and match for a whole wardrobe of lipstick cases?*

Refills in "Lustre-Life" and regular "Moisturized" .75 10 luscious shades!*

NEW DUBARRY SHOW-CASE

1.25 PLUS TAX*

Brush
Your Teeth
with Colgate's...
Brush
Bad Breath Away!

And Colgate's with GARDOL
Fights Decay All Day, Too!

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol stops mouth odor all day for most people . . . with just one brushing! Gives you that fresh-clean feeling that comes from brushing your teeth with Colgate Dental Cream.

And unlike other leading toothpastes,* Colgate Dental Cream contains Gardol to form an invisible, protective shield around your teeth that fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing!

Gardol's invisible shield fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing.

*THE TOP-THREE BRANDS AFTER COLGATE'S.

Colgate's with GARDOL
CLEANS YOUR BREATH
WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR TEETH

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

"Well—what would you like to know?"

The generation of tomorrow is now putting on its cap and gown to hear the parting words of wisdom and advice from its elders. And the words are not entirely cheerful—if this June's commencement speakers continue the warnings of last year's. "We need, first of all, to learn a little cold-eyed humility. We need to recognize that our capabilities are limited. . . ." (John Fischer at University of Massachusetts.) "We are now too prone to glory in the process of education, but not to put the results to much use. . . ." (Dr. Wilma Anderson Kerby-Miller at Simmons.) "Americans have not listened enough. The Ear of America has shrunk; the Voice is sometimes raucous. . . ." (Erwin Canham at Haverford.)

●

If there is one thing that should make for proper humility, it is the reading of history. I suppose every well-versed reader of today feels that Toynbee's A Study of History must be on her list of accomplishments. But it takes a long time to make up one's mind to ten volumes of history, and actually this particular reader waited so long that she finally didn't need to (read ten), for now the two-volume abridgment is out, surrounded by an aura of universal acclaim: A STUDY OF HISTORY, by D. C. Somervell (Oxford).

For the ordinary reader this is a godsend. Not that one has to be a scholar to understand Toynbee. But even the abridgment takes concentration, and my advice is to read it when you are at your brightest; read it every day, perhaps, for half an hour before getting up, and by the end of the summer I guarantee you'll find yourself infinitely rewarded.

●

A WOMAN DOCTOR LOOKS AT LOVE AND LIFE, by Dr. Marion Hilliard (Doubleday), is a sound discussion of women's problems from adolescence, through marriage, change of life and old age. The best in the field that I happen to have read.

"If you marry at all," says the Irishman, "marry last year."

A baby-sitter manual is issued by the Y.W.C.A., and can be picked up at any local branch where the course on that subject is given. This course (and pamphlet) assumes baby-sitting to be a real job with specific requirements, not just an easy way to make pocket money. It includes a chapter on child care, precautions for safety and health, and a summary of child development.

●

SEX FACTS AND FICTION FOR TEENAGERS, by Dr. Eugene Mozes (Ottenheimer Publishers, Baltimore), is about as sensible a book on that subject as one can imagine, not a book to hide away surreptitiously, but one to read and abide by

●

THE TURN OF THE TIDE, by Sir Arthur Bryant, is a brilliant war book (Doubleday). It is based on the war diaries (1939–43) of Field Marshal Viscount Alanbrooke, chief of the British General Staff, who, though he shared with Churchill what Bryant calls a "partnership of genius," has been almost unknown to the wide public. This is chiefly because he has always deliberately kept out of the limelight.

The diaries were personal, written by Alanbrooke for his wife—"my evening talk with you on paper"—and because of the secrecy of some of their parts, and their candor about people, the diaries themselves will not be published for a long time—if ever.

●

THE DAY OF INFAMY is another war close-up—a blow-by-blow account of Pearl Harbor by Walter Lord (Holt), in which he uses the same technique that he did in the story of the Titanic, A Night to Remember, which JOURNAL readers will never forget.

●

AN ELEPHANT IN THE FAMILY, by James Playsted Wood (Thomas Nelson and Sons), is a cheerful story about an elephant who comes to live with a family of three small children—cheerful, that is, for those of us who so deeply admire elephants.

●

HOW TO WATCH A BASEBALL GAME, by Fred Schwed, Jr. (Harper), is strictly for fans, and for fans who are not dependent on the humor of the comics. This is sophisticated fun, over a commentary on baseball technique, on the crowds, on the very different angles of the various cities, but not on individuals except to illustrate a line of thought. Almost as good as an afternoon at the Yankee Stadium.

Limited still further—to baseball fans who are about to become fathers—are these instructions in baby diapering (not in the book): "First, place the diaper in position of a baseball diamond with you at bat. Fold second base over home plate. Place the baby on the pitcher's mound. Then pin first and third to home plate."

"Well, let's see . . . yes, the nineteenth will be O.K. for our wedding—the Dodgers will be playing in Boston that day."

Have you discovered how Scotties hold together —even when you're using liquid face cream?

Prove it to yourself!
Soft as Scotties facial tissues are,
Scotties are strong—even when wet
Make this dramatic "jewel" test →

Pour two pools of liquid cleansing cream. Soak an ordinary tissue in one pool, a Scottie in the other.

Ordinary tissue breaks— Cream-soaked tissue without the wet-strength of Scotties breaks through when you drop just one earring into it.

Scottie doesn't break! Drop two earrings, bracelet, pin, necklace into cream-soaked Scottie—and it doesn't break! Scotties have wet-strength.

Glamorous new way to remove your make-up . . .
Scotties in powderpuff pink, white, yellow

Scotties facial tissues
Another fine paper product by Scott

"SCOTTIES" REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Mrs. Frances Loughran of The Bronx, New York, making the Cheer window test.

"It's really true! Cheer washes so white you can see the difference!"

Cheer's Blue-Magic whitener makes the difference . . . and only blue Cheer has it!

Try blue Cheer yourself, and you'll discover that there's a difference you can actually see between ordinary white and Cheer-white.

Here's why. Only Cheer has the Blue-Magic whitener . . . a special ingredient that get clothes really white! Even whiter than the day you bought them! And you know that when your white things are this white, your whole wash is thoroughly clean!

Try Cheer today and make your own window test. See the difference in whiteness yourself!

If you judge your wash by whiteness . . . it's got to be Cheer!

BETTER LIVING FOR ELDER-AGERS

The old folks' home is becoming a thing of the past. Today many of our senior citizens are moving into retirement villages and centers, especially designed apartment houses and homes. They generally enjoy being with people their own age, the JOURNAL learned through interviews, but they also want, as the National Committee on the Aging stresses, to be close to the center of community activities. The two projects featured this month meet both needs.

Low-rent apartments provide independence and security in Waltham, Massachusetts

Maude Doherty lived alone and liked it. At 74, she had lost none of the spirit of independence she had had before retiring three years ago from her small business as a corsetière. Widowed for twelve years, she had three children, grown up and married, with children of their own. But she never once thought of moving in with them—"Living with in-laws, you always have to yield a little," she believed. And Mrs. Doherty was used to having the run of her own household.

Now she had a two-room apartment in a business neighborhood. It wasn't easy. Sixty dollars a month for rent was a big bite out of her husband's small veteran's pension. And the noise and lack of heat were getting impossible to bear. This is the last straw, she muttered to herself early one gray January morning last year as she climbed out of bed to the roar of trucks pulling out of the garage next door. Today, she decided, lighting the gas oven to warm the cold apartment, she'd just have to start to look for another place.

At ten sharp, Maude Doherty put on her hat and coat. But she got no farther than the bottom of the steps. Turning to her mailbox, she took out an envelope. For a few seconds she simply stared at the return address: Waltham, Massachusetts, Housing Authority. She hadn't heard from them in months. Nervously she ripped open the envelope and read:

"You are requested to be at Carey Court next Tuesday to be assigned to your new apartment."

All over town similar letters were being opened: by a 70-year-old retired produce dealer who had recently found it necessary to sell the six-room house where he had lived most of his life; by two elderly sisters, no longer able to carry coal from the basement to heat their upper rooms; by a frail 79-year-old widow, whose children were unable to care for her.

To these people, 30 in all, living on Social Security insurance, pensions and small savings, six of them on Old Age Assistance, Carey Court offered a new lease on life. For it was the first of the state's several new housing developments for tenants over 65 years of age.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 26

DI PIETRO

It's wintertime in Waltham, Massachusetts, but the holiday spirit shines brightly in the lights—and in the hearts of tenants—at Carey Court.

DALE HEALY

This picture shows why residents at White Sands of La Jolla, California, never think of it as an "old folks' home."

In California resort town they find new friends in a home for the retired

"My children in the East are coming for a visit next month, and won't they be in for a surprise?" the slender 70-year-old woman tells a visitor to White Sands, a glamorous, many-balconied building at the edge of the ocean in La Jolla, California. "They think I'm living in an old folks' home!"

Home, rather than "a home," is what people over 65 are seeking when they retire, this resident explains. White Sands, which opened July 23, 1956, with luxury accommodations and complete medical care for some 200 residents, is one answer to a part of this need.

Take the Pohlmans, of Altadena. For them White Sands was the culmination of their search for a "nonregimented" home. It all began when Mrs. Pohlman tripped on a sprinkler in their garden and broke her ankle. She was hospitalized for seven weeks, limped for a year. What if a worse accident or illness struck? Would we be a burden to our daughter and her children? Mr. and Mrs. Pohlman began to map out a plan for the future—he was 71 and she 66. Their No. 1 requirement in a future home was good medical care. But all the homes for the retired they visited "either took all your money away or had so many rules you couldn't remember them all," according to Betty Pohlman. And then they read about White Sands, brand-new project of the Southern California Presbyterian Homes Corporation.

What the Pohlmans especially liked about White Sands was that residents are not required to turn over their total assets to the home corporation, as in many other "institutions." And furthermore, either party—the residents or the management—can cancel the contract with four months' notice. For their room with lanai (balcony), which they have redecorated in pale pink motif, they made a single payment of $15,900 for life occupancy. Other rooms, depending on location, start as low as $7500 for one or two persons. All are handsomely furnished, with television set, black-and-white modernistic furniture and avocado-green carpet against a background of yellow walls. There is, in addition, a pay-as-you-go life-care fee of $175 a month for each resident for all meals, basic laundry, weekly room upkeep, medical, major surgery and nursing care.

It was through illness that another resident, whom we will call Mrs. J, came to realize how many new and wonderful friends she had made during her short stay at White Sands. "I knew no one when I first arrived," she says, "but now I find that I'm remembered not only with cards and flowers but in prayers too." Mrs. J suffered a heart attack at four one morning shortly after coming to White Sands. She managed to pick up her telephone, however, and the operator summoned the night nurse. Within forty-five minutes Mrs. J was in Scripps Hospital and oxygen was being administered. "If I had been at home in Madison, your golden hour . . .

CONTINUED ON PAGE 31

your own special time . . .

when you alone can know the wonder of a now "glamorapped" in new gleaming foil

Such a lovely interlude, your own SweetHeart bath. The quiet luxury of a little leisure. Then the warm glow, and the fresh, lively tingle your skin adores. How SweetHeart manages to make you feel so good is SweetHeart's own special secret. We can tell you this much though: SweetHeart's blossom-light fragrance, graceful oval swirl and gentle, gentle softness are only part of it. The rest? Well, try SweetHeart for your hands and face or all of you and see.

warm SweetHeart bath because SweetHeart adores you so!

©1957, PUREX CORPORATION, LTD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

To be eligible for one of the modern compact units, an applicant must be 65 or older, a United States citizen, in need of housing, with an annual income of no more than $2500 for a single person or $3000 for two persons, in reasonably good health and physically able to carry on domestic duties. In the case of a couple, if one is ill, the other must be physically able to provide care. Rent is 21 per cent of income for a single person and 23 per cent of income for two people—with $41.50 the monthly minimum. Heat, gas and hot water are furnished.

Drop in now on Maude Doherty at No. 277-1 School Street in an attractive two-story tan brick building with light green trim and glassed-in porches. She is just one block from shops and convenient to churches and doctors and clinics. If it's a nice day, you're sure to find her in the courtyard in a starched cotton dress pruning the flowers around the fountain. She put them in herself.

All the residents of Carey Court like bright colors, and Maude Doherty is no exception. In her living room red cotton fabric covers the sofa—matching the shade of a reading lamp and a modern-style plastic-upholstered rocker with hassock. As in the other apartments, the kitchen unit is partly in the living room, partly in the passageway leading to the bathroom and bedroom. Each apartment has its own thermostat, "and we can have heat in July, if we want it," she smiles. Wide windows overlook the court so that Mrs. Doherty can watch the comings and goings of her neighbors. At night the lights on the front porches give her a feeling of security. "This is my bit of heaven," she says, her blue eyes shining proudly.

But it is the spirit of neighborliness that makes Carey Court distinctive. In summer the residents gather in the court between the two buildings to chat or supervise Owen MacDonald, the cheerful young maintenance man, as he trims the grass and tidies up. "Mac," who works at four other jobs, enjoys Carey Court most of all, because the residents are "so appreciative." And he gets plenty of help. Last summer when he went on vacation, his substitute complained that there was nothing to do. The residents had swept the stairs and porches, cleaned the windows and cut the grass.

When Charles Lawless, executive director of the Waltham Housing Authority, drops by, as he does nearly every afternoon, Mrs. Mary French hastens out to thank him for her birthday card. Mrs. French, a chipper little woman whose snow-white hair is covered by a pink hair net, excitedly tells Charles Lawless about her shopping trip to Boston in celebration of her eightieth birthday. At a loud insistent tapping on an upstairs window at the end of the court, Charlie (as Mr. Lawless is called) looks up and waves at Leroy Dozier, who is confined to a wheel chair. Mr. Dozier's wife Alice, who is chatting in the courtyard, looks up and waves too. The whole scene is taken in by 79-year-old Mrs.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

A NEW CONCEPT in housing the aged is the foster-home plan. Unhappiness often follows when an older person loses his loved ones and must face life alone. The plan is simple. Families agree, for a moderate monthly fee, to take in as a boarder an older person who needs and wants to be part of a congenial family group. Everyone benefits—the older person through a sense of belonging, the family through the pleasure of his company, his help with small household chores (including baby-sitting) and a supplement to the family income. Foster-care service programs are being developed by volunteer family-service agencies and by public-welfare departments in a growing number of communities. More are needed.

America's Most Famous Beauty Mark

Look for the salon displaying The Skilled Hands of Beauty... proud emblem of hairdressers chosen for superior artistry.

Nothing can compare with professional care for your hair.

RAYETTE

WORLD'S LARGEST CREATORS OF PROFESSIONAL BEAUTY PRODUCTS

BUNIONS

DOCTOR'S FAST RELIEF

You never tried anything so wonderful as Dr. Scholl's Bunion Reducer of soft rubber. Relief is immediate. Hides bulge. Preserves shape of shoe, helps reduce enlargement. 75¢ each. Sold everywhere. If not obtainable at your dealer's, order by mail. Mention shoe size and width and if for Right or Left foot. Satisfaction guaranteed.

DR. SCHOLL'S, Inc., Dept. BR, 213 W. Schiller St., Chicago 10

Pretty soft!

... and mighty pretty, too!

Posy-patterned quilted chintz in blue, yellow, pink or red . . . washable and wonderful!

Angel Treads® by BARRY 1.98

...softest things on two feet!

You'll love their bouncy, pillowy soles cushioned with

Firestone FOAMEX

At Notions Depts. of leading stores everywhere, or write R. G. BARRY CORP., Columbus, Ohio.

...IN EXQUISITE FORM

And such a desirable you, in Contour Witchery! Its gentle flat Ribbon Wire*, exclusively ours, outlines each cup separately, molds your natural curves to new beauty, and there's no center wire to irk you. A perfect evening bra with its removable, movable shoulder straps, yet equally adaptable for daytime, all the time. Try Contour Witchery's 6-way magic today – and you'll always ask for Exquisite Form bras.

*T.M. Reg.

A, B, C cups in embroidered cotton with wafer-thin lining. Long-length torso version . . . style 8432, $10.00. Style 4432 (illus.), white and black, $3.95

—GOWN BY SAMUEL WINSTON

At Your Favorite Store, or Write to Dept. LH-6, Exquisite Form Brassiere, Inc., 159 Madison Ave., N. Y. C.

We'd like to let this remarkable motion picture speak for itself!

A new first in his exciting career!

P. 26
20
CONT'D
(2)

In this scene, two men are talking about their marriage — to the same woman. Earl Carleton (Bing Crosby) is the ex-husband who was given custody of the only child. Bryan Seward, a lawyer, is the present husband.

Earl

What do you get out of this custody suit -- aside from a few fancy headaches?

Seward

Let's say I get a happily married life.

Earl

And a ready-made family. Playing father to somebody else's kid. Think you could take my place with my boy?

Seward

I wouldn't try.

Earl

Nice of you. Too bad you didn't feel that way with my wife.

Seward

I don't think either one of us wanted to fall in love -- but we did. And here we are. You'd better learn to live with that.

Earl

Must give you a funny feeling, talking to somebody who knows her better than you do.

Seward

What do you mean by that?

Earl

Isn't it funny how if you touch the back of her neck a certain way she starts to tremble -- you've found that out by now, haven't you?

Seward

Know any good dirty jokes?

EARL STARTS FOR THE DOOR AND TURNS TO....

M-G-M PRESENTS A SOL C. SIEGEL PRODUCTION · STARRING

BING CROSBY IN MAN ON FIRE

CO-STARRING INGER STEVENS · MARY FICKETT · E. G. MARSHALL WITH MALCOLM BRODRICK · SCREEN PLAY BY RANALD MacDOUGALL
BASED ON A STORY BY MALVIN WALD and JACK JACOBS · DIRECTED BY RANALD MacDOUGALL

No other rice is this easy!

Another favorite from General Foods

Yes, Minute Rice is really easy! You don't have to wash, boil, drain or steam it. You just add it to boiling water, cover, remove from heat and let it stand a few minutes!

Minute Rice is already cooked! There's never any danger of gummy failure. Minute Rice gives you light, fluffy, perfect rice every time. A delicious way to balance a meal.

Only Minute Rice is perfect every time!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

san O'Brien as she leans out of her second-or apartment washing windows.

Carey Court and the nine other develop-nts for the aging already in operation oughout Massachusetts, as well as many ers now under construction, grew out of v. Christian Herter's message to the legis-ure in January, 1953. His recommenda-ns for dwelling units adapted to the needs elderly people resulted in the appropria-n by the legislature of $5,000,000, later sed to $15,000,000, to enable local housing thorities to borrow money to construct using for the aged.

In Waltham, Charles Lawless, who, as lo- housing-authority director, manages four ner developments, frequently ran into erly people as he went about checking ap-cations for rentals. He found elder-agers ing in attic and basement apartments, aring bathrooms, using hot plates. Police d him about assisting many elderly people the streets during the day, of seeing some ndering into and out of shops and stores pply for a place to someone to talk to. To get accurate ts and figures on old-age situation which to base a quest for funds, harles Lawless led on 80-year-old uis R. Talbot, who, ough officially re-ed as a statistician, s active in civic . That was in ay, 1955. Excited his new volunteer signment, Mr. Tal-t went to work mpiling statistics m the city direc-y, 1950 census and se records of Social curity and Public elfare. His final ures showed 11 per nt, or 3476, of the al population of altham 65 years of e or over; 945 over ; 113 over 85; 23 er 90, and 3 over 0. Of the total, 03 were idle.

Charles Lawless nt Mr. Talbot's ures, along with s own findings on e need for housing for the aged, to civic ibs and public agencies and to the Wal-am Housing Authority. The authority ap-oved the report and voted unanimously to ply for state funds to finance a new de-lopment. Then the state housing board, ose responsibility it was to review each p in development plans, studied the re-rt and gave permission to go ahead.

Now there was the problem of a site for the oposed housing. Land close to the center town was scarce, but the authority finally cated an old home for sale in a residential ighborhood. The lot, 18,000 square feet, as about equal to two typical residential ts, which meant that two-story buildings ould have to be constructed. But the loca-on, in a quiet neighborhood, near the shop-ng center, was ideal. After careful consid-ation, the authority's board took an option n the land. Then it hired an architect to aw up plans for two buildings containing units—warning him to cut down on space herever possible to keep the cost for each velling unit down. When the design was mpleted and approved by the state housing oard, the mayor of Waltham signed a con-act on behalf of the city agreeing to waive xes and supply all normal public service to e residents.

Waltham could now borrow money up to 80,000, the estimated cost of the project. he state was to pay the 2½ per cent annual terest on the loan. The principal would be aid back from rents over a forty-year period.

In response to newspaper stories about the proposed development, applications began pouring in. Wrote one 74-year-old woman: "Right around me here in Waltham are seven old ladies all over 70 who are living in one room, doing laundry in bathtubs. We need low-rent housing now. We don't ask much luxury—just a kitchen to cook in and heat enough to sit and read the paper without a sweater and blankets."

After carefully reviewing each application, the housing authority finally selected 30 whose need was most urgent.

By September of 1955 construction was under way, and by January 1, 1956, the buildings were completed. On January 15, two weeks before moving-in day, the future tenants were invited to an open-house demonstration. It was a cold rainy day, but one nobody wanted to miss. Armed with tapes and rulers, they came to measure for curtains and to make the heartbreaking decision about what treasured pieces of furniture could fit in, what would have to be given up. Charles Lawless explained how to operate the electric range, the garbage-disposal unit, the thermostat, called attention to the grab bars in the bathroom and the asphalt nonskid floors, and the red emergency buzzers that could be used to call the next-door neighbor in case of emergency.

"We haven't any rules around here," he reminded them. "And we won't mind if you work out a little system of your own to ring once to say you're sick; twice, 'Come on over for a beer.'"

Just before everyone left, Mr. Lawless gave each an invitation to the Golden Age Club meetings—social get-t ethers for Waltham's senior citizens sponsored by the city—the last Thursday of each month. "There'll be transportation for those who want it," he added.

Carey Court will soon have a sister development. Plans are moving ahead for constructing 40 additional units for tenants over 65 in another part of town. But this will only partly meet the need—there are already 100 applications on file. Recently, when one of the Carey Court tenants went to the hospital for a week, the housing-authority office was deluged with requests for the supposedly "vacant" apartment. There have been letters from even as far away as Cedar Rapids, Iowa, from people who read about the "bit of heaven" in a wire-association story, all expressing the desire to be in an apartment of their own and near people their own age.

"I count myself one of the lucky ones," Bill Burke, the only single man in Carey Court, says. "They've shown us someone cares, but they haven't taken our independence away." To frail Mrs. Margaret Goinsalvos, whose greatest joy is watching the children going to and from school from her bedroom rocker, it is important to be able to fix herself a pot of tea whenever she feels like it. To Miss Sadie Martell, it is important to continue her volunteer Salvation Army work, though she retired some years ago with the rank of major. Mrs. Alice Dozier counts it a blessing that her partly paralyzed husband can be with her in Carey Court instead of in a rest home.

At Carey Court, residents share their telephones and television, recipes, hobbies, even their symptoms of ailments. But most of all, they share the joys and expectations of living for today and tomorrow. END

A

It was a momentous day in the history of mankind when some ancient genius thought of using an animal to pull a plow. Soon many Near Eastern householders were using at least one ox as a work animal. They had nothing even remotely like modern harness, however; a clumsy wooden collar was usually used, and the ox was guided by means of lines fastened to a bar strapped across his horns. Crude as this system was, it multiplied the food production of the area.

Consequently, the ox became an important economic factor and entered into many business transactions. Picture writing was practiced by the more advanced peoples, and among some of them the ox was represented by a drawing of his pronged horns, with a slanted guide bar across them.

This symbol, employed by the Phoenicians, was later borrowed by the Greeks. They turned it upside down and placed it at the head of their alphabet. In time, it became the letter "A."

WEBB B. GARRISON

How to make sure your frozen meats keep their "fresh-cut" flavor

For freezer or freezer compartment. 15", 18", 24" wide rolls in handy cutter boxes, with wrapping instructions.

Your frozen meats can be juicy, tender, and full of flavor when you wrap them right with KVP Freezer paper. It's easy to use—fits snugly—doesn't stick to meat—guards against drying out, freezer-burn.

KVP originated Freezer paper and keeps it the leader in low-cost protection. Buy it at locker plants, and in the paper section of your favorite store. Keep a box handy for meat bargains.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

KVP

Save time, save work, with these KVP household papers.
Shelf Papers • Freezer Papers • Heavy Waxed • Dusting Papers • Pie Tape • Baking Cups • Cookery Parchment Gift Wrapping

THE KVP COMPANY, Kalamazoo, Michigan
In Canada buy KVP-APPLEFORD Paper Products

KJER-JAKOBSEN DESIGN / PATS. PEND.

VIRTUE BROS. MFG. CO., Los Angeles 45, Calif.

"GOVERNMENT IS FORCE AND SHOULD BE WATCHED LIKE FIRE"—George Washington

Tops in the ice cream hit parade—

Vermont Maid SUNDAE

Quick! Easy! Delicious!
Ice cream topped with Vermont Maid—the best-selling syrup in New England's
maple sugar country.

TRY IT TODAY!

Real Walking Ease for Troubled FEET!

Sizes, Some Styles
2½ to 13
AAAAA to EEEEEEEE

Dr. Scholl's SHOES

ombine Style
istinction with Real Foot Freedom

ou'll quickly discover what real walking ase is like when you step out in your first air of supremely comfortable, foot-flattering Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's cientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, oot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to our feet. No "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for ll types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's oot Comfort® Shops in principal cities and elected Shoe and Department Stores. If not btainable locally, write for catalog to Dr. choll's, Inc., Dept. J-67, Chicago 10, Illinois.

Lovely NAILS in A FLASH... with NU-NAILS

ARTIFICIAL FINGERNAILS

Cover short, broken, thin nails with NU-NAILS. Applied in a jiffy with our amazing new quick-drying glue. Can be worn any length ...polished any shade. Help overcome nail-biting habit. Set of ten 25c. At dime, drug & dept. stores.

ONLY 25¢ SET OF TEN

NU-NAILS CO., Dept. 12-G
5251 W. Harrison, Chicago 44

Also Hollywood Fingernails... Permanent Dubonett Rose Color. No polish required...39c set.

Tense, Nervous Headaches Need This Relief survey shows 3 out of 4 doctors recommend the mous ingredients of Anacin to relieve pain. Here's ıy Anacin® gives better total effect in pain relief an aspirin or any buffered aspirin:

- ACTS INSTANTLY: Anacin goes to work instantly. Brings fast relief to source of your pain.
- MORE EFFECTIVE: Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not one, but a combination of medically proven ingredients.
- SAFER: Anacin simply can not upset your stomach.
- LESSENS TENSION: Anacin also reduces nervous tension, leaves you relaxed, feeling fine after pain goes. Buy Anacin Tablets today!

Wedding Questions?

The New Emily Post's Etiquette is the only standard guide to weddings. $5.50 at all bookstores.

FUNK & WAGNALLS

BRIDAL FABRICS WHOLESALE PRICES SAVE!

SCHENFELD & SONS, 103 Hester St., Dept. L-6, N.Y. 2
Rush me your FREE Catalogue and BIG Swatchbook.
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....

BETTER LIVING FOR ELDER-AGERS— LA JOLLA, CALIF.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

Wisconsin," she says from her convalescent bed in the White Sands dispensary, "tried to reach my own doctor, then waited for an ambulance—well, I don't think I would be here today."

Plans for the future include construction of a rest home in conjunction with White Sands, but in the meantime, in case of temporary illness, residents will use the eight-bed dispensary on the main floor, where twenty-four-hour nursing service is provided. More serious illnesses and surgery are taken care of at Scripps Memorial Hospital.

Before White Sands was established, there had been no other Presbyterian housing for the retired in California. Some of the large churches had considered setting up such homes of their own. But the need existed in all the churches, and Los Angeles Presbytery leaders decided to enlist the support of the Santa Barbara and Riverside presbyteries in working out a successful plan in Southern California.

In July, 1954, under the leadership of the Rev. Otto Gruber, a young, energetic minister with a special understanding of problems of the aging through his pastoral work, presbytery committee members—including other ministers, business and professional men, housewives—began their survey. At the same time they began scouting for a possible location for a future project. With no existing fund or endowment to work with, and with church expansion in California making further fund solicitation difficult, the committee decided to plan first for above-average-income housing that would be self-supporting. Money in the bank and a regular income from annuities, various ministers reported, were no guaranty against loneliness and fear of being a burden to someone in old age.

A hole is nothing at all, but you can break your neck in it.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY
Keystones of Thought
Devin–Adair Company

After visiting or writing some thirty established homes and residences, the Southern California Presbyterian Homes committee worked out a tentative plan for its own project. Qualifications for admission would include—in addition to assurance of ability to meet a monthly pay-as-you-go life-care fee—a medical examination certifying reasonably good health, five personal references and a personal interview attesting to compatibility, or the knack for making new friends and getting along with people.

Several possible sites were under consideration in December, 1955, when White Sands, an attractive, modernistic resort hotel in operation only four months, was put up for sale. Its location in La Jolla, a town popular with retired people, and its spaciousness (156 rooms and a wide terrace) and its recreational attractions (swimming pool and shuffleboard courts and roomy lounge) finally decided the committee in its favor. On January 2, 1956, the committee signed a five-month option-purchase agreement. Final purchase at a cost of more than $2,000,000 would depend upon the interest shown by prospective residents.

One Sunday morning in April, George Parker went to church as usual in San Diego. He and his wife had retired to California twelve years earlier, but Mr. Parker, now a widower of 78 and alone, was thinking of selling his home and returning to Connecticut to live quietly and more simply in a hotel. But what the minister had to say that morning about a new Presbyterian home for retired people changed his mind. The very next morning, George Parker drove eleven miles to La Jolla, took a good look at the place called

CONTINUED ON PAGE 127

TEST AFTER TEST PASTE IS BEST

1. Beauty Test TWINKLE brightens smoothly!
2. Speed Test TWINKLE cleans faster!
3. Thrift Test TWINKLE goes farther!

THERE'S NO WASTE WITH PASTE!

Here's proof that no powdered copper cleaner works like smooth, creamy TWINKLE paste! For faster, easier, more economical copper cleaning than ever before use TWINKLE Copper Cleaner. There's no waste with paste.

Made by the makers of Drāno and Windex

TWINKLE is tops for stainless steel, too! At grocery stores everywhere.

Calgon® solves washday problems!

Calgon puts an end to laundering troubles caused by water. No more yellowing or graying! Now, no stubborn film forms when soaps, detergents and soil meet minerals in the water. Water-conditioning Calgon chases film for keeps—and oh, the beautiful difference in your clothes. Try Calgon! Leading washer manufacturers place Calgon in their machines.

General Electric places Calgon in their new Combination Washer-Dryer, a wonderfully compact, efficient home laundry. And Calgon is recommended by many fabric makers. Calgon's fine for Orlons, nylons, Dacrons.

Try Calgon for laundry, kitchen and bath.

Calgon Company • Pittsburgh, Pa.

There's deep-down satisfaction in topping your salads with delicious do-it-yourself dressings like the ones that posed for this picture. It's easy, it's fun—and the variety is endless!

The Kraft Kitchens have just published a new book of recipes that will turn you into a salad dressing "Maestro" overnight. All these French Dressing recipes are included...

1. Malakaa 2. Continental French 3. Cascade Special 4. Honey Celery Seed French 5. Piquant French 6. Mexicana 7. Poppy Seed 8. Crystal French 9. "Philly" Honey 10. Glorious French 11. Anchovy Blue Cheese 12. Royal Tomato French 13. Confetti Salad 14. Creamy Fruit 15. Hostess French 16. Creamy Roquefort 17. Garlic Roquefort 18. Blue Cheese French 19. Fruit French 20. Dee's Caesar 21. Seafood Special 22. Spring French 23. Cranberry French 24. Glistening Lemon French 25. Orange French 26. Special French 27. Chili Relish French 28. Basic French

Every one of these fresh-made dressings starts with Kraft All Purpose Oil—the light-bodied oil that blends perfectly with favorite herbs and seasonings.

Be sure to send today for your free copy of the new 24-page booklet, "French Dressings for Your Favorite Salads." Use the coupon on the opposite page.

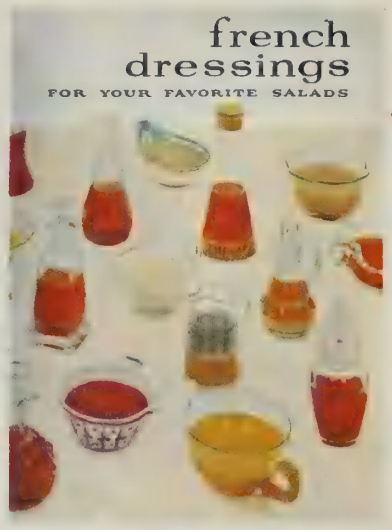
IT'S FUN TO BE CREATIVE WITH YOU

SUNNY FRUIT SALAD

Leaf lettuce
Orange sections
Grapefruit sections
Strawberries, halved
Pineapple chunks
Crystal French Dressing

Cover a large serving platter with lettuce. Arrange orange sections around edge of the platter and overlap with grapefruit sections. Add a row of strawberry halves and fill the center with pineapple chunks. Serve with the dressing.

CRYSTAL FRENCH DRESSING



¼ cup sugar
1 teaspoon celery seed
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon dry mustard
¼ cup vinegar
1 cup Kraft Oil

Combine sugar, celery seed, salt and mustard. Add the vinegar and mix until well blended. Slowly add the oil, beating constantly. The dressing becomes very thick as all the oil is added. Chill. Stir well before serving. Yield: 1⅓ cups.

* YOU CAN'T BUY DRESSINGS LIKE THESE IN ANY STORE! * BUT YOU CAN MIX THEM IN A MINUTE OR TWO, WITH KRAFT ALL PURPOSE OIL * YOU PROBABLY ALREADY HAVE MOST OF THE OTHER INGREDIENTS IN YOUR KITCHEN! * YOU'LL LOVE TO SERVE THEM WITH THE FRUITS AND VEGETABLES YOUR GROCER IS NOW FEATURING!

ALAD DRESSINGS! HERE'S HOW...

The most wonderful oil ever created for salad dressings, for baking, for all your frying

WRITE FOR THIS COLORFUL NEW BOOKLET TODAY!

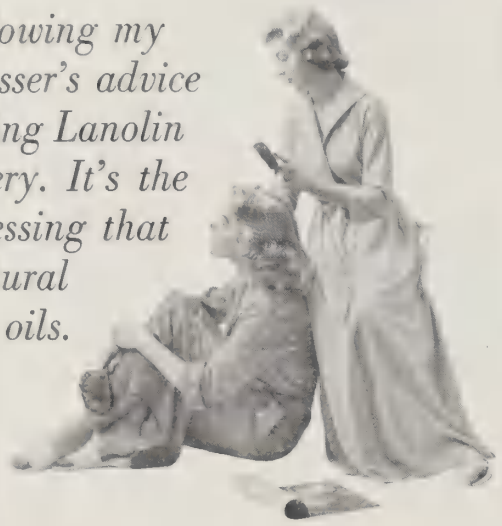
Send no money—just enclose the label from a pint or quart of Kraft All Purpose Oil

Kraft Oil
Box 5767, Dept. J
Chicago 80, Illinois

Please send me your new booklet, "French Dressings for Your Favorite Salads." I am enclosing a label from a pint or quart of Kraft All Purpose Oil.

Name_____

Address_____



City_____ Zone_____ State_____

(print plainly)

ENDS DULL DRY "THIRSTY" HAIR

Q: How do you make your hair so lustrous and shining?

A: By following my hairdresser's advice and using Lanolin Discovery. It's the greaseless hairdressing that replaces natural beauty oils.

Q: What's the difference between Lanolin Discovery and other hairdressings?

A: Ordinary hairdressings "coat" your hair —make it oily— Lanolin Discovery's misty fine spray is absorbed into every hair right down to your scalp.

To enhance the natural color of your hair—to get a shimmery satiny sheen with deep fascinating highlights, just spray on LANOLIN DISCOVERY Hairdressing and brush a little. In just seconds, you get the same beautiful results as brushing your hair 100 strokes a day.

Helene Curtis Lanolin Discovery®

THE NEW HAIRDRESSING IN SPRAY FORM

$1.25 and $1.89 both plus tax

Used and recommended by leading beauticians. Available wherever cosmetics are sold

HINTS from a PATIENT to her VISITORS . .

OR BEDSIDE MANNERS

A surgical experience is a perilous adventure to the invalid.
Naturally, he wants to tell about it.

By ERNESTA BARLOW

To visit the sick requires a surprising amount of initiative and character on the part of the caller. Hospitals are invariably three times farther away than is reasonable. It takes forever to get there and you can ill afford the time. Then you have to find the right entrance, the right floor, room or ward strictly on dead reckoning. Perhaps you have had to stand in line to get a visitor's pass. By the time you reach the right bedside you feel you've really done quite enough for one day. Far from being in a mood to hearten and amuse the invalid, you would appreciate some show of understanding yourself for all you have been through for his sake. After a few conventional words you sit down and wait for him to be bright and entertaining.

Years of almost unbroken health had produced a blind spot in my make-up concerning the sick. I was—let's face it—bored by illness.

"You've just had your stomach taken out?" I used to say. "Too bad. I hope it won't prevent your dining with us on the fifteenth."

Today I can hardly wait for a friend to break a leg or come down with something serious so that I may fly to her side and demonstrate my new-found knowledge and overflowing sympathy. This metamorphosis took place shortly after four different doctors advised me to have my gall bladder out. I went, though I felt sound as a drum, to the hospital.

"It would be easier," I told the nurse as she helped me into that revolting surgical garment known as a "hospital johnny," "if I just had a pain or something."

"You will, dear," she said cheerfully, "you will."

No matter how convincing the preoperative patient's show of nonchalance may be, I will bet my last vital organ he needs a spot of moral support. Though your husband, wife or child has nerves of steel and the courage of a gladiator going into the arena, it will comfort them to have someone around besides doctors and nurses. Ten to one the adult victim is smothering a nasty suspicion that this night may be his last. So be on hand; don't ask, "Wouldn't you like to have me there?" Just be there. Before bedtime, a good short story read aloud will cut the strain of forced cheerful conversation. A patient in great pain will not care to be read aloud to: pain is distracting, it almost builds a barrier against any continuous sound such as the human voice reading aloud. Nor will those in pain have the same nervousness about what lies ahead.

The morning of an operation, I suggest to wife, husband or mother that you be at the hospital early enough to have the patient recognize you and know you will stay by until the whole party is over. It is far less important to be in evidence directly after the operation than before it. For several days following surgery the sick one may be but dimly aware of your presence.

It is particularly important that visits, even from close relatives, be very short at first. The patient will be able to take scant notice of anyone, he will be oblivious c flowers or gifts. Merciful sedatives and pain killers may make it impossible for him t read the clock, let alone tell a vase of gladi oli from an umbrella stand. The time fo flowers is later.

Your invalid will like to have you sho concern, but not anxiety. Anyone in sever pain may seek relief by making strang animal noises. It will be mortifying to hav you standing by the bed looking as if ever grunt and squeal were a dagger through you own heart.

Ask as few questions as possible. The sic brain refuses to focus. Never, unless yo want to send your wife's temperature ove the top of the thermometer, ask if she r members what you did with your old fishin hat or does she know where your best pair c white flannels are. Such problems will seer more difficult to solve than a nuclear equa tion. Avoid asking anything that may re quire a decision or choice. Instead of saying "Wouldn't you like me to bring you a nic cake of soap for your bath?" just bring it show it to the invalid and ask the nurse t use it.

Tell your loved one he is terribly misse at home but everything is under control Avoid mention that the furnace blew up Junior was expelled from school or the dog is lost.

The moment nourishment is urged upon the patient is the time to bring delicacie from home. Find out from the nurse wha the invalid is allowed to eat, and without putting him to the effort of a decision, bring from the list the things you know he likes Hospital meals are served at ungodly hours and the patient gets hungry when he shouldn't. Also, try as the dietitian will, th cooking is hardly as mother used to do i and a private cache of food is greatly appre ciated.

As soon as the invalid's eyes can agai distinguish their surroundings, he or she will love to receive flowers. A small bunch is better than a large one. Send your bouque already arranged in some container so flower lover won't have to see lovely bloom stuffed tastelessly into a hospital vase. It i best to avoid flowers with a heavy scent un less the patient is in a ward where the odo is diffused.

I believe I have learned at last why, the moment a surgical case regains strengt enough to talk, he wishes to tell all. To th newly stricken, their experience has been a great adventure, exciting, intensely personal and of absorbing interest. Each one wants to tell his tale for the same reason he would want to give an account of having been in a railway accident, a shipwreck or in a fire. So be a good listener, encourage the story and show no squeamishness over details.

I now realize, also, how important it is to pay your visit to the sick at the hour you have specified. Invalid days are endlessly long at best, waiting hours stretch interminably. Your visit may have been anticipated in a way that would be most flattering were you aware of it. So arrive punctually

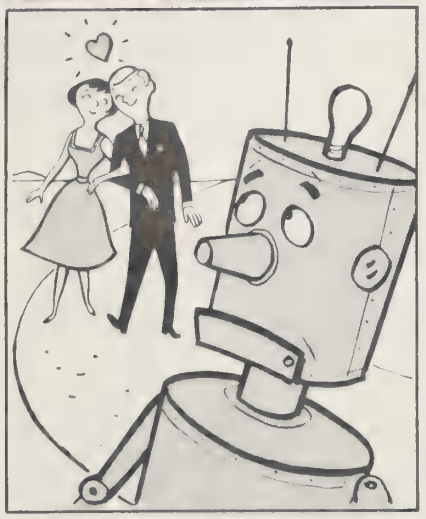
CONTINUED ON PAGE 156

Hunt-for the best

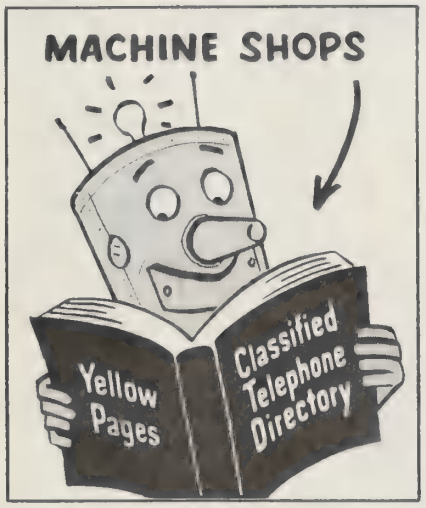
the paste with the Sunny Italian Flavor

ROLLETTES
(Italian Meat Rolls)

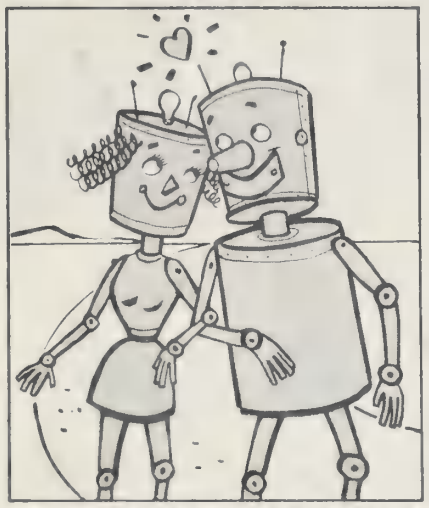
"When you brown these meat rolls and add the Hunt's Tomato Paste and seasonings, Mamma Mia!..what a delicious aroma! I recommend Hunt's Tomato Paste to all my friends—and to you. It's so rich and smooth, so fine in true tomato flavor, that thousands of good Italian cooks use it. I know you'll like it, too!"



- 1½ lbs. round steak, ¼-inch thick
- Salt and pepper
- 3 strips bacon
- 1 cup fresh bread crumbs
- ¼ cup chopped onion
- ¼ cup chopped parsley
- ¼ cup grated Parmesan cheese
- 3 tablespoons olive or salad oil
- 1 can Hunt's Tomato Paste*
- 2 cups hot water
- 1 clove garlic, minced
- Pinch of basil or marjoram
- Cooked spaghetti



Cut steak into 6 oblong pieces. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Pound thin with edge of saucer. Top each with half a strip of bacon. Mix crumbs, onion, parsley and cheese. Spread over bacon. Roll up and secure with toothpicks or string. Brown gently on all sides in hot oil. Mix rest of ingredients except spaghetti. Add 1½ teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Pour over rolls. Cover tightly and simmer 1½ hours, or until tender. If you like, you may remove the toothpicks and slice the rolls thin. Serve with the sauce and spaghetti. Makes 4 servings.



*Hunt's Tomato Paste is pure tomato, concentrated to a thick paste. Use in any recipe for true tomato flavor, a spoonful to a can full, depending on the recipe. Generally add it to the water or liquid, then to the other ingredients.

"P.S. Send for my folder of delicious Italian-style recipes. Hunt Foods, Inc., Dept. J6, Fullerton, California."

FROM MACHINE SHOPS TO STEEL FABRICATORS
whatever you need-
Find It Fast In The Yellow Pages
Ads with this emblem make your shopping easier

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Children who are close to each other in age tend to fight most.

What can parents do when their children quarrel?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"But don't parents have to stop fights?
Sometimes they do and sometimes they don't. When two young children of about equal power occasionally tangle (their sizes and ages may be quite different), I think they will often learn more about how to get along with each other if left to argue it out or tug it out or whack it out."

Every week brings at least one letter suggesting a discussion of the topic of squabbling and fighting between children in the family. These mothers who have enough of a problem to make them write letters sound frustrated and exhausted. I've visited families occasionally where the fighting was so continuous that I felt tired and edgy at the end of twenty minutes. I always assumed that when things got that scrappy (shouts, screams for mother, thuds, crashes, wails, complaints to mother, countercomplaints—all day long) the pattern was fixed for good. But I well remember the amazement of a mother and myself, once, at how fast the picture can change. She and the father decided, rather guiltily, to take a two-week vacation together without their three battling and somewhat undisciplined children (four to eight years of age). They happened to be able to engage a children's nurse with an excellent reputation to hold the fort. After a couple of days away they called home to see if the nurse and children were still alive and were told in a cheerful voice that everyone was fine. It was hard to believe, but a letter from the grandmother, who dropped in to see the children daily, confirmed the story. Everyone was having such a good time that the parents stretched their vacation an extra week. And when they came home they were astounded all over again. The children were cheerful and friendly with one another, co-operative and polite with the nurse. The mother said that the sight of them curled up on the sofa together listening to the nurse read a story reminded her of the passage "The lion shall lie down with the lamb."

There are many factors that make for quarrelsomeness, and they vary in kind and intensity in different families. We might start with a couple of the more serious and unusual types. There is the child who is chronically aggressive. He bullies not only brothers and sisters but anyone in the neighborhood if he thinks he can get away with it. Usually there is a lot of tension between him and his parents, which goes way back into early childhood. This kind usually requires the aid of a guidance clinic or a family social agency to straighten out. Another chronic type is the child whose antagonism makes him look for trouble but who is so constituted that he manages to provoke other children to pick on him—he always ends up the victim. Such a child needs professional help even more than the bully because his unhappy pattern is less likely to improve by itself with age.

A very important factor is how consistent the parents are in wanting serenity in the home. You may think that all parents want it. Certainly all parents believe they do. Yet there are some who are only going through the motions of commanding their children to stop fighting. They have no conviction or authority in their voices. They have no follow-through. They get no results. What they think are orders are really only complaints. Such parents really expect their children to fight and unconsciously they seem to get a certain perverse satisfaction out of it. They almost boast of the turmoil to the neighbors, sometimes in the presence of the children themselves, or they grin and shrug their shoulders. This represents a subtle resignation to unpleasantness, usually carried over from a similarly turbulent childhood. Those parents who really don't like fighting can at least keep it below the uproar level, even though the children may continue to give each other dirty looks and mutter under their breaths. Of course all of us have our off days when we surrender some of our control over our children and let the storms rage. But parents who can never keep things in check need and can profit from professional help.

Somewhat separate from the matter of parental control is parental tension. I think almost all of us have been aware at one time or another that when we are closest to being on an even keel ourselves (things going well at the office, social life satisfying, no ususual worries about the children or health or finances) the amount of antagonism between the children decreases noticeably. And anything that makes us irritable is apt to increase the children's fights. To put it simply: if a child (like any other human being) feels picked on and can't retaliate directly, he has an irresistible urge to pick on someone else of a size he can manage.

Of all the factors that make for ordinary quarreling between children, I think that jealousy is by far the most potent. The strongest attachment in childhood is of course the one between the child and his parents. To some degree he wants the parents' love for himself alone, and fears that the affection which goes out to brothers and sisters will be subtracted from his share. This makes him suspicious and resentful of them. The degree varies enormously, depending on circumstances and what each child is used to. The first child, who was an only child for a couple of years and took it for granted that both parents belonged exclusively to him, is, on the average, much more likely to be upset by the arrival of a baby than a subsequent child who has been used to sharing the parents from the start. Quite similar variations occur in business organizations when a new person joins the staff, or in the field of friendships.

We have to realize that this possessive, jealous element in love is not simply an unfortunate flaw in the character of man. It is part of the essence of our humanness. It's part of what makes us stick together as husband and wife, as families and as other groups. Otherwise our relationships would be as casual as the relationships of insects.

Children who are close to each other in age tend to fight most. The younger is the one who has displaced the next older from the baby position in the family, and in many ways that's the hardest position to give up. As the older one persecutes the younger, it doesn't take the latter too long to find who his special enemy in the family is. Of course there are other reasons why those closest to each other fight most. They are thrown together in family arrangements. They are interested in the same playthings and the same companions.

Much depends on the personality and physique of each of the children. I think some babies are born more agreeable and some more assertive and I imagine the assertive ones will be more likely to raise a fuss if they feel left out. A slow child in a smart family, a homely girl set gives curls that last a year!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 38

NEW! Only child's home permanent with SQUEEZE-BOTTLE EASE...

Curls really take because comb-tip squeeze bottle saturates hair far more thoroughly than any other way.

Now, no need to take chances using Adult Permanents on your child's hard-to-curl hair. Lilt Party Curl really overcomes problems of curling young hair. And Party Curl is so much easier, faster for you to apply on a fidgeting child. "Squeeze-Bottle Ease" ends messy dip-dabs for you. Now just squeeze on lotion from comb tip on bottle. Hair is so thoroughly saturated, soft curls last even a year!

■ 1957, Procter & Gamble Co.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 36

among beauties, a short boy among tall brothers, a girl born to parents who much prefer boys may each be excessively jealous, if other conditions in the family favor rivalry.

Next we ought to consider what influence the parents' attitudes toward the children have on jealousy. Right away we're apt to jump to the conclusion that inequality in the love of a parent for two children is a powerful generator of rivalry. That's what so many fairy stories and novels and people seem to say. But I don't think it's that simple. We're back to that tricky question: is there such a thing as equal love?

A few months ago when I was discussing this question I said I thought that good parents are equally devoted to each child but that they can't possibly enjoy or be irritated by any two in the same way; therefore they shouldn't try to treat them exactly the same (same number of minutes of attention, same number of smiles, same number of frowns). Children and adults are not fooled by an attitude that's forced. In the long run they don't really like to be compared with others—either favorably or unfavorably. What each wants most, I think, is to be loved and enjoyed for himself. If a child feels sure that he has a good niche in his parent's heart he doesn't worry so much about his brothers' and sisters' niches—unless, that is, the parent keeps comparing the niches or threatening to oust a child from his niche. This, I think, is the essence of the problem of handling jealousy or preventing it.

The easiest way for a parent to stir up jealousy is to keep comparing a child unfavorably with his brother. It's a double-edged sword that makes him feel definitely rejected by the parent and makes him resent his brother for being so openly favored. Most parents know this and are too tactful to try to use such a method for correcting a child.

However, I think that many conscientious parents use another form of comparison which they believe to be a preventive of jealousy but which really is a stimulator of it. They try whenever it's humanly possible to give exactly the same presents and privileges to all their children, at least to those who are close together in age. Furthermore, they're apt to call attention to the equality of treatment. If one boy gets a blue toy car, the other gets a blue car. If one daughter is to have a new winter coat, the other receives one, too, even if she doesn't really need it. If one child goes shopping with mother or on a trip with father, the parents are careful to arrange and announce the same privilege for each of the others in due time. I remember a harassed mother whose four young children fought particularly fiercely about who was to sit next to her at table. She had to keep an elaborate chart which indicated in what order the children changed places around her, three meals a day, seven days a week.

The question we have to ask sharply is whether such legalistic forms of justice decrease rivalry. They certainly do not, in my opinion. The parents who have used them or been driven into them by the demands of their children are the first to admit that these children—all day long—are suspiciously watching one another and their parents to make sure that no advantage is given or taken, and keeping up a noisy wrangling.

These precautions against unfairness constantly remind the child that there must be a real danger of unfairness unless everybody watches out. The fact that the parents cooperate in the precautions means to the child that the parents are afraid that they themselves will be tempted to be unfair. I think that this is the crux of the matter: the parents who are maneuvered into these legalities really don't have enough confidence in their impartiality. They have probably carried over from their own childhoods too strong a sense of guilt about the jealousies they felt in relation to their brothers and sisters. They are afraid that if they inadvertently show any favoritism to one child they'll be resented by another, just the way they resented it when their parents seemed to show favoritism to a brother or sister. So they lean over backward.

I'd say to a parent who was trying too hard to be scrupulously fair: Don't feel you have to buy identical toys (unless there's a very practical reason); and if the boys complain, tell them you'll take both toys back if you hear another word out of them. If your daughter objects because you didn't get a new coat for her, too, just remind her that she doesn't need one yet. If there's argument at meals about seating, tell them that everybody in this family is going to continue to sit just where he has always sat. The fierceness of tone that I seem to have put into the parents' voice in these examples isn't really necessary. The only necessity is that the parent show that he isn't the least bit afraid he's discriminating and that he's not going to be bullied into acting as if he were. The cue is to deal with each child as an individual. Praise him or correct him or give him a present or buy him a coat or set his bedtime or give him duties or expect school grades on the basis of what's right for him. Keep the other children out of the conversation and out of your mind.

There's one more subdivision of this topic that to me has great practical importance: how do you manage the squabbles themselves? Conscientious parents often try to act as the judge: Who started it? Who did what to whom? Who is to be called the culprit? What's the proper punishment? I think myself that this judging is a trap, which wise parents had better dodge as much as possible. If I'm right that jealousy is one of the principal motives that make children pick fights with each other in the first place, then the readiness of a parent to enter the picture each time as a judge emphasizes and accentuates the jealousy factor. The child comes to realize that each quarrel is an opportunity to prove triumphantly that his parent approves of him and disapproves of his brother. So quarreling acquires more purpose and appeal for him. Of course he knows that he can't openly start a battle or he'd be judged the villain. But a jealous child always feels that the other one is really the aggressor, so all he has to do is watch him suspiciously for signs of it. (He can find or imagine a hundred excuses any day.) Then he joins battle as the injured party. To put it in other words, the parent's favor becomes a prize, an added inducement for every squabble, and thus a stimulator of more quarrels.

But don't parents have to stop fights? Sometimes they do and some they don't. When two young children of about equal power occasionally tangle (their sizes and ages may be quite different), I think they will often learn more about how to get along with each other if left to argue it out or tug it out or whack it out. I'd at least give this method a few tries. But if one always pulverizes the other and makes him more timid, it's the wrong system.

The amount of squabbling will also be a determining factor in whether the parents are willing to allow it to occur. There will naturally be difference of opinion about this. Most parents would overlook a couple of minor spats a day and a bigger fight occasionally. But most wouldn't willingly permit their children to battle a good part of the day for either their children's sake or their own.

If the parents do need to interfere—because one child is bullying another or because the quarrels are too frequent or too fierce or too noisy for comfort—I think they can do this just as efficiently without usually judging or taking sides, and that in the long run this will make for fewer fights rather than more. They can simply insist that the fighting stop. They can refuse to listen to the complaints. If they really mean it and see to it that the children break it up and if they immediately interfere again in case the battle resumes, the children will be convinced and will obey, just as they comply with any prohibition about which the parents are determined and consistent.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

If fate means you to lose, give him a good fight anyhow.
WILLIAM McFEE

A little girl dreams . . .

She Fits the Fairytale!

She's the prince's choice—the glass slipper is hers! And so is the shortie gown! She's the age for fairytale sleepwear by Carter's—for Carter's knows the way to a little girl's dreams. Her dainty Dresden Print shortie is cool dimple-knit cotton. No-iron . . . machine-washable . . . like all Carter's soft cotton knit sleepwear and underwear. At fine stores everywhere.

ABOVE: DRESDEN PRINT SHORTIE, matching panties. Blue or pink print, pastel ruffles. 3-14 yrs. $3.00. RIGHT: SLEEP & PLAY PAJAMA in plaid knit terry. Elasticized pant cuffs and waist. Blue, pink. 3-14 yrs. $3.00. All are Carter-Set® so won't shrink out of fit.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

Are you ever excited...

embarrassed...

rushed?...

That's when most deodorants fail...but new MUM® Cream keeps working You've probably noticed . . . when you're under emotional pressure, your perspiration glands suddenly get more active. That's when deodorants which depend on stopping perspiration let you down, and odor often starts.

New Mum Cream works a completely different way. It is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum keeps on working actively to stop odor safely—24 hours a day—no matter how active your perspiration glands are. That's because Mum contains M-3—long-lasting hexachlorophene. No wonder Mum is so dependable!

MUM contains M-3 (long-lasting hexachlorophene)

. . . it works when other deodorants fail

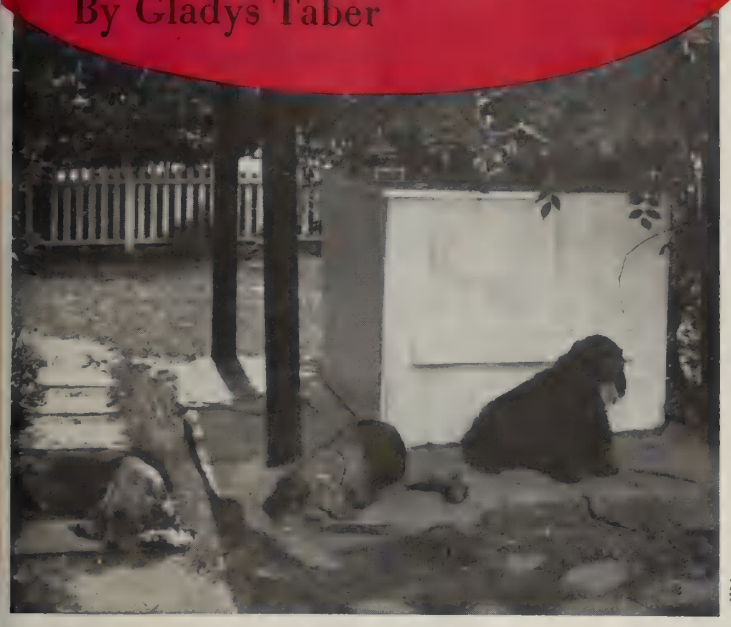
ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

Wonderful New Way to get your Vitamin C!

FRESH DAILY

at your store—or at your door!

Now—enjoy the glorious flavor and precious Vitamin C of Florida Orange Juice . . . this wonderful new way! Here's delicious, pure orange juice . . . squeezed and chilled . . . then rushed to you in handy, ready-to-serve cartons.



Standards set by the Florida Citrus Commission require that Chilled Orange Juice from Florida be squeezed from sweet, sun-ripened, tree-fresh Florida oranges . . . packed and shipped under strict supervision. You'll love this wonderful new Chilled Orange Juice from Florida—so convenient you'll want to serve it every day!

- NO SQUEEZING...
- NO DE-FREEZING—
- CHILLED AND READY TO SERVE!

Florida Citrus Commission, Lakeland, Florida

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

What is so delightful as steady sunshine and the scent of roses?

his is the poet's month, and it rhymes so easily that it has helped a good ny poets who might have difficulty ming much with January. Moon is an choice, and dune (as of the sea), rune in old riddles). Soon, noon, tune trip tly with June, and so, alas, does croon. Now all at once spring is swept off her with roses. It is so fitting that this st romantic flower comes in the month romance. Roses grow easily in New gland; often the ramblers blossom r an old fence, although the house that e stood there has been long gone.

Ve have a Silver Moon rambler that is favorite. We bought it for ten cents rs ago at the ten-cent store. We knew hing of gardening in those days, so we planted it by the picket gate where soil is chiefly gravel and ancient ashes. ever can see why former tenants made ash dump by the front gate, but they st have had a reason! Now the Silver on spreads a lacy veil over the fence. e flowers are small and simple and ry-white. Some of the expensive roses acquired after the mortgage was paid are not half as lovely.

Stillmeadow has catch-as-catch-can nting. I often wish I had known Rich- Pratt in the days when we were set- g out everything in the wrong place. d we had no idea how things grow. e Tartarian honeysuckle that was such nodest little switch now towers over summerhouse and resembles some- ng in a jungle. As for the small pines put in when the hurricane flattened thirteen old apple trees, they are prac- ully a forest. Jill chops a path to get to clothesline now.

However, Dick tells me he thinks the st wonderful way of landscaping he imagine is chopping your way through es! But when I look at the beautiful dens he designs, I feel Stillmeadow fered from our enthusiastic planting, I would certainly advise any home- ners to have expert help.

The Farmer's Almanac comments sely, "Hot, all over the lot," and we do ve very hot days in June. But nights are l cool and misty and filled with fra- nce, and even at noon we can eat wn by the pond and feel comfortable. inherited from mamma a passion for ing outdoors. She insisted on it long ore it was fashionable, and my, what picnics we had! They were not restful, for papa always drove wildly, and he never found exactly the right spot. We whizzed past lovely brooks with spreading maples, past the pellucid nameless little lakes which Wisconsin is full of, past piny stretches. Finally he chose a spot where cows descended on us, and both mamma and I were deathly afraid of cows. But mamma never gave up picnics for a quiet sit-down meal.

We always had hot dishes, and this was a trick in those days. She wrapped everything up in newspapers, blankets, clean towels. Many a chicken dinner I have eaten with my head turned fearfully over my shoulder to see what the nearest cow was doing!

How mamma would have loved the insulated carriers, the zippered cases, and all the other things we take for granted nowadays. And she would, I know, have preferred the folding grill Smiley Burnette gave us to any amount of mink and diamonds. This grill folds up to be a sort of suitcase, and opens to cook a meal instantly. It has a draft, and you can stop the charcoal fire any time by closing the lid.

Once, when papa was off looking at a gold mine, mamma and I had a picnic by ourselves and it was so peaceful. But of course it wasn't the same without papa whisking about, finding pink quartz or some old Indian artifact or coursing around giving us a geology lecture about the terminal moraine we were sitting on.

I have read a good deal of the modern child psychology, but I have come to the conclusion that my own childhood was pretty good. Everything my parents did while raising me was very wrong, but we had fun. I suspect if there is love enough in a family, things level out. My father was a fierce, often unjust disciplinarian, but he loved me. And somehow, when he was at his worst, I was secure, knowing he loved me.

I was greatly relieved when the United States Post Office Department admitted that economy in the glue for stamps had not worked out. My battle with stamps was prolonged and painful. They curled up, they came off. I finally took to weighting the stamps down with dictionaries, inkwells, book ends. My whole room was adrift with envelopes being weighted down. I came into this fracas without the right attitude, for I already felt that mail

The gentle-action Oral B is specially designed to protect sensitive tissues connecting teeth and gums.

It may surprise you that gum troubles are the cause for over *one-third of all teeth lost! Save the beauty of your smile by using a toothbrush that protects gums as well as teeth.

An ordinary brush, with stiff, pointed bristles, often causes trouble at the gum-line—either through injury or neglect. To solve this important problem, a leading dentist designed the Oral B. More than 2500 softer, nylon bristles with smooth tops give you double protection. The same gentle action massages gums safely and cleans teeth thoroughly, too.

Ask your dentist about the Oral B and use the brushing method he recommends. Then try this gentle brush. You can feel the difference at once!

*The American Dental Association reports 37%.

IN 3 SIZES FOR ALL THE FAMILY at the nearest drug counter

Oral B TOOTHBRUSH

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

© ORAL B COMPANY, San Jose, California

addressed clearly to me, in typing, should not always arrive a week late with a stamp saying, "Missent to Green's Farms," or "Sent to Winsted." I did not mind "Missent to Simsbury," because that begins with S too, and seemed more reasonable, but why Green's Farms?

So I was not in a mellow mood when the stamp business began; in fact, I was fretful. Once our dear local postmistress sent along an unstamped letter because she said she could see a stamp had been affixed thereon but had come off. She saw the damp imprint where some poor soul had tried to stick on a stamp!

Though I love economy, I take a dim view of no glue on my stamps.

June meals are fun. When the fresh peas come in, I wonder whether the honey of Hybla could be as sweet. The edible-podded, or snow peas, or Chinese peas, are our favorites. You pick the pods when the little peas are just big enough to swell the pod slightly. Jill says I hardly cook them, I pass them over the stove, but this is not so. But I cook them only a few minutes, add hot milk (cream if not dieting), butter or margarine, freshly ground pepper and seasoned salt. These peas also appeal to my impatience, for you cook them pod and all. No stripping. The pod is really the most delicious, crispy tender and delicately sweet. But like all vegetables, they must be picked before they are heavy-ripe. Even the ordinary peas are no good when they are the size of bullets.

The end of the asparagus is a sad day. If we have only four stalks left to cut, we make them a special thing. Lay them so tenderly on thin-cut toasted bread.

When people tell me they hate vegetables, I always know they have never had them picked at the right time, and properly cooked.

Do not take life too seriously; you will never get out of it alive.

ELBERT HUBBARD

Jonquil is our vegetable cocker. She not only adores peas, tomatoes, carrots (oh, how lovely are carrots), but also has a fine feeling for parsnips, turnips, cabbage, raw or cooked. If I am dicing an onion and some falls to the floor, as it always does, since I am a careless dicer, she snips that up and smacks her lips. The rest stand around, like Joseph, and wonder what she is so steamed up over.

Most of the year, I love dusk-dark the best, or moonrise, but I think in June the time I love especially is morning. Carrying our trays to the Quiet Garden, we eat in the sun. The roses are opening, still cool with dew. The trees are triumphant with leaves. The dark, almost purple-black iris is in blossom. There are wings everywhere as the birds rush busily from apple tree to lilacs. In winter they keep to the pines, but now there must be much nicer things to eat in the bark of the MacIntosh and in the old lilacs where there are inevitably borers.

Wasps we have always. Wasps in the attic in winter, and wandering wasps in the back kitchen, papershell nests under the wisteria in season, and inside the garden furniture all summer. I often wish wasps were not included in the scheme of things, but I am sure they have their reasons too.

In January, I may be waked up by a wasp buzzing around my ceiling. If I were a naturalist I would find this interesting, but as a housewife I get the insect spray. Wasps pay no heed to me, but a wasp sting swells Jill's arm up until it looks like a telephone pole and all her fingers are the size of sausages. So we keep a wary eye for them. Now, in June, we peer at the undersides of the chairs as we sit down for breakfast in the sun.

But scrambled eggs into which we stir a spoonful of country pot cheese are worth eating out-of-doors in this blessed month. Even if sometimes Jill grabs her last cup of coffee and flees to the house.

Every season has its splendors, but some you have to work at to appreciate fully. But June is like a bouquet in the open hand, an ease to the countrywoman's heart! END no more tears

from "soap in the eyes"

Won't burn or irritate eyes!

So gentle, pure and safe . . . this special formula won't hurt even the most sensitive eyes. Lathers so quickly, even in hard water. And rinses out easily!

Leaves hair silky-soft!

Johnson's not only gets hair clean . . . it leaves hair extra-soft, shining . . . easier to comb and manage. No wonder almost all the family like to use it. 29¢, 59¢ and 98¢.

Johnson & Johnson

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is America's mother-and-child favorite! Approved by more doctors than any other brand. It's so easy to give accurate dosage, there's no need to break these 1¼ grain tablets. Children like its pure orange flavor and accept it readily. Buy the best for your child.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

200 Tablets 79c ▪ 100 Tablets 49c ▪ 12 Tablets 12c

Don't Neglect Slipping

FALSE TEETH

Do false teeth drop, slip or wobble when you talk, eat, laugh or sneeze? Don't be annoyed and embarrassed by such handicaps. FASTEETH, an alkaline (non-acid) powder to sprinkle on your plates, keeps false teeth more firmly set. Gives confident feeling of security and added comfort. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. Get FASTEETH today at any drug counter.

Callouses

Pain, Burning, Tenderness?

SUPER-FAST RELIEF!

Removes Hard, Thick Callouses

Apply soft, soothing, deeply cushioning, heart-shaped Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads on the sensitive spots and you'll have Super-fast relief. Used with the wonder-working separate Medications included, Zino-pads remove callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science! Try them. Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

FEET HURT, BURN?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm quickly relieves foot discomfort caused by exertion. Very soothing and refreshing. Costs but a trifle. Try it!

Dr Scholl's FOOT BALM

New idea! VINYL in a floor wax

and the beauty of it is – *it's childproof

Never before such a high gloss!

New Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl in it, gives you higher gloss than you've ever known. On any kind of floor—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile or finished wood! Throughout the house!

No wax easier to apply!

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. No buffing. No rubbing. It spreads evenly —without streaks—quickly sets to a tough, beautiful, vinyl gloss!

Wet spills won't harm gloss!

Splashes and spills—so common with children—won't hurt the tough vinyl surface —or shine. Simply wipe them up. New Simoniz Floor Wax is water-repellent.

Never before such protection!

The miracle of vinyl—and only Simoniz has it—gives you the toughest floor surface. The kids won't scuff it, or harm the gloss with their roughhousing. No doubt about it—it's childproof!

No finish so easy to maintain!

Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl has a gloss that lasts and lasts. You can even damp mop your floors freely without dulling the shine. Without spoiling the wax finish.

Good news about re-waxing!

Here's the one floor wax you can remove evenly before re-waxing. Simply use your regular household detergent and warm water. The beauty increases with re-waxing. You'll be amazed, once you try it.

Simoniz® Floor Wax

For all floors—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile and finished wood

LINIT® STARCH
makes your pretty dresses, petticoats, blouses band-box fresh!

30, 40, or 50 cups of delicious coffee automatically!

WEST BEND® 50 cup
PARTY PERCOLATOR

(1) Pour in cold water. (2) Add coffee. (3) Plug into any AC outlet. It's that easy to make 30, 40, or 50 cups of delicious coffee in West Bend's trim, beautiful 50-cup Percolator. The "50-cup" automatically brews coffee to the peak of flavor and keeps it piping hot to the last delightful cup. $39.95.

AUTOMATIC SKILLET

FLAVO-MATIC PERCOLATORS

At housewares, hardware, gift and appliance stores; prices slightly higher in Canada and Hawaii

WEST BEND ALUMINUM CO., Dept. 676, West Bend, Wisconsin

I would like to teach another seventy years!

By FREDERICK E. BOLTON, Dean Emeritus, College of Education, University of Washington

It is the supreme art of the teacher to awaken joy in creative expression and knowledge.

ALBERT EINSTEIN

I'm only ninety. Regulations have already conspired to put me on a part-time schedule, but I still work more than full time, as I always have. And had I another life to live, I would elect again to be a teacher.

So many articles have been published in the last decade's epidemic of pity for the teachers' poverty and ostracism that thousands have deserted the ranks and only a relatively few candidates are preparing to work in a field which seems to me after seventy years of membership to be a peerless profession. It is to these present and prospective candidates that I want to speak.

I readily admit that teachers' salaries, on the average, are much too low, retirement allowances woefully inadequate, tenure much less secure than it ought to be. But exactly the same indictments can be leveled at almost all other public services, where values can never be measured by monetary compensation. In my lifetime, I have seen teaching emerge from a job given to cripples, itinerant eccentric Ichabod Cranes and doomed spinsters to the status of a profession with extended special training and technical skill.

Someone may be thinking, "He was a university dean. His work has been administration and not teaching." But I was a public-school teacher for a considerably longer time than the average woman teacher, whose professional life is only three or four years. After that, for forty-three years in higher educational institutions I taught classes every school day, plus forty-one summer sessions; and my administrative work of the last twenty-seven years was always on top of a full load of teaching. I have taught in all about 30,000 students. I started in November, 1885, at $30 per month, a princely salary compared with the $19 a month received the preceding summer as a "hired hand" on a farm. The schoolroom was a snap compared with that. It was a genuine country school with forty-five pupils ranging in age from four to twenty-four. I was nineteen, had finished about two years of high school. I had never heard of professional training. There was certainly no social ostracism, then or ever; on the contrary, I was thought to be the most learned person in the district.

> The Spirit only can teach. Not any sensual, not any liar, not any slave can teach.
>
> EMERSON

At no time since the old New England "dame schools" has there been any validity to the charge of community ostracism of schoolteachers. One trouble has been that no agreeable young woman could teach more than a year or two before being whisked away. They used to have their pick of the finest span of matched bays for the drive to Sunday dinner; now it's the shiniest convertible. There are teachers who ostracize themselves, of course. I have attended parent-teacher meetings where the teachers were absent or mere listeners, ignorant and disdainful of the problems of the community.

Some teachers complain of taboos. Doubtless there has been some unfairness. But most citizens think of the school as an agency for inculcating ideals that will elevate the standards of society; they expect education to bring better housing, better food, better transportation, better communication, better laws, better observance of laws, rights and duties, and better behavior. They do not want teachers to drink and gamble. That is as it should be. Persons who do not wish to promote betterment certainly should not engage in teaching.

> It is the peculiarity of knowledge that those who really thirst for it always get it.
>
> RICHARD JEFFERIES

If the public believes that we are serving the interests of their communities and regard us as friends, they will not need to be bludgeoned by strikes and school closures into providing adequate compensation. There has never been such a spontaneous mass campaign for it, or such recognition of schools as the salvation of society. Many communities and legislatures have already voluntarily responded to teachers' needs through orderly and rational procedures. The sums provided compare favorably with the financial status of the majority of those who pay our salaries. But teachers, like all persons engaged in public service, should find large compensation in the opportunity for service and satisfaction in work well done. The worth of such service is never completely evaluated during a lifetime. Socrates, the teacher, had scarce a place to lay his head, but how rich a heritage he bequeathed compared with the gold of Midas!

I do not regard teaching as a sacrifice. Throughout the ages there has been a direct relation between the education of a people and the stage of their civilization; I have been glad to promote it. I have loved guiding young inquiring minds. Tomorrow's classwork, the new term after the holiday, the next class of each day were always things of joyous anticipation. It has been said that "teaching is lighting a torch and not filling a basket." Every class meeting is a golden opportunity to kindle ideals, change characters, motivate lives—even lives through lives. I have fallen far short of my goals. But I have honestly tried. It has been so stimulating, challenging and highly satisfying that I have never wished to change my occupation, nor have I regretted encouraging young people to join me in it.

I would like another seventy-year shift!

TO THE FIRST-GRADE TEACHER

By ELIZABETH HENLEY

To your clean hands I now commend
This child with lipstick kiss on ear—
And hope you find him such a friend
As I, who kept him awfully near.

He knows so little—Teddy bears,
And white-railed bed, and cooky jars,
And yet is wondering about
The rest—including seas and stars.

And now it comes—the words, the books,
And what "goes into," adds, and "borrows"—
I will take care of his todays—
You, his tomorrows.

SOME PEOPLE'S CHILDREN

By PAULA REED

Those having torches will pass them on to others.

PLATO

The American schoolteacher often talks like a woman married to a low-down, no-account husband. She drudges, drudges, drudges to keep things going, her nerves frazzled, her emotions drained, her purse empty. Her talents (which were meant for higher things) are unappreciated, trampled on, profaned, sapped out by the overwhelming and unfair demands on her.

Deep inside, however, she knows the hidden charm of this marriage to her profession—those intimate and personal moments when the score is squared, the gates of Eden open and she stands inside. The secret charm is the charm of some people's children. They can walk right in under all your defenses and bundle up your sentiments as neatly as a cowboy ties a rodeo calf.

Then there are other people's children. . . . All the children have bubbles inside them. Sometimes they are quiet bubbles, at other times they are busy bubbles, an intoxicating fizz, rising fast and bursting on the surface in giggles and mad laughter and dizzy jabbering. It is a wonderful feeling: it is good just to move; all the other boys and girls exist just for beat-push-and-shove bait; and the world has just been made—finished and shined up only yesterday. And here's Old Hatchet Head dulling it all up with stuff like participles, Silas Marner, the Battle of Antietam, or the Pythagorean theorem.

But then somebody's child suddenly looks up at you and asks a question. Dan, maybe. His face is clean and scrubbed and momentarily serious. When his brow buckles up in thought, the stubble of his square-top wiggles a little. The puzzled but fearlessly searching expression on his face is the essence of idealistic boyhood reaching up to be a man.

I've had thousands of these children in just the space of a short career. I've had them of all ages, sizes and conditions—children of German, Bohemian and Russian immigrants, Latin Americans, children of

CONTINUED ON PAGE 47

SURF ADDS BRIGHTNESS

(yes...even to perfect whiteness)

Brightens colors too!

A wash that's merely white is no longer the best you can do. Now all-purpose Surf has a special brightener that puts ultra-violet rays (like those in sunshine) to work for you. Surf actually adds brightness—even to perfect whiteness. Brightens colors, too. Try today's Surf and see. If you don't get the whitest, brightest wash ever, Lever Brothers will refund every penny.

Today's smartest floors wear KENTILE

Interestingly different floor design above features White Tweed and Sandalwood gray.

So richly beautiful! So easy to care for! So wonderfully long wearing!

Your floor of KENTILE solid vinyl tile!

This dramatic living room, with its split-level and handsome floor of Kentile solid vinyl tile, is boldly contemporary yet so very, very comfortable to live in! That's because every detail is geared to easy, modern living. Take the floor, for instance.

It's greaseproof, stain resistant, difficult to mar or scar, and cleans with a whoosh of a damp mop! Furthermore, those glowing, jewel-bright colors stay that way through years of hard wear. Like it? Stop in and see Kentile solid vinyl tile (KenRoyal®) at your local Kentile dealer's soon. He's listed under FLOORS in your Classified Phone Directory.

Kentile, Inc., Brooklyn 15, N. Y.

How easy it is to do-it-yourself! So inexpensive, too!

KENTILE FLOORS

AVAILABLE IN SOLID VINYL • VINYL ASBESTOS • CUSHION-BACK VINYL • CORK • RUBBER AND ASPHALT TILE . . . OVER 150 DECORATOR COLORS

© 1957, Kentile, Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 44

bankers, of farmers, of roughnecks and drillers, of business executives, of engineers, of ministers, of prostitutes, of drunkards, bums and thieves.

I remember Herman, fourteen and still in grade four. He was big and awkward, towering above the others in the grade, his face passive, expressionless. When I gave him directions, he would answer with a blank stare; or if I pressed him for an answer, he would give an uncomprehending "Yes." One day we read some simple poems and I asked the class to write down some lines of their own telling how they felt about some object or person. Herman wrote:

The rugs is werry hairy
I like to walk on it
It fills good I tink.

Beon the tree trunk I will say
Hello, daddy, hello
For I have always said it
Hello, daddy, hello

Rags, rags, rags
For I have always worn them
I wish to get me some more clouse
And feel much better today.

It was as if a mute had spoken.

I remember the little devil that hit me with a snowball with a rock inside it. I remember the gash in my forehead and the blood.

I remember Joey—and Joey's mother. She dabbled in psychology books, the kind that favored complete freedom for a child's self-expression. Joey loved to read. He would read through arithmetic class, spelling class, art class, recess and noon if somebody didn't punch him. I used to keep him in after school for tardiness or for his complete disregard of class activities. He didn't mind; he would sit there reading happily. Joey often seemed lonely without any patterns set down for him to follow, and he seemed to love any punishment I gave him as if it were a mark of special favor.

I remember with humility some of the mistakes I've made. It takes a lot of trial and error to find the best methods of discipline. Dave McConnell was in the seventh grade, but he was already big enough for a college quarterback. He jabbered constantly. Five hundred times a day I had to ask him to stop talking. One day my patience collapsed after the three-hundred-and-fiftieth request. Once more he leaned toward Clifford and started—I planted on his jaw a roundhouse right that sent him sprawling out of his seat into the aisle. I remember with what rue I looked at him, and the awkward way he scrambled up yelling wrathfully, "My gosh, you might at least give a fellow a little warning!"

If Mr. McConnell ever heard about the incident, he apparently favored my corner. Dave himself spread the story around school—rather proudly. The strength of my right arm became a legend and a source of awe. But it chastens one to lose his temper with a child. I determined to work harder on discipline through diplomacy.

The junior-high pupils talk constantly, and if they run out of something to say, they sit and groan. Most of the boys are behind the girls in physical development, and there they sit six inches shorter and twenty pounds lighter than the girls. Their hair is always either in need of a trim or it has just been cut too short. They can forget more books, lose more jackets and sweaters, strew more wastepaper around than any other age group. The girls are beset by special problems. They sit there self-consciously with bosoms in all stages of burgeoning. They can break more straps, lose more buttons, split more skirts and devise more minor emergencies to send them whispering and tittering in pairs to the teacher for permission to go to the rest room. Nothing at this age is so sweet as a secret shared with a friend.

S S S S S S S

True education makes for inequality; the inequality of individuality, the inequality of success, the glorious inequality of talent, of genius; for inequality, not mediocrity, individual superiority, not standardization, is the measure of the progress of the world.

FELIX E. SCHELLING
Pedagogically Speaking

S S S S S S S

And yet for many girls this awkwardness is only a transparent film through which shines an innate grace and charm. You catch sudden glimpses of them—perfect still pictures—when the awkwardness lifts like a fog to reveal a fresh and lovely miniature of the woman that is to be. The boys often startle you by growing a full foot during vacation. And sometimes it comes to them to take your arm on the stairway or to make an introduction with perfect graciousness.

Senior-high boys and girls give the teacher the most worry because they are nearer to the point of being dumped on the world with all their inadequacies. It seems a race with time to get into their heads all that you need to give them. And they are so oblivious of the problems that lie ahead. I often think we reverse the natural order of things. We try to teach them before they can see the need; and when they see the need, the opportunity is gone. Once when my senior class had gone through a series of pregraduation activities and had been victims of advice of various notables of the area, Joan said to me, "Why is it that all these speakers talk to us as if this world we're going out into is cruel and cold and filled with trouble? The world looks fine to me. I don't get it." Yet at that very moment we could hear the echoes of the planes and guns of World War II, and her own nature—emotional, dedicated, brilliant—was the kind that is destined to struggle.

But she was not wrong. That is, after all, the peculiar strength of youth—the not-knowing. As we grow older our anxieties feed and cultivate all the negative possibilities that a situation has to offer.

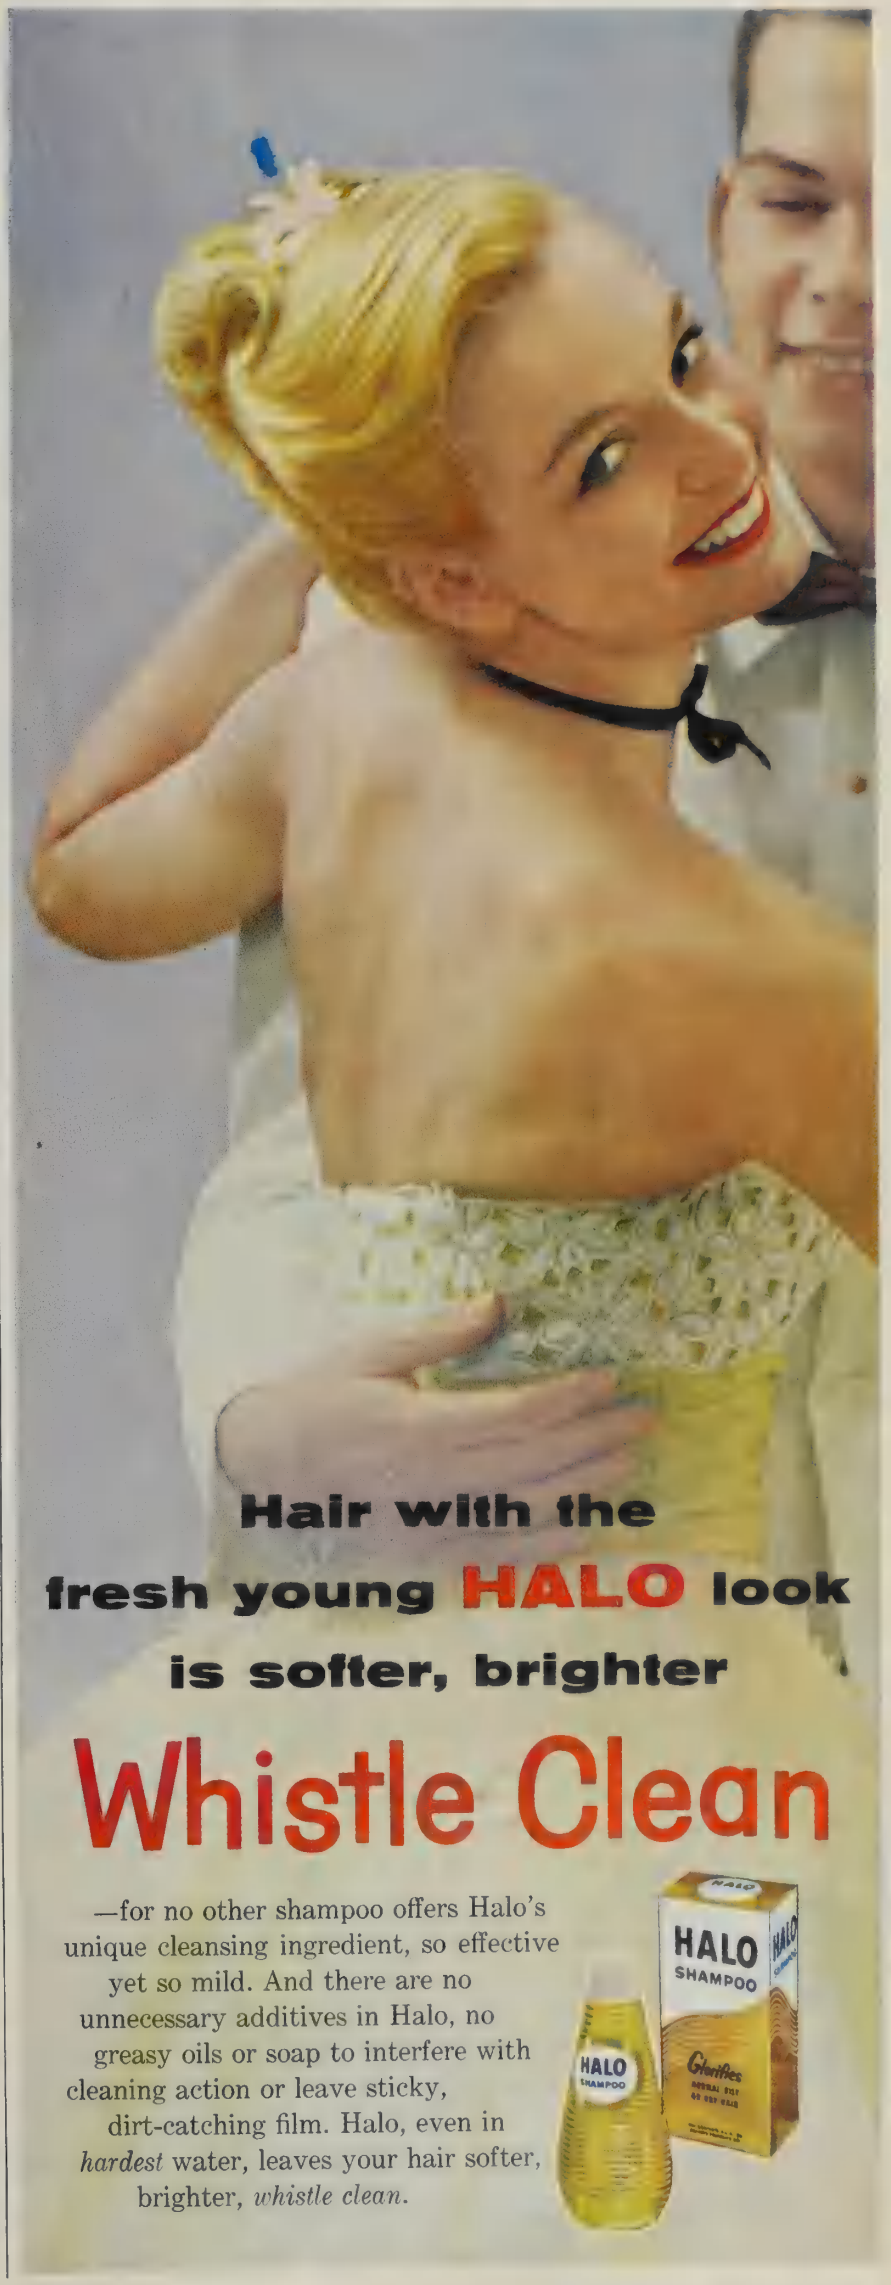
By far the worst part of teaching, paper grading, is sometimes lightened by entertaining wrong answers and original spelling: In mid-evil days the country was organized on the old futile system. . . . We must learn to coke with the situation, use the upmost care, and not take anything for granite. . . . Shakespeare's tomb is inscribed with an epitat. . . . Paul did not knottis the rip in his white panse and when he found out he felt like a silly nincompoot.

And when it comes to poetry, those bards knew not what they wrote. Stuart read:

"Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine."

And he concluded: "This poem is a promise from a man to his girl friend that he will stop drinking."

Another day we read aloud Sir Walter Raleigh's poem The Silent Lover.



Wrong not, sweet empress of my heart,
The merit of true passion,
With thinking that he feels no smart
That sues for no compassion.
Silence in love bewrays more woe
Than words, though ne'er so witty;
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity.
Then wrong not, dearest to my heart,
My true, though secret passion;
He smarteth most that hides his smart,
And sues for no compassion.

The boy I happened to call on to tell the meaning of this poem grew red. "It means," he said, "that—uh—the feller that—uh—does a lot of talkin' don't get much lovin' done."

The quaint old custom of note passing never dies. Once when two chronic note-passing girls had been at it for several minutes, I walked over authoritatively and took possession of the latest edition. I opened it, and amid ripples of giggles I read: "Ha, ha, ha! We knew you'd get this."

Once two girls passed up a message in a sealed envelope: "Dear Teacher, we hate to see you sad. Could we do anything?" Nothing

CONTINUED ON PAGE 49

"Ready-mixed...and full of good milk nourishment," says Elsie the Borden Cow

Borden's Dutch Chocolate Flavored Drink is a real thirst-quencher, and children love it!

This makes mothers happy for two reasons.

They know this delicious drink is full of energy and body-building nourishment. And Borden's Chocolate Drink is no bother at all. No measuring, no mixing! You serve it cold right from the carton, or just pour it in a pan and warm it. Hot or cold, it's delicious!

Borden's Dutch Chocolate Flavored Drink

See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice," "Queen for a Day" and "Fury" over NBC.

...a best buy for June
June is Dairy Month.

Milk ▪ Fine Chee
Ice Cream • Sta

Borden.

For 100 years folks have been say
"If it's Borden's it's got to be goo

© 1957, The Borden Company.

Welsh Winkie
"Hitch - Hiker"
NEW-And So Exciting!

Folds For Storing

Double fun now, for twins – or, toddler and baby brother who can hitch a ride on the Winkie Stroller. Just fasten the "Hitch-Hiker" to the Winkie and away they go! Look what you have:

STROLLER SLEEPER
WALKER
(and, with the Hitch-Hiker)
DOUBLE STROLLER
AUTO SEAT
BOOSTER CHAIR
Ask Your Dealer To Show It.

WELSH CO., ST. LOUIS 4, MO.

MORE CASH FOR YOU!
YES, you can have more cash in your pocket if you put your free time to work. Write for our easy-to-follow money-making plan. No obligation.
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY, 979 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

STOP BITES 25¢
Use like a cleansing tissue
MOSQUITO REPELLENT TISSUE
REPELS MOSQUITOES, GNATS, CHIGGERS, FLIES

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING
NAIL BITING

THUM
TRADE MARK
Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

NEW DECALS
By MEYERCORD

SEE THE X416 SERIES AND MANY NEW DESIGNS AT HARDWARE, PAINT, DEPT., & 10¢ STORES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

escapes them. And again Mary Frances wrote me: "Miss Reed, your slip shows about one inch on the left side." Now, what to do?

One day when they were to write in class a character study of someone they knew well, Steve responded with a description of me:

Your hair is like a haystack except it is not yellow.
Your lips are like Old Faithful— always spouting.
Your mouth is like the Grand Canyon and your teeth are just as colorful.

At the end of the period Steve turned in a theme entitled "My Dearest Brother," a sensitive and moving portrait of Jesus of Nazareth.

What can you do to someone like that?

But believe it or not, most of the time, putting aside the jokes and tricks, the boys and girls work; and through that work you come to know them best—their capabilities and their needs, their dreams, their fears and inhibitions, their impressions of friends and families, the heroes they worship and their need for heroes, their idealism. You come to know things about them that they themselves don't know or that are too personal for them to talk or to write about. You know good things, such as Sue's beauty inside and out and her equanimity; the gaiety of Jeff, a natural clown whose mere presence spreads good feeling and optimism; the generosity, understanding and all-encompassing kindness of Ellen, whose family's wealth might have made her snobbish.

Of course no matter how good your situation, there are always a few fauna from the "blackboard jungle." I have taught the knife-toting Tabor boys. I have seen in my classroom faces and bodies battered from the hand chains of a gang fight. I have taught a girl with an opaque expression that shut out everyone from knowing her. Picked up at a dope party, she had to report regularly to her probation officer. I have taught a ninth-grade boy from a turbulent family who came to school several times a week with a hang-over. I have taught a girl who lived with her mother in a tourist court, apprenticed to an ancient trade in spite of the hounding of juvenile authorities and the school administration.

One of the best things to have up your sleeve is a funny bone.

These boys and girls make up a meager 4 or 5 per cent of the juvenile population. But it is their dereliction that makes the news, for news must have shock value. Yet in the midst of the complete concentration of newspapers, movies and TV on boys and girls like these who have been defeated by unfavorable environment and God knows what, there is a matching 4 per cent of extra-courageous ones who have battled the same terrific odds and won.

I like to remember Clara's story. She developed real executive ability and a great understanding heart organizing a family of eight after the death of her mother. And in between the cooking, cleaning, sewing, spanking and the schoolwork no one cracked so many jokes or sang so many songs. Often it was graveyard whistling; she was strongly tempted to run away at times. But she didn't—so there was not enough melodrama there for the news.

It has been my good fortune to teach more offspring of the salt of the earth than of salty characters. But from whatever station in life they come, they are fascinating and unpredictable. You never know just which way these chips off the old block will fly. It's fine timber, though, the greatest of natural resources. And through it runs a hidden grain of perfection that shows up intermittently from this distance across the desk and in the changed perspective of the crowd.

It is this challenging vision of the great potentialities of people's children that is the real basis of the teacher's love affair with her profession. END

MOTHER, STOP HURTING YOUR CHILD with old-fashioned, harsh antiseptics!

NEW JOHNSON & JOHNSON FIRST AID CREAM fights infection; speeds healing—without stinging!

No other antiseptic—liquid or cream—is so effective, yet so safe for cuts, burns, abrasions:

✓ won't sting—won't irritate tissues ✓ speeds healing
✓ fights infection ✓ penetrates deeper, protects longer
✓ relieves pain quickly ✓ greaseless, stainless

Keep a tube handy in your home, car, office or workshop.

Johnson & Johnson

MASSAGE YOUR FEET!

Enjoy grateful relief from tired, aching feet, legs WHILE YOU RELAX

Recommended by Doctors

Exclusive 30 Degree Angle allows Feet, Legs to rest naturally, comfortably

The wonderful benefits of professional-like massage can now be yours while you sit and read, watch TV or relax, with the new 30 degree angle Dr. Scholl's Electric Foot Massager. This highly invigorating type of massage improves circulation in feet and legs . . . relieves fatigued, aching feeling . . . rests, refreshes, revitalizes the feet.

MAKES AN IDEAL GIFT

Choice of lovely pastel pink, green, ivory white. Model for both feet $16.95. Single foot model $8.95. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops. Mail orders filled if not obtainable locally. Write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. M2, Chicago 10, Illinois.

Dr Scholl's Electric FOOT MASSAGER

NOW! With Super-Powered Radioear 850

New Thousands can enjoy HIDDEN HEARING!

You may be among the thousands who have suffered embarrassing years of awkward amplifiers, dangling cords, buttons.

BUT NOT ANY MORE! RADIOEAR 850 makes hidden hearing available even to many formerly "impossible" hearing losses. For women: hair offers complete concealment. For men: only a thin transparent tube shows.

SO POWERFUL—you may NEVER have to use its full volume!

SO CLEAR—at normal use levels, distortion is less than 2%—a level acceptable in expensive high-fidelity phonographs.

SO ECONOMICAL—you can expect up to twenty hours of brilliant hearing for as little as one penny!

FOR TELEPHONE USERS: WONDERFUL NEWS!

No more fussing with volume controls. A flip of a switch gives understandable telephone hearing!

Learn all about the ALL-NEW RADIOEAR 850. Mail this coupon for our free 6-page booklet No. 526.

radioear
CORPORATION
Pittsburgh 16, Pa.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

526

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

GOLDSTEIN

"First I served him the caviar, followed by shrimp cocktail, Vichyssoise, filet mignon, champagne, baked Alaska, and demitasse—then I waited ten minutes for a comment. . . ."

My neighbor with the new carport has invented a tricky method to end a fond quarrel with his wife. "Anyhow," he tells her, "I'm better than no husband at all!"

After vacations at seventeen different resorts in seventeen years, my wife's cousin is still baffled. "We are always torn," he confesses, "between our yearning for privacy and our fear of loneliness."

"When I feel we're in a deep rut," muses Betty Comfort, painting her mailbox turquoise, "I can always rearrange the furniture in the living room. When my husband comes home we can pretend we're two different people."

At our luncheon table we decided (by a narrow margin) that a man should be politer to his own wife than to the boss' wife. (And that she should be politer to you than to your boss.)

Sometimes I look down a half mile of sidewalk between home and the office without seeing a pedestrian. Yet I believe motorists who swallow tranquilizers and cause their own traffic snarls might be better off walking three or four miles to work and back.

One of the wittier wives in our neighborhood argues it's deceit to put an iron flamingo in your front yard unless you've actually been in Florida within the past five years. I think ten is fairer.

My Dream Girl feels younger at summer resorts than at winter resorts. "On the Southern beaches you seldom see anybody under fifty in March," she complains, "but younger people do get summer vacations."

I infuriate the women at a bridge table when I argue that if men had to diaper the babies, they'd have evolved a brave-new-world substitute for the diaper long ago.

In our family the female letter writers all have far handsomer handwriting than the males. If we men improved our penmanship (as that French scientist contends) maybe we'd improve our dispositions too. (And our morale too?)

Newest kind of snobs in our town: the ones who brag they've missed five cocktail parties in a week. "Why should I stand on my feet for hours," demands one of our social lions. "I'd rather lie down and read a good book. Or take a hike."

One of our town's irrepressible matrons picks up quaint shells on the beach and makes costume necklaces and bracelets. She's even sold some to Dior in Paris, which puts her one up on our town's matron with the chinchilla cape.

My dad wanted me to be a doctor, offered to pay my college expenses if I'd study medicine. I declined, and paid my own college expenses, on the ground that I'd rather have somebody else trim my appendix than try to trifle with somebody else's.

I'm baffled why nice women make such a fuss over brazen philanderers, and seem to admire and enjoy them so much, when they conk their husbands on the head if they so much as look at a girl at the next table in a restaurant.

Why do we quibble so much about paying teachers a decent wage? It'd cost us more to hire baby sitters nine months a year than we pay in school taxes, and the education is thrown in free.

My Dream Girl is unfascinated by de luxe lakeside trailers in Florida, glass-and-aluminum cabana attached, at $7000, plus $28 a month. But she thought a beach motel ($38 a day) just too cute.

A razor expert urges me to shave my chin first, and that reminds me: If I ask my wife, "May I skip shaving today?" she usually acquiesces. But if I skip shaving without consent she razzes the whiskers off my face.

And now that we've finally bought a power lawn mower, I wonder what will be our youngest's defense against mowing our grass once a week. Last summer I felt like Simon Legree, chaining him to a powerless mower.

On our last trip south my Princess of Sheer Delight didn't sneer at my fondness for smoked mackerel, though she prefers stone crab. Gourmets rank stone crab as most subtle of delicacies. I still like smoked mackerel; it's better'n smoked salmon.

My frazzled neighbor likes to tune in on the sweet music of Lawrence Welk. Or Waring or Lombardo. But his coed daughter stalks off to her room to play in self-defense a Louis Armstrong record. Aren't parents a problem?

Among our town's young matrons the lorgnette is staging a comeback, since one of our wanderlusty couples brought several pairs home from the Flea Market in Paris. Maybe this will delay reluctant experiments with contact lenses.

On my last air trip I reached a new high in trip insurance: $187,500 worth for $7.50. For a moment it tickled my Princess of Sheer Delight more than two dozen roses.

We disagreed at lunch whether a wife should ever strike her husband. I contend there's no harm if she isn't too athletic; it gives him the upper hand morally for a few days. A few hours, I mean.

One of our town's judges miraculously persuaded our town's most quarrelsome couple to dismiss their divorce lawyers. "Just be as tolerant of each other's faults," he told 'em, "as you are toward your friends'."

One of our town's dentists has struck it rich in Texas oil. His father lost his savings in gold-mine stock and rice plantations, but remained a good doctor. A few selfish townsmen say they prefer a good dentist to a Texas oil millionaire.

My neighbor's wife now challenges her husband's claim (always offered in self-defense) that any husband is better than no husband. "I can picture a situation," she retorts, "when I'd question that."

I was flattered when my daughter-in-law asserted that Harlan III resembles me. "But don't despair," I told her. "All babies look like me at first, but they get over it as their faces smooth out."

. . . When I discover our youngest reading Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,

. . . Or our calm daughter-in-law confesses her baby arrived in a fog of anesthetic without her awareness,

. . . And Junior sends us a diagram of his quarters at his Air Force base in Japan,

. . . Or our faraway daughter describes her two babies with such skill and gusto that we can see them growing up,

. . . And my Dream Girl in a red-checked gingham shirt and blue denim pants looks like a college sophomore,

Then I admit guardedly that I've got it so golden I wouldn't swap with a twenty-four-year-old bachelor.

PROVINCIAL HIDE-A-BED sofa with wing-curved back and box pleats. Wide range of Provincial prints. From $279.50 depending on choice of fabric.

MODERN HIDE-A-BED sofa, biscuit-tufting, off-the-floor look. In metallics and other decorator textures. From $239.50 depending on choice of fabric.

TRADITIONAL HIDE-A-BED sofa, channel arms and flounce. Turquoise boucle. Also brown, sage green, coral, beige, olive. Full $329.50; apt. $319.50.

MMONS new service: a HIDE-A-BED® sofa made to order for you!

ose from more than 50 styles, fabrics, many sizes—hundreds of ible combinations! Now Simmons "custom make" your Hide-A-Bed –at no extra charge!

ie trained salesman at your favorite will help you select from all the ern, Traditional and Provincial s . . . with flounces, shirred kick s and box pleats.

ien take your pick from the print, d, linen, nylon and boucle fabrics all-new colors.

ioose the kind of cushions and mat- you want. And order the size you —full or apartment, loveseat or -wide sofa.

Hide-A-Bed sofa, exactly as you've custom-ordered it, will be ready in about three weeks!

You get all these Simmons Exclusives:

- Wider arm-to-arm—the full-size sofas are a full 65″ between arms.
- Super-comfort cushions—Beautyrest* (or foam rubber, slightly more.)
- Exclusive seat design — new lower height, slopes gently down toward the back for maximum seating comfort.
- Easy-opening mechanism — opens in seconds to the bed with bedding in place.
- Simmons mattress — a full length Deepsleep.* Or famous Beautyrest, slightly more!
- Exclusive all-steel sofa frame — (not just the bed frame!) for a lifetime of wonderful wear.

*Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Patent Office, Copr. 1957 by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

Visit your favorite furniture or department store for a wide selection of Simmons convertibles, as low as $89.95. Convenient terms 1942... The other woman was me – when Tom asked me to marry him in wartime. My first home: a trailer, then a series of makeshift apartments. No wonder I never had the silver I'd always dreamed about!

"I just realized

I've been 'making-do' w

"It's finally dawned on me – the silv been using for 15 years isn't really mine longs to another woman. The girl I was early 1940's when Tom and I had a tw honeymoon in an army trailer camp be went overseas.

"So much has happened to us since: o children... our own home... Tom's promot has a really good job now.

"Then why, it suddenly came to me, a doing without the lovely silver service I've dreamed about? We ought to have it righ
These are the best years of our family life thing's going on all the time. Family and coming to dinner on weekends... children taining their friends at buffet suppers.

"I can't wait to set a really beautiful t sparkling with my new silver. Or give a buff and arrange a whole glorious spread of silver on the table! Nothing shows off silve buffet table!"

Now c

your "dream's-wort

...in magnificent solid silver HEIRLOOM STERLING! Which of these lovely patterns will you choose for your "Second Honeymoon" service? Flower Lane, the "new modern" edged with elegance? Silver Rose, rich and triumphant in its graceful simplicity? Tender, serene Lasting Spring? Radiantly romantic Damask Rose? Or stately, traditional Stanton Hall? All are distinguished – all completely original.

Another woman's Silver!"

– and such wonderful things have been hap-ng in silver design lately, you really owe it to self to see! And right now—one of the great es in silver—Oneida Ltd. Silversmiths—is offer-specially priced services for eight, actually ded for families like your own. These wonderful
"buys" come only in the very best—in superb, ous Heirloom* Sterling, so well known for its ty and freshness of design – and in world-us Community* Silverplate. When you set a with Community it says the right things about
And just look at the lovely patterns!

ere is silver really worthy of your loveliest sildreams! And by acting now you can save on magnificent matched sets.

So why wait? Spaced-out payments can be so easily arranged. Just ask your jeweler or silver department. As little as a dollar or two a week will put a complete silver service on your table—today!

"SECOND HONEYMOON" SERVICE IN HEIRLOOM STERLING
A superb sterling service in a deluxe drawer chest with solid brass drawer pulls, handles and name plate. The chest—a $25 value—at no extra cost. Eight 5-piece place settings plus two serving pieces. See all the stunning Heirloom Sterling patterns and choose yours... from only $216, Federal tax included!

"HAPPILY MARRIED" SERVICE IN COMMUNITY
In your choice of the enchanting patterns shown below—eight 6-piece place settings plus 2 Serving Spoons, Butter Knife and Sugar Spoon. 52 pieces of beautiful silverware in a handsome blond or mahogany finish chest only $75.50.

*Trade Marks. © 1957, Oneida Ltd., Oneida, N. Y.

er ...created in the Design Studios of Oneida Ltd. Silversmiths

..or in world-famous COMMUNITY*, the finest silverplate* For your "Happily Married" service choose from these beautiful Community patterns: South Seas with flowing line of sea and shore... Sophisticated Morning Star inspired by a priceless jade carving... Frankly feminine White Orchid... Formal, traditional Coronation... Graceful Twilight with tapered handles and curving tips... Choose your favorite!

MAKING MARRIAGE WORK

"We agree on almost everything except sex."

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

IS SEX IMPORTANT IN MARRIAGE?

"My husband and I have been married three months. We agree on almost everything except sex. He says I am cold and selfish, but I think he is exaggerating the whole business. I admit I am indifferent much of the time, but I think most young wives feel as I do. He claims they don't, and wants me to see a doctor. If there's something wrong with me, I want to correct it. Where does sex fit into marriage? Is it as important as my husband says?"

Like any other problem, a sexual difficulty is best understood and resolved with some knowledge of basic facts, rather than solely on the basis of personal opinion. Perhaps we can help this bride get a better perspective on her situation by describing some of the factors affecting sexual adjustment in the college marriages studied in our research.

Yes, sex is important in marriage. Generally a fourth of a wife's married happiness, and a third of her husband's, depend on the sexual adjustment they make. The greater importance to the male is probably due to his greater sex drive, especially during the early years of marriage. Thus he may appear to her to be "exaggerating," whereas in fact he is conforming to the typical.

The relationship between a bride's attitudes toward sex and her sexual adjustment is marked. When she has healthy positive attitudes, she can usually make a successful adjustment. The few who don't might have succeeded had their husbands been more thoughtful. Conversely, wives with negative attitudes experience considerable difficulty in achieving sexual satisfaction within the first year of marriage. Those who succeed owe much to their husbands' patience, co-operation and teaching.

Frequent dating and a long courtship also favor a wife's making a good adjustment, as does her being a friendly, affectionate personality. Of course the kind of man she marries makes a difference, in this respect as in all others. If he is mannerly, affectionate and appreciative, she becomes less reserved and more responsive. But if he limits his demonstrations of affection to strictly sexual demands, she may come to feel that he wants her only as a female, not as a wife.

All the research shows that the first few months of marriage are crucial in determining sexual adjustment. But no young wife should conclude that this aspect of her marriage is a failure, simply because the honeymoon did not bring the complete release for her she had expected. She owes it to herself and her husband to tell him how she feels and what he might do to help her. Most marriage counselors feel that a substantial number of sexual maladjustments in marriage would never have developed if husband and wife had been able to discuss their sexual feelings, preferences and inhibitions from the start.

Resolving a sexual problem in marriage, like any other, depends on the full and free communication between husband and wife. Indeed, the physical relationship is a profound and fundamental form of communication. When the inhibited young wife can accept it as such, her doubts and fears will gradually disappear. Though faulty or deficient sexual techniques are often blamed for sexual maladjustment, attitudes are far more often responsible.

Almost any husband and wife can achieve a satisfactory sexual adjustment if each sincerely wants to, for the sake of the other as well as of self. Sex is not the most important part of marriage, but it often spells the difference between success and failure. For a good adjustment may give a weak marriage a chance to grow stronger, while a poor adjustment may aggravate any other difficulties.

ARE THERE RULES FOR MARRIAGE?

At a recent social gathering, a young matron took me to task for what she called the "negative viewpoint" of much that is written about marriage and family relationships.

"My husband and I love each other and our children and we're happy," she said. "Is that so unusual? Do you think a successful marriage depends on a lot of hard-and-fast rules and technical information?"

Of course not, nor does any other qualified counselor. There is nothing obscure or mysterious about making marriage work. It doesn't require special talents, eternal vigilance or technical knowledge. But it does require two reasonably sensible people (like young Mrs. B. and her husband) who believe that marriage is the best way of life for them and that, through working and sharing, they can be happier together than apart.

Communication is essential. Without talking things over, understanding is difficult and companionship is blocked. But words alone are not enough. Communication in marriage means the ability to sense and respect the other's mood, to listen as well as to talk; to share feelings as well as ideas. Communication is the means by which love is nourished and kept alive.

Confiding is the most intimate form of communication. The husband and wife who habitually confide their hopes and fears, their defeats and accomplishments, find relief from tension, encouragement when things go badly and shared joy when things go well.

Compromise is necessary in every close relationship. It can be achieved easily, almost without conscious thought, when the couple communicate and confide.

Co-operation is the best single criterion of happy marriage. Probably no two human beings can co-operate fully at the beginning of their relationship, but husband and wife acquire the ability through compromise and appreciation. Co-operation means united purpose, mutual effort and shared reward—a fair definition of any partnership, and the fundamental achievement of marriage.

Ask yourself if you are making full use of these principles. If not, today is the time to start. If so, then, like Mrs. B., you won't consider married happiness unusual.

The purpose of marriage is to unite two people, not to stifle them. A happy relationship can never be achieved by obeying "a lot of hard-and-fast rules."

Nevertheless, consciously or unconsciously, happily married couples do observe certain basic principles. Though Mrs. B. might formulate them differently, she recognizes their importance in her marriage. These principles are not separate and distinct, but are interdependent and mutually reinforcing.

Acceptance is first—not only acceptance of the person you marry, but also acceptance of your role in marriage. Although a wife may still pursue a career (as does her husband), the career is not an end in itself but a means of building a happier and stronger marriage. So is every other privilege and responsibility.

Approval is requisite. Love fades and marriage ties weaken when a husband does not take pride in his wife and her activities, or when she does not respect and admire him. Without mutual approval, there can be no true sense of belonging.

Appreciation grows out of acceptance and approval, and should not only be felt, but expressed in word and deed.

DO YOU AGREE?

Is the average pregnancy planned?

In half the cases, yes; in the remainder, no.

ASK YOURSELF:

Should She Go Steady?

Whether a girl is ready to go steady depends less upon age than upon her emotional maturity. When a girl begins going steady, she faces the definite possibility of early marriage. Unless your daughter is well along the road to marriage readiness, she is not ready to go steady. Honest joint answers to these questions may help both of you decide if you and she are both ready.

Is Your Daughter:

1. At least seventeen years old?
2. At least a high-school senior?
3. Proud of being your daughter?
4. Concerned about what people think of her?
5. Stable and acting her age?
6. Able to confide freely in you?
7. Provident and conservative about money?

Has She:

8. Good judgment about boys she dates?
9. Dated several boys during the past two years?
10. Made any future plans (college, job)?
11. Any basic knowledge about homemaking?
12. Avoided impulsive actions and hasty decisions?
13. Usually discussed her problems with you?
14. Willingly accepted responsibilities that accompany privileges?

Wouldn't you feel that your daughter is ready to go steady if the answers to 11 or 12 of these questions are a solid "Yes"? And wouldn't you doubt it if 6 or 7 answers were "No"? Whatever the score, you must remember that you have had a major role in preparing her for this period of her life. If she isn't ready, one of you has fallen down. The big question now is how you can help her. After all, the time may be short!

New and lavish
PINK CAMAY

scented like perfume from Paris that would cost you $25.00 an ounce... blended with pink cold cream

Probably the most lavish soap that ever pampered your skin (yet costs no more than ordinary soaps)

Kept fresh and fragrant in Pink Pearl foil

© The Procter & Gamble Co.

from California comes the exciting

Patio Spectacular!

with golden cling peaches broiled on Kaiser "Quilted" Foil

The newest, brightest notion yet from the land where Barbecues make party history: broiled Cling Peaches from California! Juicy, sweet clings are such a colorful, simple way to touch your meals with glamour . . . taste so right with every cook-out favorite. Next time you're shopping, pick up a can or two of clings. Sunshiny, golden cling peaches make all your meals company-good, out-of-doors or in!

EASY TO FIX: Just marinate two-inch lamb squares in your favorite barbecue sauce. (Or use other meats if you prefer.) Thread squares on skewer with parboiled onions, green pepper, mushrooms. Broil. Ten minutes before the meat turns its handsomest brown, place golden cling halves on Kaiser Broiler Foil (the new, stronger "Quilted" foil). Fill hollows with catsup, chili, or other relishes, and grill until meat is ready.

CANNED Cling Peaches FROM CALIFORNIA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

and not just those in the armed forces? Such organizations as Blue Cross and Blue Shield meet only a fraction of the cost of a prolonged illness, which means, for an average middle-class family, financial ruin. Surely if an impoverished country like England can give its people free medical care, we should be able to too.

Sincerely,
SHEILA M. MACARTNEY

Note to the Young

Iowa City, Iowa

Dear Bruce and Beatrice: I appreciate as never before your greetings. I am not hurrying to write. Instead I sit here and see again all my old friends who care to remember me from former days. It is a great part of my feel for life and happily I remember with the utmost distinctness this long stretch of years. It is one compensation for old age, that terror of almost everyone. Shakespeare lived, if one can judge by his many references and that terrible play Lear, in constant fear of old age which he was never to experience himself. Old age has at least this compensation. It has a range and perspective of experience, a fullness and richness unknowable to youngsters.

The happiest part of our long married life, for my wife R. and me, were the thirteen and a half years, halcyon years, when both of us were pretty much knocked out. We were never separated and we knew that any day might well be the last for one of us. Somehow that gave each day a peculiar quality of happiness, something which could not have been but for its anxieties and troubles. Last April R. was discovered to have cancer and the end came in September. She did not lose her radiance, her serenity, her beauty in spite of all. I am now going on making what is possible of my mutilated but not at all self-pitying life. I don't think many have had such happiness as we in our fifty-three years of marriage.

As we move on, we no longer have the ecstasies of youth, but life is so much deeper, more real, less bewildered; and above all, fear fades out. My only fear now, and it is not serious, is that I may live too long. The young are right in always fearing that they may be cut off and miss what they might have. It is not a true saying that those whom the gods love die young. A superficial piece of classical cynicism!

With my very warm regards,
STEPHEN H. BUSH

▶ A distinguished former professor, who has been blind for some years, writes us that old age need not be terrifying. ED.

More on Toys

Ottawa, Canada

Dear Sir: In March, the editor of Toys and Novelties advised your readers to buy only American-made toys if they wanted good quality. Are your readers naïve enough to believe that the only "good" toys are manufactured in the U.S.? Is every product made by even an excellent toy-making house "good"?

For the benefit of your Canadian readers, we would like to point out that good playthings are manufactured in Canada too. (And what about imports from Great Britain and Sweden, for example?)

Surely the criterion of a good toy is not its country of origin! We should know—we've tested toys from all over the world.

Yours sincerely,
MRS. A. L. KASSIRER
Chairman, National Toy-Testing Committee of the Canadian Association of Consumers and Citizens' Committee on Children

. . . and 44 Years Later

New York Mills, Minnesota

Dear Editor: While looking over a box of keepsakes recently, I found an article I had saved from the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, May, 1913. It is What Can I Do About Cancer? by Samuel Hopkins Adams.

I am deeply grateful to the JOURNAL for printing that article. It convinced me that I ought to get a doctor's opinion about a small and painless lump in my left breast. I went to our family doctor, who removed the growth and sent it to the hospital for examination. The growth was cancerous. Our doctor performed an immediate operation, and the entire breast was removed. The wound healed and I have had no more trouble. I was a young woman then with two small children; the doctor was young also, and he said it was the first operation of that kind he had done.

Now, nearly forty-four years later, I still feel as the doctor did in 1913 that the article I read in the JOURNAL was most likely the means of saving my life. I am glad that you still have articles of a similar nature.

Very truly yours,
GRACE HOARD

Note to Dr. Adams

McAllen, Texas

Dear Editors: Why doesn't someone just once write an article on "How to Hold Your Wife"? Why should it be so much more offensive to a nonsmoking man to have his wife smoke than it is to a nonsmoking woman to have her husband smoke? And why is it so much worse for a wife to become a little too "gay" during a cocktail party than it is for a husband to really cause his wife embarrassment?

I really feel Doctor Adams might write a follow-up article bringing out a few things a husband can do to keep his wife thinking he is the same man she knew during courtship and the early days of marriage.

Yours very truly,
MARTHA J. SIDENER

Well, Thank You, Suh!

Moscow, Tennessee

Dear Editor: Until today, I have abhorred big slick thick magazines—especially the big slick thick LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

I am a rural mail carrier and JOURNALS just won't stay put in a mail bag. Many times I've had to re-sort my mail because a JOURNAL had slipped out of the tie. And, too, I've always regarded the contents as just a bunch of feminine nonsense, unworthy of a masculine glance.

A few months ago my wife subscribed to the JOURNAL without my knowledge. Well, suh, the day I delivered the first copy I was fit to be tied—and I've been mad ever since. Then today my wife went traipsing off to one of them hen-shebangs and left me all by myself. Well, the TV was on the blink, and the JOURNAL was layin' in easy reach, so I sheepishly started thumbing through its pages. Well, suh, that's when I quit hatin' the JOURNAL; by Ned, I found some powerful good readin' within its covers. Why, "There's a Man in the House" is alone worth the price of a year's subscription!

I won't kick no more, even if all my patrons become JOURNAL subscribers. It's worth delivering, even if it is big and thick and mighty slick.

A new friend,
GUY SIMMONS

Mother Knew They Were Worth Saving!

Storm Lake, Iowa

Dear Friends: Last year I used half-century-old JOURNALS for my Christmas cards. My mother carefully put these JOURNALS away years ago, but I forgot about them until I opened this annually dusted box to examine the contents.

All 87 magazines were cleaned with wallpaper cleaner, and the edges trimmed at a local printing shop. Then on the outside was a greeting, "An Old-Fashioned Christmas from Marie Harker." The response has been delightful. One is to be put on exhibition at a public library, others are having special covers made to preserve them for another fifty years. The menfolks seem to enjoy the advertisements very much.

I have kept a few—just couldn't bear to part with them!

Sincerely,
NORA MARIE HARKER

Dad's Still in the Family!

Denver, Colorado

Dear Editors: Four days after Christmas we received word that my husband would have to be hospitalized. An unexpected blow. We were not prepared for it financially, emotionally, or any other way. We have four little boys; the oldest is nine, the baby is two.

One of my husband's main concerns was being away from the children for several months. Childlike, would they forget "daddy" after a few weeks? Would they

Happiness has a fragrance ...called TWEED®

Under the sun, under the moon, let the fragrance of TWEED surround you. Splash or spray its sparkling freshness . . . happy aura for a happy summer.

Tweed Bouquet—a cologne to use lavishly—from $1.50

Tweed Mist—concentrated Toilet Water—from $2.25 prices plus tax

Lenthéric

. . . the name that says fragrance

3 ways better... O-CEDAR SPONGE MOPS with exclusive

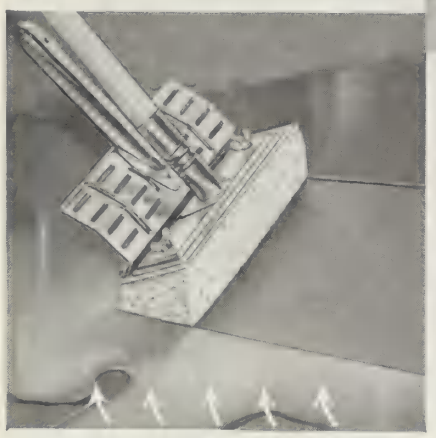
"Wonder-Working Angle"

1

GRIPS THE FLOOR...



Only the O-Cedar sponge has the scientifically cut "wonder-working angle" that makes it hug the floor surface. This action spreads just the right amount of water with less effort—actually scrubs out the most stubborn dirt.

2

SQUEEZES OUT DRIER...

O-Cedar's "wonder-working angle", plus the specially designed back presser, lets you squeeze the entire sponge evenly without arm-tiring work. And remember—your hands never touch water!

3

PICKS UP MORE WATER...

The "wonder-working angle" sponge lies flat to the floor. Only light back strokes are necessary to pick up water or accidental spills. In just a jiffy your floors are sparkling clean.

Keeps Hands Dry... Saves Mopping Time!

With the O-Cedar Sponge Mop, you can damp mop an entire floor in just minutes without "scrub water hands". O-Cedar Sponge Mops are ruggedly built too, with all metal parts fully chrome plated for long, dependable service. That's why they're guaranteed for five years! Model "76" (shown) only $4.50. New deluxe model "88" with king-size 11-inch sponge that squeezes from the handle, only $5.95. Use extra sponge refills for waxing and special cleaning jobs.

Available where you buy cleaning supplies

O-CEDAR
Chicago, Illinois—Division of
AMERICAN-MARIETTA COMPANY
O-Cedar of Canada, Ltd. Stratford, Ontario

find someone else to mend their broken toys? Would they make my burden even greater by not having a father to help with their discipline?

We found that Bill could talk to the boys on the phone a few times a week. They tell him their little troubles—what happened at school and at play. They also report on the little tasks Bill gives them to help me. According to their size, they weed the garden, shovel snow, cut the lawn, empty wastepaper baskets, dry dishes, polish shoes. They write these chores on a blackboard and check them off as they're completed. There is a minimum of complaining as they want to give "daddy" a good report when he calls.

Family.

On visiting days I bring Bill the broken toys to mend. A YoYo string gets in a hopeless tangle, wheels come off little cars, wind-up toys get wound too tight. There's no end to it with four little boys! The toys get fixed, the children are happy, and it's excellent therapy for Bill.

Visiting nights also find me with a folder of school papers to show "daddy." How proud they are of an "A" or "100%"! Their grades have gone up in the past few months, and even our little five-year-old in kindergarten works especially hard to make a drawing to please "daddy."

As a reward for their efforts Bill makes prizes for them—belts with their names carved into them, unique marble bags fashioned from scraps of colored leather.

Unfortunately, our little two-year-old gets the least out of all this planning. But every time the phone rings he runs for it on his fat little legs yelling "Lello daddy, lello daddy." As you might imagine, when Bill does talk to him, Timmy just listens with a big grin on his face and usually doesn't say a word.

God willing, we hope it won't be too long before Bill will be able to come home occasionally. In the meantime, he feels he's an integral part of the family doing his share in the proper rearing of his children. And the boys are conscious of the fact that their father is still the head of the household and will mete out praise or punishment as it's deserved.

Sincerely,
LUCILE RUFF

It Burns Me Up!

Millions of dollars are spent entreating the motoring public not to be "litterbugs." But car manufacturers make larger and larger cars (for larger and larger families) with nary a trash receptacle. Why not a pocket on the inside of the doors as they had years ago? Or a place under the glove compartment?

MRS. JACK TURNER
Temple, Texas

Cleanser cans—Ah hates 'em! The bottoms rust my counters; the middles disintegrate when wet; the tops bruise my hands when pounded. WHY don't they invent pretty, pastel, plastic, PRE-PERFORATED containers?

MRS. J. R. BURDETTE
Paducah, Kentucky

▶ Best solution thus far is a plastic container which fits over the can. ED.

The time I waste trimming patterns down to the "cutting" line, so I can really see how they fit my victims after they are pinned. The margin is supposed to "fall away." Fall where? Let's go back to ready-to-use patterns, please.

MARIE L. EDWARDS
Hanceville, Alabama

Of all misleading statements
Plain tho' they are, and clear
The one that heads my list is this:
To open box—press here.

MRS. J. E. GASTON
Fairhope, Alabama

Quick Relief of HEADACHE NEURALGIA

Because of the combination of fast acting ingredients in the STANBACK formula—STANBACK Tablets or Powders are remarkably effective for relieving pains of:

1. Headache, neuralgia and neuritis.
2. Cold discomforts and other pains that usually accompany colds.
3. Discomforts of tired, sore, aching muscles due to overwork or unusual exercise.
4. Pains and discomforts following tooth extraction and other dental work.

Snap Back with

STANBACK
POWDERS
QUICK RELIEF
HEADACHE, NE
STANBACK TABLETS
STANBACK COMPANY, LTD.
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

LIPS SORE
Blistex
FAMOUS RX
POCKET SIZE
39c
HIGHER IN CANADA
BEST FOR COLD SORES
CHAPPED LIPS FEVER BLISTERS

VARICOSE VEINS
Tired Legs, Leg Cramps
Relieved By The NEW
Dr. Scholl's
Super-Sheer
ELASTIC STOCKINGS
NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED
So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops, Drug, Department, Surgical Supply Stores. For leaflet and booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Illinois

The very best in FINE
SEWING MACHINES
Fleetwood®
Homemaker®
Diplomat®
For your nearest dealer, and for your FREE Color Brochure, write to:
S.K.S. machine company
• 4448 BROADWAY — NEW YORK 40, NEW YORK

Especially on Hot Foods...

The flavor of real butter is still nature's secret!

hy does real butter make such a big flavor difference on hot ods? Because it's churned from 100% real cream, of course. eal cream is the heart and soul of its goodness, the source of e subtle flavor that agrees with you always. Just like milk, al butter belongs on your family table—and your family serves real butter as much as your guests. Serve the best—rve real butter.

AWN BUTTER SAUCE: To ¼ cup melted butter add 2 tablespoons flour, stirring. d dash pepper, ½ teaspoon salt, dash paprika. Slowly stir in 1 cup water. ok until thickened. Just before serving stir in 1 teaspoon lemon juice.

See "Disneyland" on ABC-TV

AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION • Chicago
Representing the dairy farmers in your area

June is Dairy Month

You never outgrow your need for foods made from milk!

© 1957, AMERICAN DAIRY ASSN.

The safest possible soap for the finer things you do by machine!

Now that so many special-care washables go into the machine, it is so important to choose the same safe soap you use for hand-washables . . . wonderful Ivory Snow! It leaves baby clothes and diapers safe, soft . . . far softer than washday detergents . . . free from irritating deposits. Pampers colors, fluffy woolens, all your nice things. Safe as safe can be, the only soap both Ivory-safe and granulated for efficiency!

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In June, 1907, America's beloved humorist, Mark Twain, was made Doctor of Letters at Oxford, and The Red Mill, Girl of the Golden West, and Mrs. Warren's Profession flourished on Broadway. Perforated peekaboo shirtwaists were all the rage, and a new ditty spoofed ladies' towering bonnets:

We have the horseless carriage,
The wireless and all that,
Also the loveless marriage,
But not the birdless hat.

In the June, 1907, issue, Editor Bok warns working girls away from the "evils" of dance halls and Chinese restaurants, penny arcades, five-cent theaters, and music counters selling ragtime in department stores.

"Saving old underwear to use when traveling will save many a laundry bill. After it has become soiled, throw it away."

"Ice cream must not be kept overnight in July and August for fear of ptomaine," advises Mrs. Rorer. "Do not cook and then cool chicken by placing it on plates on the cellar floor."

Manners: "Soup should be taken from the side of the spoon, although persons with mustaches have a special dispensation to put the point into the mouth."

"The twenty-three-hour cure," explains the Health Editor, "means living in the open air for twenty-three hours out of twenty-four with the help of outdoor sleeping porches. For convalescents it is considered beneficial."

"Do not pay for your iceman's tongs when buying ice," warns the Food Editor. "They usually weigh about three pounds, or seventy-five pounds in a month of deliveries."

"I never have any trouble getting household help," declares a reader, "for I never let a maid leave before she finds a friend to take her place."

"What a Godless young creature to mention in the JOURNAL!" a reader protests about a young businesswoman whose weekly schedule omitted any mention of Wednesday-night prayer meeting.

"In one of our largest cities," crusades Editor Bok, "the cost of pure milk is so high that thousands of half-starved babies are poisoned by a sour mixture of drugs, chalk and water sold by cheap vendors."

"Paper bags may be easily kept by means of a spring clothespin hung in the pantry."

Mexican comedian Cantinflas, from his seat on a high-wheeler, discusses with producer Mike Todd a bit of business for Around the World in Eighty Days.

We've just polled Workshop opinion here on what movie of the season seemed most filled with fun, wonder and excitement. The vote was virtually unanimous for Around the World in Eighty Days. And now we only hope you've a movie house nearby big enough to accommodate it. For one thing, you simply mustn't miss Cantinflas, the Mexican comedian who's the richest and highest paid entertainer in the world. Yet this is his first American film. "Why is that?" we asked Mike Todd. "Too particular, and too expensive," said Mike, proud to be the first producer with a part Cantinflas would play and a fee to fit.

Cantinflas is always the Cantinflas character—a lovable, debonair, double-talking underdog—and in S. J. Perelman's delirious adaptation of the Jules Verne classic it fits to perfection the part of Passepartout, valet to David Niven's Phileas Fogg, another piece of pure delight in a picture that lasts nearly 3½ hours. We for one wouldn't care if it went on for the whole 80 days.

Can't leave Cantinflas without one more thing Todd told us. Seems that in Mexico, where Cantinflas has a popularity rating equal to one here of Danny Kaye, My Fair Lady and the President rolled into one, they have to close the pawnshops for several days before one of his comedy bullfights—so many people hock their clothes to buy tickets.

Something Louella Shouer had been telling him reminded Richard Pratt of the overseas telephone call he received several years ago from Buenos Aires. The English-speaking secretary of a millionaire Argentine cattleman was on the wire. Seems her boss was in a big hurry to build the house he'd seen on a certain page of a recent JOURNAL. How could he get the plans and get in touch with the architect? It took our architectural editor only a moment to find the page in question. "The plans," he told the secretary in Buenos Aires, "you can get from the Library of Congress. The architect's name is Thomas Jefferson; but he died in 1826." The millionaire had taken a shine to Monticello.

Our curiosity is always getting the better of us around here, so when we saw a line of girls getting weighed and measured down by the beauty department, we asked Dawn Norman why, and she explained that after she and her assistant and her secretary, all different heights, wearing dress sizes from 8 to 12, suddenly discovered one day that they each weighed exactly 116½ pounds, she decided to find out what variations there were among all the girls here in the same weight group. The results, ranging from 6 to 14, made convincing answers for the readers of Dawn's reducing articles who wonder how a girl "who weighs 145 pounds can wear size 11, when I only weigh 126 and wear size 13." Dawn herself, if you've got to know, is 5'7", and wears size 8.

Different sizes and shapes, but all 116½-pounders.

ABBOT MILLS

We dropped in the other day on a friend who told us rather reproachfully, we thought, of struggling to get her mammoth April JOURNAL out of the mailbox in the lobby of her apartment house, and of the dignified gentleman who came to her assistance. "It's really a job for an obstetrician," she laughed. "Well, that's my line of work," the man announced as he deftly tugged the magazine free. "And here you are," he said, "a safe delivery."

Peter Briggs got a letter from his friend Bill Holden complaining about "the heat, bugs, leeches and boredom out here in the jungles of Ceylon," where he was making another "Bridge" movie—this, The Bridge on the River Kwai. He enclosed this snapshot of himself with his head in an elephant's mouth. "This was taken by the native who owns the elephant," Bill explained. "He wanted us both in the same picture, and this was the only way I'd look as big as his beast—the most obliging animal I ever met."

Bill Holden—
a tasty mouthful for an elephant.

Louella Shouer* thinks we should not overlook Fanny Farmer's first centennial. Her recipes were as revolutionary as they were delicious-making: giving exact measurements of time, weight, volume, temperature, instead of anybody's guess as to what constituted "butter the size of an egg, a pinch of this, a scant cupful of that, a quick oven." The answer is that Fanny Farmer's cookbook, after 50 years, is still a best seller. "Even how to hard-boil an egg properly was a matter of pride with Mrs. Farmer," Louella mused. "And when 'hard-boiled' came in as a vulgar slang word, it was almost more than she could bear."

Escape to the Mountain

By THELMA STRABEL

Her life was in danger.
But did the real peril lie in the volcano, or in the hands of the man who had sworn to love her and cherish her?

The sun couldn't be said to rise at St. Pierre. Rather, the night drew back. First it left the sea, with an effect of shimmering mauve above blue, like a sea upon a sea. Then it revealed the red-tiled roofs of the houses along the shore and polished the dark green leaves of mangoes, the yellow-green of tamarinds.

Tom pushed up the mosquito netting over his bed. The tiled floor felt cool to his feet as he stepped out to the balcony that ran across the rear of his house, facing seaward. It was a morning like any other morning—the beginning of that day in late April, 1902. The wind carried the fragrance of roses and jasmine from the neighboring walled gardens, mingled with the odor of burning charcoal in kitchen braziers. It was not yet laden with the sharp smell of fear.

Coraline was haranguing Sylvestre, his gamin, in the kitchen, and there was the scent of freshly ground coffee. Tom began to dress, listening for the cannon shot that announced the arrival of a ship. The Hampton was due from Boston, and though she wasn't a Hitchcock Company vessel, she carried cargo for them, and it was his job this morning to meet her.

Bare feet padded on the stairway from the court; Sylvestre was bringing up his coffee.

"Boujou, mussieu," Sylvestre said.

"Boujou, Sylvestre." He sat down in the rocking chair, reaching over to put sugar in the strong, black coffee. "It's a beautiful morning."

"Oui, mussieu."

Tom waited. He didn't have a newspaper with his morning coffee. He had Sylvestre.

"The people of Prêcheur," the boy began, "felt a trembling of the earth yesterday. They say it came from the mountain. They have smelled sulphur for some time, and now it is said they smell smoke."

Tom finished his coffee. So at Prêcheur they thought they smelled smoke. The word had touched that old, deep-seated memory. He supposed he would never be entirely free of it. Sometimes passing a bonfire in the fall or a partially burned-out building after a fire, he would sniff that acrid odor, and then, if only for a split second, he would remember. He would remember the day the Medora mine had exploded, and he would remember how and why his father had died.

"—— and at night," Sylvestre was saying, "he has been seen walking past the house of Miss Hitchcock and he stands there looking at it."

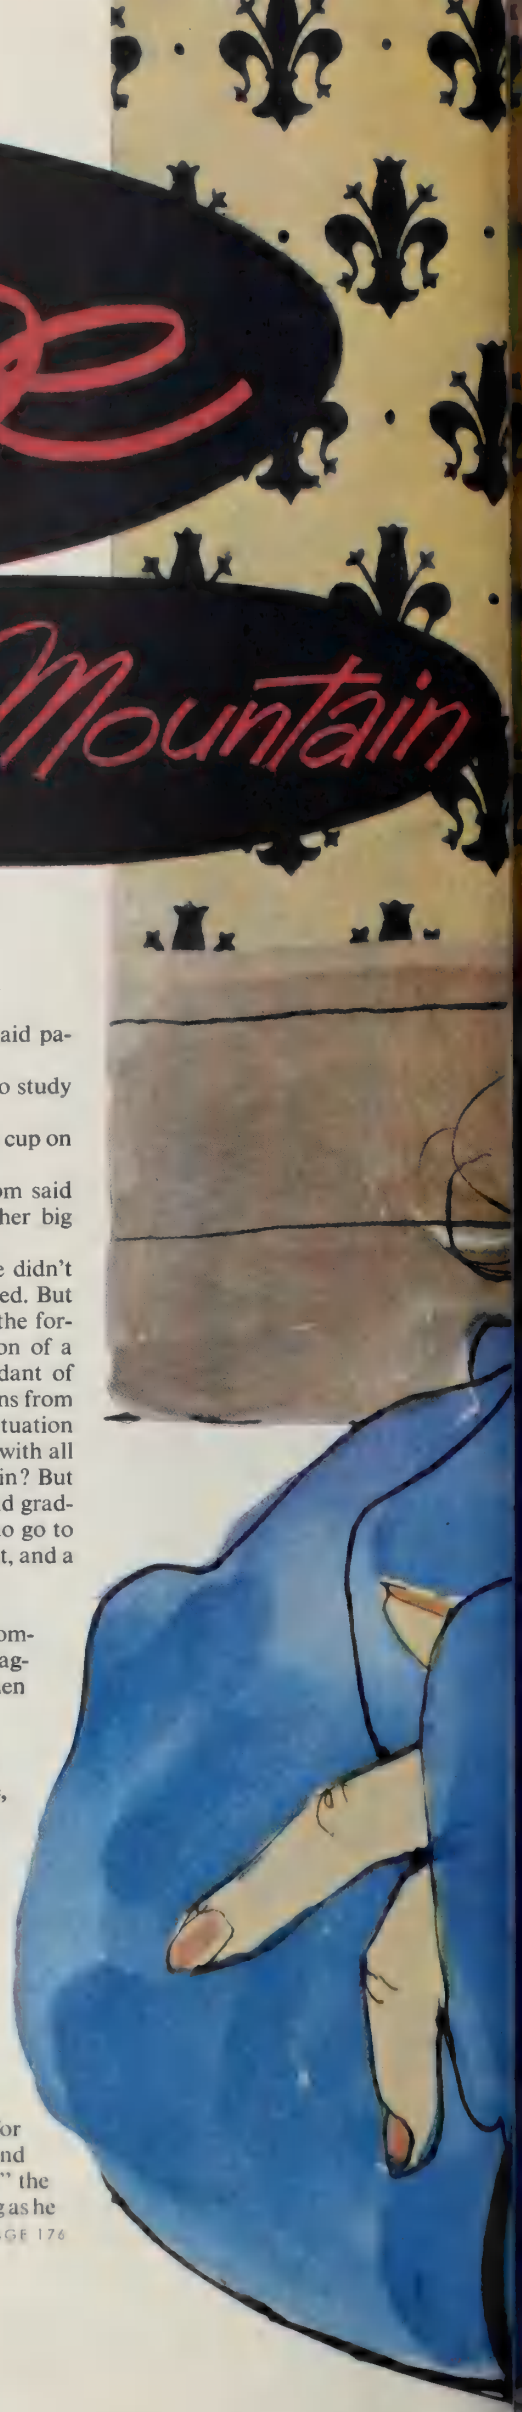
There had been a change of subject. "Who? Who looks at the house?" Tom asked the boy.

"Mussieu Khan, as I have told you," Sylvestre said patiently.

"Mussieu Khan likes to walk at night. He stops to study the stars."

"Oui, mussieu." Sylvestre placed the empty coffee cup on the tray, and just then the cannon boomed.

"Don't you go around spreading nonsense," Tom said sharply. "And don't you and Coraline have another big fight today."



He was disturbed by Sylvestre's news because he didn't doubt the truth of it. The boy was never misinformed. But André Khan and Nell Hitchcock! André, chief of the forwarding clerks at Hitchcock Company, was the son of a Chinese mother and a Mussulman father—descendant of the workers who had been imported to the plantations from India and China after the end of slavery—so the situation was impossible. And what could André see in Nell, with all her absurd affectations? The magic of her white skin? But André had his own pride, and he had dignity. He had graduated from the lycée and he was saving his money to go to Paris, to study science. Tom had always had a respect, and a genuine liking, for André Khan.

There was a throng on the dock near the customhouse. Tom found the man he usually engaged, haggled with him about the price, also as usual, and then jumped down into the pirogue.

The Hampton was at the buoy now. The larboard ladder went down, and the pirogue maneuvered under it. Tom hailed the brigadier of police, who was just mounting, and received permission to go on board. The passengers were crowded against the rail, looking toward the town, and he paused to look, too, because it was a scene of which he never grew tired: the yellow-washed, green-shuttered houses, the flowery iron balconies, the dormers breaking the red roof lines. It was beautiful and a little mad—France in the tropics. Conventional store fronts painted in vivid stripes and checkerboards, coal-black nuns, a cathedral like a piece of giant pastry.

A fleet of small canoes had reached the ship, and already the naked boys were diving for money. Tom took a coin from his pocket and held it out over the rail. "Ici, patron, ici!" the boys cried, and there was a great splashing as he tossed out the money. CONTINUED ON PAGE 176

THE JOURNALS
COMPLETE
IN ONE LIGHT
CONDENSED NOVEL

© 1931 by Thelma Strabel

Escape to the Mountain is soon to be published in book form by Harper & Brothers under the title CARIBEE

She lifted her head.
"You really think I will run away with you, don't you?"

Heat Wave

Laurie felt reckless.
She wanted to say.
"I have trouble with myself, Mike.
Real trouble."

By HOPE DAHLE JORDAN

ILLUSTRATED BY THORNTON UTZ

This was the morning she could sleep until noon. For all the good it was doing her, summer-school classes might as well have started. Here she was, alone in the house for the first time in all her eighteen years, because her parents had gone to the cottage to fish—and today turned out to be the day a construction crew came to Jarvis Avenue to do something about the chuckholes!

Laurie turned over, glared at the clock, pressed her hands against her ears. But the racket of a pneumatic hammer on concrete, the rumble of heavy trucks and the barking shouts of workers could not be wished away.

She swung long tanned legs over the side of the bed, and immediately discovered that today was full of weather.

The ruffled curtains were limp. Even as she stared they seemed to scorch in the sun. She wiped her neck with the corner of the sheet. Today was going to be one for the books.

In the bathroom she trickled cold water over her wrists, and while she prepared her life stream for the scorcher she studied the face in the mirror. She knew at once this was one of the mornings when she could not bear the sight of Laurie Bemis. And it wasn't the heat, because scads of cold days she had come to the same conclusion.

Take red hair. You take it, she thought bleakly. The green-yellow eyes? Not bad—but a mouth too large. If only I had some personality! For a moment, as longing welled, she closed her eyes. She had never had a date with anyone she wanted to date. It was the leftovers who asked her, a leftover. Mom preached, "Relax, Laurie. Be yourself, and they'll like you." Which was fine—in theory.

In the kitchen she got out a pan for some eggs, and glory be, already she was dripping. She'd bet the humidity was 110 per cent. She carried her breakfast tray to the side porch, and here she stuck to the chair. She sat with her arms hanging limp. Then she said aloud, "In this mood, I'll stand at the front window—and hate."

Look at the dust! The men were working barebacked, like primitives. As much as possible, they clung to the shade of the big elms. Laurie, about to become an art major in college, half closed her eyes and tried to envision an oil painting. . . . Progress, or maybe Civilization—or better, Summer.

On the far side of Jarvis Avenue in the full sun, directing traffic with a red rag tied on a stick, stood the youngest of the crew. In her oil painting he would be the focal point of ——

Suddenly Laurie gasped. She knew who that fellow was. Biting her lip, she stared more closely at the cropped black hair, at the big shoulders in the white T shirt with faded college insigne. He was lank and lean. His knees seemed to sag in the denim trousers and he kept shifting sneakered feet as though the pavement felt hot right through the rubber soles. Still, he smiled when he lifted his red flag against the northbound traffic. Quite cock-of-the-walk, he bowed from the waist to one particular gleaming car—probably friends. Construction, if you could get it, was the job for the college men home on vacation.

Laurie's skin prickled. Mike Alan (that was his name!) brought back the high-school days she was working to forget. He had been part of a closed gay crowd; they were polite, but made outsiders feel little, invisible—did they really see you?

Mike Alan had been Most Likely to Succeed. Laurie Bemis had been Still Waters Run Deep.

Fascinated, she watched him swelter. Under her breath she scolded if he jammed traffic in favor of the heavy dump trucks. As the morning exploded into full heat a pity grew in her for the sweaty, good-natured young man in the sun. Why didn't the others give Mike a chance to slosh at the hydrant?

She looked at her own cold lemonade. Why not take him a tall, ice-clinking glass? It would be a nice neighborly thing to do. She probably would bungle; still, she was powerfully tempted.

I could say to him, she planned, an almost fierce expression on her pretty face, that I've been trying to place him all morning and now I remember that we both were in Mr. Mercer's history class at Lincoln High—and —— A glazed expression came into her eyes; yet something impelled her to go to the kitchen. "I—I just happened to notice you there in the sun as I happened to fix myself a cool drink. 'N' as one alumnus to another ——"

Her mouth dry, Laurie walked across the lawn and stepped down the curb. Evidently thinking she was a jaywalker, Mike Alan grinned mechanically as he raised his red flag. Laurie's heart raced, and little dots of moisture sprinkled her upper lip. Never before had she been close to him, full front; she hadn't realized how tall he was. His eyes were the color of strong coffee, and through his soaking T shirt she could see his black-haired chest.

"I—I ——" She hated herself for coming. "I ——" The speech—how did it start? She blurted, "Lemonade," and, thrusting the glass at him, sloshed some awkwardly on his arm. She'd have liked to die.

Turning on her heels, she raced back to the house and slammed the front door. Darn,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 117

Closing her eyes,
she leaned back against the tree and, oddly, it was not at all difficult to say,
"Did I hear you mention a movie
tonight?"

End of

"I don't know who you are," she thought,
"or why you've stopped he or how you know my name, but I could listen to you all day lo ne Road

She loved a good story and he told her one. There are times when even a sensible woman is susceptible to a good storyteller.

By PAUL M. FITZSIMMONS

High up in Maine there's a road where pine cones and sea shells can be found together. It's a road that lazes along indifferent to the route markers that poke up admonitory fingers now and then, scornful of signposts; and, as though pleased to have company, slows to an amble at the sound of brooks running beside it. Sea breezes and the crash of surf do seem to quicken it for a hundred yards or so past landmarks like Bunting Light, Leadsman's Cove and Preparatory Point. But through the towns of Port Haven, Ponkapoog, Quemasset and Seaview, the road has been known to settle down for days.

Folks from out of the county have been told time and time again there is no sense in swearing at a road like that. It has taken too many breaths of balsam, too many whiffs of hay wagons, too many drafts of other worlds blown in with the salt air.

Many who have traveled it never got where they were going. But, like the road, some of them weren't going anywhere anyway.

In the late afternoon of an early autumn day John McHugh came up the road fourteen miles from Quemasset. Nothing about his posture or his step suggested how far he had walked. His back was still erect, his motions rhythmic. The canvas carryall gripped in his right hand swung a little forward, then a little back, in alternation to his strong-legged strides.

From the porch of a great house on a rise of land a quarter mile away a woman sat watching him. She had first seen him on the long curve just below the wood line. He passed from view with soldierly steps and reappeared five minutes later at the foot of the rise in the same effortless advance. The same easy swing of arms, the same lean flexure of legs.

Now where can he be headed for? the woman wondered. There's not another house between here and Seaview and that's twelve miles away.

She stopped rocking, set her sewing aside.

As he came nearer she could judge his height. About 5′9″ or 5′10″. His build, sturdy. She could make out his clothes, which were denim, and she could almost distinguish the checker of his ridiculous cap. It was a plaid cap. Orange and —— No, yellow and —— Goodness, it was orange and yellow and green.

Odd for a man his age. About her own. Not a fisherman; they dressed soberly. Not a woodsman, without boots. Perhaps a field hand headed for the potato counties. She would soon know. He was coming toward the house.

She regarded him gravely. Lean and level-eyed, he approached more leisurely now. His keen looks came from an unwrinkled face and his voice was vigorous and young as he saluted with his colorful cap and spoke up clearly.

"Mrs. Honeycutt?" He knew her name.

"Yes."

"Good afternoon, ma'am," he said earnestly, not breathing hard at all. "My name is John McHugh."

"How do you do, sir," she replied, aware of his sweaty brow. "Won't you come up and sit down?"

"Thank you." He smiled. White, white teeth. "I certainly will."

He came up on the porch, set the carryall aside and drew up a chair.

Who can he be? she wondered. An agent about the house? About the land? Not in those clothes. A buyer from downstate? Not in that cap. Not a Maine man at all, she decided. Perhaps a seaman or a former ship's officer who had known her late husband.

He spoke. What a cheery voice.

"I feel good," he said. "I've had a fine walk."

He seemed pleased with himself. Wanting to laugh, she smiled.

"Fine and long," she suggested. "From Quemasset?"

"No," he replied. "From Boston."

He couldn't be serious. "From Boston? Walking?"

"Oh, yes," he insisted. "All the way. I made good time, too, till I hit that road out there. What road is that, anyway? Does it have a name?"

"We call it the shore road," she told him. "It's really a state route till it gets to the Canadian border."

"Well, the way it's been going for me," he said, "I don't think it ever gets there."

Wanting to laugh, she laughed. "Why do you feel that way?" she asked, still smiling.

"Well," he began, "it's a long story. I got to Bangor late on the first of September walking just the way I walked up here. I stayed over a night and a day and left early on the third figuring, as I do, on thirty-five miles a day till I hit the border. A few miles north of Bangor I left the U.S. highway and took this road. I took it because it seemed made for walking and because I wanted to have the sea at my side to look at. To listen to. Well, pretty soon I had the sea on my right and the country on my left and I was listening and looking and hardly walking at all.

"I came to a place then called Port Haven. Just a little harbor almost blocked up with boats. Well, I tell you I just stood on the jetty there, and looked at those boats all day long. I hadn't been offshore since I did a hitch in the Navy a long long time ago and all of a sudden the sight of those decks and sails and the noise of gulls and engines leaving me behind made me feel stranded. Like a castaway, or like a sailor who's missed his ship.

"Early next morning I just couldn't leave. I hung around the sea wall till an old fellow came up and asked me if I knew a hawser from a handrail. I said 'Yes' and that I also knew a handrail from a hatch cover and he said 'Come on.' Mrs. Honeycutt, I went out and in on his lobster boat for three weeks. I don't know who got the last nibble in, but me and the lobsters both had mighty fine eating."

The widowed Mrs. Honeycutt wore the pleasantest expression. She loved a good yarn.

"Well," McHugh continued, "I got on the road again and came to a place called Ponkapoog. It's only seventeen miles or so from Port Haven, but it took me from six in the morning till four in the afternoon to walk it. I'll tell you why. About four or five miles from Ponkapoog the road cuts into the country a ways on account of a lot of marshes near the shore. First thing I knew I was passing right through a rainbow. Through gold, russet, silver, crimson,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

ILLUSTRATED BY HADDON SUNDBLOM

Love's old Sweet song

Mitsi's past was a secret— to all but one person.

By DOROTHY BLACK

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT C. HARRIS

Mitsi was naturally of a cheerful nature, and one who managed to get on somehow or other, but she always got depressed when she had to go to the police. It wasn't that they bullied her, or anything. They could not have been kinder. After all those years of regular visits they had come to know her quite well. The one with the walrus mustache was always very bright and matey and tried to lighten the situation by cracking a joke about her punctual calls. "Well, well, well. Here we are again." Then he would hand her a nice cup of tea which she obediently drank, and a small biscuit. The tea tasted of ink and the biscuit looked like a medal torn from someone's chest.

It was the questions they asked Mitsi year after year that got her down. The same old questions, the same old answers, bringing back only too clearly so much she preferred to forget. "You are a widow?" "Yes, I am still a widow." "You have children?" "Yes, I have one child but I do not know where she is. For many years I have not seen her. When the troubles came she was taken away by her grandmother to safety. I do not know if she is alive or dead." "You have a work permit?" "Yes, I have a work permit." "Then please to sign here." . . .

"Merely formality, you know," said the policeman with the walrus mustache, and he could not have been kinder. He all but winked at her (in quite a nice way). She sensed he was sorry for her, but what could he do?

Still, it depressed her.

She went back into the gray London street feeling low. The only bright spot was that the tedious visit was over for a little while, though it kept on coming round again, like Christmas, much faster than you expected.

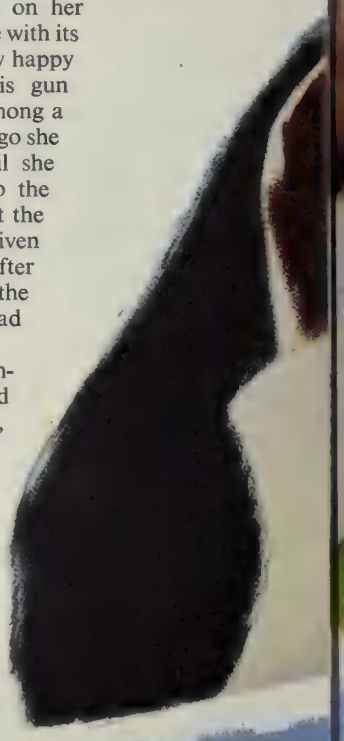
Mitsi walked home the long way round, across the park to feel the grass under her feet, and forget for a while the pavements and the gray streets. There were children in the park, and she liked to watch them. Plump well-dressed children, owners of expensive mechanical equipment in the shape of toy motorcars, scooters, steam engines and most elaborate dolls' prams. Sometimes she tried to pretend for a moment she was back in Hungary, and the little girl with golden curls flying, running toward her on her stout legs, was Miklot. But Miklot (even if she were alive) would no longer have flying curls, and probably no longer stout legs, for she would be nearly seventeen. She would pass me by in the street, and I would not know her, thought Mitsi. Something best not dwelt on.

Better to count one's blessings and not tot up one's losses. Though sometimes it seems winter will last forever, one day the snowdrops appear. Compared with some of her compatriots, Mitsi was fortunate. She had got a work permit. She worked in the Parkinsons' London house, as cook, and had a nice bedroom and a sitting room to herself, and a daily woman came in to do the housework. Mitsi really liked to cook so there was no hardship there. She turned out some gorgeous dishes, watched by a large tomcat that had his own special back door cut out of the kitchen entrance, and led his own life his own way.

It had been a good thing she had learned to cook. It made all the difference to her chance of getting a work permit in England, where people either can't or won't do it.

The autumn leaves were turning a shabby gold—not the flaming scarlet they did in Hungary all about the large white turreted house where once, long ago, Mitsi had lived. Now when she thought of it, it had taken on the half-unreal air of a remembered dream. Mitsi did not care for the English autumn. In her shabby brown coat and skirt, inherited from Mrs. Parkinson, who was not quite the same shape, she felt like a fallen leaf herself, a leaf blown round the world on gusts of national emotion, and bound to end up on some bonfire or other.

She stopped for a moment beside the Round Pond, to watch the children sailing their expensive model boats all among the ridiculous ducks that did not care one way or the other, a tall thin woman with thick hair prematurely streaked with gray, nothing left of her former beauty except her eyes. Gray-blue eyes, arresting and startlingly bright, surrounded by thick black lashes. Men still looked at her—and children were always attracted by her. A little boy with apple cheeks looked at her two or three times now and said shyly, charmingly:



"Would you like a go with my boat?"

So she had a go, and then kissed him quickly and thanked him. The children here in England were friendly because no sour experience had taught them not to be. As yet. She hurried now, for she had the dinner to see to. The lamps were already pricking out in area windows, the tomcat was waiting for her, looking supercilious and smelling of kipper.

As she often did, to cheer herself up after the dingy visit to the police station, she took a look at her pictures on her dressing table. The big white house with its turrets and red roof, surrounded by happy woods. Ference, her husband, his gun under his arm, standing proudly among a morning's slaughter of bears. Long ago she had been sorry for the bears, until she realized the harm they did. Next to the shooting picture was a group taken at the Christmas party that had always been given to the servants and estate workers, after the dancing and the distribution of the presents. How little any of them had thought what lay ahead.

The row of friendly faces smiled comfortingly back at her. Zusanaa, who had taught her how to cook. Maria and Roza, pretty as

CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

So engrossed were they with each other that neither heard the kitchen door open.

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Gathered for a quiet evening between busy comings and goings: Tony and Cyd, high-schooler Nicky, and little Tony.

TONY MARTIN

and CYD CHARISSE

Young Hollywood at home

Far Eastern motifs glimmer in white, black, gold and scarlets of living room. To right of entry hall is kitchen. To left are sleeping rooms.

Singer Tony Martin and dancer-actress Cyd Charisse work and play in a hilltop home overlooking sea with sons Nicky and Tony, Jr.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND and EILEEN SHARPE

HAROLD FOWLER

Windowed walls of living area lead to a large, secluded patio (free-form pool is at right, not shown here). Louvered shutter seen in foreground is part of a sliding wall that can close off one space from another. Shutters are usually left, as here, swung open. "Our greenery outdoors is beginning to come up," Cyd says, "to cool this side of the house."

Electronically drawn draperies in master bedroom open at touch of button. Boys' rooms are nearby, each with a play yard. Small Tony uses his to experiment with trains, a puppet theater. Nicky entertains friends with a portable barbecue. More often, whole family gathers around patio and bathhouses at the pool.

Cyd Charisse gets an hour for lunch—no more, and often less. "I suppose everybody who works on a tight schedule needs most of all to relax at night." The new Martin-Charisse home was planned for relaxing on a gracious scale. Tony Martin meets singing engagements all over the country with hotel stays at every stop, "and so a home has to answer for everything you miss on a road tour." The Martin home was planned for that.

Finishing slightly over a year ago, they built into it all the elements that draw a working couple appreciatively back to a fireside. Even Nicky, fourteen, and Tony, Jr., six, now have sizable private rooms where every hobby, book, toy and game has settled in to stay.

"In a way," says Cyd, "the home was planned around four people with ideas of their own." The rate at which her sons are growing continually startles her. Nicky, in high school now, is sociable but likes to disappear behind his own closed doors for long thoughts, homework, phone calls or short-wave-radio tinkering—uninterrupted. Young Tony (Cyd calls him "Little T"—his father is "Big T") put his foot down a while ago by announcing he wasn't a baby any more and didn't want a nurse, so the white-uniformed woman who cared for him gave way to a "companion" who lives at the house while his parents are at work.

At evening, over weekends, the favorite family hobby is a foursome gathering. Natural gravitating spots are the big living room CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

At evening, draperies close area. Dining room with glass-topped table adjoins kitchen through serving door in background. Party dinner menu: clear soup, trout in wine sauce, roast, vegetables, dessert, demitasse. A white dining nook in kitchen serves for breakfasts, snacks and Little T's evening meal before early bedtime.

Childbirth without Fear and without Pain

By DR. GRANTLY DICK READ

When we were moving last year, it was necessary for me to go through a great many papers and letters, to decide which could be accommodated in my small study and which would have to be put away in storage. Some of these papers always bring me pain because they are associated with unhappy times. Others give me great happiness. These are the letters from all over the world telling me of the joy natural childbirth has brought into women's lives.

Natural childbirth is such a simple thing in its essence that its reality as a technique has often been suspect. It has been said, for instance, by some of its critics that natural childbirth is just a new name for an old, an age-old event. In fact, this definition is not very far from truth. Natural childbirth is age-old, but civilized woman in many parts of the world has almost lost the ability, unless it is taught her once more, to perform without pain and difficulty the most important physiological function in her life.

Natural childbirth means exactly what the two words say—giving birth naturally, as God intended, without real pain.

The mother's labor is shortened, and it is extremely unlikely that she will even require any gynecological surgical treatment if she has borne her children in a properly conducted natural way.

If she wishes, she can have her husband with her during her baby's birth. After her baby has been born she feels, not weary and depressed but physically and mentally exhilarated, as exhilarated as an athlete who needs rest after a well-won race, but whose heart beats high with the thrill of having put behind his physical endeavor all the assistance of his natural powers. It means that mothers have healthier, happier babies, and that as a result of allowing all these events to flow naturally, without interference, they are happier and healthier mothers and wives, able to bring greater harmony into the intimacy of family life.

"I have never seen anything lovelier or more likely to establish the emotional security of married life than that look which is exchanged between husband and wife when each has just seen their baby born."

Here are a woman's own words, written to me in 1937:

"I look back upon the moments of the births of my children as the most wonderful and complete experiences of happiness. Something never to be forgotten and to be treasured my whole life through—comparable only to the happiness of my wedding day. I would not have missed hearing my baby's first cry for anything in the world.

"The teaching gave me great confidence. I found it all most interesting and owing to the teaching it seemed to me to be all so simple and straightforward—nothing to be afraid of. I didn't in any way want an anesthetic and would not have had one at any price, although it was there to be used if I felt I needed it. It is quite unthinkable to me to be unconscious at such a moment."

"Civilized woman in many parts of the world has almost lost the ability, unless it is taught her once more, to perform without pain and difficulty the most important physiological function in her life."

Of course, natural childbirth principles will not override the difficulties that can sometimes arise because of physical or emotional troubles. But I have many times seen natural childbirth successfully overcome difficulties. I have heard, also, of cases where natural childbirth was achieved although a doctor or midwife had thought it unlikely at first because of unusual circumstances.

One young woman who came to me in Johannesburg in the early 1950's interested me very much. Her case was exceptional, presenting additional responsibilities which I saw as a challenge.

I don't think this particular patient came to me with any idea of wishing only for a natural birth, but she had heard of the results we were obtaining, and there were reasons why she felt she needed to be especially well looked after. As I talked to her I could see that she believed instinctively that natural childbirth is right; that it ought to be a healthy woman's normal physiological function to produce her babies without artificial obstetric aids such as anesthesia and forceps, unless complications occur.

She seemed a highly strung person, a Germanic type in her early thirties, fair-haired and pleasant, well dressed, and clearly the type of woman who takes a good deal of pride in her appearance.

When I examined her she appeared to be a healthy, contented, young married woman, carrying her baby well. But looking into her eyes, I could see that she had been through some tragic personal experience.

When there are hidden scars on a woman's mind, or hidden weaknesses in her body, she needs additional care, for these weaknesses can become troublesome when she is giving birth to her child. That is why an obstetrician must always become as familiar as possible with the emotional as well as the physical and clinical background of an expectant woman.

So I went on chatting to my visitor, setting myself to put her at ease completely so that I could learn more about her past.

"Yes, it is true that you ought to be able to have your baby in this way," I assured her. "But there is one thing I must ask you to believe. When they first hear about natural childbirth, many women make the mistake of thinking it easy. It is easy to understand, but it takes perseverance and serious application to acquire the correct approach and technique. Natural childbirth is not something you will achieve just by wanting it to come true."

My patient assured me she would undertake everything I wanted her to do, to the best of her ability. But I was still concerned about that look in her eyes.

From his own casebook, here are stories of women patients whose "happy deliveries" lead Dr. Read to predict, "It is my belief that within the next five decades women will find childbirth under normal circumstances as free from difficulty as it was intended to be."

SUZANNE SZASZ

Gradually while we were talking my visitor relaxed and began to tell me about herself. There was Jewish blood in her German origin, and during the war she had been incarcerated in one of the brutal concentration camps.

In the five or six years since leaving Germany she had married a young Union of South Africa man, and, with his help, made herself again into a reasonably healthy and happy woman. But she was worried about her ability to have her child. Understanding all that her history implied, I felt anxious myself.

Because of this patient's background, we were especially careful and considerate of her during her antenatal training. As she promised, this young woman accepted very seriously the responsibilities of her preparation, the exercises that would loosen her pelvic joints and mobilize her spine, and tone the particular muscles she would be putting into use.

She learned to breathe and to relax in the right manner for natural childbirth. When she came into hospital ready for her delivery, according to the procedure always adopted with any woman under my care, she had one of the labor-ward staff nurses with her all the time.

"Many of the chronic neurotic states in women arise from the bad effects of unhappy birth on sex life."

During her baby's birth she responded exactly to what was required of her at the right moments. She felt nothing, she assured me, that she would call pain; only the temporary discomforts I had warned her to expect at certain stages.

Toward the end of the expulsive stage of her labor she seemed to tire. This I had half expected because of her earlier depleting experiences. There was a delay in getting the baby's head through the lower part of the birth canal and the baby, I knew, would not be enjoying it. This was the only time I had to intervene, and the help I gave the mother she accepted without any difficulty at all.

My patient was fully conscious at the moment her child gave its first cry. For years I have delivered all my mothers in the second stage of labor so that they are lying on their back, supported by pillows raised at an angle of forty-five degrees, and with their knees raised and bent.

This is the posture of squatting used in childbirth among most primitive and Oriental races, and it is far more satisfactory for both the woman and her attendants than a side position.

"Natural childbirth is not something you can achieve just by wanting it to come true."

Early in my obstetric experience, too, I began to rotate the baby after its head crowned. I turned the pointed shoulder of the child at the outlet of the birth canal, so that the point of the shoulder was not central at the outlet, thus helping to eliminate the risk of injury.

This rotation also makes it possible for the mother, raised on her pillows, to look down into her baby's face at the time of its birth. And so this patient, leaning slightly forward, was able to look down with an expression of absolute amazement and delight at her very much alive baby.

While the navel cord was still pulsating and attached to the placenta, I placed the child's tiny fingers in its mother's, and at that moment of thrilling contact with her newborn child, that look of exquisite joy I can only describe as a link with the Divine completely illumined this young woman's features.

For those few moments all expression of her tragic experiences was completely removed from her eyes.

I always wait for the navel cord completely to cease pulsation before I cut it on the anemic spot. This is a spot on the cord where it pales and first ceases to pulsate. When this was done I wiped the mucus from the baby's nose and face and wrapped it in a warm towel and placed the crying child in its mother's eager arms.

I have never yet heard a wailing, screaming child go on screaming when a mother takes it and holds it to herself immediately after birth.

The baby quieted its crying and the mother's eyes filled with happy tears. Soon the placenta came away. And when the mother was tucked up, her baby in a crib beside her bed, I went in to say good-by.

"Oh, doctor, how can I ever thank you enough?" she whispered.

I was very grateful myself that the whole thing had gone so well, but I was not the one whom she ought to thank. "Do not thank me," I said gently. "Have you forgotten your German poet, Goethe, who believed in the perfection of the God of Nature, and all His works? It is your God of Nature you must thank. It is He who has given you the ability to have your baby in this way."

This mother had a second child in the natural manner under the care of the young doctor who practiced with me in the Union.

A great part of my boyhood was spent in very happy circumstances on a beautiful Norfolk farm. We had a wonderful childhood and those perfect summers I can recall without any effort. My brothers and sisters, out-of-doors, were interested chiefly in sport. But it was the exploration of the marshes, woods, fields and inlets of the Broads that held me fascinated.

I knew the haunts of butterflies. I would lie on my back among the cotton plants with a chemical substance smeared on my chest to attract these pretty creatures to me. Scarcely breathing lest they be disturbed, I watched them alight and then feasted my eyes on the beauties of their colorings and form.

I spent long hours sailing our small boat, skimming over weeds, clear deep

CONTINUED ON PAGE 138

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NON-FICTION BOOK

© 1957 by Grantly Dick Read

IV At the office Tuesday morning there was an unopened cablegram addressed to Lowry on his desk. It was from Daran, announcing his arrival that day, saying he would telephone from the Waldorf. Miss Marshall gave him the report from the Friday meeting which the stenographic room had produced over the weekend. Lowry read it carefully and decided then was as good a time as any to see the president. He went in with a cheery good morning. As usual, Cramer's smiling affability and the quiet tone of his voice were half disarming. Lowry handed him the report and said what it was.

"Oh, I am very glad to have it," Cramer said. He glanced through it quickly with the seeing eye of the experienced reader. "I can see there's a good deal in it we'll need to talk about. I hope John was of some help to you in preparing it."

"I don't believe he knows about it yet."

"You didn't ask him to sit in on it?"

"No."

"Well," Cramer said with a new smile, "I don't want to start off this fine morning with any discussion, but I think it would have been the nice thing to have asked him. But we won't go into that now. What can I do for you?"

"I have a cable that Daran arrives today and I thought you'd like to know."

"Oh, that's very good. I wondered if that had been forgotten in all the rush. Of course, I'll want several talks with him, particularly on that bridge which I'm determined we must get. Arrives today," he repeated. "When did you hear about this?"

"I got a personal cable from him."

"Where can I reach him?"

"At the Waldorf."

Cramer put both hands flat on the desk. "The Waldorf?" He wagged his head. "Well, I won't say I'm astonished, but I am going to ask, friend Lowry, whether you aren't letting your departme it in for a good deal of expense. I think I'd just reconsider the Waldorf. I wouldn't dream of staying there. Of course, you may be thinking of all that we owe Doran ——"

"Daran. You see, Mr. Daran has made this trip for private reasons at his own expense. I'm not in a position to tell him what hotel to go to."

"That's different. You most certainly and very definitely cannot tell him. Anything else? Anything holding you up or bothering you?"

"Not at the moment," Lowry said and went out, confident that he left Cramer more puzzled than he himself was. Though this was personally gratifying, he knew it was not the way to run a business. Or rather it was a way if Cramer's objective was to provoke Calvin Hewitt and him into resigning.

The thing seemed to go deeper than petty and capricious interference. It might be a shrewd device which would allow him later to say to Delano, "I really thought the world of Lowry. You remember I spoke of it, but he's going around with a chip on his shoulder, unco-operative. Of course, he may not be a well man." If Cramer wanted new officers, of his own selecting, this might be the way to achieve it.

Halleck appeared as Lowry sat down at his desk. It was plain the poor young man had had a bad holiday.

"I'd like to get this off my chest, Mr. Lowry," he said. "I feel badly about it but I don't see what else I could have done. We were going to Jones Beach Saturday. I was polishing the car and my wife was fixing the lunch basket when John Cramer and his father drove up. They couldn't have been nicer, thought I had done wonders with the place, and it all ended by their coming to the beach with us.

"Well, the long and the short of it is, after we ate, my wife took a nap, and we got to talking and"—Halleck drew a long breath—"I told them about the report and Mr. Cramer said, 'Well, you boys will work more closely together next time, I'm sure.' I hate to say the rest. I don't know just how it came out, but I told John Cramer I didn't tell him at the time because you didn't want me to."

© 1957 by [illegible] Swiggett

"I suppose at that point Mr. Cramer went up and got six ice-cream cones," Lowry said.

"As a matter of fact, he did just that. How'd you know?"

"It was inevitable. Well, don't feel badly about it, if you do. It's all right with me. By the way, Daran will be in today or tomorrow. How are the preliminary figures on the bridge coming?"

"We're building up as far as we can without definite specs."

"Cable this morning and ask when they can be expected. Daran will want to know."

When Halleck left, Lowry telephoned Rosalie and told her of Daran's impending arrival.

"Tell me honestly," he said. "Do you have any objection to having him and his Beatriz at the Beach Club for dinner?"

"Tell me honestly yourself, dear, do you mean because of what I may think of her, or because of what he may be thinking about me?" It was the first reference either had made to Peale's story since she had told it to him.

"It's just," he said lamely, "that I thought I ought to ask."

"I know. I'm sorry. Ask them, by all means; or I'll telephone her if you like."

"That won't be necessary."

It was three o'clock before Daran telephoned that they were settled at the Waldorf and that he was at Lowry's disposition.

"Are you both tired out?" Lowry asked.

"Not at all."

"Well, would you like to drive out to our house about five and dine with us at the Beach Club? We can have a swim before dinner."

Daran said he would be very pleased. Might he consult Beatriz? Lowry waited.

"She asks what should she wear?" Daran said.

"Any light dress and a light wrap. It may be cool there."

Daran spoke again to Beatriz. "She asks do you mean a cotton afternoon dress?"

"Precisely."

Daran lowered his voice conspiratorially. "It is not to be known at the hotel, of course, but we are not yet married owing to legal delays there would have been in France. Will your wife understand?"

"Certainly."

"Then we come with great pleasure. Thank you. Oh, you will find her face now very beautiful."

So indeed Lowry found it when he met them, and he was again impressed by the mixture of ease and piquancy in her manner. He had brought Daran a copy of the analysis of the ten days' sales.

"Your president's assistant, another Mr. Cramer, a son I gathered, telephoned after I spoke to you asking me to dinner. I put him off indefinitely until I knew your plans."

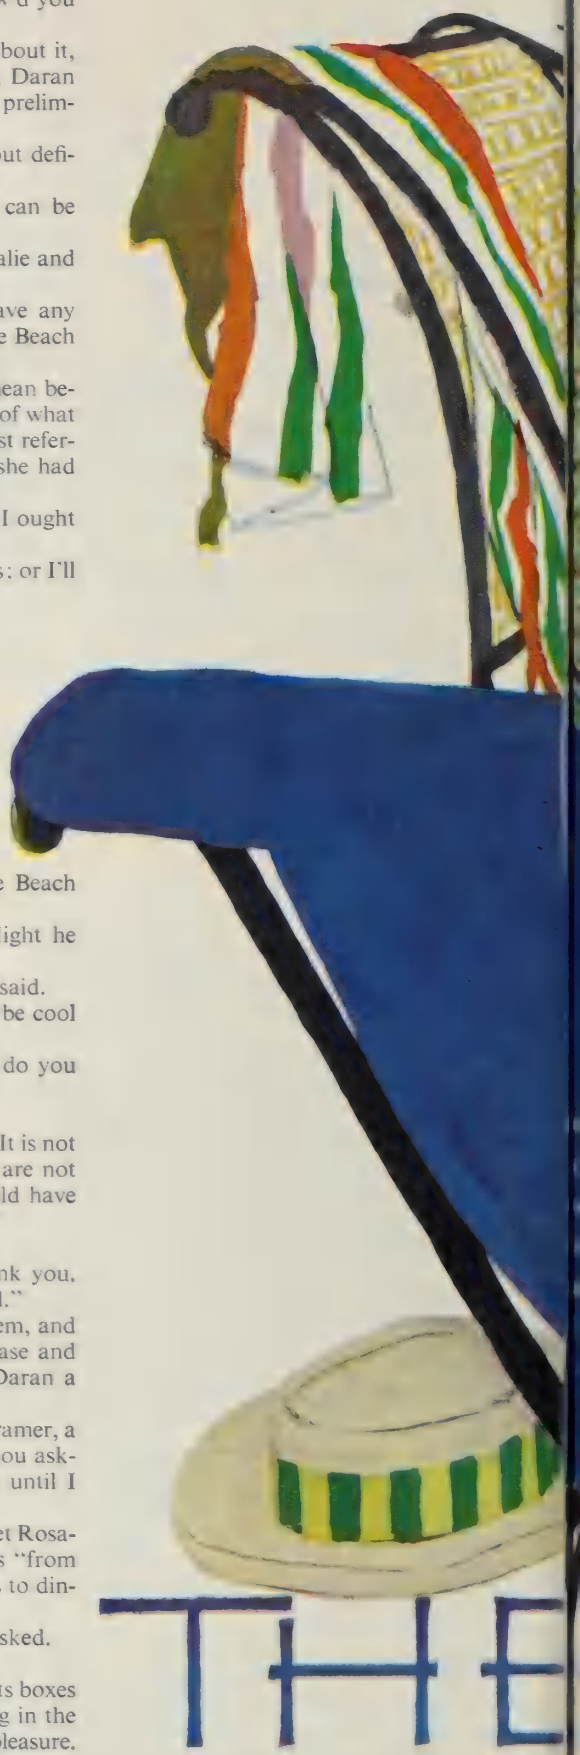
They were both very charming when they met Rosalie. Beatriz said she brought special greetings "from your brother. He was kind enough to have us to dinner at his own house."

"Did you bring a bathing suit?" Rosalie asked.

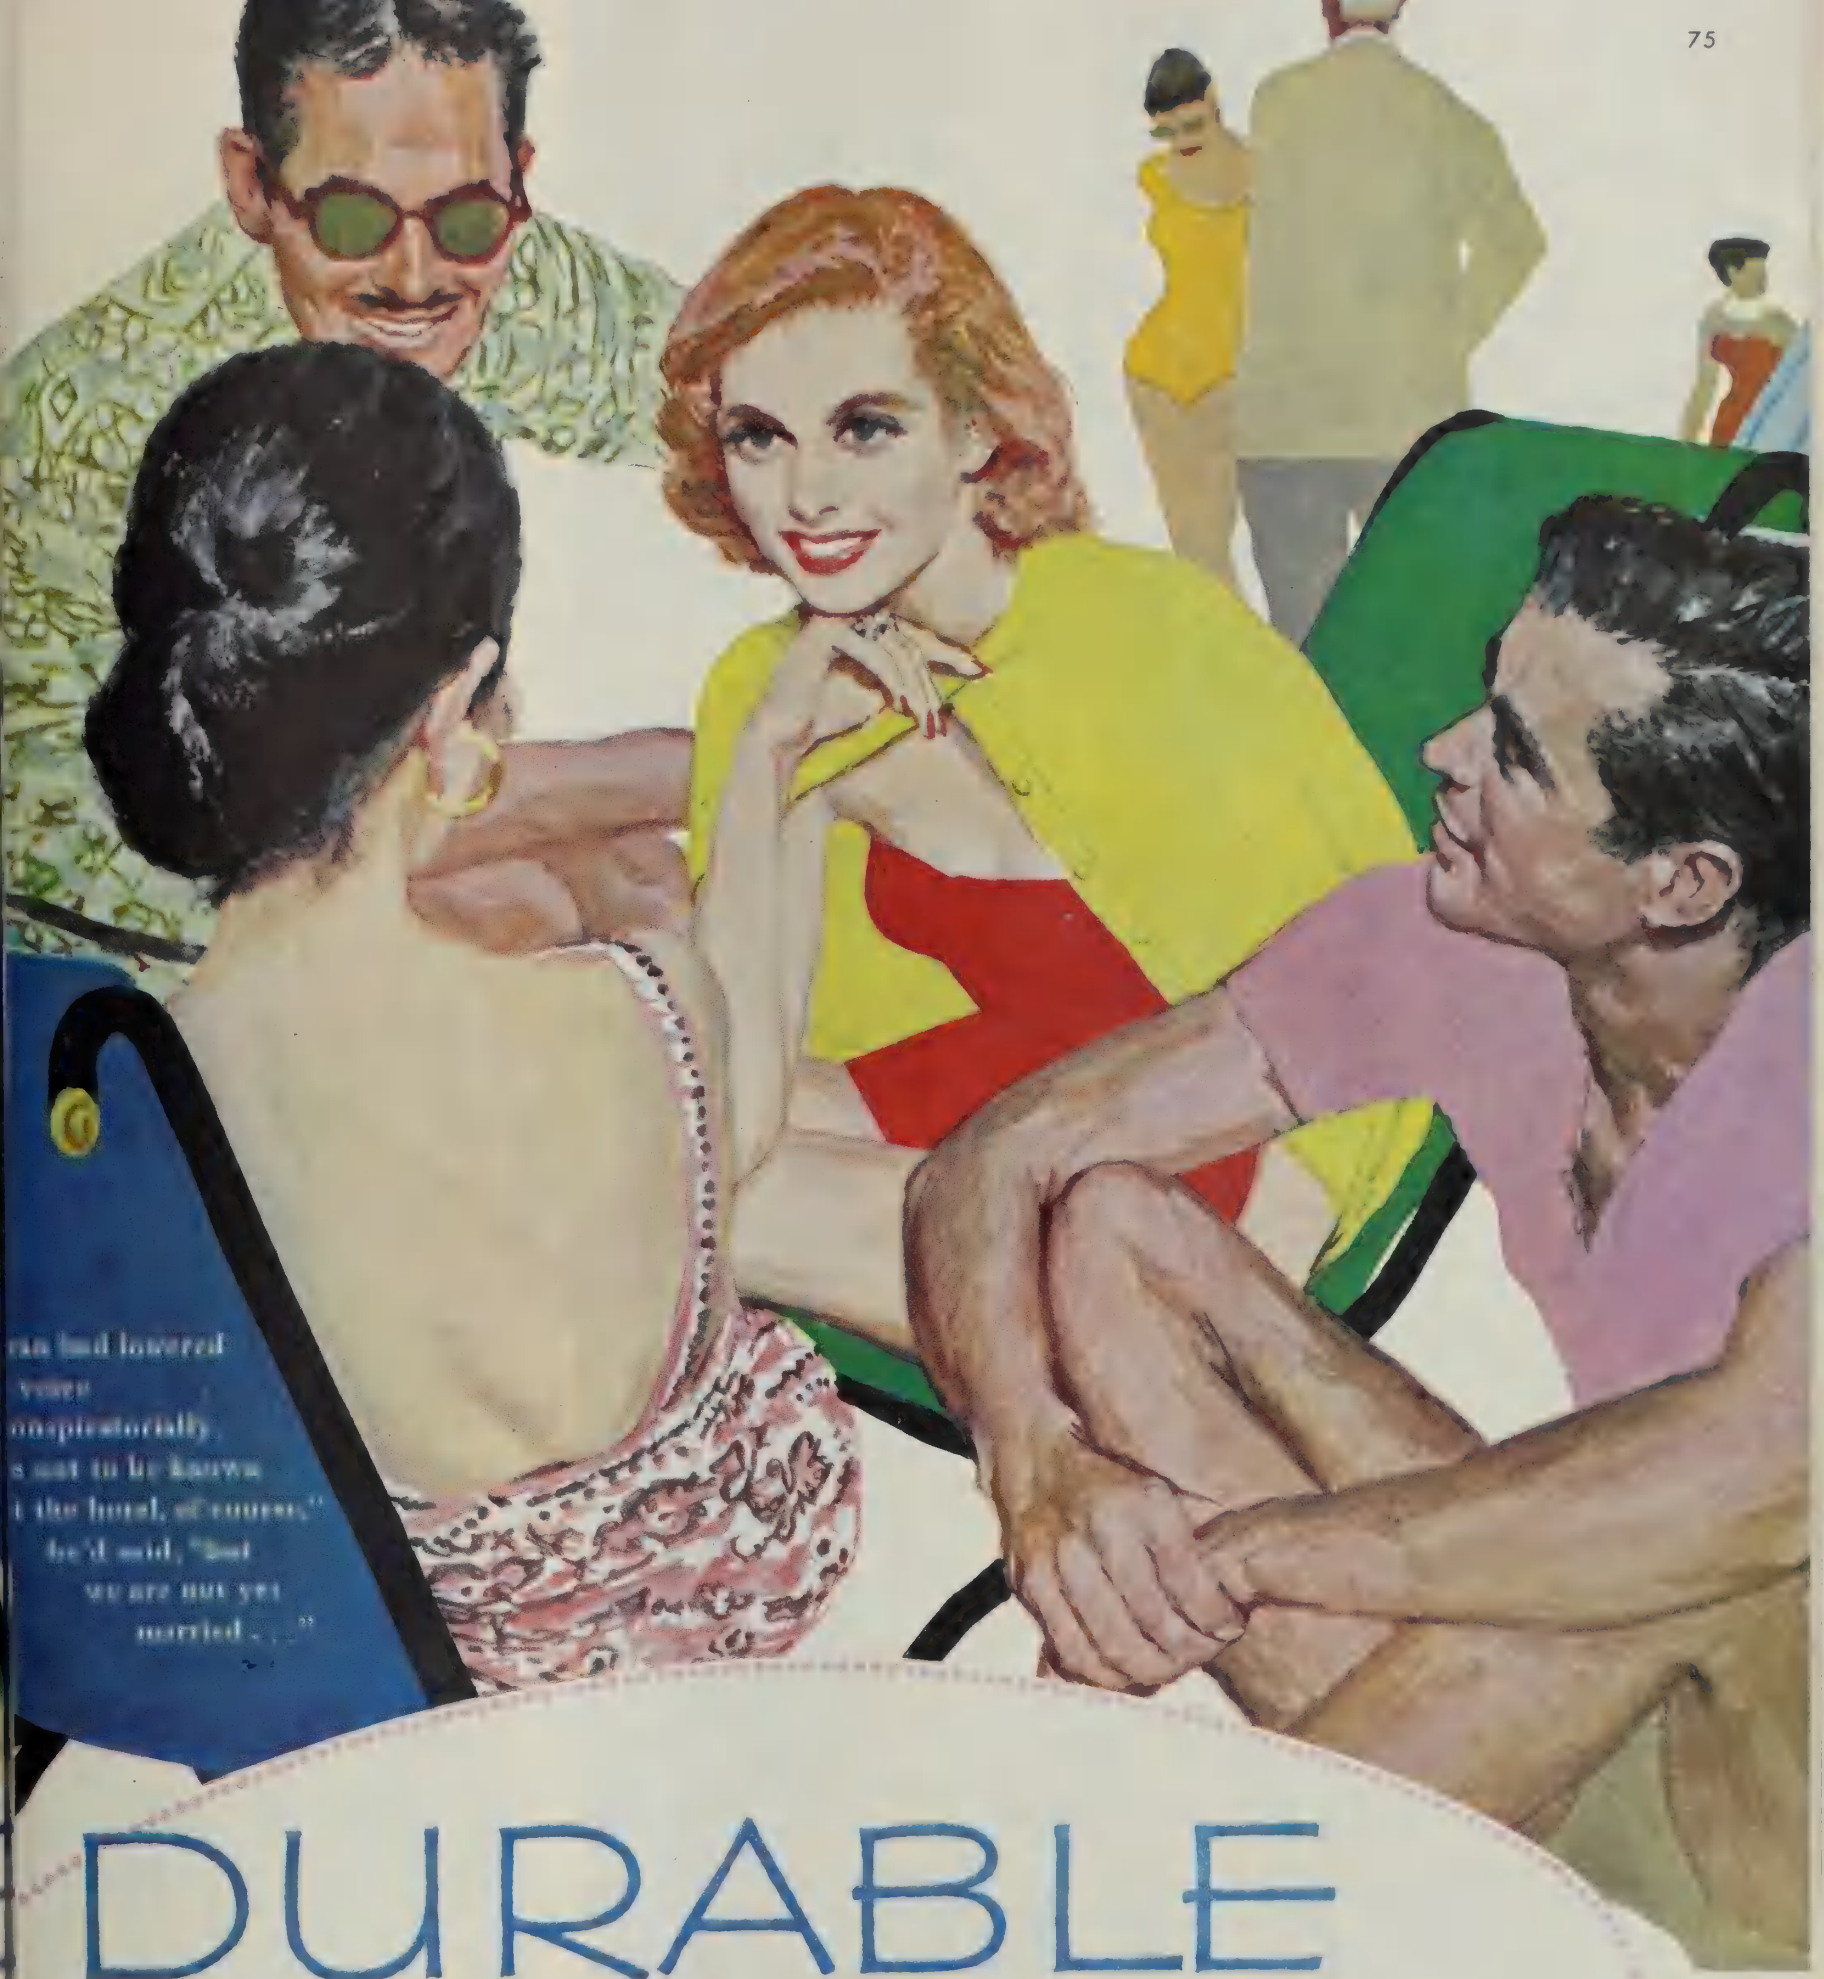
"We both did. They are in the car."

Daran viewed the Beach Club, bright with its boxes of petunias and geraniums, the pool gleaming in the late sun and the ocean rolling in, with obvious pleasure.

"I very much like luxury," he said.



The women went off together to the dressing room while the men waited.



"As I wrote you, I have said nothing of Mr. Peale to Beatriz. I should like to ask you how is he and should I see him? I'm not sure what is desirable."

"Well, he has a job. I see him occasionally and of course he's going through a very hard time."

"He wrote me, sending me a check. I really don't need it and had

CONTINUED ON PAGE 94

DURABLE FIRE

By HOWARD SWIGGETT

ILLUSTRATED BY JOE DE MERS

From Washington and New York to the coast of California, these well-known women tell us why they love their favorites.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

HAL ROTH

Mrs. Herbert Brownell, wife of the Attorney General, loves beautiful colors, has many occasions for evening clothes in Washington. She likes this chartreuse shantung-taffeta dress because "it is one of my husband's favorites, and I love to wear it." The long fringed stole in pale pink and cerise-red satin adds a touch of exciting color.

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Deborah Kerr, Mrs. Anthony Bartley, starrin
An Affair to Remember, likes this turquoise sa because it has a graceful silhouette, a pretty ba and she adds. "I love a dress that moves we

Right: Dina Merrill, who is Mrs. Stanley M. Ru bough, Jr., in private life, has had this sapph blue chiffon for more than seven years. "It is of my pets and a dress my husband likes to me wear. I often take it with me when I trav

Don't give up your Favorite Dress

Sharman Douglas, daughter of former Ambassador Lewis Douglas, likes this pale blue satin informal dinner dress because it is so wearable.

Right: Mrs. David Niven is practically indifferent to a dress until she has had a good time in it. Then it becomes a favorite. She prefers full skirts, loves this plaid paper taffeta with its slim top of blue crepe.

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Young-time

The newest sheath is tied at each side. Checked linen by Ann Fogarty. Short yellow tweed coat goes with everything.

Summer suit of rayon and cotton with a piqué collar, by Stefan, sailor hat, crocheted straw bag.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Every girl at sweet sixteen should have a white organdy with a blue sash. Gail Land, Hollywood starlet, soon to be seen in the picture Loving You, wears this one by Eloise Curtis.

clothes

Everybody is young in the summertime and everybody takes tips about clothes from the teens.

Sailcloth for boats or beaches—
a coat the color of a summer sky, worn with long, slim trousers.

Cotton bathing suit trimmed with rickrack, shirred to the figure, worn with a matching coat.

Tangy yellow and sweet lilac, as well as pink and blue, are color favorites of the young crowd. They're cultivating calico and the gingham-girl look with big puffed sleeves, eyelet organdy, printed piqué, and they know that stripes are in, pin to giant size, and candy-colored slippers in straw or kidskin.

For town, they insist on a straw sailor worn with a bright cotton suit or checked linen or a shirtwaist dress like the ones their pretty mothers wear. For dances, those cool chambrays or a white organdy with a baby-blue sash; for beach and play, sailor-collar dresses and middies, cotton knitted shorts and tops and cotton bathing suits, easy keepers, quick to dry. For that pulled-together look, they have short cotton gloves, small pearls, fresh daisies, white slippers; and a good little tweed coat, probably yellow, that goes with everything. By RUTH MARY PACKARD

Pin-striped cotton shirtwaist dress by Jerry Gilden, worn with Gobbi's sailor with three ribbon bands.

HAL REIFF

Lilac striped chambray—a princess silhouette cotton dance dress that makes pretty figures even prettier.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Coral and turquoise beads (they come in packages) used with turquoise braid trim this hand-knitted sweater, made in one piece. Instructions for knitting and trim, Journal Pattern No. 2902†.

The fashion for trimmed sweaters is young and amusing. These original ideas can be applied to any regulation cardigan, to an old sweater to make it look new or to a wool-jersey cardigan jacket. (Vogue Design No. 9221).

OH, WHAT A BEAUTIFUL SWEATER!

and I trimmed it myself...

Our Journal pattern will give you explicit directions for shortening sweaters and instructions for trim. A pretty summer fashion to wear year round.

By NORA O'LEARY Pattern Editor of the Journal

LEOMBRUNO - BODI

Lace in a scallop design makes a charming sweater front, and the bottom of the sweater is finished to follow the design of the lace—sleeves too. Journal Pattern No. 2904†. Skirt, Vogue Design No. 9210.

Colorful needlepoint—one a chair-seat design, the other a border—the needlepoint worked and ready to be appliquéd to look like part of the sweater. Pretty on either the front or the back. Both Journal Pattern No. 2903†. Wear the turquoise with Vogue Design No. 8999; the raspberry with Design No. 9210.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 114. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

†Order Journal patterns from Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. Price, 25c each. Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax. For back views, see page 115.

Black felt and white braid make an exciting contrast with this red sweater which has been shortened to waist length. Journal Pattern No. 2905†. Wear with a dress whose skirt fabric is printed in a circle and sells for $5.95, including fabric for top. Vogue Design No. 9222.

© VOGUE

Roman-striped ribbon makes the facing and collar on this sweater. The ribbing, cut from the waistline, makes two pockets. Journal Pattern No. 2906†. Skirt. Vogue Design No. 8965. Blouse. Vogue Design No. 8971.

A dressmaker version in pink cut to bolero length and trimmed with bias bands of the print from the dress. Sweater. Journal Pattern No. 2907†. Dress with wool jersey jacket. Vogue Design No. 9211.

A garden that grows on a sweater—complete with grass and butterflies. Buy the flowers in a package. Journal Pattern No. 2908†.

A very feminine sweater in a pale mauve with a lace overlay on the front with a pretty scallop edge. Journal Pattern No. 2909†. Wear over Vogue Design No. S-4798.

Wanted—women to Help

By VIRGINIA C. GILDERSLEEVE

Dean Gildersleeve

The humanitarian services of teaching, nursing, home care have been for centuries the especial province of women. Yet today these important professions face a desperate need for workers. How can that need be filled? The Dean Emeritus of Barnard College, who has spent most of her adult years in the education of women, offers a possible solution to the problem.

All my life I have been concerned with the education of women and their place in our communities and our nation. The professions have been of special interest to me, and also the national service rendered by women in time of war. During the Second World War, I played a part in the organization of the Navy WAVES.

As I now observe the greatly changed and changing pattern of our American society, I am distressed to see that many of the duties and services traditionally performed by women are not being adequately carried on, so that much avoidable human suffering results, and considerable peril to the future of our country. In the changed social and economic structure of today, the old ways of meeting these ills do not avail. Some fundamental changes must be faced, some new order established.

The following informal dialogues present in concrete form examples of the facts that alarm me (the cases are drawn from real life) and a conceivably possible solution—or if not now possible, at least a stimulus to some hard thinking and drastic effort.

"Poor old Captain Josiah Plant!" said the Skipper. "I hear his rheumatism is much worse. I'm worried about him and his wife," she added.

"Hasn't he a Coast Guard pension?" I asked.

"Yes, a tiny one, and it buys less and less each year. They're both over eighty. She's got a bad leg, can't walk; just pushes herself about a bit in a wheeled chair. They own their little house, but it's in that remote country township. They've no children, no relatives, and they're terribly proud.

"They nurse each other as well as they can, with occasional brief help from the district nurse, and most days one of them is able to cook up some food. But what's going to happen on days when neither one can get about?"

"They ought to have 'Meals on Wheels,'" said I.

"What?"

"'Meals on Wheels.' Here, look at this picture. It's a plan carried out by the British Women's Voluntary Services. A small van brings hot meals to old people like your Plants, people who love their little homes and ought not to be shut into an institution, but who really can't take much physical care of themselves any more. There are a few such programs in this country—one in Philadelphia, I know; one planned for New York; best of all, the year or more of voluntary humane service of American Mennonite Youth.

"It would be cruel to separate the Plants or tear them from their house and their church. If we could send in a home helper to clean up a bit and give them some hot food occasionally, what a lot of human suffering we'd mitigate, and what a lot of pressure on hospitals and homes for the aged we'd relieve."

"Home helpers would sure be a blessing," said the Skipper, "to young mothers with new babies and a lot of other little children to care for and cook for. Do you remember young Mrs. Elijah Brown leaving the country hospital with her wee son four days after he was born, and those five other small children of hers in the old car who greeted her with shouts of joy?"

"Yes, her doctor was worried about her. He told me it was a real problem for women like that. They can't possibly afford to pay the hospital charges for more than three or four days and so they go home to families where there's often no one to help with the housework and no kindly neighbor at hand—as in Mrs. Brown's case. 'We tell them to be sure to take it easy at first,' said the doctor, 'but how can they?'"

"I'll bet," exclaimed the Skipper, "the dishes for the whole four days were waiting in the sink for Mrs. Brown's return. And as for the dirty clothes waiting! Your home helpers would be a godsend in such cases! Why shouldn't we have a country-wide corps of them, with Meals on Wheels, too, like these nice, kindly-looking W.V.S.'s in the picture?"

"The tendency in this country," I pointed out, "is to do things of this kind locally instead of nationally. Besides, you can't find enough women to travel from house to house and undertake such humble, drudging service, even when paid for it. Helen, who's been deep in social-welfare and public-health work for years, you know, tells me some of her organizations have had the same bright idea, but they can find hardly any women, almost nobody, to do this home helping."

"What can we do, then?"

"The mothers and the babies will struggle along somehow, I suppose, and we'll shut all the crippled and aged up in institutions, or put them out on the polar ice to freeze as some Eskimos are said to do—unless some miracle produces a supply of visiting angels."

"Where," asked the Skipper a few days later, "can I find some husky young persons with two hands and two feet and a kind heart? No special brains or training required, but the hands and feet indispensable, and particularly the kind heart."

"I've no idea," said I. "They all seem so busy. What do you want them for?"

"Three of them," she replied, "I'll send right over to Marian Laing's house. I had a talk with her yesterday."

"I haven't seen her for a long time. How's her spinal arthritis?"

"Worse, especially in this winter weather, so that she's badly crippled. And she's got other ailments too. But what's giving her sleepless nights and wearing her out with worry and perplexity is how to get her aged mother cared for. The old lady is ninety-four, you know. She fell and cracked a vertebra in her spine. Now the spine is better, but she's practically bedridden and has to have nursing attention twenty-four hours a day."

"Mercy! Can't Marian put her in the hospital?"

"She was in the hospital for six weeks. Then they said she must leave. Yes, really! They said hospitals couldn't keep old people for long stays; they needed their rooms for younger patients in emergencies, who could be cured and restored to active life."

"Heavens!" said I. "What's the condition of the old lady now?"

"Excellent organically, say the doctors. She may live five years or more! But some of her bodily functions don't work quite normally, and CONTINUED ON PAGE 134

Barbara was my girl, but when Diana said "All alone, man?"
and went on smiling—
I was down for the count.

Detour in Summer

By S. W. M. HUMASON

He hadn't heard that troubles come in pairs, but he found it out—
the hard way.

Last year my dad was sick and summer was different. The cottage was the same, and the sea, and I did the same things—fooled around with Andy and his outboard, lived in bathing trunks and yachting cap, dove off the rocks at high tide, fished for scup and cunners, threw jellyfish at the girls, played a little tennis—but it was different. While I was doing all these things, sort of back of doing them was the knowledge that dad was sick. Mother spent most of her time at the hospital, which made things different, too, and when the gang came in to raid the icebox and leave wet salt all over the kitchen floor, we were quieter and even mopped up after ourselves after a fashion. Another thing that was different was that I really tried to be decent to my kid brother, Goofy, twelve, and sister, Bouncer, ten. I was fifteen.

One night when my mother had come home from the hospital and was getting supper she called me into the kitchen. The kids were still out around somewhere. She told me there was a chance my father might die. She told me very quietly, not even sitting me down and being formal about it, just telling me while she was shelling peas. I didn't say anything. I pulled up a chair and started to shell peas sort of jerkily. "We're not to give up hope," said my mother, "and we won't tell the children. But I needed to have you share it with me."

"Sure," I said. She had made me feel good in the midst of feeling as bad as I ever expected to feel in my life.

When I woke in the morning I saw it was a swell day and I wondered what was wrong with it and then I remembered. I told my mother I'd like to go to the hospital with her and she said she'd feel better if I stayed home with the kids so of course I said O.K. She'd no sooner gone than the Prescotts came by and asked my kids to go sailing with them and their kids, taking a lunch along.

So I was left alone and had nothing to do. I went to look up Andy, who had a driver's license, to see if he would borrow his mother's car and drive me to the hospital, but he wasn't home and I didn't feel like asking his mother because I thought she would put her arms around me. So I went back to our house and sat on the steps and stared at the lines of ribbon seaweed that had come in on the last tide.

This girl named Barbara Thompson came along. She was a thin girl with straight hair which was never either cut quite short or curled and was usually wet because she spent most of her time in the water. She had braces on her teeth. I wasn't interested in girls then, except to throw off the raft and heave jellyfish at and she wasn't any fun that way because she didn't scream. She heaved the jellyfish back and if you threw her off the raft she was likely to take you with her.

I said, "Hi, Barbara." She had a crabbing net over her shoulder and without even saying "Hello," she said, "You want to go crabbing in the creek?" I don't know yet what made her ask that, still less what made me say I'd go. Crabbing in the creek was strictly for the small fry. The creek is shallow and they can paddle around there at any tide. It's an idiotic sort of occupation because the crabs are too small to be any use, and the kids just collect buckets of them and throw them back again. The smaller kids race up and down pulling store-bought boats or tugboats made from old boards with empty spools for funnels. I'd spent plenty of time in the creek in days gone by, but by this time even Goofy and Bouncer had stopped going there. But just as soon as Barbara asked me that question I said "Sure" and went and got a net out of the garage. I asked Mrs. Brown, next door, if she was going to be home and she was, and I asked her if our phone rang (she's on the same party line) or my own kids came home, would she blow the whistle that she keeps to call her cat. She said she would.

Barbara and I put our nets over our shoulders and went off to the creek like a couple of eight-year-olds. I had forgotten how good the muddy clay on the bottom of the creek felt and what a cool kind of noise your feet made sloshing through the shallow water. We had the creek to ourselves. The kids are like that. One day they'll all be in the creek and the next day they'll all be playing croquet or looking for shells. I suppose I was like that, too, once. It was nice having the creek to ourselves. There were plenty of crabs and we filled the bucket and then emptied them back in the water and laughed at the way they scuttled off.

The sun was hot and the breeze off the water was strong and cool so there weren't too many mosquitoes and the air smelled fine and salty. I could see, looking across the flat marshes, our house and beyond it way out by Tuckett Island the Prescotts' boat with my kids on it. I hoped they were having fun. Andy was racing his boat up and down the shore line. He would have been surprised to know where I was. The shadow of a gull swept across our faces and on over the marshes. In a backtrack sort of way, I was happy. At least, it all seemed kind of good—the sun and the salt smell and the blue-green marsh grass and the bluer water and the little shingled houses and the bunch of sails down by the yacht club and the yells of kids playing croquet in the Merricks' yard. And it seemed good to be with Barbara Thompson. She hardly talked at all. Pretty soon I got hungry.

"Let's get some sandwiches," I said, "and the canoe, and some rods and bait, and go up by the bridge after eels."

The braces showed a lot when she grinned, but I didn't mind. We went back to my house and made the sandwiches and I got a canful of worms from the flower beds. Then I got worried for fear I wouldn't hear the whistle way up by the bridge.

"I want to know if the telephone rings," I said, "because my father ——"

"I know," she said. She had known all the time and

CONT'D ON PAGE 151

Once combed and brushed in the morning, this cool and classic arrangement can be kept in place all day with a pretty hair accessory. The headdress here is an organdy clip with a snood-veil attached. By Hattie Carnegie.

ALL SET FOR Summer

Here are eight hairdos flatteringly arranged to stay put with a minimum of fuss between settings. Hair lengths vary from the shortest (four to five inches all over the head) to the longest, which falls below the shoulders. There's the new brief "scoop" cut—the sleek upswept—the smooth, wide-waved look. Choose your favorite, and enjoy keeping a cool and pretty head all summer long!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN, Beauty Editor of the Journal

"I feel my prettiest when I wear bangs," says fashion model Joanna McCormack, who is often called upon to change her hairdo half a dozen times a day. This feminine arrangement also camouflages an irregular hairline, "hides" a too-high forehead, "cuts" a long face.

"I love it!" says model Sara Thom, who had her long hair cut very short for this new "scoop cut." "It's young and much easier to manage. A few finger curls around the face every other night keep my hair in pretty shape all week long." Sara's back hair hugs her head, needs no curling.

"With my hair short in front and long in back I can wear it a dozen different ways," says Evelyn Tripp. Here, Evelyn's shoulder-length hair is set in wide, deep waves at sides, turned under into a short pageboy in back. In the little picture, bangs are swept away in favor of a smooth brow. Evening headdress by Hattie Carnegie.

ROGER PRIGENT

"Once it's up it stays all day," says Millie Perkins. Millie's medium-length hair is brushed up in the back with the ends rolled under and pinned securely at the crown. The ribbons are for color and fun.

"My new hairdo stayed in without pin-curling for five days," Patricia Bell told us delightedly. "The side wave loosened, slightly but prettily." Pat's little ribbon bow attached to a bobby pin enables her to keep waves in place.

A pretty way to make long hair behave this summer. Our model's almost shoulder-length hair is waved softly on both sides with the ends wound and pinned into a tiny chignon low on the neck.

HAIR DESIGNS BY ENRICO CARUSO

In the relaxed, informal loggia at the Embassy which she has decorated in her favorite grays, blues and greens, Mme. Alphand often sings an impromptu song or two for her dinner guests, accompanying herself on a guitar. Her favorite red velvet evening dress is from Dior.

DI PIETRO

A menu for one of her "railway-station buffets," prepared with all the wizardry of the Embassy's chef, might include beef à la mode en gelée, cold chicken chaud-froid, Mme. Alphand's favorite green "salade mimosa" with grated egg yolks and whites. For dessert: orange shells filled with orange sherbet.

When I entertain

Mme. Hervé Alphand

tells her philosophy of entertaining to Nancy Crawford Wood.

Blue-eyed, honey-blond Mme. Hervé Alphand, wife of France's ambassador to the United States, is considered by many people to be the most sparkling and delightful hostess in Washington—in great part because she takes such obvious pleasure in gathering people around her and entertaining them. Behind the success of each of her parties, however, are the most careful planning and a well-thought-out, practical philosophy of party giving. "My favorite way to handle a large crowd of people," says Mme. Alphand, "is what I call a 'railway-station buffet.'

"All the dishes for the supper are cold because this is apt to be the kind of party that lasts and lasts. Places are set at the dining table with plates, silver, glasses and so forth; big platters of the cold food are arranged in the center, right on the table. People help themselves, and pass things back and forth to each other. I call it 'railway station' because people keep drifting into and out of the dining room; as places at the table become vacant, they are filled by other guests."

Any large party following Mme. Alphand's "railway station" plan is, of course, enormously expedited by having help on hand to remove used plates and replenish the table with fresh silver and dishes. Failing this, one could work out a plan of service, in which guests carry their own used plates to a serving cart, to be wheeled away. The next guests to sit down at the table would get their own fresh plates and silver from a sideboard.

A typical menu might include beef à la mode in aspic, cold chicken in aspic, or cold CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

Charming flower arrangements which combine fresh flowers with big sprays of artificial silk roses, paper stock and larkspur are in all the Embassy's rooms, in black-lacquered balloon glasses. Above the flowers hangs a lovely late-eighteenth-century painting from the Louvre, by Vigée-Lebrun.

STUART

A typical, and favorite, buffet menu: Casserole Espagnole, a delicious mixture of rice, shrimp, chicken and peppery sausage slices; Oeufs Enteralliés, hard-cooked eggs baked in a savory cheese sauce; a salad of mixed vegetables tossed in French dressing and chilled. The centerpiece: a basket of gleaming, colorful vegetables, another of Mme. Alphand's favorite ways to decorate her table.

In the Embassy's dining room the table is set with beautiful old blue-and-white Sèvres plates. Mme. Alphand loves to make an enormous arrangement for the center of the table of alabaster grapes and fresh fruits, piled high in a deeper blue Sèvres tureen. "I like to use fruit rather than flowers for the center of the dining table; and it's economical—you eat it afterward." In the background hangs a superb painting by Pierre Bonnard, from the Louvre.

One of the greatest problems in modern family life, underlying many others, grows out of the fact that so often the wife's work is in the home, the husband's work is away from home. Frequently wife and children alike see very little of him—if he is a golfer or fisherman, they may not even have much time with him on weekends. This is bad for all concerned. To a large extent this condition is inescapable, but it must be counterbalanced by some sort of adjustment on all sides, if the marriage is to be strong and satisfying and if the children are to have the two parents they need. Wives naturally see their own side of the problem; husbands take a little different view; and all concerned must have some re-education in order to build a sound family unit. The counselor in this case was Mrs. Roberta Lovell.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "I've reached the point where I can't sleep without pills. I'm tense and miserable all the time. My husband's business and my husband's mother are wrecking my marriage."

HE: "I'll admit my mother can be a trial and I quite definitely go my own way. Apparently Della can't. She constantly allows herself to be browbeaten and pushed around."

DELLA TELLS HER SIDE:

"Frequently I feel like a widow," said twenty-nine-year-old Della, a drawn, harried-looking young woman with a pale complexion, glittering eyes and bitten nails. "I'm not fooling. People joke about golf widows and small-boat widows and business widows, but Riley's business is anything but hilarious to me. My husband's business and my husband's mother, in that order, are wrecking my marriage. The three children and I see practically nothing of Riley—he is almost a stranger to our five-year-old son—and we see far too much of his mother.

"Riley's mother, whom I call Mother B at her demand, has been a problem ever since I married six years ago. Indeed, she took complete charge of my wedding. And I mean complete. She went so far that she invited my father, who has been divorced from my mother for over twenty years. On the other hand, she 'forgot' to mail an invitation to my college roommate. My roommate was a Mexican girl and my mother-in-law is obsessed by every type of prejudice, racial, national, religious. Riley and I wanted a small ceremony, with only close friends and kin present. We were married in a huge church and there were two hundred guests at the reception.

"Possibly I could handle Mother B—her narrowness, her meddling and her bossiness, her voracious curiosity—if I received some slight co-operation from Riley. I don't. I fell in love with Riley because of his sense of humor and the fun and companionship we shared. He has become as glum, withdrawn and buried in work as his father. Settling female squabbles, as Riley puts it, is not a man's responsibility. He is too wound up in his present job to devote five minutes listening to any of my troubles.

"Riley is a consulting engineer—he was a senior at Cal Tech when we met—and he specializes in judging undeveloped real estate, deciding the value and best use to be made of it. Until two years ago he was on the state payroll; he worked regular hours, earned enough for us to get by comfortably—and when I served dinner in the evening there was a man at the head of the table. If I needed to speak to him in the daytime, I could reach him on the phone.

"But then he quit his civil-service job and went into private business with an old Army buddy. His partner is a real-estate promoter, a dynamo of energy—and a bachelor. Riley and Fred are scarcely ever in their office. Instead they are roaring around the countryside in the company car, searching for tracts of land suitable for suburban housing developments or shopping centers, trying to talk owners into bargain-rate options, dreaming big fat dreams. The dreams have yet to be realized fully in terms of solid cash, but Riley isn't doing badly in a financial way—last year we were able to acquire a home—and it's likely his operations may be extremely profitable sometime in the future. However, it's the lonely, difficult present that concerns me.

"Riley is so absorbed in his ambitions that he leaves the house at the crack of dawn. In the evenings I never know when or if he will show up for dinner. As a rule he's very late, and he brings his business preoccupations home with him. There's no satisfaction in talking to him; he just doesn't listen. His weekends are spent on out-of-town trips. This means that from Friday until Sunday the children and I are at the mercy of his mother and my mother. With Riley gone they assume I am lonesome and both move in on me.

"My mother is a worrier and a nagger. She picks at me for being pale and thin, for losing weight since my marriage. She is forever suggesting I adopt the latest high-calorie diet. She is also rather liberal with marital advice, considering the fact that her marriage broke up when I was only five years old. Tiresome as she is, I'm accustomed to her fussing and fluttering and ordinarily I can ignore it.

"Mother B can't be ignored. When she and my mother differ on the course of conduct they think the children and I should pursue—you should have heard the two of them on the subject of choosing the proper nursery school for Johnnie—I almost explode. Several times I've walked out of the house leaving them to settle their arguments in my absence. Often Mother B has upset me to such a degree that I've left her in charge of the demoralized household, and have gone to the movies or just sat in the park by myself struggling to regain control of my emotions. I'm ashamed to admit that, but it's the truth. The pressure is just too much.

"I've reached the point where I can't sleep without pills. I'm tense and miserable all the time and frequently I can't imagine why. The other day my mother called to tell me something about my father—they live separately, of course, but fairly close to each other—and, just listening to her babble on, I nearly had hysterics. A few minutes later the phone rang again and it was my mother-in-law calling the third time since morning to tell me the weather was chilly and to be sure Johnnie wore the sweater she had given him for his birthday. That time I did lose my self-control. I shrieked at her over the phone, which was exactly what she wanted. The balance of the day I was so depressed at myself I didn't care whether I was alive or dead.

"I didn't used to think of myself as a neurotic weakling—I worked my way through college—but I can't deal with my mother-in-law. She always makes me look and act my worst. For some reason, she can invariably outmaneuver or steam-roller me. And then she tosses her head and laughs a victorious little laugh that really drives me wild.

"Mother B has a reputation for generosity and, according to her own lights, she is generous. The trouble CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

"I'm just not capable of being both a father and a mother to my children. I don't satisfy my husband; I don't satisfy his mother. And I certainly don't satisfy myself."

DON ORNITZ

CLEVELAND MUSEUM OF ART
CHARLES W. HARKNESS COLLECTION

Mrs. West and Her Son Raphael

BENJAMIN WEST (1738-1820)

Son of a Quaker innkeeper near Chester, Pennsylvania, Benjamin West rose to be the official painter to the King of England, president of the Royal Academy, and unquestionably the father of American painting. His career began at six, when he (one of ten children) drew a pencil sketch of his baby sister in her cradle. His mother was delighted. "I do declare," she exclaimed, "he has made a likeness of our Sally," and she kissed her son. "That kiss," Benjamin West wrote seventy years later, "made me a painter."

At twelve, Benjamin was known around Philadelphia as an infant prodigy; at sixteen, he had a flourishing business in portraiture; at twenty-one, confident, adventurous, brash, he sailed for Italy to see the Old Masters, and soon gained a reputation as one of the outstanding artists of the foreign colony in Rome.

At twenty-five, in London, his success was even more complete. Handsome, reserved and forthright, the talented colonial delighted the English aristocracy. During the Revolution his divided loyalties made life difficult, since he never wavered in his allegiance to CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

Summer Garden Buffet

Flaky hot salmon mousse;
veal rolls with a nutty filling;
coeur à la crème, jeweled with the season's most luscious cold red strawberries.

The first celebration of summer is ideally an out-of-doors one, where sweet-smelling air adds zest to every mouthful of food. Our bountiful, beautiful buffet menu would be perfect for a wedding breakfast, in the garden just after noon when the dew has left the grass; ideal to celebrate a birthday or graduation, on an evening starred with fireflies. The delicious hot main dish is a heavenly salmon mousse, molded to a shape of beauty, and served with savory dill sauce. Surrounding the coral-pink mousse: a ring of hot mushroom caps, filled with piquantly seasoned bread crumbs. Nearby, swirled slices of chilled veal roll, layered with a mouth-watering filling of ham, calves' liver and pistachio nuts—crowned with the first bright, crisp radishes from the garden. Our salad is a subtle blending of water-cress sprigs, ice-cold lettuce, cool cucumbers, and a fillip of chopped fresh mint (save some of the tiny, newest mint leaves to decorate the top of the bowl). As for dessert—it's a creamy complement to summer's own firm, juicy red strawberries: coeur à la crème, a luscious mixture of cream and cottage cheese.

If you prefer to, you can prepare your salmon mousse on the day before the party and store in the refrigerator. Remove the mold from refrigerator an hour and a half before baking.

SALMON MOUSSE

Drain and take out the skin and bones from 3 large cans salmon. Flake the salmon very well. There should be 5 or 6 cups. (Fresh salmon can be used, too, if you can get it.) To the salmon add the juice of 1½ lemons, ¼ cup fine dry bread crumbs, 1 onion, grated, 1 tablespoon minced parsley, 1 teaspoon dried dill, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a dash of hot pepper sauce. Now make a very thick cream sauce, using 6 tablespoons butter, 6 tablespoons flour and 1½ cups milk. Season with 2 teaspoons salt and a dash of pepper. Stir constantly until thick. Mix thoroughly with the salmon. Then fold in 3 egg yolks, beaten until light and thick. Taste for seasoning. Pour into a CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

Menu

Hot Salmon Mousse with Dill Sauce

Chilled Veal Rolls with Ground-Ham-and-Nut Filling

Piquant Stuffed Mushrooms

Green Salad with Diced Cucumbers and Chopped Mint.
French Dressing

Buttermilk Biscuits

Coeur à la Crème with Strawberries

Coffee

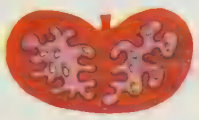
(Planned for 10–12)

STUART-FOWLER

A feast to make the most of lovely weather; a garden table set with pinks and greens, and a gathering of summer roses.

COLLECTOR'S ITEMS

Vegetable Variety - Seasonings, Combinations, One dish Meals from the Journal Kitchen



Summer's vegetable bounty in a basket.

Through summer and fall vegetable stands hold variety and color to tempt you. Of the dozens of ways to serve every vegetable, these are our pets:

BEANS The best green beans we ever ate were succulent miniatures, picked when they were only about three inches long and no bigger around than a soda straw. But no matter what their size, if they are crisp, firm, and snap with a crackle, they'll be good in this dish.

Green Beans with Sour Cream: Cook 1 pound green beans, French cut. Or if they are succulent, tiny ones, leave them whole. While they cook, sauté 1 onion, chopped, and 2 tablespoons chopped parsley in 2 tablespoons butter. Work in 1 tablespoon flour and ½ cup bean liquor. Cook a few minutes until smooth. Season with a good pinch of dried or fresh dill, 1 teaspoon sugar and 1 teaspoon vinegar, salt and pepper. Add drained beans and stir in 1 cup thick commercial sour cream. Makes 4 servings.

TOMATOES Robust and red, tomatoes add a dash of color as well as flavor to more recipes than we can count, but alone or in combination with another vegetable they can take a star part in the menu.

Tomatoes Provençale: In Southern France tomatoes are prepared in this simple but delicious way: Sauté 1 onion, chopped, until golden in 2 tablespoons olive oil; add one clove garlic, finely chopped, and stir for a minute or two. Add 6 large ripe peeled and broken-up fresh tomatoes or 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes, and allow to stew gently for about 10 or 15 minutes over low heat. Do not cook long enough to change color. They should be bright red and fresh-tasting when served. Toss in a handful of croutons sautéed in butter to take up the juice. Makes 6 servings.

Tomatoes with Curried Rice: Slice the tops off 4 large tomatoes; scoop out the insides and mash up with a fork or pastry blender. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper, 6 tablespoons finely chopped green pepper and 1 teaspoon curry powder. Heat together; blend in ⅔ cup soft bread crumbs and 2 cups cooked rice (use the precooked rice for speed). Stuff tomatoes with this mixture. Sprinkle with buttered crumbs. Broil 10 minutes under low heat until tomatoes are just tender. Makes 4 servings.

SPINACH Cooked with parsley, scallions and a little rosemary, spinach or chard is elegant—plain buttered and served with lemon. For another time ——

Spinach with Mushrooms: Wash 2 pounds spinach in several waters. Cook, covered, with just the water that clings to the leaves, adding ¼ teaspoon salt, until just wilted. Drain and chop fine. Add 1 tablespoon butter and ¼ cup heavy cream. Slice ½ pound mushrooms and sauté in 2 tablespoons butter until browned. Add to spinach. Season with 2 tablespoons minced onion, ¼ teaspoon marjoram and salt and pepper to taste. Just before serving, sprinkle with croutons that have been made by dicing 2 slices of stale bread and browning them evenly in 2 tablespoons butter. The croutons should be tiny and very crisp. Makes 4 servings.

CARROTS Slim and young and artfully seasoned, these two ways will make any carrot hater ask for more:

Westphalian Carrots: Use 2 bunches carrots for 6 to 8 people. Scrape and cut carrots in half crosswise. Then cut into very fine strips so they are almost shredded. Boil in very little water. This does not take very long because carrots have been cut so fine. At the end add ¼ cup dark brown sugar, ¼ cup butter, ¼ teaspoon nutmeg and salt to taste.

Carrots and Zucchini: Cut 1 clove garlic in half and brown in 1 tablespoon salad oil. Remove the garlic from the pan and add 1 small onion, minced. Cook slowly about 10 minutes. Cut up coarsely or slice in thin round slices 2 large carrots and 4 small zucchini. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and 1 teaspoon thyme. Add 2 tablespoons water. Cover the pan and cook very gently for about 20 minutes, or until the vegetables are tender. Sprinkle the vegetables with 2 tablespoons grated Parmesan cheese and allow to sit, covered, about 5 minutes before serving. Pour into a hot vegetable dish. Sprinkle with chopped parsley if you like. Makes 6 servings.

SQUASH All season long there is some kind of summer squash in the markets—crookneck and zucchini in most abundance. Low-calorie vegetables, too, if that is an item you consider.

Zucchini Madrones: Cut 6 small unpeeled zucchini squash lengthwise in fairly thin slices, about 2 inches long. Then cut the sliced squash into julienne strips. Place squash in a pan with very little water, 2 tablespoons butter, 1 tablespoon minced onion and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Cook over low heat until tender, but not soft. Drain thoroughly and add ½ cup heavy cream. Season with 1 to 1½ teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon white pepper and ¼ teaspoon orégano. Serve very hot. Makes 6 servings.

Summer Squash and Tomatoes: Peel and slice 6 ripe tomatoes and 3 medium onions. Slice, but do not peel, 3 tender young crookneck or zucchini summer squash, and parboil in a little water for 5 minutes. Remove from heat and drain. Heat 1 clove garlic, minced, in ¼ cup salad or olive oil in a very large skillet. Add the tomatoes, onion and squash slices and simmer until the onion slices become transparent, about 5 minutes. Transfer the mixture to a 6-quart casserole. Add 1 cup bouillon, 2 teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon pepper. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for about 1 hour, or until squash is tender. Stir in ½ teaspoon each of dried dill and tarragon. Sprinkle top with ⅓ cup finely chopped parsley. Return to oven and bake ten minutes more. Makes 8 servings.

KEEP THAT GARDEN FRESHNESS

The most succulent vegetable can be ruined by overcooking. For best flavor, use as little water as possible. One inch of water in the pan or three quarters to one cup is sufficient to cook up to three pounds of vegetables. This is a general rule. Often you won't need this much. Have the salted water boiling before you add the vegetables. From there on, cook just until fork-tender but still firm and of good texture. Quick cooking keeps the color bright—the flavor fresh.

EGGPLANT The vegetable "meat"—eggplant—is beloved in the cuisine of many countries. We think it's at its best in the Italian dish ——

Eggplant Parmigiana: In a large skillet, sauté 2 medium onions, sliced, and 1 clove garlic, crushed, in 2 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Then add 6 to 8 tomatoes, peeled and cored. Simmer slowly about 20 minutes. Add 2 tablespoons tomato paste, ½ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon thyme and ¼ teaspoon sugar. Simmer another 10 minutes. Place in a bowl and allow to stand. Mix together ½ cup fine dry bread crumbs, ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese and 1 tablespoon chopped parsley. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a pinch of pepper. Meanwhile, wash but do not peel 1½ pounds eggplant. Slice thin. Beat 2 eggs slightly and season with salt and pepper. Dip the eggplant slices into and out of the egg. Sauté in hot salad oil. The oil should be at least ½ inch deep in a large skillet. Sauté the eggplant until tender and golden brown on both sides. Drain on paper toweling. Place a layer of eggplant slices in the bottom of a greased casserole. Sprinkle with part of crumb mixture. Pour some of the tomato sauce over. Repeat 2 or 3 times, ending with eggplant slices on top. Cover with thin slices of Mozzarella cheese. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about ½ hour, until piping hot and cheese browns. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

ONIONS Onions have a way of making the roast, the sauce and the dressing the better for their presence.

Onions Hungarian: Use small white onions. Allow about 5 or more per person. Peel, boil about 30 in enough salted water to cover. When done, drain but keep 1 cup broth. In a small pan heat until bubbling 1 tablespoon butter, then add 1 tablespoon flour. When it bubbles up, add broth and stir until smooth. Add 1 teaspoon vinegar, 1 teaspoon sugar, and pepper and salt. Butter the hot onions, return them to this sauce and reheat. Makes 6 servings.

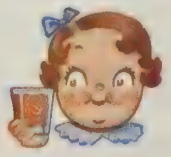
"Blooming ambrosial fruit of vegetable gold." John Milton

Quick! Cooling! Nourishing!

Summer Surprises with Soup!

ROSTED SOUP! Campbell's Tomato Soup, chilled in the refrigerator, mixed with cold water or milk. So cooling and refreshing to drink. The taste is brisk and angy! Have this year-round favorite the cool summer way with lemon or cucumber.

SOUP ON THE ROCKS! This is the coolest new drink in town, and made in a minute! Just open a can of Campbell's Beef Broth (Bouillon), and pour over ice in a tall or short glass. Thirst-quenching! Refreshing! A bracing drink!



REAM OF CHICKEN GLACÉ! Sound fancy? The flavor is, but it couldn't be asier to make. Simply chill a can of Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup. Combine it with a can of cold milk, and add a dash of curry. Voilà! Soup glacé!

JELLIED CONSOMMÉ! This soup literally shivers with cold—cold, inviting bites of jellied beef broth. It's a good idea to keep some Campbell's Consommé handy in the refrigerator. Then it's always chilled and ready when you want it.

Once a day...every day...SOUP!

Soups supply basic nutritional needs: Vitamins, minerals and liquids—for general well-being • Proteins—for upkeep and growth • Carbohydrates—for energy

...and ask yourself this question:

"AM I A SAFE DRIVER?"

You are a safe driver if you . . .

- always observe traffic regulations, especially about speed
- watch other drivers and try to anticipate their actions
- drive extra-carefully when pedestrians, especially children, are about
- know distances required to stop your car completely at various speeds
- never drive when you are fatigued, ill or upset
- lower your speed as darkness approaches
- signal other motorists in ample time before stopping or turning
- keep your car in top mechanical condition

You are not a safe driver if you . . .

- fail to observe right of way
- follow too closely behind the car ahead
- weave in and out of traffic lanes
- pass on hills or curves when there is no clear view ahead
- do not adjust your speed to weather and traffic conditions
- fail to lower your headlights when a car approaches
- take chances or trust to luck in hazardous situations
- feel over-confident or believe accidents happen only to the other fellow
- speed through traffic lights on the yellow signal
- mix alcohol and driving

Always drive as if your life depended on it. It does!

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
(A MUTUAL COMPANY)
1 Madison Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N. Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "How's Your Driving?" 6-57-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

THE DURABLE FIRE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 74

forgotten about it—well, I say forgotten, I'm afraid that is just a pretense. It has all made me very sad. Poor fellow."

"We're all very sad, of course, but he must make his own way back, it seems to me."

"Yes, I suppose so. Oh, there are the ladies."

Both guests swam almost as well as the Lowrys, which was to say very well indeed, and before dinner they went up to the balcony bar, looking down on the ocean in good spirits.

"Goodness is so puzzling," Rosalie said to Stephen as she prepared for bed that night. "There is Daran, living in luxurious sin on the proceeds of a lottery prize, yet I have never felt more consideration for others in anyone. I could tell that he was afraid something she said or one of her questions might hurt me. When you went to order dinner and she spoke of all her half brothers and sisters and started to ask about my family, he guided her away from it. He was so worried that that was why, when she asked me where I had learned to swim, I told them about Estonia. I thought it would make it easier for him. You didn't tell me Armas had been to Bonn."

"I know. I thought it would only make you feel worse."

"Being afraid to hope because you may be disappointed is very cowardly, I'm afraid. Beatriz was very sweet when we went to powder our noses. She said she could hardly wait to be married and that he was so good she wanted to give him a family."

The full specifications for the bridge were in the mail the next morning and Daran, Lowry and Halleck spent an hour on them before Daran went in for his interview with Cramer.

When Daran returned he made a face at Lowry and held up his hands in a gesture of bewilderment. "If you don't mind," he said, "we shall talk about it a little later. I am perhaps a little confused. I am to have dinner with him and his son at six-thirty. I shall probably leave for Caracas tomorrow night."

The day passed quietly. Hewitt kept to himself. In midafternoon Lowry fixed a meeting of Evans and his engineers and calculators, as well as John Cramer, with Daran, who gave them a general fill-in on the bridge.

When he arrived next morning, Lowry found Daran waiting. So was an envelope "From John Cramer for Mr. Lowry" which he put aside.

Daran began, "We return to Caracas tonight. I shall remain there whatever reasonable time you feel necessary for the company. But I now resign my position as your manager."

"What's happened?" Lowry asked.

"In all countries businessmen talk a good deal of nonsense and I am accustomed to such palaver. But Mr. Cramer not only talks nonsense and deception but he insults my intelligence by thinking I do not realize it."

"You mustn't resign," Lowry said.

"I have," Daran said with a smile. "I am going to do something I prefer to do. I wished to leave Venezuela. Your brother-in-law has offered me a very fine position in his bank in Paris. I accepted it by telephone this morning. It will be much better for Beatriz to be in a cultural center like Paris."

"Are you sure my brother-in-law and you didn't settle this before you left?" Lowry asked.

"No, Mr. Lowry. It was wholly conditional and if my intelligence had not been insulted last night, I should not have done it."

"What was the nature of the insult?"

"Well, first about Mr. Peale. How perceptive I had been from the start. Many compli-ments, but I said I was not perceptive. It never occurred to me to start with that anything could be wrong. I told Cramer that. He talked about the satisfaction it must give me to have had this wrongdoing exposed. I said it gave me no satisfaction, and it must have almost broken your heart as a friend, because I shed tears when Mr. Lainvee told me and I was only an admirer of Mr. Peale's culture. But of course all that was by the way. He then asked if I did not think it would be better for me to agree that my rate of commission and my bonus on the last three weeks' business be reduced."

"Not really?"

"Oh, yes. You understand that if I had been told 'Daran, you never expected to make this much money and we're not going to pay it'—well, perhaps I would have thought it over. But to be told I would be better off without it in the long run—which was how he put it—that was too much. And there was much else I did not like. Something called 'Headquarters Reports' to his son, not to you. Many small-minded things from a small-minded man. The end was very funny. Nothing would do but they must walk back to the Waldorf with me. As we came up the stairs from Park Avenue we met Beatriz just coming down to dinner. She looked absolutely charming, though in street clothes which I told her she should not have worn to the Sert Room at that hour. But she had been to a movie and not taken time to change. I said good night to them, excused myself and joined her." He laughed. "Isn't there an American joke, 'You don't resign, you're fired'? I walked up the steps to the Sert Room with my arm around her waist."

Lowry said, "Though your resignation is very depressing, I know you'll both be very happy in Paris."

"You must understand that if it makes big difficulties for you, I will hold it up."

"It doesn't, in that sense, but there are a lot of difficulties," Lowry said.

The morning cables had brought word that negotiations for the building to house a proposed assembly plant of road-making and farm machinery near Smyrna had reached the final stage. A question of law under existing treaties had been raised on duty-free passage and Lowry judged it of sufficient importance to talk to Cramer about.

He found Cramer largely indifferent to the issue, which plainly he did not fully understand, finally interrupting rather brusquely:

"I want to tell you something and I can only hope it's news to you. Your Venezuelan friend took dinner with us last night. From something he let drop, John guessed that he had a woman with him at his hotel and we went over with him, intending to make inquiries. There was no need. There she came, flagrantly dressed, half exposed, and he hurriedly left us overcome with embarrassment, I could see. Did you know this? You must have. Why was I not told?"

"Told what? I met Mr. Daran and the lady he is to marry in Paris. My wife and I had them at our house night before last. What was I to tell you?"

"Your wife and you had an immoral woman in your own house?" Cramer exclaimed.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

YOUR KISSES ARE SO SINCERE

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

Your kisses are so sincere,
Though those of older men
Often betoken
Desire unspoken ——
A greedy, ulterior yen.

Lord, bless that ragtime smile
From a heart that has nothing to hide!
And thank you for making
Light work of my baking.
Here's your cooky; now go play outside.

Lucky Pup

with all that love—and new Gaines Dog Menu to thrive on!

New Gaines Dog Menu—with DL-Methionine—offers your dog
a sturdier body, stronger bones, more bounding life!

Isn't that what you want for your dog? Then get new Gaines Dog Menu today! It's packed with vital food essentials including meat*, of course—but meat plus DL-Methionine, the remarkable nutritional discovery that unlocks more of the life-giving "protein power" of the meat itself. Sounds good? Is good!

It's like an extra helping of nourishment in every can.

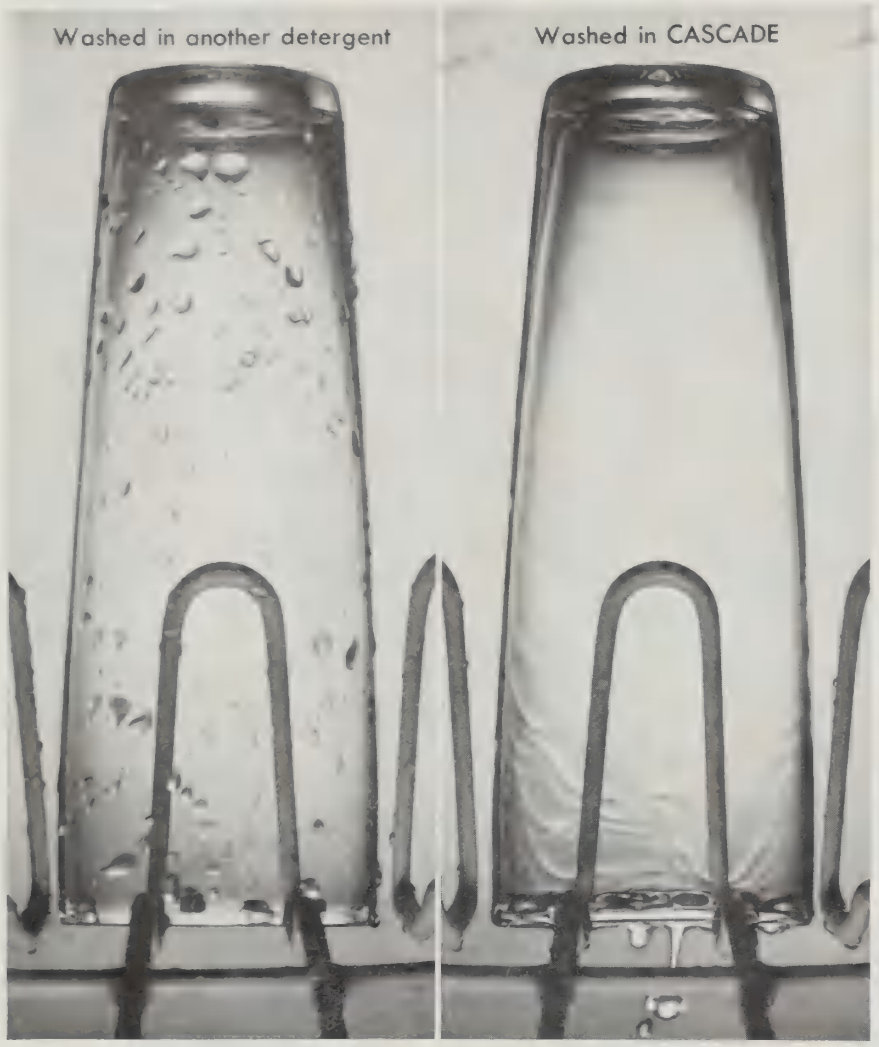
Dogs prefer new Gaines by instinct!



*Rich red horse meat

A Product of General Foods

NEW! FOR DISHWASHER OWNERS

Cascade eliminates drops that spot!

Only Cascade has an exclusive ingredient that changes drops of water into cleansing, clear-rinsing "sheets"—stops spotting as no other detergent can!

Compare two glasses fresh from the dishwasher rinse. Water drops clinging to the glass washed in another leading detergent can dry in ugly spots. But not a drop remains to spot the Cascade-washed glass. That's the magic of Cascade's exclusive formula. It changes water drops into free-flowing "sheets." And it leaves everything so slippery-clean, rinse water slides right off. Result: no water drops, no more water spots! Cascade gets glasses clearer, silver and china cleaner than any other detergent!

What's more, Cascade is safer than any other detergent — actually protects gold leaf and other delicate china patterns. So switch to new Cascade. You'll love it!

MADE BY PROCTER & GAMBLE

Critical flashlight test proves it!

"Light up" a glass and see. Cascade-washed glasses dry spotless, close-up clean! Proof that Cascade eliminates drops that spot!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

can't believe it." He pondered the question a moment. "Have they got separate rooms?"

"I don't know anything about it."

Cramer hesitated. "Irregular as it is, if they have separate, nonadjoining rooms I'd overlook it, I think. Can you check that or shall I have John do it?"

"I'm afraid the answer is now immaterial. Mr. Daran has just resigned."

"Mr. Lowry, I must ask myself what can possibly be back of the obvious fact that, whether it is intentional or not, you are gradually destroying the organization. Apparently, I say apparently, Peale should have gone. As to Doran, except as he may now turn vindictive and sabotage the bridge, I'm satisfied to have him go. But you regarded him highly. Tell me, when he resigned—a man you believe of value to your company—what did you do to persuade him to remain?"

"I saw that his decision was taken and there was nothing I could do."

"You mean to say you did absolutely nothing? Felt no impulse of duty toward your company? Is that what I'm to tell Mr. Delano?"

"I should think you'd tell him a man in whose morals you had no confidence had fortunately resigned."

"A man like that will have just one goal—to make trouble for us in Venezuela. I suppose you got no hint of Doran's plans?"

"Yes, I did. He's leaving Venezuela as soon as possible."

"To do what?"

"To join my brother-in-law's firm in Paris."

Cramer was speechless a full half minute. Then he shook his head and said, "This is the most flagrant —— No, I'll say no more now. I don't trust myself to speak."

"Before I go, I'd like to see what this is about," Lowry said, took the envelope from John Cramer from his pocket and opened it. The memorandum inside read:

> The president would like to know full circumstances of payment of $5000 to Mr. Dahlgren Lowry in connection with Larus. May I say you will advise him by Friday?

"Why in the world do you do things this way?" Lowry asked.

"In other words, you're saying I'm entitled to the information but you don't like the way I ask for it, is that it? Let's get this clear, friend Lowry. Is it policy or procedure that's chewing you? Or could it be that maybe your conscience hurts you because I have had to learn from outside sources what you should have told me?"

It was almost impossible to know how to put his objections. It had probably been fifty years since anyone had been able effectively to say "A gentleman doesn't do something like this." Yet that was the basic issue—that Cramer was not a gentleman but pretended to be. If he were told how Rutledge or Johnson would have acted in his place, he would say, "Well, if I've got to beat around the bush with a lot of sweet talk to get a few facts out of you ——" But the worst of it was that he may have been entitled to know as soon as Dahlgren's check was received. Because he put no value on Cramer's opinion, had he been entitled not to ask for it? Had he, in fact, not taken the easiest way and thereby been unfair to Cramer? Even now wasn't the healthy-minded thing to blow up, get mad, clear the air and be friends again? Or admit he had made a mistake and accept the passing unpleasantness that would follow?

"Understand, I'm not going to drop the matter," Cramer said.

There was enough of a threat in his tone to stiffen Lowry's resistance. He said, "Before the Larus deal was final I was assured there was no finder's fee to be paid in any form. I was apparently deceived, but the whole situation has since changed and I cannot see that our interests were in any way involved. What happened has turned out to be a highly complicated personal matter among outsiders. I feel no obligation to say anything about it."

"Have you benefited personally by this?"

"Certainly not, nor has my brother."

"Then why not tell me? Why must there be this constant pulling in different ways between us? It's not my wish or doing."

This man is such a liar, Lowry thought. Unquestionably Beatriz was not "half exposed" last night. Unquestionably he lies to himself about his own motives.

"I'm wondering this, friend Lowry," Cramer continued: "do you need a vacation? You've had a difficult spring getting your family together, having taken on a big new house. Now would it be wise for you to get away? I'm only thinking of you. We'll forget the Larus matter till a later day."

The man's amazing ability to pick up scraps of intelligence was less disconcerting than his ability to change his color like a chameleon.

As though nothing had happened, Cramer's face relaxed into a broad, benign smile. "You know what might be a good idea? For you and me to get a quick bite of lunch and go out to the ball game together. What do you say? It's only eleven o'clock."

Lowry picked up his papers. "Thanks. I've got to be with the lawyers on the Smyrna matter this afternoon and I want to see Daran off."

He telephoned Rosalie about the resignation and asked her to pick him up at Idlewild.

The elder Cramer took his son to lunch at the Louis XIV restaurant. It gratified him to have the corner table where he had once seen John D. Rockefeller, Jr., having a bowl of soup with one of his sons.

"I don't suppose, John, there's a man living freer of animosity than I am," Cramer told his son. "I don't want you to think I have any animosity toward Lowry."

"Oh, I know that, dad."

"Then why can't I seem to get him to go along? The trouble is, John, the fellow's got a queer streak. That wife of his isn't French at all, she's Estonian. It's as though our nice American girls weren't good enough for him. He's headstrong, he's mulish. Just now I tried to smooth things out by suggesting we go to the ball game. No, wouldn't do it. I phoned Mr. Delano about Doran joining Lowry's brother's firm. He was shocked and horrified. Lowry will never know it from me, but I saved his job for him. I don't know that I could do it again."

"Would you want to, dad? He's a pretty expensive luxury, it strikes me."

Daran, busy about packing and tickets, was unable to lunch with Lowry, but said that on the way to Idlewild he would have some advice on the bridge bid ready. He saw no reason why his assistant could not file the finished bid and performance bond, but that he would go into the matter thoroughly before leaving Caracas. Lowry, wishing to avoid the Cramers at the club, went around to the Louis XIV with Hewitt.

The Cramers saw and waved to them as they went to their table.

"I'd give a lot to know what they're talking about," Hewitt said to him, as Cramer said the same thing to his son.

"I had an exasperating talk with him this morning," Lowry said, and told Hewitt about Daran. "I thought Cramer was trying to force me to resign, and at the end he asked me to go to a ball game with him."

They were studying the desserts on the menu when the headwaiter came up to say Mr. Lowry was wanted on the telephone. He went to the booth, where Miss Marshall told him Mr. Dennison wanted to speak to him urgently. She gave him the number of Dennison's office.

"I'm just going to lunch with Bill Delano and I want your side of this story about your brother-in-law luring your Latin-American representative away from you."

"It's very simple. Cramer provoked Daran into resigning by proposing that his commissions be cut on these recent sales. Told him it would be better for him. My brother-in-law had met Daran in Paris ——"

"Through you."

"Yes, through me," Lowry said angrily, "and told him that if he wanted a job in his bank any time, he could have it. Daran has taken it."

"That's all you know about it?"

"Certainly it's all I know about it, and I don't like the implication."

"Let's not be touchy about little things. I called you to try to help."

"Well, I appreciate that, but ——"

"I must hang up because I'm late now. I'll talk to you later," Dennison said.

Lowry slammed the telephone back on the cradle and started back to his table. Hewitt, all smiles, had joined the Cramers and all three were pointing to the vacant chair awaiting him. Lowry walked over with what grace he could.

"I settled our check, Steve," Hewitt said. "They're bringing our coffee here."

"I was just saying to friend Hewitt here," Cramer said, "that I want to make a two-three-week swing around the plants and I want him to come along. You see no reason why the boys won't get along all right without us, do you?"

"The boys will get along all right," Lowry said, "because the men will look out for them."

At this witticism, Cramer threw back his head and laughed heartily. "Love your sense of humor, friend Lowry," he said. As for Hewitt, a considerable change had come over him. He gave the impression of a man who has made his peace with God.

In the office they parted with hearty we-must-do-it-ofteners, Hewitt stopping at Lowry's door for a final word.

"I think, Steve, you've been right about this from the start. We'd have made fools of ourselves by going to Delano or anybody else. D. P.'s perfectly reasonable if he's handled right."

"Well, I'm glad. Is 'D. P.' the new form of address?"

Hewitt ignored the question. "I wanted to tell you this. As you know, I've said nothing about that memo relative to seeing Jim. There's been absolutely no mention of it and it occurs to me that it wasn't intended for me in the first place. Typographical error. I think it was meant for you. You've had all the contact with Jim. I can bring it up diplomatically on the trip and I'll do so. I think I'm going to be able to get a lot of things squared away for us all."

"Good for you," Lowry said.

"John's going with us, by the way, which is a mighty nice gesture."

"I see," Lowry said. "Toward whom?"

"The executives—shows D. P. has full confidence in them. You know perfectly well how you would have felt if he had been left here."

Though the cat was away for three weeks, neither the mice nor the men in the office engaged in play. The office was an agreeable and stimulating place which men and women could leave at five with a sense of accomplishment and without anxiety for what would come up in the morning.

Though it was a little dismaying to Lowry that the mere absence of the two Cramers could make for such contentment and satisfaction in his work, he found himself happier in it than he had been at any time. Evenings and weekends in Ridingtown were perfect, after the all-but-Arabian heat of the city. For the time being Tamargo, Daran's second man, was operating successfully in Caracas, and at the end of the second week after Daran's departure the engineers and calculators came up with the final price on the bridge. It was put on Lowry's desk for signature and dispatch. Curtis himself brought in the performance bond from the surety company. All that experience and care could do had been done. Each page of the supporting calculations bore the varicolored initials of the calculating experts. The profit, though large, was in line with the risks and time involved. There was a sense of elation and confidence in the office, and Evans and Curtis, with most of the principal subordinates, came in smiling to watch him sign.

Lowry signed. He told Miss Marshall to send the telegram Mr. Cramer had requested that it was done and what the price was. If they were the successful bidder, as he felt they would be, though the credit would not be his alone, it must inevitably make matters easier with Cramer.

He felt a great relief, mixed with elation. He wished Daran were still in Caracas to share in it, and thought of the not-unpleasing self-importance with which Harold Titcomb would have put on his hat and coat and gone out past the fountain and the flowers to the Venezuelan consul next door to have the papers notarized. Most of all, he thought of the pity that Jim Peale, who had really made it possible through Larus, should not even know of it. To call and tell him at his wretched desk in the Bronx would of course be cruel, but he felt like doing it and telling him his part was not forgotten.

He reached for his telephone and asked Miss Marshall to get Excello. When she connected him he asked to speak to Mr. Peale. The operator said he was no longer with the company and no, they didn't know where to reach him. He felt a sense of alarm and of responsibility. He told Miss Marshall he would be back in about an hour, or if he was delayed he would call her.

He took a taxi through the wilting humidity to the West End Avenue address and rang the bell of the apartment where Peale had had a room. A woman answered the ring, with the door on a chain, and said Mr. Peale had moved out a week ago.

"Did anything seem to be the matter?" he asked. "I'm a friend of his."

"No, he paid up, left money for his laundry," the woman told him.

"He left no forwarding address?"

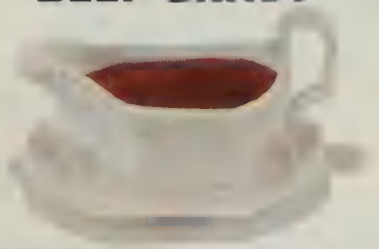
"The next time he threatens to run away from home, Mrs. Tibbs, don't pass up a marvelous opportunity."

FRANCO-AMERICAN IS A TRADEMARK OWNED BY THE MAKERS OF CAMPBELL'S SOUPS

3 Bar-b-clues

to sauces that sing...with the always-ready lean beef gravy

Like the special zing outdoor grilling gives meats? Then you're sure to want the special goodness FRANCO-AMERICAN Beef Gravy gives to barbecue sauces! Just a few flourishes and its savor will bring out the particular flavor of beef, chicken, pork—any meat! So here's the one easy way to a chef's selection of sauces! Keep several cans in the kitchen cupboard, too—for pouring roasting-pan goodness over potatoes, rice and sandwiches.



For Chicken—Dice 1 slice of bacon; grill over low heat until it's crisp. Blend in 1 can Franco-American Beef Gravy and ½ cup tomato ketchup; heat. Makes about 1¾ cups. Adds zest to outdoor appetites!

For Burgers (shown above)—Cook ¼ cup chopped onion in 1 tbsp. butter or margarine until tender. Stir in 1 can Franco-American Beef Gravy, 2 tbsp. pickle relish and 1 tsp. Worcestershire sauce; heat. Makes 1½ cups.

For Frankfurters—Cook ¼ cup chopped onion in 1 tbsp. butter or margarine 'til onion is soft. Stir in 1 can Franco-American Beef Gravy and 1 tsp. prepared mustard; heat. Makes 1¼ cups. And hardly takes you from your lawn chair!

FRANCO-AMERICAN
BEEF GRAVY

Made from fine quality beef... ready to serve any time

"I was a Hollywood star," says Juanita Hansen
famous Mack Sennett beauty of silent films,

"then soft living caught up with me...

but I found Ayds and recaptured my figure!"

"I weighed 196 lbs.—now I'm 127. And to think I owe so much to Ayds candy. You see, I had lost the struggle to stay on top. I lost my figure, too. Finally, I determined to lose weight. But without Ayds help I wouldn't have done it. I guess Ayds low-calorie appetite-quieter is what helps. Ayds contains the vitamins and minerals your body needs. Before eating, I enjoyed delicious Ayds candy as directed. At mealtime, I wasn't hungry. I ate less. Fat disappeared. I'm so grateful for Ayds!"

PROVED BY DOCTORS: The Ayds Plan was proved conclusively against three other weight-reducing methods. Of the hundreds of men and women tested by doctors at a New England clinic, Ayds users lost nearly twice as many pounds as those using even the next best product—without any irritating side effects.

PROVED BY PUBLIC: Everywhere, Ayds users report losing up to ten pounds and more with their first box. Before reducing, see your doctor. Have him write for Medical Journal report of the famed Ayds test to Campana, Box MD, Batavia, Ill.

PROVE IT YOURSELF: You must lose weight with your first box, $2.98, or your money back. Get Ayds now. At drug and department stores.

Take Ayds...
first aid for overweight!

A Campana Product

"No. He was out late for him one night, about eleven-thirty. I had to get up to let him in. He got a call at six-thirty the next morning and he was out of here by eight."

"Do you know who it was called?"

"I was that sound asleep, I didn't even know whether it was a man or a woman. You're not a cop, are you, because, if you are, this is a respectable place, no funny business."

"No, no, I'm a friend. He wasn't upset by the call, you wouldn't say?"

"I don't think so, but you couldn't tell about him."

Lowry thanked her and left. Other than to call the lawyer whom Peale had seen several months ago, he could think of nothing to do. The lawyer said he had last seen Peale on May thirteenth and had no communication since then. The only encouraging thing was that he obviously had not left Excello with any charges against him.

There was a telegram from Cramer on Lowry's desk when he got back:

CONGRATULATIONS AND GOOD LUCK. HOPE WE HAVE NOT BEEN AVARICIOUS.

He thought about Cramer. In a sense he had failed with Jim. Somehow such brotherhood as he thought existed should have forewarned him of the impending crash, and let him prevent it. In a totally different relation he must not fail with Cramer. If, as he thought to himself, he was the better man, he must make the qualities which he believed in—tolerance, good will, belief in the best in people—prevail over Cramer's devious ways and pettiness. To get along with men like Rutledge, Johnson or Caithness was no great credit.

That Friday even Ridingtown was under a pall of heat and humidity. The Hopkinses were coming to dinner and Rosalie telephoned Marcia to have her husband come in shorts and shirt.

"I'd like to go to the Equator and cool off after that train," Stephen said when Rosalie met him. "I'll kiss you after I've washed my face. We got the bridge bid off."

"You poor lamb," Rosalie said. "It's been suffocating here, so I can imagine New York. We have a very cool dinner. Cold consommé Waldorf, cold chicken and artichokes, and melon and Château d'Yquem."

"Good," he said. "I wish I could have a swim."

"The ocean was horrid, seventy-nine degrees, the pool seventy-five. I left the shower running to have it cold for you."

"You're an angel."

The Hopkinses arrived and Rosalie, coming out on the porch with the bowl of ice, found the two sunburned men sprawled in long chairs. "You look like two white hunters. I feel like somebody on safari in an Elspeth Huxley book."

"On high-class safaris," Lowry said, "the mem-sahibs wear jewels at dinner with their pajamas and mosquito boots. Where are your jewels? Where are your mosquito boots?"

"Is that a wounded water buffalo under those lilac bushes?" Hopkins asked.

"That's Smoky drinking out of the birdbath," Rosalie said.

"Not the birdbath, the water hole," Stephen said. "Save me the trouble of clapping my hands for another drink, please."

"Yes, bwana. I wish we were all on safari."

From inside the house there was a sudden thunder of feet and a tumult of voices.

"The bearers have evidently mutinied," Stephen said. At which their three children and two neighbor's burst through the door.

"Dad, can we run six times around the house and will you time us, please? Here's your watch. Can we—I mean may we? Don't say no, mum. Only six times."

"Will you please speak nicely to Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins?"

Richard, evidently not having seen the Hopkinses, controlled himself. "Oh, how do you do, Mrs. Hopkins? I'm very glad to see you. How have you been feeling?" In the midst of a courtly bow, he handed the watch to father. "Can we, dad? Good evening, How have you been feeling?"

"Thank you—not very well. Too old dently," Hopkins replied.

Lainvee curtsied to Mrs. Hopkins wit polite murmur of greeting, ending in, "And fair, no girls. Isn't that so, dad?"

The others were queueing up for bo "Just bow," Rosalie said; "don't put out th filthy hands. And you may not run at all this heat."

"Then, dad, won't Mr. Hopkins and y play batting practice with us? Please. It's early as anything. You'd like it, wouldn't y Mr. Hopkins?"

"Dears," Rosalie said firmly, "it is time Martin and Christopher to go home. It is ti for you to have baths."

"And no wet-towel fights," their father terjected. "Honor bright, now."

"Yes, dad. Mum, will you be up?"

"Yes, dear."

They trooped happily off with polite go nights.

"Have you ever thought of giving them vi mins?" Hopkins asked. "Think of wanting be timed around the house. God be merci to me, a sinner!"

Darkness brought small abatement to t damp, breathless heat of the day and a n ment's radio news announced "No relief sight from heat wave gripping the nation."

"Why don't we go for a swim in the cha nel from our dock?" Marcia asked.

"Our suits are at beach," Rosalie said.

"There are spare su in the boathouse," Mar said. "Come on. Yo sleep better."

"I'm for it," Lowry. sa Rosalie scurried upsta and came down with an c pair of trunks for Steph and an old suit of her ow Lowry went for his c as Hopkins made hims a final drink. When brought the car to the door, Marcia w waiting.

"They're following. You have to take me she said.

They drove through the winding lanes to h house, with the lights of the Hopkinses' c glaring in his mirror. The house was dark e cept for a hall light downstairs and the gard path to the boathouse dim in the moonle night. The only sound, as Hopkins led the w to the boathouse, was the slap of water again the dock and the rhythmic bumping of a ro boat against it.

"Tide's running out. Look, Lowry, why a suits at all? It's marvelous without the What do you say, Marcia?"

"I don't mind. Rosalie, are you game? It divine."

"Oh, I know, and it's terribly easy to pe suade a Balt not to wear a suit. It is dar Steve."

"Stephen's hesitating; he's so righteous."

"No, I'm not hesitating. I suppose we a sure no one's around." Lowry unbuttoned h shirt.

"No, no—girls first. We'll leave our cloth on the dock, Rosalie, by the ladder. You c dive. There's ten feet of water at low tide "Is it all right, darling?" Rosalie half wh pered to Stephen.

"I heard that," Hopkins said. "There will nothing to offend the most fastidious lady the land. Just a nice bathe, as those Englis call it."

"In with you," Stephen said to Rosalie.

"Keep your distance," Marcia called fro the ladder, and dived in, with Rosalie after he

"Oh, it is marvelous. I didn't think I'd ev be cool again. What's the little bobbing ligh out there?"

"Buoy. Don't go near it. Barnacles," Ho kins replied as he dived in and, swimmin strongly, headed for mid-channel.

Stephen followed and swam to where Ros lie was. "'Like a white lily floating on the pea hags dark waters,'" he said, taking her in h arms.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 101

You are as young as your faith, as old as your doubt; as young as your self-confidence, as old as your fear; as young as your hope, as old as your despair.

SAMUEL ULLMAN

More picnic fun because the work's all done with the STRONG aluminum foil...

new ALCOA WRAP

CHEESE-BACON WRAP-UPS

Spread sandwich buns with butter; fill with slices of cheese, strips of crisp cooked bacon. Wrap each bun in square of Alcoa Wrap, using tight double folds. Grill over low coals 10 to 12 minutes, turning frequently.

GRILLED CORN-ON-THE-COB

Brush husked corn with melted butter; salt, pepper. Wrap each ear in damp paper towel, place in Alcoa Wrap. Bring up sides, fold down onto corn in tight double fold; twist ends securely. Grill 20-25 minutes, turning frequently. Serve in opened packs.

PICNIC FRENCH FRIES

Place frozen French fries in center of double-thick square Alcoa Wrap; bring up sides; double-fold down onto French fries; fold ends up in tight double folds. If still frozen, grill over hot coals 20-25 minutes—15-20 minutes if defrosted in package. Turn several times; serve in opened packs.

Playtime? Plenty! And no time out for clean-up with convenient Alcoa® Wrap. You can grill a long list of tempting treats in Alcoa Wrap, then serve them right in their own foil containers. Keep picnic foods fresher in Alcoa Wrap, too. Next picnic, try these tasty delights. They're extra-good and easy with wonderful Alcoa Wrap.

Alcoa Wrap comes in three sizes:

STRONG
25-ft Package

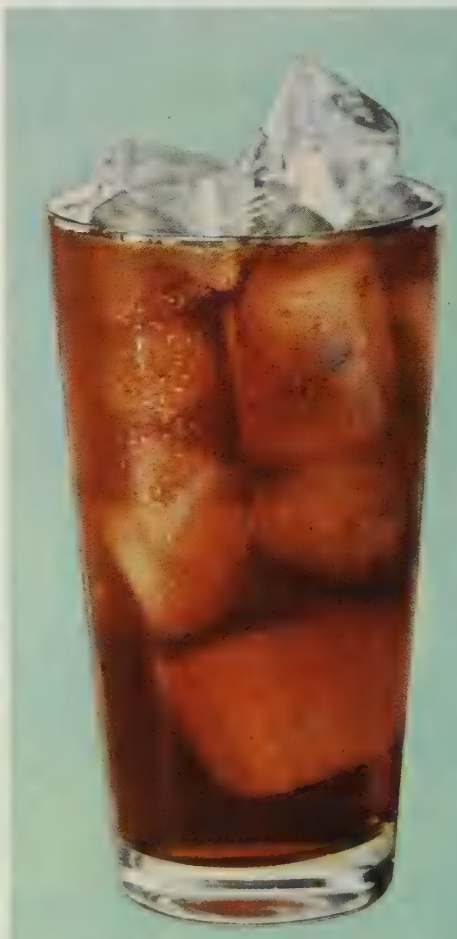
MONEY-SAVING
75-ft Economy Package

HEAVY-DUTY
25-ft Freezer and Broiler Foil

FREE BOOKLET! "Summer Living with Alcoa Wrap"—including cook-out recipes and travel tips—is now in specially-marked packages of Alcoa Wrap at your favorite store.

VISITING NEW YORK THIS SUMMER? Learn how to Live Light with Aluminum. See the Alcoa Exhibit on Macy's 5th floor.

THE ALCOA HOUR
TELEVISION'S FINEST LIVE DRAMA



NEW ways to take an ICED "Coffee-break"

Iced Coffee Secret. Cream double-strength Iced Coffee with Carnation Evaporated Milk. Brings out richer coffee flavor – lighter in calories, too. It's the ideal mid-summer refresher with a snack, a sandwich, a tidbit.

Iced Coffee Float. Scoop some of your favorite flavor ice cream—coffee, vanilla, chocolate or other—into Iced Coffee. Just taste how delicious it is with a generous wedge of cake so easily made with Betty Crocker Cake Mix.

3 ways to make good Iced Coffee

1. Quick Method

Make extra-strength coffee by using ½ measuring cup (4 fluid ounces) of water for each Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) of coffee — pour hot over ice cubes.

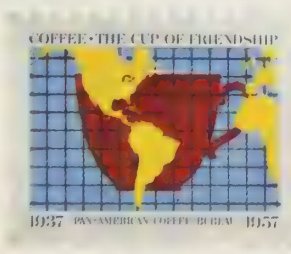
2. Pre-Cooled

Make coffee: 1 Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) to each 6-oz. cup of water. Cool in covered non-metal container. For freshest taste, serve within three hours. Pour over ice cubes.

3. Instant

Mix twice the usual amount of instant coffee with a little water (hot or cold, according to brand)—add ice cubes, fill glass with water.

HINT: In refrigerator trays, freeze regular strength coffee into cubes — pour fresh coffee over them. Delicious — and no dilution!



Good restaurants serve good Iced Coffee—enjoy it often!

Iced Coffee Mocha. Stir into Iced Coffee 2 tblsps. chocolate syrup and 2 tblsps. cream. Top with whipped cream if you like. A superb complete lunch when you serve it with a bacon sandwich made with Wilson Pan-Size Bacon — exactly sandwich size.

Iced Coffee Julep. Add a couple of drops of mint flavoring to Iced Coffee. Top festively with sprig of fresh mint. So cooling, especially with party-popular brownies, date bars and macaroons—quickly made with Betty Crocker Cookie Mixes.

Why Iced Coffee Makes Friends So Fast

Today's Iced Coffee is so versatile that there's a kind to delight every taste! And every kind is cooling and refreshing! You may choose to serve guests an exotic Continental variety—in your finest glassware. Or you may want the relaxing lift that only a regular Iced "Coffee-break" gives. Try America's favorite beverage, coffee, iced. The new and different ways to enjoy it make Iced Coffee fun for everyone!

Pan-American Coffee Bureau Dept. N, P.O. Box 33, Old Chelsea Station, New York 11, N.Y.

SEND FOR THESE COFFEE RECIPES NOW!

ONLY 10¢ for this exciting, helpful booklet, 32 colorful pages packed with information on best brewing methods, wonderful and new coffee recipes, serving suggestions and easy gourmet cooking hints. Write the Coffee Bureau for Fun With Coffee today!

© 1957, Pan-American Coffee Bureau

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

'Hey, none of that," Marcia called. "Ken, n't go out too far. Isn't it marvelous to feel water flow all around your arms and legs? ish Kenneth wouldn't go out so far."

'He used to be a fish," Lowry said, treading ter.

'He still is, but a rather heavy one and cer-ly a tired one tonight. Kenneth, don't be isocial. We're having fun."

'See you soon," he called back, his voice rying clearly over the water.

'I'm going to have two dives and call it ht. Rosalie?"

'No, a long float and a backstroke sprint l I'll be in."

'Believe it or not, I'm cold and I'm gulping. going in. I'll put towels by the ladder," rcia said and swam away toward the dock.

'Darling," Rosalie said, "not since we were Rhodes, do you remember?"

'Um," he said. "Every detail."

They saw Marcia go up the ladder and rry into the boathouse. "Go dive nicely," salie said and, turning on her back, started her out. They were then about twenty-five ds from the dock, pkins perhaps a hun-d.

n the long submerged onds of his jackknife e, Lowry did not hear sudden, frightened from Hopkins:

'Steve, come out! I'm in. I can't make it."

As Lowry came up I shook the water out his eyes, he heard salie answering, "I'm ning. Try to float. I tow you in."

Try, hurry," he heard pkins gasp, and then rcia ran to the edge the dock, calling, eve, untie the boat. get the oars."

Rosalie, swimming ngly, also called to g the boat. He real-d in an instant that as better to get the t in spite of the risk Rosalie of Hopkins' icking and pulling under. Marcia, pant-, ran out, dragging oars.

'It's all right," phen said. "Rosalie's ifesaver."

'Hurry, Steve, hurry. Ken, we're coming, ling," Marcia called, sliding down the slip-y incline to the boat, holding the oars.

Lowry had the painter loose and was over side, fitting the oars in the locks.

'Stay here," he said.

'No, no, I'm coming. I can row."

Over the water he heard Rosalie, "I've got n, but hurry, Steve."

'Try to get him on his back."

'I'm trying. I can't."

'Steer," Lowry ordered, "I'll row." The t boat skimmed over the quiet water.

'I can see both heads," Marcia said. "Oh, d, they're in that current, more on your t. They're being swept toward the buoy. , God, if they miss it."

'Steer for it ahead of them. We better be inst it."

e thought of the deadly embrace of a wning man around Rosalie and wanted to for her to save herself. He looked back-rd enough to see them forward on his right l made the terrible decision between them l the buoy.

'Crawl past me quick so you can tie up. going over after the next pull."

Marcia slithered past him like a snake as he pped his oars and slid over the side. The ep of the current was terrible. After the t kick he made no effort to swim against but only to keep his position.

'Don't fight," he yelled at Rosalie. "You'll ft here in a second."

'I've tied up," Marcia said.

"Take the oars. Keep broadside to us. It's all right, I've got them," he said as the two floated against him. "Can you make it?" he asked Rosalie.

She was panting hard. "Yes. He's terribly hard to hold. Have you got him?"

"Yes. Hang on to the boat till you get your breath." He turned on his back and pulled Hopkins on his back beside him.

Rosalie kept beside him, watching the boat, gasping, "You're all right. We're almost there. About ten feet."

"Go ahead," he said, turning his head to see his way. "In over the stern." Then all three of them drifted against the boat and, with one hand on the gunwale, he held Hopkins and himself. He suddenly realized he was not sure Hopkins was still alive. His mouth was open, the water splashing in, and he felt as dead as a wet flour sack. It was a marvel that Rosalie could have held even his head. Already he felt as though his own arm, holding the boat, would be pulled out of its socket.

"Try to get an arm and a leg over the stern," he said to Rosalie. "But don't try to pull yourself up until you've got your breath."

She made one effort and splashed back. Marcia leaned over the stern. "I've got my legs under the seat. When I lean over put your arm under my shoulder. Say when you're ready."

The second seemed eternity before Rosalie said "Ready," and he almost lost his own grip as the boat pounded up and down. Then it steadied and he heard her breathing above him and knew she was safe. Marcia's head was over the side and she was begging Kenneth to speak.

"Oh, Steve, he's not dead, is he?"

"No, I can feel his heart."

"We can hold his wrists until you get in."

"It won't help. We can't get him in that way. Have you got any flares?"

"No."

"Slap him hard across the face. Harder. Ken, try to help yourself. You're all right."

Hopkins made no answer.

"I better try to get us on the buoy. Pull up closer. Easy though."

"You'll be cut to pieces."

"I'm all right again," Rosalie said. "If I get in the water, can't the two of us lift him enough for Marcie to pull him in?"

"I don't think we can out of the water. I could tow him in, but I think he needs to be on his face—I'll try the buoy. It will only cut my feet. Get us around, stern in. Easy now."

Marcia took the oars and maneuvered them in, and Stephen, towing Kenneth, edged along the side. Rosalie slid in the water beside him and took some of the weight on herself.

"Wait, you can kneel on this bait box," Marcia said. There was just room for it between the supports for the bell and light.

"Rosalie, can you hold the boat? Grab that iron beam. Watch your fingers."

"Oh."

"Marcie, undo the painter and tie it around the seat. Good. All right. Let go, Rosalie. I'll slide out on the bait box face down. I think we can manage. You and Marcie hold him half a minute. Now I've got him. I'll lift him head first and dump him in."

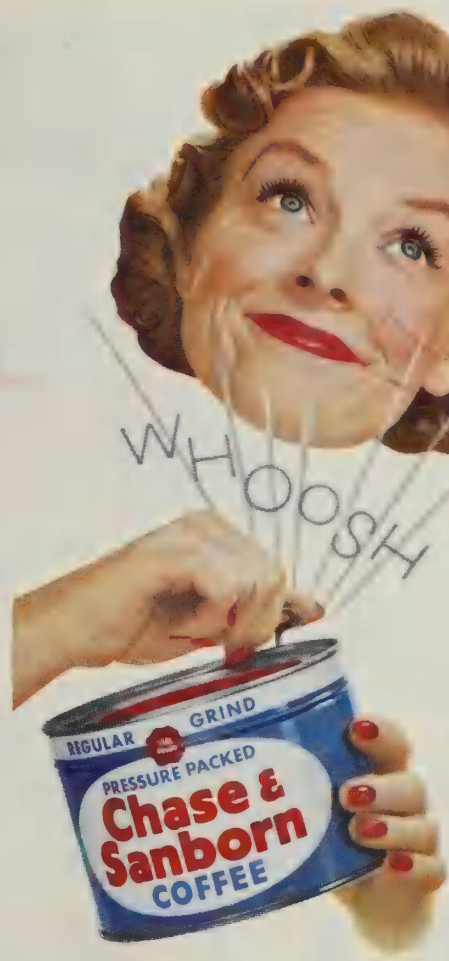
"Wait," Rosalie said. "I've got a foothold. I'll help lift."

"All right, heave."

Hopkins' head and shoulder topped the stern an instant, Marcia tugging at his shoulders, and then he slipped back, Rosalie losing her footing.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 103

NURSERY RHYME



By MARY WEDEMEYER McCARTHY

Quicker than silver,
His thoughts are his deeds,
And loving and laughter
Are all that he needs.

Heedless as sunshine,
Enchanted, he knows
The ways of adventure
Wherever he goes.

But she in her stillness
Holds love in her eyes,
And her gestures of giving
Are tender and wise.

So I shall have music
The lovely day long—
My son is the singing,
My daughter, the song.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

This coffee tells you it's fresher...

...and that fresher Chase & Sanborn flavor makes really full-bodied iced coffee

Crowd the glass with ice! You'll still get full-bodied flavor if you start with Chase & Sanborn. Its fresher flavor won't be watered down by melting ice—or even cream. For Chase & Sanborn is the only leading coffee that's pressure packed. And pressure packing preserves coffee freshness and flavor better than any vacuum can or bag.

Chase & Sanborn coffees are served by more fine hotels and restaurants throughout America than any other brand.

Chase & Sanborn

Fresher because it's pressure packed

Give yourself a FLAVOR BREAK

Make it ICED

Instant Chase & Sanborn, too

THE FULL-BODIED COFFEE

So easy! 50% more jam... and fresher flavor because you boil only 1 minute with SURE-JELL or CERTO

Recipe for perfect homemade strawberry jam. Crush 2 quarts fully ripe berries to pulp. Mix 4½ cups prepared fruit in large saucepan with 1 box Sure-Jell. (Or use liquid Certo—recipe on bottle.) Stir over high heat until mixture comes to hard boil.

Stir in 7 cups of sugar, at once. Bring to full rolling boil, then boil hard 1 minute, stirring constantly. This short boiling time means less juice boils away. So you get up to 50% higher yield—and the flavor comes through fresher with Sure-Jell or Certo!

Remove from heat, alternately stir and skim off foam for 5 min. Ladle quickly into glasses. Paraffin at once. Yield: 11 medium glasses, for mere pennies a glass! And you're sure of perfect results, with either powdered Sure-Jell or liquid Certo!

Sure-Jell and Certo are brands of pect . . . the fruit substance that causes jellin The amount of pectin in fruits varies— Sure-Jell or Certo takes the guesswork o of jam and jelly making. Recipes with pac age and bottle. Products of General Foods

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 101

'It won't do. I've got him," Lowry said, nting.

Then across the water they heard the wail a police-car siren and its searchlight from boathouse lit up the water. They could see policemen on the dock, and some other ple.

A police voice called, "Are you in trouble there?"

"Yes," Marcia called. "A man is drowning." "We've radioed the Coast Guard. They're ning."

"Get a boat from the next dock and hurry."

"O.K., hang on."

Rosalie slithered back into the boat. Ste- n saw blood running down her thighs ere the barnacles had sliced her. She lay , facing him, holding one of Hopkins' sts. Down channel he heard the horn of the ast Guard patrol boat coming toward them, l saw the police putting off from the dock.

"Get a doctor and blankets," he yelled to people on the dock.

"O.K.," they called back.

"You better lie down on your stomachs," said to the girls. "We'll get Ken in the other t."

Then it pulled up beside him. "It's Mr. pkins. Get him in your boat." Even for the police the lift was a heavy one, and for a ment Stephen felt so exhausted he was not e he could row ashore.

The officers glanced at the women without nment and one set about artificial respira- immediately.

"We'll row in," Stephen said. "Get him re as quick as possible. He's swallowed a of water."

"It's running out of him. Sure you can make " they asked. "There's another of our cars v, if you want 'em to come out for you."

"No, it's all right," he said, climbing into boat with Rosalie and Marcia. He could the lights of more cars and hear more ces around the dock. "Get your partners to o the sight-seers away, will you? We've lost suits."

"Yeah, so I see," the one who was rowing lied.

As the police left, the girls scrambled onto the stern seat, Marcia sobbing against Rosalie. Stephen thought of the nightmare dream of being naked in a crowd which would be reality at the dock, and started to row slowly after the other boat.

"Stephen, what will we do?" Rosalie asked.

"We'll manage. Are you badly cut?"

"No, it just hurts. It's only the front of my legs."

"Do you think Kenneth will live?" Marcia sobbed.

"He'll be all right. You both better turn over. We're coming into the lights."

"Call to somebody that there are big towels in the boathouse," Marcia said, "though I don't care who sees me if Kenneth is all right."

He backed on his oars twenty-five feet from the dock, and swung around to watch the four officers bring Kenneth up the ladder. Then Doctor Hovey's voice called to them that he was there. Only three figures besides the police were on the dock, but he could see a ring of spectators farther back.

"My shorts and shirt are by the ladder," Stephen said. "I better swim in and get in them and I'll bring towels to the ladder for you. Can you take the oars, darling?"

"Yes, hurry. I'm awfully cold. I hate to have you go in the water again."

"Nonsense," he said, slipped in and swam to the ladder.

A woman, crouched by it, called, "It's Mary Hovey, Mr. Lowry. Are you all right?"

"Yes. Can you hand down my shorts? They're there."

"Yes, and I have towels for the girls."

"Oh, good. Come in," he called to them. "Mrs. Hovey's here with towels."

"And brandy," she called. "Ken's coming around."

Chilled as he was, his thin shorts and shirt felt like warm parkas as he got into them, and reached up for the towels.

"Back in," he said to Rosalie. "The rope's at the stern."

She swung the boat around and he caught the painter and wound it around his arm.

"Go ahead, Marcie," Rosalie said, shipping her oars neatly.

By MUNRO LEAF

What, oh what can we do to cure these? It is a Foot-Sitter that has just about ruined that perfectly clean sofa. If you have ever seen Foot-Sitters you know that they never sit down without folding a foot underneath them, and you may also know that they never look to see how dirty or muddy their feet are before sitting. Lucky is the house that doesn't have a Foot-Sitter—or if there is one, let's hope it takes its shoes off first.

WERE YOU A FOOT-SITTER THIS MONTH?

SAVE 20¢ on your FAVORITE COFFEE and discover New Instant PREAM— delicious coffee "creamer"

This Special Offer good on any coffee

DO THIS NOW: Mail coupon on this page and one Pream label (Economy or Regular Size) plus: one label from any instant coffee, or one inch of metal winding strip from any coffee can, or the front half of any coffee bag to PREAM, BOX #3, Clinton, Iowa.

However you "cream" your coffee—

You'll love the fresh taste and the convenience of PREAM

Extra creaminess. Pream is made entirely from fresh sweet cream and other milk products. The exclusive Pream® process captures their fresh taste for your table.

Extra convenience. The new Economy Size "creams" up to 70 cups of coffee. Never spills or spoils in daily use. Always handy!

Extra economy. Buy Pream in the big new Economy Size and save. Look for it at your favorite food store next time you shop!

© 1957, H. C. MOORES CO., COLUMBUS 16, OHIO

Hurry!— Mail this valuable coupon now!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

PREAM, Box #3, Clinton, Iowa

I am enclosing one PREAM jar label plus: one label from any instant coffee, or one inch of metal winding strip from any coffee can, or the front half of any coffee bag. Please send me 20¢ in cash.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State____

Limit 1 per family. Offer good in U.S. and Canada. Expires June 30, 1957.

He gave her a hand. Mrs. Hovey reached down to help her. Rosalie followed.

"You poor angel," he said, wrapping her up in the big towel the doctor's wife had brought. "You were marvelous."

"Darling," she said, "'when children are bad, they always, always get hurt.'"

Past midnight they reached their house. Doctor Hovey, uncertain as to the extent of shock, had ordered Kenneth to the hospital. Marcia had gone off in the ambulance with him. The police completed their questions and answers in their memorandum books. Doctor Hovey, after a glance at Rosalie's ugly wounds, told them to go to his office for a better look.

Lying under the bright light on his table, with Mrs. Hovey on one side and Stephen on the other, while the doctor washed off the blood, Rosalie, trying not to wince, said, "Darling, I have been immodest for the last time in my life. Hereafter I'm going to be swathed like a nun."

Doctor Hovey roared with laughter. "That's what they all say. You're all right. Nothing to do. Salt water's done it."

When they turned into their drive, the house was dark except for a table lamp, lit in the hall. They went upstairs together to the boys' room. Both were lying in the deep sleep of childhood and Rosalie carefully removed a baseball bat, a fielder's glove and some wearing apparel from each bed. Across the hall a small girl-tea-rose was sound asleep amid complete and tidy order. Shoes were together, robe over chair and clean clothes for the morrow laid out.

With a sigh of maternal love, Rosalie kissed her, and Lowry and she stole across the hall to their room. The darkness was heavy with French perfume and they lit the lamps on a scene of chaos. One evening dress was on the floor, two others on the bed, four pairs of evening slippers were scattered around the room. The glass-topped dressing table was covered with a snow of bath and face powder and the tops were off all the bottles of perfume. On the table was a sheet of paper on which, a small hand had written:

Dear Mummy: I hope you had a good time. I had fun dressing up.

Your Darling Lainvee.

P.S. I washed my face well afterwards.

P.P.S. Peter has written to daddy under your telephone.

P.P.S. Smoky was quite sick. It was too many eclairs. Too bad.

Rosalie handed the note to Lowry. He read it through. "They know they are not supposed to feed the dog," he said pompously.

"Feed the dog!" Rosalie cried. "Look at this room. Look at my dressing table. What horror has Peter written you about?"

The scrawl under the telephone was brief.

Dear Dad: A man came and wanted to take a picture of mum and you. He said he had one he got at Mr. Hopkins' dock but wanted a better one. I guess he will be back.

Smoky didn't make much of a mess. I guess eating grass is bad for him.

Your loving son,

PETER.

Lowry read it aloud.

"Stephen, who could it have been?"

"Maybe no one. Possibly a reporter."

"Oh, how could I have let us get in such a situation! I should have said no; I knew it at the time. Somehow Cramer will find it out."

At first light that morning Lowry was awakened by the wind and rain, driving in a full easterly against the bedroom windows. The wet, cold air felt wonderfully tonic as he got up to close them. Then he stole out to the children's rooms and closed their windows. How safe the house and those in it now seemed. As softly as possible he slipped back into the warm bed and Rosalie, still asleep, moved closer to him, pillowing her head on his shoulder, so that her hair tickled his chin and nose. The most beautiful and thoughtful of women, he thought with regret, never seem to realize how unendurable that can become. He endured it as long as possible and then moved very slightly away, whereupon Rosalie, moving closer again, announced in clear, grieved tones:

"Now you've wakened me. Why can't you lie still? I want to sleep."

"I can't sleep with your crowning glory tickling me. I'm going to get up. I'll get my own breakfast."

"How can you be so vigorous? What time is it?"

"Oh, about five."

"It's ten after five," a small voice from the open doorway said. "Can I get in your bed, mummy?" Lainvee asked.

"Go back to bed at once," Rosalie said sternly.

"Can't I even watch daddy shave?"

"Lainvee," Stephen said, "your mother's very tired. Now go back to bed, dear."

"I never get to do anything. I've been down to see Smoky. He's all right today."

When Lowry shaved and bathed and came back into the bedroom, Rosalie was sitting up sleepily, examining the cuts on her legs. She sank back on the pillows and pulled up the covers.

"Would you like me to bring you some orange juice and coffee?" he asked, hastily dressing.

"Please not, for four hours. Close the door after you and turn that telephone off." As he bent to kiss her, she saw Peter's note on the night table. "Darling, you don't suppose any one really took a picture of us, do you, or that there'll be anything in the papers?"

"There might be something. After all, you did save Kenneth's life. But certainly nothing to worry about."

He fixed a fine big breakfast, retrieved the morning paper from the rain-swept doorway, glanced quickly through it and settled himself behind the closed door of the library with the notes of Principal Errors. Later he vaguely heard the maids and then the children come down to breakfast.

It seemed to him he had never seen so clearly the direction the book was to take or realized how far organized its material already was. Synopses of several chapters flowed from his pen, full of fresh ideas and points of view.

The house was utterly quiet except for the beating rain on the windows and it was almost ten o'clock when the telephone beside him rang.

It was Kenneth Hopkins, calling from the hospital, full of apologies. He was quite recovered and going home after lunch. He would never forgive himself, etc., etc. Lowry soothed him and returned to work as the phone rang again.

The call was answered simultaneously by Richard and Rosalie and himself. A little girl wanted Lainvee to come for lunch. Lainvee took the phone from Richard.

"Oh, I can't possibly, Lindsay. I have to talk to mummy as soon as she wakes up, because she had her picture taken."

"Dear, your mummy is awake," Rosalie said from the extension.

Some minutes later, in white housecoat, looking tired but beautiful, she appeared in the library. "Nice, quiet morning," she said. Lowry shook his head sadly, and reached again for the ringing telephone.

"For you," he said, handing it to her. "Jane Alden, long distance."

He could hear both ends of the talk that followed.

"Darling, how are you?"

"Oh, fine."

"We're cursing our luck at being up here in Connecticut out of it all. How did you manage that enormous Kenneth?"

"Steve and Marcie and the police did most of it."

"Listen, darling, I'm dying to know, was it one of the Hopkinses' special after-dark swims?"

"What do you mean?"

"Birthday suits. You can be sure everyone will suppose so, so it's best to laugh and say yes if there are jokes about it. Only you do have to be careful about Mrs. Rossiter at the school. She absolutely refused to have those darling Van Tromp children after Sheila was on such a party there. Save all the dirt for me, dear. I'll be back Monday after lunch."

For the rest of the morning neighbors continued to call and in the brief intervals the children alternated in telephoning their familiars about the rescue.

"It's like a funeral, dear," Rosalie said, legs stretched out to the fire, "when they say 'She had so many friends.'"

"I've been thinking ——" Stephen said.

"In this tumult? You really are wonderful."

"That I wish we could fly to England and spend ten days at Oxford, really working."

"Dear, we haven't the money."

The telephone rang again. The caller said he was Joe Casey from one of the news agencies and that his partner, Rudy Ekler, had got a shot of them at the dock but he'd like to come and get another. And there were just a few points they wanted to be clear on.

"We got you clear, Mr. Lowry, the vice president of Continental Industrial Company

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

Defeat comes not so much from physical effects, as from a state of mind which makes men reduce or cease their efforts.

GEN. CHARLES P. SUMMERALL

How to Save time on stove cleaning

Never were stoves so easy to clean - but when foods spatter or spill and burn on - you need S.O.S®

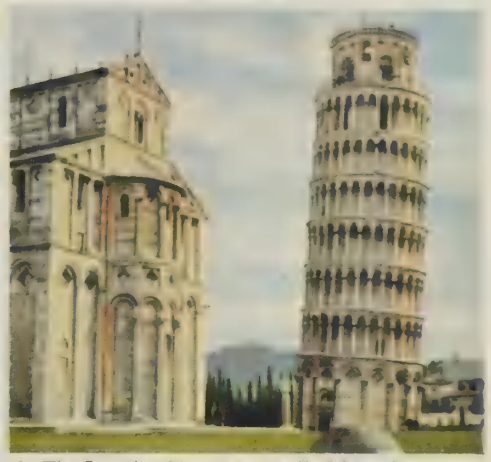
Griddle: Rub briskly with S.O.S. The combination of sturdy fibers and soap wipes off greasy crust, makes griddles gleam!

Reflector pans: Remove and wash as you would any other pan, using S.O.S. to clean off spatters and polish at the same time.

Broiler: Wash after every use, before food burns on tight. Use S.O.S. to clean off food particles and grease without hard scrubbing.

Oven lining, racks: Run S.O.S. pad over entire surface frequently to remove spatters and spills. Oven cleaning never becomes a major operation.

© 1956 The S. O. S. Co. Chicago 38, Ill. S. O. S. Mfg. Co. of Canada, Ltd., Toronto, Ont.



Can you name these cities in Italy?

1. Ancient ruins of the Colosseum seen in_____.

2. Gondolas on the Grand Canal in romantic_____.

3. The Leaning Tower awes all visitors in_____.

Win a trip to Italy via Pan American Airways

World's most experienced airline

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® $100,000 HOLIDAY-IN-ITALY CONTEST

rips to Italy! Nearly 1000 exciting prizes!

first prizes: Expense-paid tours of Italy for 5 couples! elax for two fun-filled weeks . . . travel via luxurious Pan merican Clipper . . . to historic Rome in 16 hours . . . see lorence and Naples in all their beauty . . . visit the fabu- us Isle of Capri . . . explore exciting Amalfi, Sorrento, ompeii, Taormina!

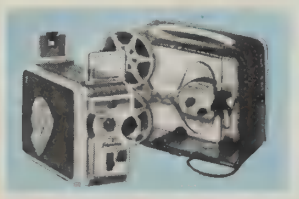
agine! Within weeks you may be inging your way to romantic Italy as the door-to-door guest of Chef oy-Ar-Dee!

The five top winners in Chef's big oliday-in-Italy Contest will receive a glorious free 2-week vacation for two—plus $500 cash to spend as they please!

They'll stop at the finest hotels, dine in the grand Italian manner, enjoy the holiday of a lifetime!

Take a holiday from cooking with HEF BOY-AR-DEE Italian-style foods!

Easy to win! Enter today!



Look at all the other wonderful prizes! You have hundreds of chances to win—so get your pencil out now and mail your entry today!

2nd prizes: 65 modern Caloric 36" White Sands Gas Ranges . . . featuring Thermo-Set Burner and Roto-Ray-Barbequer, easiest range to clean!

3rd prizes: 20 Gibson Refrigerator-Freezers with outstanding new combination features. Dependable, double-duty performance!

4th prizes: 50 complete Kodak Home Movie Outfits, featuring the famous BROWNIE Movie Camera and Projector!

5th prizes: 100 Mow-Master Streamliner Power Mowers, famous for precision grass cutting and trimming, perfect lawn grooming.

6th prizes: 100 beautiful "Watches of Celebrities" by Helbros with 17 lifetime jewels, unbreakable mainspring! For men or women.

7th prizes: 75 Evans Firebird Bicycles, America's foremost Speed King plus 200 Evans Imperial Tricycles, super-deluxe models!

8th prizes: 350 sensational new Sunbeam Automatic Saucepans with exclusive Simmer-Safe Controlled-Heat cooking!

OFFICIAL CONTEST RULES

1. Fill in the name of the city in which each of the above Italian scenes is located and complete in 25 words or less the following sentence: "I like Chef Boy-Ar-Dee..... (fill in the name of product) because..... ....." Use either an official entry blank or a plain sheet of paper. Print your name and address clearly. Submit as many entries as you wish, but each entry must be accompanied by a Chef Boy-Ar-Dee label or box top or a reasonable facsimile thereof.
2. Send your entries to: Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Holiday-in-Italy Contest Box 34C, Mount Vernon 10, New York Entries must be postmarked no later than July 31, 1957 and received by August 10, 1957. Your entries must be your own work, submitted in your own name.
3. Any resident of the Continental United States or Canada may enter this contest except employees (and their immediate families) of American Home Products Corp., its affiliates and their advertising agencies.
4. Entries will be judged by The Reuben H. Donnelley Corporation on: (a.) the correct location of the three pictures, (b.) the originality of thought, sincerity of expression, and appropriateness to the product described in the 25-word completion. Judges' decision will be final. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in case of ties. All entries become the property of American Home Products Corporation, and none will be returned.
5. Winners will be notified by mail or in person approximately 30 days after the close of contest. Prizes will be awarded as listed hereon. Trips must be taken before June 30, 1958. A complete list of winners will be mailed to any contestant who encloses with his entries a self-addressed, stamped envelope.
6. This contest is subject to federal, state and local laws, ordinances and regulations, and is not open to contestants in any area where state or local laws, ordinances or regulations render participation illegal.

OFFICIAL ENTRY BLANK

Mail to: Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Holiday-in-Italy Contest Box 34C, Mount Vernon 10, New York

Write in names of cities identified above.

1 ..... 2 ..... 3 .....

Complete this sentence in 25 words or less:

I like Chef Boy-Ar-Dee .....(name of product) because .....

.....

Your name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone ____ State _____

(Enclose Chef Boy-Ar-Dee label, box top or reasonable facsimile thereof)

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

that's right, and Mr. Hopkins is a lawyer. Got his firm all right."

"Well, I'm not the vice president and my company is Continental Industries Corporation, but we don't want a story in the papers about it."

"Somebody told us your wife who made the rescue is foreign. Do you happen to know where from?"

"Now look, Mr. Casey," Lowry told the reporter, "we don't want to make a performance just because one of our friends swam out a little far and we gave him a hand. That's not news."

"Listen, Mr. Lowry, it's news and it's my hard luck it was too late for the morning papers, but when all parties don't have a stitch on, it ought to be good tonight and tomorrow with Ekler's shot. Give us a break and we'll give you one. Think of what a heroine your wife is. The TV show, Thrill of the Week, is going to want her. Where'd you say she's from? I'm just asking you to co-operate a little."

"I appreciate it, Mr. Casey, and I know you have your job to do, but really we haven't anything to say."

"O.K., if that's the way you want it," Mr. Casey said and hung up.

"Well," Stephen said to Rosalie, "I don't know whether I was wise or not. I suppose if he's sore he'll make more of it."

"I heard the 'don't have a stitch on' part. I am so mad at myself. Do you suppose they'll print it?"

"Oh, I don't think so really. Would you mind my reading this synopsis to you?"

"No," she said. When he finished she said it was very good and asked, "When will we know about the papers?"

At three o'clock he splashed through the rain on foot to the village for an afternoon paper. The news dealer said there was nothing in about them yet, but there was a later editi If he liked, a boy would deliver it.

Rosalie was asleep again when he got b and he resumed work on Principal Erro Looking much better, she appeared for just as the newsboy brought the later editi There was brief mention of the heroic resc but no picture and no reference to clothi It did say Mrs. Lowry was a society matr and mother of three, and gave Hopki weight.

"You see," Lowry said, putting his a around her, "conscience doth make cowa of us all. Now can you take a little more act interest in Principal Errors?"

"Yes, sir," she said meekly. "But it would have been very nice, and it made me ill think about Mr. Cramer. Let's play gan with the children tonight. They've been a fully good all day."

When Lowry went down in slippers a bathrobe for the papers Sunday morning, w the rain still falling, he found, along with t Times and Herald Tribune, unordered cop of two tabloids and a local South Shore pap There, in the last three, was the story w Ekler's shot on the dock of Rosalie and M cia, wrapped scantily in towels. There wa wealth of detail, biographical and otherwi about Diving Godiva, café society's candid for the Carnegie Medal, who had first swu as a girl on her estates behind the Iron C tain in Estonia before meeting the dashi war hero, now a New York executive.

The Times and Herald Tribune gave a f prosaic lines to the story. Lowry read other accounts again, feeling ill himself. T telephone rang.

"Mr. Lowry, this is Schantz, your pap man. I sent you both the tabloids. Will y want me to set aside any more for you to se your friends before they're sold out?"

"No, thanks very much. It won't be nec sary," Lowry said. He wished there were so way he could spare Rosalie. He wished, fact, he knew just what to do. You could buy up a whole issue and you could no lon horsewhip editors.

He tore out the various pages and we upstairs. Rosalie yawned, stretched a turned back the covers in one gesture.

"Dear," he said, "here are the stories. B fore you read them, remember that everybo won't see them and, of those who do, m won't care. Between laughing or crying ov them, it's better to laugh, and ——"

"Undressed?"

"Um, yep. However, if in addition to bei undressed, you had swum ashore and aba doned Kenneth, the story would be worse

"It's all very well for you to laugh about but I should have known enough to say n You're not supposed to do such things, a when you do they get found out."

She got out of bed, quickly donned a ro and went into the bathroom, locking the do behind her. Lowry dressed and went dow stairs.

At breakfast even he felt that the childr looked at their parents with accusing qu tions in their eyes.

"I feel simply horrible," Rosalie said to h later. "I am sure the children know, probab from a friend who heard her mummy a daddy discussing it. I'll be ashamed to go the beach—outside of the fact that my legs a a sight. I've behaved as though I had no sen of decency or responsibility. I resent the at tude people have about European women, a I act as though you had found me in the Pla Pigalle. I am horrified when I think of wha would have said to the children if they'd do it."

"Dear," he said patiently, "stop worryi about it so. It's over with."

"You always say to me things are over wit when they're not."

Late in the afternoon a telegram arriv for Mrs. Stephen Lowry. It was from Chica and said:

HAVE SEEN TIMES ACCOUNT YOUR DARIN RESCUE. PLEASE ACCEPT SINCEREST CO GRATULATIONS ON THIS NOBLE DEED I WHICH MRS. CRAMER AND JOHN JOIN ME. W THANK GOD YOU ARE SAFE.

D. P. CRAMER

fashion rated colors . . . exciting new idea in

Dress by Rosalie Macrini

Now you can live with colors that are flattering to you. Colors inspired by the fashions of the day!

Breathtaking new pastel shades in TEXOLITE paints give an exciting new dimension to home decorating—complement your dress . . . reflect your own good taste.

Those who influence our fashions rated these colors . . . extravagantly praise them . . . "fresh strokes of fashion, applied by the painter's brush," says Vogue magazine.

Why not make your home truly fashionable? Ask your TEXOLITE dealer about new TEXOLITE Fashion Rated Colors, thrilling new idea in home decorating; or write Dept. LHJ-1, 300 W. Adams Street, Chicago 6, Illinois.

TEXOLITE* PAINTS

UNITED STATES GYPSUM

The Greatest Name In Building

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

ou see," Lowry said. "That's all it was, ble deed.'" eight Monday morning Kenneth Hop- telephoned. "Steve, are we speaking?" ked.

ure."

wouldn't blame you if you weren't," said. "but do you want to drive in? I know that I can face the club car. I'm dfully sorry and ashamed to have got n the papers."

've been thinking about the club car, but nk I better face it," Lowry told him. nks, though."

m terribly, terribly sorry about it," Ken ogized.

Well, cheer up. It isn't a tragedy. We're ive."

e club car was an ordeal. The faces of ellow travelers were either hidden behind papers or they wore fixed smiles of charity ellowship, as though to say, "You're still mber of an exclusive club car." A third on kept grinning, if not leering, with the ication that Stephen could give them the details over a drink later.

most the entire office force stopped him questions or congratulations as he made ay to his office. No tabloid clippings were idence, but as he passed the president's door he saw Miss Wilkins busy with scissors on some paper. His telephone was for an hour with congratulations mixed jests of friends such as, "What was the er with you? Lose your water wings?"

osalie telephoned him toward noon to say, alized after you left that the question of e Jim is would come back to you this ning. A letter written to me yesterday in the mail. All he says is: 'Dear Rosalie: t read in the Times of your very brave res- f Kenneth Hopkins and want to send you nost heartfelt congratulations. I have been fortunate in being able to leave Excello have real assurance of getting everything ghtened out very shortly.' He doesn't give ddress. Are you relieved?"

"Yes, but what can he mean 'get everything straightened out'?" Lowry asked. "Mailed from New York?"

"Yes."

"Well, thanks, darling," he said. "Are you all right?"

"Um, managing. The South Shore Breeze called up and wanted to take pictures of the house and of me with the children. I couldn't face the beach yet. I sent the children over and was at loose ends, so I've done quite a bit on Principal Errors. I was amazed, darling, at how much you got done yesterday. You're so smart and so precious. No more now. I love you. Good-by."

Just before lunch Curtis came in and spoke nicely of the rescue. Stephen, feeling that he had been right about few people reading the tabloid story, told him of Cramer's telegram to Rosalie.

Curtis seemed unimpressed. "I thought you might care to read this," he said and handed him a letter from Cramer:

While in Lebanon yesterday I took my friend Bresnahan into my confidence as to my serious doubts about the value we were getting from Frank Parry's services as head of the engine unit. Bresnahan fully agreed with me. He believes, as I do, that if Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Johnson had not had their sympathies worked on by the fact that Parry has a domestic situation and that backward child, he would have been out long ago. True, the plant is not badly run, but that's not enough. I am sure you will agree that we don't owe Parry a thing. Bresnahan, as you know, is worth upwards of a million dollars. His quarry, his store and his fertilizer-spreader company in Lebanon are among the smallest of his companies. I think, in fact I have reason to know, all we have to do to get the fertilizer-spreading company for a buck and a dime, as the boys say, is to throw the engine company under his son-in-law who runs the spreader company. The son-in-law only draws $8000 and bonus, figured on spreader units shipped. Parry, you realize, has been upped to 10. I think we might fix young Shattelcutter's salary—his uncle is Senator Shattelcutter, of Iowa—at 12, but you may think this too high. I think this can be handled as a matter of executive action and doesn't need to go to the board, though I would, of course, tell Mr. Delano. I think all this shows how important it is for us all to get out in the field. D.P.C.

"We stayed in town yesterday because of the storm," Curtis said, taking it back, "and I found myself reading some Walter Bagehot. I copied this bit. It may interest you. 'A large corporation is exactly the place where a vain and shallow person in authority, if he be a man of gravity and method, as such men often are, may do infinite evil in no long time and before he is detected.' I suppose I must do as he asks."

"But Charley," Lowry said, "you can't let him do this. I've only met Parry, but we can't let this happen to the poor guy. He's had a terrible life."

"I know we shouldn't," Curtis said. "I suppose I'm tired or old, but I don't have the mental or maybe it's the moral energy to fight. You feel strongly about it. I was sure you would. Why don't you fight the battle?"

"I don't think I can do that," Lowry said. "The letter isn't to me. It would only annoy Cramer and probably harm Parry's chances. I should certainly think, though, that a strong refusal from you would be enough."

NEXT MONTH

Ruth Madison is a young schoolteacher—held hostage for the lives of 38 school children by two escaping bank robbers in the Arizona desert.

CAPTIVE

the new novel by the Gordons tells the story, beginning in the

July JOURNAL

"Stephen, I'm sorry for Parry, but I don't want a row with Cramer. I've got four years to go before retirement."

"Well, you're not going to spend them agreeing to things like this, are you?"

"It's difficult for you, in the prime of life, to realize how much you want peace after sixty. If you don't want to write Cramer—and I see no reason why you shouldn't say I told you about it—then see Delano or Channing. Tell them how strongly you feel."

"But Charley, you've known Parry all these years. I haven't. I know almost nothing definite about his record."

"I suppose you're right, but about two minutes ago you said, 'We can't let this happen to him.' Now it isn't 'we' when it comes to doing something."

"It's so absolutely clear that you are the natural person to do it. You're the senior officer next to Cramer. You can say 'No' and make it stick. For the moment just write Cramer you'll discuss it when he gets back. Then tell him it's a mistake, and if he persists, tell him you won't stand for it."

"Well, Stephen, I'll tell you this. I don't think you want a showdown with Master Cramer any more than I do. As far as I'm concerned, Parry will have to look out for himself."

Lowry spent a troubled night. He reached his office at his usual hour and was told that Mr. Hewitt was trying to reach him from Chicago.

"Steve, I didn't want to call you at home last night, but I thought you ought to know. Cramer's got all that stuff about you in the tabloids from Miss Wilkins and he's really on a tear. I'm doing my best to quiet him, of course, but he's out for blood. You know the high moral line he can take—well, it was something to hear. I can't advise you what to do, but I'm frankly worried. I don't want to talk any more in case he comes in. Just watch your step. Have some story ready."

(To be Concluded)

LOVE'S OLD SWEET SONG

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 68

pictures in their Hungarian dress . . . Pista and Janos.

Janos. . . . Mitsi leaned closer to take another look at the honest round face. She smiled at the picture tenderly, for he had been her first love in the far-off days when he was twelve and she was ten. He was the head keeper's son. Beautiful games they had together. Wolves chased them over icy steppes, and they shot pretended bears together with wooden guns. He had made a tree house for her, where they kept house together. How clever he had been. He could turn his hand to anything, indoors or out. Full of ambition, Janos had been. They had sat on a fallen tree looking over the flat green country, holding hands, while he sketched for her the life he had planned for himself. He did not intend to remain a country boy. He meant to get on in the world. "You will see, nagisaya," he said solemnly, using always the courteous form of address to her. "I shall become a rich man."

A charming innocent interlude that had been, a song before sunrise that ended the day her mother called her into her room.

"Now that you are no longer a child, these games with Janos must stop, dragan. While you were still a child, it did not matter. Now you are becoming a young woman."

"But, mother, Janos will be so shocked, so hurt," she had said, appalled.

"Janos," said her mother calmly, "has good sense. He will not be hurt. Perhaps I should tell you that it is Janos' father who has spoken to me about it. It is no longer fitting that you should run about wild with his son as in the past. This," said her mother placidly, "is a sensible and good family. They know their place."

So it had to be. In those days one did not argue with one's parents. After that Mitsi saw Janos only from afar, when he carried in the logs, or came to take away the guns and clean them, or her father's uniforms to be brushed. And once they had met in the wood at the back of the house, and had a friendly talk together.

"You must always be my friend," she had said impulsively.

"Give me the rose you are wearing, nagisaya," he said, so she gave him the rose, and he stuck it in his coat. There could be no harm in that. It was a small tight half-opened flower, white, with the heart tinged with gold.

Soon after that she became engaged to Ference.

The wedding had been a splendid affair with feasting and dancing, and lit candles in the church swimming before her eyes in a mist of tears. Not that there had been anything to cry about. Ference had been a good husband.

Janos had worn Hungarian dress, and had come in and helped with the reception, and he bowed very low over her hand when she went away, and said, "God's blessing go with you wherever you are, nagisaya."

Where were they all now, those happy people who had danced so gaily that summer's day? Dead? Deported? She would never know. They had lost sight of one another, families broken and separated, lost to one another in the ghastly exodus over the frontier.

There had been difficult times for Mitsi and many a hateful memory. There was the small seedy man who had oiled up to her in the endless queue where she had had to wait so interminably for her work permit on a chilly London winter afternoon. Out of one corner of his mouth he had spoken to her:

"You got fifty pounds to spare?"

She looked at him aghast. How could she have fifty pounds; and even if she had had it was it likely she could spare it?

"Fifty pounds down, and I'll get you a husband. British," he said. "All ticketty-boo. Lots of them are doing it. Then you won't have to bother with all this."

It had seemed, somehow, the ultimate humiliation. Tears had streamed from her eyes as she turned her back on him. Thank goodness, she thought, remembering it, that racket had been put an end to, but the memory of it sickened her still.

She had managed to build up a sort of life for herself in the Parkinsons' home. They knew nothing about her, save that she was a displaced person who could cook. They were kind to her in a condescending fashion.

"A real treasure," Mrs. Parkinson called her to her friends, but she did not say it to Mitsi herself, for fear of giving her ideas above her station.

Mrs. Parkinson came down to the kitchen after dinner that night. It was a thing she seldom did, and Mitsi wondered uneasily if something was wrong, but it was all right.

"I thought I'd best tell you at once, Mitsi. We have a big party next month. As you know Mr. Parkinson has many foreign business connections, diplomats as well as businessmen, and they are to be in London for a conference. We feel we must entertain them."

Mitsi said dutifully, "Yes, madam," as she had been taught to do.

"There will be some of your own countrymen coming," Mrs. Parkinson said, "which will be nice for you. We shall not expect you to do it all yourself. Mr. Parkinson is arranging for a good caterer to take over, but we thought some of your special Hungarian dishes ——"

"I shall make them very beautifully for you," said Mitsi; but at the thought of some of her countrymen arriving on the scene, her heart sank. Whoever they might be, she had no wish for them to see her as she now was, and she knew too well that all the news she was likely to get from her country would be bad news. "You will not wish me to come upstairs into the dining room," she said quickly.

Mrs. Parkinson looked disappointed. "Mr. Parkinson and I had thought it would be nice if you would help serve in your Hungarian dress."

ALWAYS A HAPPY CHOICE — those delightful Dundees!

Whether you like them balloon-bright or soft as candlelight . . . striped or sprinkled with twinkle, you'll find them all in your favorite budget-bracket. And downy Dundees keep their good looks-appeal and feel-appeal with nary a care!

Dundee Towels

CROYDON, a wonderfully gay way to add drama to your shower decor! Carry striped, edged in licorice-black. Bath Towel about 59¢

TEMPO keeps its lovely look longer with Dacron/Nylon reinforced selvages. Comes in complete ensemble. Bath Towel about 59¢

HARMONY strikes just the right keynote for any bathroom in a captivating chalk stripe available in ensemble. Bath Towel about 69¢

CORONET creates a whole ensemble, a-gleam with golden Metlon metallic for decorator drama. Finger Tips about 49¢ Bath Towel about $1

LUXURY—ensemble in white or colors, with magnificent Metlon gold metallic. Reinforced with Dacron/Nylon. Bath Towel about $1.49

JEWEL—for a breathtaking bathroom! Chalk-striped gemstones flickering with Metlon. Ensemble with fingertips. Bath Towel about $1

DUET, twin-bordered bath-beauty in colors that practically sing! Available in complete ensemble for a fresh new look! Bath Towel about $1

CLASSIC—nicest thing that ever happened to a bathroom! Puff-soft ensemble with smart dobby border. Bath Towel about $1.29

CHANTILLY—the nap of luxury! Sumptuous, angel-touch terry in decorator colors. Dobby-bordered ensemble. Bath Towel about $1.79

DUNDEE MILLS INC., Griffin, Ga.—Showrooms: 40 Worth St., New York 13, N. Y. • Other Dundee Fabrics: Diapers • Flannelettes • Terry cloth • Dunfast All Purpose Cottons

ALL BATH ACCESSORIES COURTESY SHERLE WAGNER

Mitsi said, "No. Everything I will do for you, but not that."

Back in the big comfortable library with its wood fire Mrs. Parkinson said, "There's something funny about Mitsi. I know she's a treasure and all that, but it's quite obvious she has something to hide."

"Remembering that goulash of hers, I'd have her do it," said Mr. Parkinson, an easy-going man.

Waiters came from the catering department, bringing gold chairs in a green van bearing the name MacGreggor and Co., Ltd. Bringing long trestle tables and piles of white pottery, and glass and china. They also brought, on the day of the party, some quite appalling floral arrangements in pots. It was more than Mitsi could bear.

"May I please arrange them a little?" she asked, and the headwaiter said, "Do as you like, as long as you make it plain when the boss comes it was none of us touched them." So she pulled out the poor tortured roses that were crammed into china baskets of horrible design, and rearranged them so that they looked at home. Not like displaced persons herded in a queue, thought Mitsi, smiling to herself. And she arranged the carnations and the lilies of the valley each with its own kind, with long sprays of their own green with them, as way flowers should be. Even the headwaiter, sucking his teeth, agreed.

"Pretty, I will say," he remarked. "But what the boss will make of it is another cup of tea."

Upstairs in the library Mrs. Parkinson said to Mr. Parkinson, "I am going to ask your Hungarian friend from the embassy down to see Mitsi, since she refuses to appear. Maybe he can tell us where she comes from and something about her."

"My dear girl, he is more likely to know everything about our old cook. Let well alone. Maybe she has her own reasons for not wanting to appear."

"I feel certain she has," Mrs. Parkinson said dryly.

"Where the apple reddens, never pry. As Kipling puts it," said Mr. Parkinson. It wasn't Kipling, but he happened to be the only poet Mr. Parkinson knew.

Down in the kitchen, with no idea what was brewing for her, Mitsi made her special goulash, and she made almas retes and kremes pites, crisp and golden and inviting, piled high on Mrs. Parkinson's flowered china dishes. The buffet stood glistening and inviting, all ready. The caterer's men stubbed out their cigarettes and put on their best faces and their black coats, and a large shining automobile drove to the door. Mitsi thought it was the part of the guests, but the headwaiter said it was Mr. MacGreggor come to see everything was O.K.

"And it's O.K. about your flowers. Real pleased with them, the boss was. He asked us who did them, so we told him the cook. He's coming down presently to thank you."

Mitsi said quickly, "No. I am not at home to anyone. I am busy and cannot see them."

"What he wants to do, he'll do," said the headwaiter with obvious respect, as he went off with a tray of glasses.

Presently, by the gay scraping of violins that flowed down the service lift, Mitsi knew the party had begun. The rooms filled up with noise and chatter that drifted downstairs. Loads of dirty glasses, of empty plates came down the lift with a rattle and bounce, to be unloaded by Mitsi, who stood at the bottom waiting, enveloped in her big white apron. The daily woman, Mrs. Gruel, had been sent to come and give a hand with the washing up, but she was never one to put herself out on someone else's account. It was her right for going to the pictures so to the pictures she went, sending word along only at the last moment. Mitsi had to manage alone. Not that she minded, only it did not go as quickly as she would have liked, on account of her having only one pair of hands. There was always someone banging impatiently on the lift shaft upstairs.

When the door of the kitchen opened she thought it was the headwaiter again, and she said calmly, "Yes, yes. They are arriving now in a moment," stacking the newly polished glasses, the plates refilled with canapés into the lift. As soon as she looked at him, she realized this must be Mr. MacGreggor himself paying his promised visit, or, more likely, come to complain. He was tall, with an unmistakable air of authority about him, and in his buttonhole he wore a small white rose tinged with gold. He was so well dressed and well set up he might have been one of the guests, except that of course no guest would find his way belowstairs.

"You are all alone," he said. "Why did you not tell me? I could have sent someone to help you."

"I am used to being alone," she said. The tomcat, looking supercilious, arrived through the window with the air of one not wishing to miss anything. "But, you see, I have one friend," said Mitsi, smiling.

Mr. MacGreggor said, "You are Hungarian?"

"Yes, I am Hungarian. She gave him a look that was suddenly distrustful, for it came to her maybe he was one of Mr. Parkinson's Hungarian acquaintances come to pry.

"From Kendares?" he said, and his voice was oddly breathless.

"From Kendares," she said. "You know this place?"

The kitchen table had been between them, but now he came round it, and he knelt down beside her, not giving a fig for the knees of his expensive suit on the kitchen floor. He took her two hands in his and held them against his face.

"You do not know me?" he said. "You do not remember those days and the games we played and the wolves that chased us, nagisaya? And the wooden house I built for you in the trees, where we pretended we had a home together? And the rose you gave me that time—the last time —— Always, look, I wear a rose."

She looked at him then, and saw it was the same honest boyish face, only thinner, and the eyes were the same honest country eyes that had smiled into her own, long, long ago.

"Janos," she said. "My little Janos. Is it possible! But what do you do here? Are you merchant? Diplomat?"

He laughed, and when he laughed he was a boy again, the boy she had known in those other years.

"No. I am the caterer, believe it or not. I was lucky, nagisaya," he told her, "I learned some cooking in those days from Zusanaa. I came to England. In England, anyone who can cook can make a fortune, for always the English are hungry and always there is nothing fit to eat. So I begin, and soon I am a rich man, with a catering business that has many branches. MacGreggor and Co. Diplomacy? Phut! Anyone can become a diplomat, and struggle to make ends meet, but he who can cook has the world at his feet. And you, what are you doing here, down in this place, dressed so?"

She said, laughing, "I also am the cook."

"You are the cook? Here? It cannot go on so. You must come with me. The old world is dead, dragan, but we can build a new one together. Now I have a better house for you. No longer a wooden house in a tree—a good house. And I will keep off the bears. Nagisaya, my beautiful, my darling one, there shall be no more wolves ——"

Just when one thought the winter would never be over, the snowdrops appeared.

Mrs. Parkinson had explained the situation to the man from the Hungarian embassy in Paris before she took him downstairs and opened the kitchen door. Someone was banging impatiently on the walls of the service lift for more clean glasses, but nobody was taking any notice.

Mitsi stood in the arms of Mr. MacGreggor the caterer, the tomcat looking on with an air of smug approval. So engrossed were they with each other that neither heard the kitchen door open.

"Nagisaya," said Mr. MacGreggor, and he said it over and over again. "Dragan," he said.

"I do not think we are needed here just now," said the Hungarian gentleman, and he backed out tactfully, leaving Mrs. Parkinson no choice but to follow him.

"That's the caterer—Mr. MacGreggor," said Mrs. Parkinson, furious. "He was recommended to me as a most reliable man."

"I think that he is probably highly reliable," murmured the Hungarian gentleman.

"Nagisaya. What on earth does it mean, nagisaya . . . dragan?"

"'Dragan' means 'my darling.' 'Nagisaya' is a term of respect, used only to those of big families. Important persons, with titles, of whom we have now so few left."

"Nonsense," said Mrs. Parkinson testily. "The woman is my cook." END

E E E E E E E

The trade of advertising is now so near to perfection that it is not easy to propose any improvement. But as every art ought to be exercised in due subordination to the public good, I cannot but suppose it as a moral question to those masters of the public ear, whether they do not sometimes play too wantonly with our passions? DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON

E E E E E E E

"love walks the pleasant mazes of her hair"

Your hair remembers its loveliest lines . . . when it's trained with Helene Curtis Spray Net®

trains as it sets pincurls . . . trains as it holds your wave

If your hair inspires no poetry, is the fault perhaps your own? Are you using a mere pincurl spray? Or are you training your hair with Helene Curtis SPRAY NET and its exclusive "control" ingredient? Use SPRAY NET to set silky but long-lasting pincurls. Use it as always to hold your hair in place. Gradually, excitingly your curls get the habit of curling. These lovely waves remember their place from shampoo to shampoo. Use SPRAY NET faithfully, confident that soon your hair will be trained to softest perfection—poetic perfection!

BOTH FORMULAS NOW IN GLAMOROUS NEW GOLDEN CONTAINERS

SUPER SOFT
trains most hair and hair styles beautifully.

REGULAR
for hair harder to manage.

69¢, Large $1.25, Giant Economy $1.89 plus tax.

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

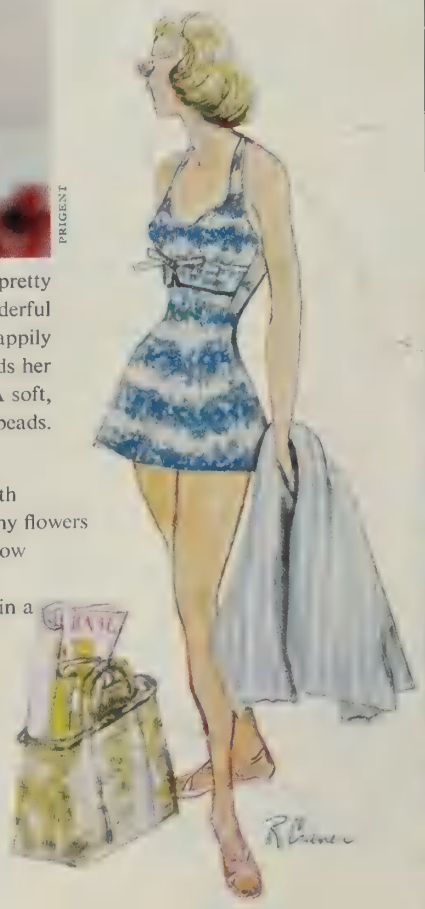
Having a Wonderful time

Barbara J.'s prescription for this: lots of thought beforehand . . . not a care in the world (at least fashionwise) once her bag is packed and she's on her way! All former spring and summer purchases enter into the scheme of Barbara's vacation plans—and she finds they will be just as pretty and busy away as at home. Starting from what she already has in her wardrobe, she fills the very few remaining vacancies with two lighthearted additions: a white, very white dress; a bathing suit in bright colors. They have the look of happy vacationing—blue skies, heavenly sunshine, lots of leisure and . . . a wonderful time!

By BET HART

The white dress—sleeveless to show off a pretty sun tan, a gently flared skirt and in a wonderful fabric, Arnel sharkskin, that takes happily and easily to washing. Barbara adds her turquoise scarf and pin at the waistline. A soft, deep V neckline takes prettily to beads.

Into one suitcase,



Barbara packs her polka-dot dress, white sweater, all her separates from May, white chiffon skirt, coral bolero and trimmed shirt. To add to the gaiety of all, she chooses the brightest accessories she has!

Traveling,

Barbara wears her beige skirt and blouse, over her arm carries her beige coat.

Left behind,

but not forgotten, her black dress. Newly washed, hanging neatly in the closet, it will be welcomed to wear for the next day (or days!) when she returns.

Barbara's bathing suit to wear gaily beneath sunny skies is polished cotton striped in tiny flowers of turquoise on white. A tight bodice cut low in the back and flared skirt add to an already pretty figure. Barbara also invests in a straw carryall—costs her all of $1.98.

shion $'s for Vacation

ite sharkskin dress	$10.95
tton bathing suit	10.95
raw carryall	1.98
Total	$23.88

For bridal showers and other special occasions, serve this diamond-studded dream dessert. It's one egg white beaten with ⅓ cup of mint jelly over hot water until fluffy. Fold in drained DOLE Fruit Cocktail. Chill. Garnish with additional Fruit Cocktail. Diamond-sprinkle with silver decorettes. It's a minty dream of five fruits—peaches, pears, grapes, cherries and Hawaiian pineapple. Very festive. Very easy. Very, very good.

DOLE Fruit Cocktail—gem of them all

Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd., Honolulu, Hawaii—San Jose, California

YOUNG HOLLYWOOD AT HOME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

and the free-form pool directly outside it. On the terrace that joins them Cyd often teaches Little T to dance. He compensates by teaching her how to box—"We send him to a school where he studies athletics—he has energy to burn—will probably be a sports fan like his father." Tony stretches out in the sun in a lounge chair, radio at his side, listening to a baseball broadcast.

On the sun-striped terrace, overlooking a valley below and an ocean lapping at the far horizon, no sound but family living breaks the deep silence. Often Tony flies home in three-day breaks between singing engagements 3000 miles away—New York, Florida, Nevada or London can all be on the work schedule in a busy year—just to soak up the restfulness of a family weekend. Cyd says, "We all get geared to travel in our work, just the way I imagine John Foster Dulles does. It gets to be a fact of life."

The house is ideally suited for both formal and casual living. In the living room of super-Cinerama length dozens of guests often gather for a bon voyage or welcome-home event. A party of six or more friends may be invited for dinner in the candelabra-lit dining room where one wall is mirrored, another windowed to look out over lights coming on in hills around. "We like a change to formality," Cyd says, "after being casual all afternoon."

Why can we remember the tiniest detail of what has happened to us, and not remember how many times we have told it to the same person?

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

On a party evening Tony will do new songs at the piano or pick up sax or clarinet for close harmony with fellow musicians. "Little T," he mentions parentally, "has perfect pitch—it pains him to hear a wrong note—he was telling me the other day he plans to write music when he grows up."

Cyd, as hostess, supervises trays of refreshments prepared in the oversize kitchen with its gala aqua-and-white striped ceiling and airy work space—"I never learned to cook—I was always too busy dancing—so I leave family meals to the housekeeper," but she enjoys putting together party fare, making cheese dips or mashing crisp bacon into avocado and seasoning it for a tasty bread spread.

Tony is the impulsive "come over tonight" kind of host, his wife a planner who'd rather work out all details in advance. "But we both like people, so we entertain both ways." Ordinarily evenings are quiet with Cyd at work on M-G-M's Silk Stockings. In rehearsal, she works at the studio from 9:15 to 5:30. When actual shooting begins, she must be in make-up and costume and before cameras by 8:30 every morning (rising time: 5:30) and often works through until 7 P.M. But there's more leeway for leisure since the studio recently cut down from a six-day to a five-day week. "I'm not sure it helps a dancer not to dance two days a week," she worries, and keeps in training by joining husband and sons in a Palm Springs weekend to fit in the tennis and golf Tony enjoys, or does ballet exercises at home on a Saturday. The house has space for everything.

"At one time we thought it would never take shape," the Martins explain. "We had such a good offer for the place we were living in that we decided to sell right then and build what we wanted." Angled on all sides to take advantage of its hilltop view, the house has movable indoor walls in the living area that slide to shade and cool the rooms when needed or open to make the most of ocean breezes at evening. From the living-dining-kitchen area the house plan moves on into a separate sleeping wing removed from any distracting noises. Everywhere, ample storage and closet space was incorporated to fit individual needs. Handiest of all from the Martins' point of view are the walk-in two-level closets where wardrobes hang in double tiers, and hangers all have slim poles attached for ease in transferring garments up or down.

"We need a lot of clothes, professionally and personally, and for more than one climate"—for Cyd's location trips, Tony's supper-club work—"and this way we can put the ones not often used on the top rod and not have to bother with storage chests."

In the big garage flanking the kitchen are the three cars "necessary out here." Tony uses one, Cyd another, and there's an extra for shopping trips by the staff who would otherwise have to hire cabs to bring in household supplies—Cyd's working day ending long after stores are closed. "Pretty soon," Cyd reflects, "Nicky will be old enough to need a car—but I still can't believe it." He goes to and from school currently with friends and their parents in a car pool. Cyd herself often chauffeurs the high-school crowd, and attends P.T.A. meetings when she can after dinner.

"Did you speak at all?" Nicky asked after her first visit to a meeting at his high school.

"No, dear," answered the gentle screen beauty whose home life is directed by three men, "I listened."

END OF THE ROAD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 67

orange, copper and purple. I took to the woods right then and there. I wandered in a ways and stood around like an Indian in a cathedral. There was noise in church too. I could hear caws and calls and chirps and screeches and whistles, but now and then they'd all stop together and there'd be a soft sunny silence with nothing louder than the whisk of a wood mouse or the fall of a leaf. Mrs. Honeycutt, a man could lose a lifetime in a place like that, but being sort of unsentimental I only lost four or five hours."

The lovely widow was listening avidly, not wanting to miss a word.

He took a deep breath and backhanded his brow.

"Mr. McHugh," she asked, "would you like a glass of cider?"

He grinned.

When she brought out a large tumbler of cold reddish liquid he sipped it first, like wine, flourished his tongue and took a great long draught.

"Ah-h-h," he declared with a satisfied sigh. "God bless you. And, of course," he added with a wink, "God bless apples."

Her soft smile told only a little of her delight.

"Shall I continue?" he asked.

"Why, yes, Mr. McHugh," she replied. "Please do."

I don't know who you are, she thought, or why you've stopped here or how you know my name, but I could listen to you all day long.

"Well," he began again, "I got into Ponkapoog by late afternoon swearing at a slow road and wondering when I'd ever get to Canada. I generally put up at a rooming house, but Ponkapoog didn't have one. They had a fire station, though."

"Yes," Mrs. Honeycutt remarked. "That's the central station for Pequosset County."

"Uh-huh," McHugh replied. "Well, the man on watch there said I could wash up, clean up and sleep all night for a dollar. A good night's sleep being worth exactly one million dollars, I considered that a bit of a bargain, so I gave him a dollar of my lobster money and then I went out and spent another dollar on a clam supper that was worth a thousand.

"Around nine-thirty, ten o'clock," he continued, "I turned in on a cot by Engine Number One. In my sleep around two in the morning I dreamed I heard a noise, a big noise—a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

Have a Pepsi

the Light refreshment

It's a long way from the bustled beauties in grandmother's wedding picture to the slim, trim bridesmaids of today. Modern diet—the trend to lighter, less-filling food and drink—can certainly take credit for the difference.

Today's Pepsi-Cola, reduced in calories, goes right along with this sensible trend. Never heavy, never too sweet, Pepsi-Cola is the modern, the light refreshment. Have a Pepsi.

Refresh without filling

PEPSI-COLA

Now you can enjoy the full beauty of lovely radiant hair more often with

Lady Sunbeam®

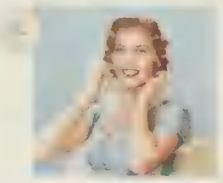
CONTROLLED HEAT

HAIR DRYER

Only Lady Sunbeam gives you all these advantages

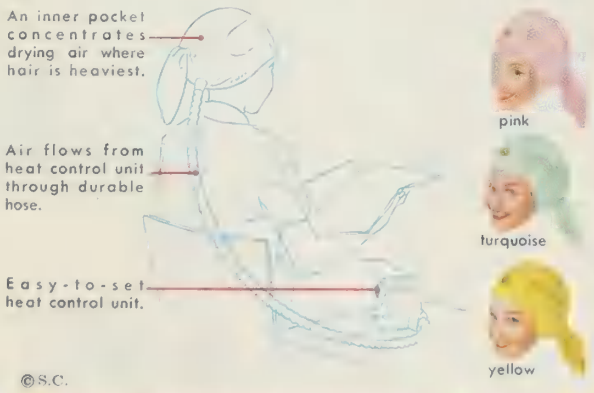
- Greater convenience
- More freedom
- Faster drying action
- More comfortable
- Scientific heat control

Enjoy new hair drying speed, comfort and convenience



New, scientifically designed vinyl cap fits easily over your hair and concentrates drying air where hair is heaviest. Drying air comes from heat-control unit through durable, flexible hose. No more head turning or tiring arm raising as with an ordinary hand-type dryer. No more hot air on neck and shoulders as with a professional-type dryer. And the Lady Sunbeam is so simple to use—just set the dial for any temperature you want—hot, warm, medium or cool. Cap has no electric wires.

HANDS ARE FREE
Do nails, write letters, etc.



MORE COMFORTABLE
No heat on neck, shoulders.

FASTER
You are finished in minutes.

Your Choice of Colors

©S.C.

Look for the MARK OF QUALITY Sunbeam® Famous for Mixmaster, etc.

Sunbeam Corporation, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois • Canada: Toronto 18

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112

boom. Then I woke to a big bell banging in my ear like a Shanghai gong. From where I sat up I could see burning red outside in the harbor. I like to think I know one thing from another and I realized it was no time to see if my socks matched. I ran for the town dock, threw off the mooring line of a small boat and rowed away like a crazy man. Crazy or not, I never missed a stroke and a good thing I didn't. A pleasure cruiser was blazing bright. I took a little girl out of the water. She had a life ring around her, but she was so little she was lost in it. I got her ma too. Seen her jump and got to her in a jiffy. And her pa. He was burned bad. Leaped right out of the flames and fell across the rowboat. He nearly upset us all, besides breaking his leg. He passed out and on the way back I had to knock the woman cold to keep her from hugging at him. Burned the way he was with his leg bone broke through the skin, she would have killed him altogether with her carryin' on."

Mrs. Honeycutt, whose glance was ever soft, now had excited eyes, bright and lively as the heroic happenings she pictured.

She urged him on. "What had happened? Will they be all right?"

"Oh, yes," he assured her. "Their gasoline engine had been leaking and fuming the day before. The woman woke up that night and lit a cigarette. They were lucky. Fire's a terrible thing, in the night. The husband'll be in the hospital some time, but he'll heal fast wi his family safe."

"Because of you," the widow remarke somewhat worshipfully for a handsor woman with many suitors.

"What gets me," McHugh continued, lay down like a nobody for a night's sleep in nondescript little town and by morning I'm great big somebody. The town square is fi of people wanting to shake my hand. I'm o fered housing, a boat, a job and a guest a pearance at the next selectmen's assembl Seems that fellow I saved had a lot of frien and all of a sudden they were all mine. Not h wife, though; she was still kind of mad 'cau I socked her."

Mrs. Honeycutt laughed in sisterly appr ciation and was pleased to see McHugh gr understandingly.

"I was a whole week getting out of th place," he went on. "The morning I left, th firehouse watchman came up to me. 'I've ha some time gettin' hold of you,' he says, 'th way you been staying this place and that.'

"'Oh,' says I.

"'Here,' he says, and he hands me a fift cent piece.

"'What's this for?' I asked him.

"'Heck,' he says, 'you only slept half th night.'"

Mrs. Honeycutt hated, hated to hear th telephone ring. Twice, twice, once.

"Excuse me, Mr. McHugh."

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 80 AND 81

Vogue Design No. 9211.	One-piece dress and bolero; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9221.	Jacket; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 50c.
Vogue Design No. S-4798.	One-piece dress and jacket; 10 to 20 (31 to 40). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. 9210.	"Very Easy to Make" skirt, overskirt and cummerbund; 24 to 30 waist measure. 60c.
Vogue Design No. 9222.	One-piece dress and jacket; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.

"Certainly, ma'am," he said, rising as he oke.

Answering the kitchen phone, Alice Honeytt heard her son calling from his home in aview.

"Ma."

"Yes, Edward."

"Ma, there's a feller here name of Tom Samls. He used to know pa and he says he'd like look at the place. Want me to send him er?"

"I don't think so, Edward. Not today."

"Look, ma, I've sold him on everything t the price. If you're going to be settled in ngor by the first snow, you don't have ich time."

"I know, Edward, but not today. It's really ry late."

There was some conversation on the other d.

"Here's Mr. Samuels, ma. You tell him."

"Mrs. Honeycutt?" Somewhat peremptory.

"Yes."

"Better see me, Mrs. Honeycutt. I'm in a yin' mood." Heartiness. Not heart.

"Are you really, Mr. Samuels?" she said htly, holding herself aloof from his cajoling eer.

"Indeed I am," he insisted. "What's more, e driven thirty miles to see your place."

"Thirty miles?" She mused. "Why, Mr. muels," she said mindfully, "that's hardly a y's walk."

And she hung up.

She stood for moments before returning to porch. She really wasn't acting sensibly at . Just because a man walked up, tipped his sy cap, spoke in sounds and colors and told r fairy tales as though she were a little girl. e reprimanded herself. He's like the road, thought. He rambles on and on and doesn't anywhere.

A gentleman, though, she admitted, and a nly one. Polite, clean-spoken, sun-brown d sturdy. Adventurous too. And how come knew her name?

She had to know. She went back out to the rch.

"Ma'am," John McHugh said, "it occurs me I've been taking up a good bit of your ne. I feel refreshed and maybe I'd better be ting on."

Her heart fell. Oh, please don't go, she ought.

"Why, Mr. McHugh," she said chidingly, "would you go away and leave a good story half told?"

"Well, no," he replied. "Not to a good listener. I tell you, though," he added, "it's getting very cool now and I'd feel more comfortable if you'd put that shawl around your shoulders."

She took the shawl from the chair back and dressed it round her. She already felt wonderfully warm.

"Well," McHugh continued, "here we go again on that crazy road. I set out from Ponkapoog to Quemasset about seven in the morning figuring to do the nineteen to twenty miles by noon easy. Trouble was, though, all I had had for breakfast was 'Good-by' and pretty soon the exercise and the sharp air started teething on my appetite. Anyway, I came to this salt inlet with a wood bridge over it and while I was leaning on the rail looking down at the water I saw a crab and then I saw another and then I saw a whole slew of them. Well, nobody's ever had to ring a bell to bring me to breakfast. I went down along the inlet to a sandy place, took off one shoe and one sock and set out to set the table. I've crabbed before on the Chesapeake shallows, but that was with a boat and poles and a baited clothesline. This time all I had was my appetite. I made a starving adventure out of it, though. I waded out ever so slow, ever so slow till I was up to my waist, and my one shoe soggy wet. Then I lifted out my leg with a fine footful of toes ——"

"Oh, my goodness," Mrs. Honeycutt exclaimed with a shiver. This was something her brothers used to do on dares.

"Now, now," he gentled. "Don't be alarmed. I had heard about it before from men who had been really hungry. The worst part was keeping my balance. Pretty soon I saw a crab fetch up and catch on, but in that cold water it wasn't any more to me than a mosquito bite. Soon as he was set I just brought my leg over like a lazy man fixing to scratch, then I scooped him up fast and flung him ashore. In ten minutes I got six big ones. Six"—he grinned—"mind you. With only five toes."

She had to laugh.

"But your foot?" she ended seriously.

"A little blue," he told her, "but not bleeding a bit. Salt's like alum. Besides, those crabs don't bite at first. They just sort of nibble."

THER VIEWS OF JOURNAL PATTERNS ON PAGES 80 AND 81

(Back views are shown only where the design continues to the back.)

2902 2904 2905

2906 2907 2908

All step-by-step SWEATER trimming instructions are JOURNAL patterns which can be applied to any classic cardigan sweater.
Also, to Vogue's Jacket Design No. 9221. Other wool-jersey jackets are included in Vogue Designs No. 9222 and No. 9211.

Start enjoying this new safe way to feminine daintiness

Only the Lady Sunbeam®

has the "compact" shape and the exclusive MICRO-TWIN Head

Enjoy new freedom from nicks and cuts this safe, gentle, quick way

ONLY the Lady Sunbeam has the "compact" shape and the shaving head with one edge especially honed to shave the legs, and the other edge especially honed for underarm use. Ends muss and fuss, nicks and cuts of soap and blade. The Lady Sunbeam's gentle, sure performance eliminates underarm irritation caused by blade shaving and gives you a new easy way to keep neat, fresh, dainty. Your choice of 6 lovely colors.

Small as a compact—and fast, sure, convenient.

Lady Sunbeam ELECTRIC

Only $14.95

Also available in Deluxe white leather zipper case—slightly higher.

See Sunbeam Products demonstrated on the Perry Como Show

©S.C.

Look for the MARK OF QUALITY Sunbeam® Famous for Ironmaster, etc.

Sunbeam Corporation, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois • Canada: Toronto 18

"M-m-m-m," she said, marveling. "I can imagine."

"Anyway," he went on, "I got a driftwood fire going, put the wet shoe and sock close as I dare, put a stick to a crab, baked it and ate it and then ate four more. I threw the last one back so's he could have a story to tell too. Then I lay drying out in the sun by the side of the road with a full stomach and an empty expression. I smelled the salt air, saw the blue sky, looked to the woods beyond and listened to the faraway sound of the surf. 'McHugh,' I told myself, 'on this road you'll never, never, never get to Canada.'"

He was silent. His eyes deep, his expression pensive. For almost a minute she forbore to speak.

"Mr. McHugh," she said at last, "your story reminds me. You must be hungry now. Won't you stay to supper?"

He awoke from his thoughts. "You're very kind, Mrs. Honeycutt. I'd be delighted."

He set his cap on the carryall and opened the screen door for her.

In the great kitchen he hung the cap on a wall rack by the woodshed door. She went to a side room and returned with a towel half as big as a bedspread.

"There's a work shower at the other end of the woodshed," she told him. "If," she added slyly, "you don't mind cold water."

He laughed and went out.

She busied herself briskly, wanting to set him a wonderful supper. From time to time she glanced at the tipsy cap, the crazy clockwork of its colors—the jaunty look, the happy spirit of it. She went and touched it, felt the stuff of it—the soft crush and then the crinkle.

It's new, she noted.

Forty minutes later McHugh sat to table wearing clean whipcord pants and a wrinkled white shirt. His curly hair, close-cropped, shone bright and black. A bead of water trickled to his cheek. She noticed it.

Before him she set broiled fish bound in bacon, two large baked potatoes, two large ears of corn and a great gob of butter. Behind his back she noted the wear of the white shirt, saw it needed ironing, needed sewing, but couldn't stand many more washings.

Much later McHugh leaned back like a baron from a banquet, lit a cigar and breathed blue smoke above his brown face.

"Mrs. Honeycutt," he remarked, "you invited me to finish my story, but after a meal like that I'm all out of words."

"Enjoy your cigar, Mr. McHugh."

Reckless automobile driving arouses the suspicion that much of the horse sense of the good old days was possessed by the horse. ANON.

He did. She was content to watch, her eyes sweet on him but gently so.

At last she spoke.

"Mr. McHugh, you have me intrigued. Won't you tell me how you knew my name and why you came here?"

"Mrs. Honeycutt," he said, "I've asked myself that question, too, but to answer it . . . well, we'll have to go back on that road again. The reason I was on the road in the first place is this: Back in Boston some time ago, I was a well-to-do man. I had a grand wife and a good son and a fine business. I owned two lumberyards. After school and on weekends my son—he was sixteen—worked in both of them. About that time I had some trouble with some men. We won't go into that, but one fine day one of my lumberyards burned down and two weeks later on a fine spring evening so did the other one. In the second fire, my son was suffocated. Smoke poisoning. He died right in my arms. The firelight on his face.

"His mother was disconsolate. I was out of my mind, but worse was to come. A month or so later my wife was discovered to have an extensive cancer. In the next nine months I spent twenty thousand dollars, most all I had, to reclaim her from that awful affliction. I barely had enough money left to give her a decent funeral."

His eyes were solemn and intense.

"For weeks, months, a year I raged around the streets, fought, drank and did my desperate best to ruin myself."

The widow's eyes were tearful.

"As the saying goes, Mrs. Honeycutt, I finally cracked up. I blacked out completely. I don't know where a man's mind goes when he loses it, but mine must have gone back to where it was created, because when I woke up weeks later my mind was clear. I was somewhat sane and somewhat sensible and the past was really past. I was released from a rest home into my brother's care.

"There was no staying in Boston for me, ma'am. You can't start a new life on old grounds. I borrowed a little from my brother, packed this bag, wet my finger and held it to the wind. The wind was from the north.

"I had heard a lot and read a little about uranium and such up in Canada, so I decided that was where I was going. I brought flowers to my wife and my son and I said good-by. Walking out of the suburbs, I saw this cap in a store window and I said to myself, 'If I wear a cap like that on my head I'll never have heavy thoughts again.' I was right. I've been lighthearted ever since.

"So," he said, "Boston to Bangor, Bangor to Quemasset. In Quemasset ——"

The phone rang again. Twice, twice, once. Wishing it had never been invented, she rose and went to it.

"Hello," she said.

"Hello, Louise?"

"Harvey?"

"Who else? Who else? I'm calling from the bank, Louise. I'm afraid I'll be an hour or so late. Two fleets came in this afternoon, Sanborn's up from Bangor, and it seems I've got to supervise everything."

She was silent.

"Louise! Are you listening?"

"Yes." Behind her she heard McHugh lea the table and walk toward the porch. Goo ness. He wouldn't go away, would he?

"Louise, you sound a million miles away Harvey said.

"Harvey, I'm right here. What is it yo want?" Her impatience was plain.

"I told you. I won't get to your house t nearly nine. Have you forgotten we were goi out tonight?"

"No, I hadn't." Yes she had.

"Around nine, then, all right?" he asked.

"No, that will be too late."

"All right, all right," he said after a paus "I'll leave in a little while."

"Harvey."

"What?"

"Be a nice boy and call me in the morning.

"Now, Louise, I've planned —— Nov Louise, be reasonable." And finally, "Louis you're acting like a little girl. What's cor over you?"

Would he ever hang up?

"Listen, Louise, you're a fine attracti woman, but if you expect to be ——"

She held the receiver away from her.

When she brought it to her ear again sl heard "—— business before pleasure" . . "not many men in my position" . . . "g to realize" . . . "responsibilities ——"

Ever so gently, she hung up on him.

Turning, she noticed the bright cap was r longer on the hook. Lord, she thought, don let him be gone.

Outside on the porch, twilight was lowerin McHugh rose to speak as she returned.

"I thought you might want privacy."

"It was very courteous of you," she a swered, sitting down opposite him.

"Well, anyway," he began again, "goi into Quemasset the road just about had n befuddled. I was drifting and dreaming ar caring no more for Canada than for t Congo. I put up overnight in Quemasset an lay awake wondering what to do with mysel In the morning I thought I knew.

"I went out looking for a lumberyar There wasn't any. A woodworking sho

A CinemaScope Picture released by 20th Century-Fox, produced by Jerry Wald Prods., Inc. Color by Deluxe.

DEBORAH KERR LOVES
LUSTRE-CREME
SHAMPOO

never dries–it beautifies

thick and creamy . . .
blessed with lanolin!
needs no after-rinse!

of course, it leaves hair more manageable!

Cream or Lotion

NO WONDER IT'S THE FAVORITE SHAMPOO OF 4 OUT OF 5 TOP HOLLYWOOD MOVIE STARS

re wasn't any. A hardware store. No hard-e store. There was a general store, igh, so I went in, introduced myself to the prietor, told him of my experience and d him for the benefit of his. He said the e for me was in Seaview. He said everyg was there. The lumberyards, the boat-ls, the businesses, the banks.
'All right,' I said. 'But, tell me, isn't e another road to Seaview besides this
?'"

Irs. Honeycutt's smile was now as soft as twilight around it.

IcHugh continued: "He told me there n't; but he said that about halfway I'd ie to the Honeycutts' place and if the ow was home she was a good woman who ildn't give me less than a drink of water.
other fellow spoke up then and said the e might be sold already and another fel-said it was awful lonely for a woman in big house anyway, and then another idered why her son in Seaview hadn't n her in."

Why, he offered to many times," Mrs.
eycutt said proudly, "and so did his ing wife, but they're newlyweds and I ildn't dream of intruding on them."

I understand," said McHugh, "but you picture me listening to that bunch. They being a woman you'd probably be ped out of a fair sale and then they said place was probably running to ruination way, without a man to tend it. Well, I'm ng you, when I walked out of there I had in mind as a frail old lady in a dark old se, bereft of your husband, deserted by r son. I pictured you wondering and worg how to cope with things. You know.
roof leaking, the porch falling apart, the l going to weed. And most of all, being
e. I saw you having to leave finally with r whole world coming to a sad end.

"'Well,' I said to myself, 'McHugh! Get out there fast! No matter where that useless road stops, you keep going. That poor old lady,' I told myself. 'If you want a new life for yourself, McHugh, you can start by making a new life for her.'

"Well," he went on, "all the way up here I didn't miss a step. I mean to tell you I marched. I marched and I made plans every mile. I'd mend the fence, I'd reshingle the roof, repair the chimney, the flashing, the gutters. I'd give the whole place an honest coat of paint. White and green, I figured. I'd fix everything up and by then, if you still didn't want to stay, I'd see you got the fairest sort of sale price.

"And then," he said, "I came round that bend down there and I saw the place. I saw the well-kept lawn and the hollyhocks by the side of the house. I saw the high corn out back. From way off I could tell the roof was sound. A little nearer I knew the chimney didn't need work. The closer I came, the farther away my fine ideas went flying and I realized that what a man hears in a general store is likely to be very general indeed.

"I decided, though, that I'd still drop in. Just to say 'Hello.' But as I crossed over, I got the biggest surprise of all. I saw that my frail old lady was a fine handsome woman, quite as young as myself.

"Since then"—he grinned—"I guess I've been talking to keep from looking."

He rose up, reached for his carryall. He took his cap, its colors lost now, from the post of the porch rail.

"The last few miles," he declared a trifle ruefully, "I thought I had this road all walked away. Maybe by Seaview, now, I'll find out where it ends."

"Mr. McHugh," she said softly.

"Ma'am?"

The lovely Mrs. Honeycutt rose, happily surprised at what she was about to say.

HEAT WAVE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 64

n, she moaned bleakly. Talk about mans! Talk about gracefulness! Yes, talk about m—because certainly a person wouldn't them in Laurie Bemis.

t was all very well for mom to preach ake it easy, and people won't bite you!"
y to do—with those you didn't particu-
y want to impress.

Laurie's eyes burned. She snapped on the io: "A record breaker, and no relief in ht." Drearily, she stacked records on the chine and lay on the living-room floor. She st have dozed. Suddenly she heard the back orbell and, sleep-dazed, dashed kitchen-
d. "I'm coming, I'm coming."

Mike Alan! And I didn't brush down my hair, said in her mind. I didn't even put on my pers. In her bare feet she felt absolutely le even though, truly, she had nice feet. hat do you want?" Talk about courtesy! n-mean ——"

He held up the empty glass. "More."

For a moment she could not move. She ned the refrigerator, and as she poured re lemonade for him she saw that it already s noon, high blazing noon.

Mike said, "Can I borrow the shade of your k yard?"

She nodded stiffly. Afterward, furious with self, she prowled from window to window. u'd think she had never seen a sandwich led from a paper bag. Now he lay on his k, his lunch unfinished. How easily he went sleep!

When the construction crew showed signs t lunch was over and Mike remained dead the world, a panicky spasm went through . She banged the back door but he only ned over, making himself more comfort-e. She squared her shoulders.

'Mike!" she yelled.

'Huh?" As if he weighed three hundred unds he got to his knees, and stayed there.

hrow a pail of water over my head," he d her.

Hardly believing what she was doing, Laurie ned the hose against his handsome black ad.

'My shoulders, too," he instructed.

"B-but ——"

This was more than she'd bargained for, as one alumnus of Mr. Mercer's class in history to another. Then her mouth dropped open as, suddenly, he reached up and stripped off his soggy T shirt.

"Give me the works."

If mom could see her now! Screwing up her face, she aimed the water over his shoulders, and he shivered and yelped but he would not let her stop.

Immediately after her own lunch she dashed across lots to the grocery for more lemons. But while she was gone the foreman must have decided it was too hot; the street had been converted to one lane with orange wooden horses.

Again Laurie lay on the living-room floor, absolutely mortified as she reviewed the fine way she should have acted—and in contrast, the way she had. "Lemonade." . . . "What do you want?" . . . "B-but." . . . Boy, was I brilliant!

All that night she tossed, caught up in a heart-to-heart talk with herself. Mike's the man, she thought wistfully, who has never asked me for a date!

And no wonder. But how can a girl expect to be magnetic in this kind of heat? Laurie pounded her pillow. Other girls did. She twisted and turned while gay and fascinating speeches skittered through her mind. Well, she'd remember them for tomorrow. When Mike returned, he would find a completely poised, quietly alluring ——

In the morning the pneumatic hammer blasted, and she turned on the radio long enough to hear that you must not water the lawns. "Parch," said the waterworks officials, because they could not pump enough million gallons. "Swelter," said the radio announcer.

She went to the back door for milk and there was Mike about to touch the bell.

"Hi, Heat Wave," he greeted. "Will your mother permit my lunch in her refrigerator?"

"She isn't home." Her mind reached desperately for one of those priceless gems of wit she had dredged up last night.

But—it was too hot! Too hot, hot, hot ——

New Spray-Set
by the makers of
Lustre-Creme...

SETS HAIR TO STAY THE SOFTEST WAY!

See lovely TERRY MOORE, in "BERNADINE"
A 20th Century-Fox Production in CinemaScope.
Color by De Luxe.

SUPER-SOFT
LUSTRE-NET HAIR SPRAY

Loved by Hollywood Stars because it's non-drying... contains no lacquer... mists hair with Lanolin!

HOLLYWOOD FOUND IT FIRST—NOW IT CAN BE YOURS!

There are 2 types of Lustre-Net. Super-soft for loose, casual hair-do's. Regular for hard-to-manage hair. 5½ oz. can—a full ounce more! Only $1.25 plus tax.

Suddenly Laurie simply didn't care a hoot about glamour. Suddenly Mike was just another person, and the weather was doing a better job than the Constitution of the U. S. in making all people equal.

Heavy-eyed, her lips already tasting of salt, she used her shirttail to wipe her face.

"Did you come without a hat again?" Sternly, her green-yellow eyes roved over his handsome head. "Honestly, you deserve a sunstroke."

"It's not my head, it's my feet." Patting a bundle of cotton stuff, he parked it on the kitchen-window ledge. "An extra T shirt and a pair of socks."

The milk bottle dripped condensation over her.

"I'll weep salty tears for your feet, I really will," she told him.

So, beaten down by the good old summertime, and having relinquished all wild dreams for charming Mike, Laurie also decided she had better give up her grandstand view from the front window. Out of sight, out of mind, she assured herself, dragging about the small business of tidying the house, making a morning of it.

"If you say anything about the you-know-what ——" she threatened the now-dusty Mike when he came for his lunch.

He swayed on his toes as if the porch were needle-studded. "It isn't the heat, it's the humanity."

Laurie twisted her lips into an imitation of agony. "I'll bring your lunch. Want milk, or orange juice?"

"What I'd like"—and he rubbed his hand over the five-o'clock shadow which had appeared on his chin by noon—"is for you to sprinkle me gently, as if I were a tender flower, while I eat."

Yesterday this would have struck her speechless. "This being my day for glamour and magnetism with you," she told him, daintily picking away her sticky blouse from her sticky person, "I think it would be a very alluring arrangement."

She thought of another glamorous business: finding two pails which she filled with cold water, she bade him soak his feet to chill his life stream. So there they were, Laurie and Most Likely to Succeed, he with his feet parked in pails of water while munching sardines on rye; she with her red curls knotted high, in wrinkled shorts, and a drop of perspiration on the tip of her pretty nose.

And it was nice, it was really nice. She could talk to him because she simply didn't care whether she could talk or not. She told him about Carson College and how she had lost credits transferring to Applied Arts, which was the reason for summer school. He told her about chemical engineering, and when he dozed off she sat quietly, a warmth within her that had nothing to do with the temperature.

Next morning the weather was still something you actually can't describe; you had to live it.

And so, considering it was such a dilly of a day, it was odd that Laurie could inspect her mirror for possibilities—and find some. Imagining herself to be a Titian or a Gainsborough, she studied her skin tones. She nodded approvingly, and she also decided she had good bone structure, which was certainly fine, because bone structure was the one thing which stuck out all over a person in this weather.

Yes, she had possibilities—and the instant Laurie admitted this to herself, the familiar tightening-up feeling began building inside her.

She lectured herself, she pretended to feel relaxed, but as noontime approached tension grew. Of course people act differently in extremes of heat and cold and floods and such, but does this difference ever last? Could one heat wave melt the icy habits of a lifetime?

Watching the clock, Laurie whispered with passionate fervor, "Give me the strength to take it easy."

Now it was time to take Mike the iced tea he wanted, and despite anything she could say to herself, she sloshed it on his arm as awkwardly as she had the lemonade the first day.

"I'm sorry," she said, after clearing her throat much too loudly. She thought of other girls, and envied their smooth coolness and self-possession.

When he ate, she tried to figure out what to talk about. It was all too clear to her that tension had tied her tongue in knots.

Finally she blurted, "Why'd you take such a hot job?"

Mike propped his head on his elbow. "It may be hot, but did you ever think of the power I wield with my red-flagged stick? I can make the mayor await my pleasure."

Laurie prayed and prayed. Part of h despised herself for her inept nervousness, b part of her was sick with longing for the kna of friendship with a man like Mike Alan. A other girl could have used these valuable da while Jarvis Street was being fixed to ——

"W-what?" she gasped.

"I said an air-conditioned movie. Abo seven-thirty?"

For a moment she thought she had dream the words because she wanted so badly hear them. "Why—I ——" Her mind scurri around in search of a pert, scintillating answe

"Don't you want to go? Have you anoth date?"

"N-no . . . that is ——" Laurie's ey blurred. Defeated, she wiped her throat wi her handkerchief.

Mike plucked a blade of grass and chewe on it. "What's the matter?" he asked.

She groaned hel lessly. She looked him, and she didn know how it happene but all of a sudden sh was pleading with hin "What would a girl sa who's smooth wit men—when she's suc denly asked on a da and she wants to g badly, but of course sh doesn't want to give th impression that she falling all over to go, b cause naturally sh wishes him to think she something special —— Her voice broke as h spurt of courage ebbe Fumbling with th empty glass, she fough a smothered feeling.

Mike made a soun in his throat. "Yo mean, how do you pla hard to get?"

Laurie nodded "Something like t-that. In the heat, in the breath less stillness with no lea stirring, you got the feel ing that the world woul explode—and Lauri wished it would.

Mike's voice wa loaded with amazement "But why do you hav to play hard to get?"

His words, spoken i that tone of voice, cause such pure joy to wel through her that there was absolutely no roon for misgivings. She didn't know how it hap pened, but it was the easiest thing in the worl to say, "I have trouble with myself, Mike real trouble. Mostly I don't know how to ac with a person like you—and ——"

"I can remember," he said slowly, "you used to be shy."

"Used to be?"

His words were music, sheer music. Th heat had forced her to be Laurie Bemis, un varnished, and evidently Laurie Bemis wa enough.

"Oh, Mike, I've got a fence around m that's—well, it's like a concrete wall with barbed wire strung around the top. It's a prison! But in this heat a gate was opened fo some air, and t-there you were ——"

She gave a short, strangled laugh. Mike's hand had closed over hers. Laurie had a queer disembodied feeling that this couldn't be happening to her.

"There I was," he said, "and here I am."

Closing her eyes, she leaned back against the tree and, oddly, it was not at all difficult to say, "Did I hear you mention a movie tonight?"

"You heard that."

She said lightly, "Well, I'll go—but only because of the air conditioning."

They looked at each other, and smiled. It was hot—much, much too hot to be clasping hands. So easy as anything, Laurie lifted the hose and dribbled cold water on the hands to keep them cool, and clasped. END

LITANY FOR A MAN-CHILD

(or 13 patrons for luck)

By ALMA ROBERTS GIORDAN

Guard him, St. Joseph,
Aid him, St. Jude;
Let not life treat him
Overly rude.

Christopher, shield him,
Peter, lend strength;
Thomas, sustain him
With faith full-length.

Maintain his body
Wholesome, St. Luke;
Help him, St. Stephen,
Bear life's rebuke.

Francis, instruct him
Gently with things
Wild and defenseless;
John, give him wings.

Song bequeath, David,
Job, patience prove;
Solomon, grant wisdom;
Abraham, love.

To keep lovely summer cottons looking like new call upon your

Sanitone Dry Cleaner

As high-style summer cottons grow lovelier every season, it gets more difficult to keep them looking their best. It's so hard to renew their original airy crispness! Ordinary starching is out...too stiff...won't drape...unflattering to your figure. What then?

The Sanitone Cotton Clinic! It's the modern, scientific way. First, your dainty dresses are cleaned so that not a trace of dirt remains. Then, their crisp, but never boardy, finish is restored with Sanitone Style-Set®...the miracle finish that makes dainty cottons look and feel like new again. Ask your Sanitone Dry Cleaner about it.

HOW TO FIND YOUR NEAREST SANITONE DRY CLEANER

Look for "Sanitone Approved Service" under "Cleaners" in the classified pages of your telephone directory. There you will find listed the Sanitone Dry Cleaner of your town. If you cannot locate one, please write directly to us.

HEY KIDS!!

WATCH FOR EXCITING NEW WALT DISNEY'S

COSTUME PLAY BAGS

Now given FREE with Sanitone Dry Cleaning

© WALT DISNEY PRODUCTIONS

Watch for Walt Disney's technicolor movie, Cinderella, at your favorite theater

Sanitone Dry Cleaning Service

A division of Emery Industries, Inc. Carew Tower, Cincinnati 2, Ohio

The Picture of Health for June

by MAXINE DAVIS

Why does one fatten now that it's warm and one's not so hungry? Easy! Strawberries and cream. Garden peas, new potatoes in butter. Well-camouflaged calories! The season's so short that . . . temptation seems irresistible. So—KESSAMIN is a must. The very best aid to weight-control I've ever found. I first used the NEW KESSAMIN PLAN to reduce my winter-grown bulge, after talking with a doctor. Now I take them to avoid meal-time seconds. They combine essential nutritional vitamins, iron, and a neutral, no-calorie food additive that helps make one portion all you really want. You feel better, too!

"Anyone want to learn croquet? I'm giving up golf," glooms our club pro.

His new dentures won't stay firmly in place. That throws him off his own game and makes him irascible with learners—unfortunate, but luckily easy to overcome with ORA-FIX, a really dependable adherent for dentures.

With ORA-FIX he's again able to be patient with the most inept beginners, concentrate on his shots, and also to indulge a habit he has of munching the peanuts he always keeps in his pocket.

His druggist recommends ORA denture powder too. A half-teaspoonful of ORA in a glass of water cleans them in 20 minutes. So—no morsels of peanut, no denture breath!

After the 18th hole, a bath, a change, and a long cool drink are part of the pleasures of golf. You feel wonderful—relaxed, peaceful, almost a part of the golden June day. Except . . .

You perspire. You don't sweat as you do out on the fairway but you get damp, especially under your arms. You know perspiration is natural as summer rain. But showers are clean and sweet—and perspiration starts that way but definitely does not stay sweet. For bacteria grow in perspiration . . . they change it and make it—well, unfragrant!

Trying to cope more successfully with this problem I've discovered the NEW YODORA, a deodorant containing an antibiotic that simply stops those objectionable "germs."

YODORA is a light delicately-scented cream. It soothes and heals any irritated area. And it lasts. You apply it once and all day long—even up to two days—stay as truly fresh as your new linen frock.

When the committee debated building a footbath at the club swimming pool as a safeguard against athlete's foot we asked a doctor if that was a wise move.

We learned that athlete's foot comes from little plants—fungi—that lurk on many people's skin and, when given the slightest chance, may spread and cause trouble. But it's far more efficacious to take good care of the feet than try to sterilize the innumerable places where bits of the fungi might be.

So our family will use OCTOFEN LIQUID if we do get an infection. And OCTOFEN POWDER, sprinkled daily in hose and shoes, is a fine preventive. Hospital tests have clinically demonstrated the effectiveness of OCTOFEN to stop the attack or to prevent it. It's the only athlete's foot medication approved by the National Foot Health Council.

TARTAN

AVAILABLE IN CANADA

Pure sun-gold—Tartan's specific sun-screen action lets you stay in the sun 8 times longer without burning! Use Tartan as directed for richer, really flattering tan. No other lotion gives outdoor-loving Americans a better tan than Tartan. Get it in your favorite form. Lotion—Foam—Cream.

TARTAN LIP POMADE

Summer or winter—it relieves "weathered" lips—no chapping, drying, cracking; heals sore lips; does not show.

BETTER . . . by McKESSON ©1957—McKesson ■ Robbins Inc., New York, N. Y.

Let Formfit define fashion for your figure...

Formfit

Whether the fashion neckline is plunging . . . completely covered . . . or beautifully bared in back, Formfit creates the flattering fashion definition. For each occasion . . . Playtime, Gaytime or Daytime . . . you'll find the just-right Formfit Bra. But see for yourself how Formfit defines fashion for your figure in terms of beauty and comfort . . . be fitted at your nicest store.

Versatile is the word for "Confidential" Convertible Bra No. 296. Wear it without or with straps—halter or off-the-shoulder. Embroidered White cotton contoured with a thin layer of foam rubber lining each cup. Sizes 32A to 38C. $5.00

Wear a Longline Bra like "Romance" No. 375 to smooth your midriff and beautify your bustline. White cotton broadcloth with wired underbust and soft "cuddle-stay" shaping in each cup. Sizes 32B to 40C. $6.95. Sizes 32D to 42D. $7.50

Life by Formfit

Choose a Strapless Bra that stays in place . . . always lifts you beautifully, thanks to the soft "cuddle-stay" cup shaping. As the elastic back band stretches, the "cuddle-stay" curves up from the bottom to the top of the cup—lifting and flattering every inch of the way. This one is "Romance" No. 382 in embroidered Nylon in 9 fashion-favored colors. Sizes 32A to 38C. $5.95

THE FORMFIT COMPANY • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • CANADIAN PLANT, TORONTO

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 88

is she gives me what she thinks I should have and then expects inordinate gratitude. She reminds me of my father. My brothers and I grew up in a slum neighborhood because he wouldn't pay my mother adequate alimony, despite his prosperity. But he kept his fingers on our affairs, exercised his visitation rights, and we saw him often. The Christmas I was nine and without a winter coat he gave me an enormous doll. As soon as he left our dreary apartment I dropped the doll on purpose and it smashed to smithereens. My mother was terrified he would find out. Perhaps she was afraid he would stop her meager alimony checks.

"Over the past six years my mother-in-law has given me at least a dozen dresses; all of them were full and loosely fitting. My figure is good. Unless I'm pregnant, I always wear sheaths and tightly fitted suits. Mother B refuses to grant that her taste isn't my taste. Once when I badly needed clothes, an Easter outfit arrived. It came from a smart shop, and I was momentarily delighted. When I tried on the dress I discovered it was much too large and, because it had been bought on sale, not returnable. I was so disappointed I sat down and cried. But then I got angry. I hung the useless Easter costume in my closet, went to the store where it was bought, opened an account in Riley's name and charged a hundred-dollar dress, a twenty-five-dollar hat and a fifty-dollar alligator purse.

"I meant to keep the buying splurge a secret and juggle my household budget to cover it. But Mother B soon learned the truth—in her usual manner. She explored the unpaid bills filed in my desk, made an inventory of the contents of my closet and unearthed the new clothes. She then began advising me to curb my extravagances. To this day she complains about that purse and dress. I still adore and use them both.

"Most people think our home is charming. The place was spoiled for me on the day we signed the deed: my mother-in-law lent us half the down payment. Her assistance would have been unnecessary if we'd bought a smaller house. It's my fault we didn't. I let her persuade me that the youngsters required separate bedrooms and a full-size recreation room. I don't know why I was so foolish. Mother B never allows us to forget she has a financial interest in the house.

"Nor does she allow our friends to forget that her housewarming gift was the wall-to-wall carpeting in our living room. I had selected straw matting for a temporary floor covering, but she was horrified at the idea. So we accepted the high-priced carpet, and, in effect, lost our living room. Whenever Mother B steps in there she makes a quick inspection to make sure that her carpet is vacuumed, that nobody has burned a cigarette hole in it, that the ash trays are emptied, the newspapers picked up, the furniture dusted. She is represented by some purchase in every room in the house—the draperies in our room, the bedspreads in the children's rooms, the dinette set in the kitchen, and so on.

"I'm rapidly turning into a demon housekeeper, one of those awful women who chase the tiniest speck of dust, because of her. Last Tuesday I decided to sit outside in the sun with the children and let the cleaning slide. So Mother B dropped in, unannounced, and was in the living room like a shot. She telephones as often as five times a day, but never to warn me of a visit. She prefers to surprise me. Yesterday she arrived just as Riley was leaving and before I'd got the children up. Riley brushed right past her, but I was caught. She commented on his early departure and long hours, wondered why such hard work wasn't more financially rewarding, and then commiserated with me for being a neglected wife.

"Next, she checked on the condition of the children's beds. Fortunately I'd removed and folded the spreads in a way that met with her approval. But it developed that she disapproved of my daughters' pretty little nightgowns. After she put on the percolator—I prefer instant coffee, but long ago she installed the percolator—she produced shapeless outing-flannel pajamas for both girls and a horrid-looking pair for me too. My gift was delivered along with a lecture on the folly of sleeping in sheer nightgowns and risking a bad cold. She wouldn't know my lingerie was sheer if she hadn't rummaged through my dresser drawers. Pajamas happen to be a particular hate of mine, as she is well aware. Nevertheless, I felt obliged to drum up a show of gratitude.

"In the midst of my hollow thank-yous, the milkman came to collect. Mother B offered to pay his bill and I politely declined. But I was short of cash and my fountain pen and checkbook had disappeared. I blamed Johnnie for the disappearance, spoke to him sharply and he began to cry. His sisters joined in. The phone rang and it was Fred asking whether Riley had started for their office. I was rude to Fred. When I banged down the receiver the milkman was gone, and of course Mother B had paid him. Then, with a bright-eyed giggle, she produced my fountain pen and checkbook which she'd hidden underneath the blotter for the specific purpose of getting her own way and preventing me from getting my way.

"Shaking inside, I took Johnnie into the bathroom—he was still sobbing his heart out—and finally I managed to comfort him. When we came out, Mother B had dressed the girls in sun suits I hadn't meant for them to wear. She was entertaining my next-door neighbor, whom she'd invited in for coffee, by exhibiting the pajamas and dragging in the inevitable mention of the living-room carpet. Maybe it wasn't intentional, but she was conveying the impression that Riley was too impoverished to furnish our home and buy night clothes for his daughters.

"Later on when she wanted to take the children to her house for lunch I simply didn't

CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

AFTERNOON IN THE THIRTIES

By MARY KENNEDY

Vanished the summers when we played croquet,
Driving over the rough grass through flimsy wickets.
Incongruous, the big awkward man, red-haired,
Tall, in prime of life, full of authority,
Who gambled even on this half-childish play.

Ladies in chiffon, English tweeds, costumes from France
Shrieked in despair as he drove some painted ball
Into the farthest hedge. Flattering eyes, lips,
Admiring him, so loud, so brilliant and strong,
Beaming on all alike, encouraging romance.

His verandaed house, full of serene faces, hospitable, gay,
Welcomed arrivals in endless cars. Now vanished without echo,
Those famous names, sparkling words and confident grace,
All laughing on the green with mallet and ball,
One time or another during the careless day.

Gossamer soft and petal pink—the dream of a negligee cascading in a froth of French lace and silk chiffon. Specially designed for Scott, it matches to perfection the luxury of Soft-Weve—Scott's superb "facial quality" 2-ply bath tissue. Five exquisite Soft-Weve colors for your bath or powder room.

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

To wake the sleeping beauty in your skin...use Tussy Creamy Masque. Its triple-action blackhead treatment cleans down deeper than any soap can to be as lovely as you can be...

TUSSY creamy masque

9 oz. jar $3 ... 4½ oz. $1.75 ... 2 oz. $1. Plus tax. On Canadian counters, too ... Her lipstick ... Tussy's Contraband e the strength to argue. As soon as they e gone, I telephoned Riley's office to ask to use his lunch hour to fetch the children e for their naps. Mother B doesn't believe naps. Fred answered the phone and said y had just stepped out. I didn't believe . I was rude to Fred again. And then I was liscouraged at myself that I felt like jumpout the window. Naturally I didn't. I went work and washed a terrific pile of laundry. n I flew at the house and scrubbed and shed until I was exhausted and had a splitheadache. I tried to reach Riley on the ne again. This time I got the telephonewering service. I left a message for him to home.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

Mother B didn't return the children until pertime. Without troubling to ask my mission, she took them to the beach. All e had plainly had a wonderful time with- me. But the little girls were badly sunned and Johnnie, who isn't strong, was ny and drooping with fatigue. Mercifully, her B didn't stay for supper. I held the l in the hope I would hear from Riley. re was no word from him. Eventually I fed youngsters and got them off to bed.

Half an hour later Johnnie woke up in hys- s. It was one of his nightmares—some- g about a swooping, huge-billed bird chas- him—and he screamed bloody murder for y. 'Where's my daddy? Where's my daddy?' ept crying over and over. I had no idea to locate Riley. Moreover, I was afraid neighbors would hear the uproar and start iping. I shook Johnnie and he shrieked automatically, the two girls swelled the us. By then I felt so completely sunk that ed too. I guess I howled louder than any e youngsters.

t was after ten o'clock when Riley tiptoed ss the porch. He slipped in as quietly as a glar. I was wide awake. I felt as though I'd l a million years and I had a million things ay. I hadn't seen or heard from Riley for n hours. Since early morning he had been sulting and conferring with Fred. Yet he no time to waste on me. When I began to ribe my dreadful day he pecked me absentedly on the cheek—he hasn't been really n to me for months—and then he picked e phone and dialed Fred. At once the two em plunged into a conversation about a e of property they have been discussing he last month.

couldn't stand it. I'd kept supper warmn the oven. I marched to the stove, empthe food into the garbage can, ran into bedroom and locked the door. I expected y to knock and make a fuss. He didn't. lly I unlocked the door and went into the g room. There I found Riley hunched up chair. His eyes were closed, but I didn't k he was asleep. I thought he was trying to d any sort of contact with me. He didn't e when I covered him with a blanket.

went back to the bedroom, but I couldn't . I walked the floor for hours, wondering I was such a failure as a wife, a mother a person. I've tried my level best. I'm just capable of being both a mother and a r to my children. I don't satisfy my hus-, who is far more concerned with his busi- than with me. I don't satisfy his mother. I certainly don't satisfy myself."

EY TELLS HIS SIDE:

'm afraid my wife may be heading toward vous breakdown," said Riley, a scowling, lexed and worried man of thirty-three. ce our marriage Della has completely ged personality. The first thing that at- ed me to Della was her independence. As n-age girl she moved from the Middle t to California under her own steam—her parents followed—and she earned her way in everything. I was particularly at- ed by her walk. It was proud and erect she held her head high in the air. She now s around like an old woman with the ht of the world on her shoulders.

he used to be full of fun and gaiety. She is jumpy and irritable; she wallows in ity, she cries over trifles. The other night erved me pork chops that were overdone, h I didn't mind in the slightest, but she burst into tears with the first bite. It seemed she'd been hovering over the stove trying to keep the chops moist for several hours. I told her I'd rather eat meat burned to a crisp—my stomach isn't all-important to me—and have the pleasure of a smiling wife. At that Della hopped up from the table and ran out of the house, still crying. Before I could stop her, she was in the car and gone. She spent the night with a woman friend, although I didn't learn that until much later. She didn't notify me of her whereabouts. Next morning I had to call my mother to come and look after our youngsters in order to go to work. When Della finally returned the following noon she was indignant to find my mother in charge. I'm convinced it was her intention to keep me away from my office.

"Della habitually acts before she thinks and she is hopelessly undisciplined. Yet she expects our children to be well behaved. Our girls are too young to be affected by her outbursts. But Johnnie is already a handful. Della smacks him when he's done nothing wrong and then, conscience-stricken, she hugs and kisses him. Or else she buys him a toy she has previously announced he can't have. My mother and my mother-in-law also participate in spoiling the boy. It's a wonder he isn't worse behaved than he is. When he's older I'm sure it will fall to me to straighten him out.

"In our courtship days Della was always laughing. She used to laugh at my corniest jokes. I believe I fell in love with her laughter. As a young kid, while I sat listening to my mother's endless lamentations, I decided I would never marry a girl who lacked a sense of humor.

"I can still vividly recall the evening Della sold me on her humor and her sportsmanship. She and I had a date for a fraternity dance. As a gag and, perhaps, as a sort of test, I sent her a corsage of withered, half-dead violets; the violets were in such poor shape the florist didn't charge me for them. Then I called for Della carrying a second corsage, butterfly orchids that cost me plenty. When Della opened the door, the violets were pinned on her dress—she'd picked out most of the dead blooms and substituted artificial flowers bought in the dime store—and she was laughing. I proposed to her that same night.

"It's been months now since I've heard Della laugh. I never know what mood she will be in when I get home in the evening; I can safely gamble she won't be calm and happy. More than once she has frightened me by threatening suicide. Perhaps I frighten easy, but I do know that before we met—Della was then in her teens and living with her mother back in Michigan—she swallowed an overdose of sleeping pills. She still takes sleeping pills, in spite of my objections.

"Several months ago I came home from an out-of-town business trip—I'd had car trouble and was very late—and found her sitting in the living room with my Army pistol in her lap. I was badly alarmed and I wasn't satisfied with her explanation that she'd heard noises and got up to look for a prowler. She insists she is afraid to stay alone at night, although I can't understand why she should be. Our next-door neighbors live within fifty feet of us. Della didn't used to be fearful and timid. Della used to be friendly and outgoing. It never occurred to her then to wonder whether people gossiped about her in an unkind way. It occurs to her now.

"Looking back, I believe the change in her personality, the deterioration in her nervous system, began as long ago as our honeymoon days. She was determined to start a family immediately. I would have been willing to wait awhile, but I was dissuaded. I was twenty-seven at the time and Della talked as though at that advanced age I was a candidate for the old folks' home, almost too antique to be a father. Johnnie was born the week we celebrated our first anniversary.

"Our relatives—relatives on both sides—have always figured in our marriage. Della's mother came West to attend our wedding and didn't feel she should leave during Della's pregnancy. At birth Johnnie was delicate and sickly and she then stayed on, so she said, to help nurse him. Della didn't require nursing help and, frankly, she didn't receive much. Instead the two grandmothers, her mother and my mother, commenced a debate on the proper way to rear children that has been raging off and on ever since. This discussion is frequently enlivened by comments from Della's father, who has also settled in California. I'm sure Della dislikes her father, although we see him from time to time. But it makes her furious when my mother, who isn't especially tactful, remarks that her father is well heeled and if Della watches her step our youngsters may be remembered in his will. Quite a row occurred when he was invited to our wedding. If Della's sense of humor had been operating, I think she might have found some amusement in that situation.

"In the first place, it was hardly up to my mother to make our wedding arrangements. By fast talk and fast footwork she managed to outflank Della's mother and grab control. At that point, a month before the ceremony, Della's father appeared. He is just as bossy as my mother, if not bossier. He and she fought out each and every detail of our wedding—the food, the decorations, the date, the hour—as though the two of them were the bride and groom. Della's father picked the minister and the church, my mother picked the caterer and the photographer. He chose the hotel where the reception was held, she hired the musicians. Nothing went the way Della wanted it. She became so distressed at having all the planning snatched away from her that I seriously suggested she and I run off and be married by a justice of the peace. Della refused. She suffered through the wedding in silence.

"She has been suffering ever since at my mother's hands. Not in silence, however. One of Della's big complaints in life, which I hear about daily, is my mother. I love my mother and admire her good qualities, but I'll admit she can be a trial. During my boyhood I had to learn to let her streams of advice and instructions pour in one ear and out the other, which wasn't too hard for me. In fact, as a kid I more or less took her side and patiently swallowed her interminable and highly colored recitals on the subject of my poor father's sins of omission and commission. The truth is my father can't call his soul his own, even in his business. My mother invades his office—my father is a sales manager—tells him how to handle his employees and his customers and takes full credit for his success. She doesn't think he has the brains to put on his clothes by himself; every night she lays out the suit, the shirt, the necktie he is supposed to wear the next day.

"When I went in the Army and later when I attended college on the GI Bill I discovered the joys of independence. I still listen to my mother, but only when she can catch up with me, and quite definitely I go my own way. Apparently Della can't. For some unknown reason, my mother has the Indian sign on her. She constantly and unnecessarily allows herself to be browbeaten and pushed around. My mother takes our youngsters to the beach when Della thinks they should stay at home. Della doesn't peep. Della planned a pink color scheme for their bedrooms. When my mother put in yellow bedspreads Della didn't say a word. Nor did she protest to my mother when curtains she disliked were ordered without her knowledge and hung in our bedroom. But she objected strenuously to me.

"My mother is a demon shopper and bargain hunter. Last year she suddenly made up her mind that I needed a pair of suède shoes. I told her I didn't care for fancy shoes, but she paid no attention. The day after our conversation a pair of suède shoes arrived. I sent them to the Hungarian Relief Committee and asked that a note of thanks be mailed to my mother. I suggested the same solution to Della. She keeps dresses she despises hanging in her closet, like a row of hair shirts; I've seen her shiver with distaste on catching sight of them.

"Nowadays Della sees the dark side of everything. But her two pet peeves are my mother and my job. What she doesn't realize is that if it weren't for my job I doubt I could bear the continued strain of living with her and maintaining my own balance. Not long ago in the midst of a quarrel—she did the quarreling; I kept quiet—she told me I would have to choose between my boss and her. For a moment I was hard put to hold my tongue. Naturally I wouldn't trade my wife and children for my partner. But Fred's company is preferable to Della's company as she is now. The only place I find any peace is at my work.

"When I was first married I had a state job which Della now thinks was a vast improvement on my present job. But she picked flaws in that job, too, when I held it. One advantage of my present job is that a good part of the time I'm out of telephonic range of Della's complaints. My mother can't get at me either. To a man in my spot, the long hours and the out-of-town trips are no handicap. I'm lucky in my partner. Fred has put up most of the capital in our business and he likes and is sticking with me, in spite of Della's frequent digs at him. He has let me into some long-term investments that may pay off someday in a big way. Instead of being rude to Fred, Della should give some thought to our financial future.

"Della is considerably more materialistic than she thinks she is. When I give her a present it has to be the best or she gets no charge from it. I bought her a pretty bottle of toilet water for a valentine and she was disappointed it wasn't imported perfume. Della isn't ordinarily a foolish spender. Yet every now and again, particularly if something has got on her nerves, she sends our budget into a spin by buying expensive truck we can't afford. The last time she had such a spell was a month ago and she bought a forty-dollar lamp for her dressing table. The inexpensive lamp already on the table was perfectly appropriate, but

---

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Some parents move to the country to give their children and pets more freedom . . . to cross roads at points where motorists are traveling faster than in town.

A watched child always boils.

Some parents find it impossible even to let their children turn a Lazy Susan without giving them advice or assistance.

When children are young, a mother is apt to be concerned with the appearance of food, but when children get older she's apt to be more concerned with the disappearance of it.

"I don't mind doing something I don't like to do," says our cleaning woman, "because then I work harder to make quitting time come faster."

Probably the happiest persons are the ones who move early into the slow lane in life's traffic and never cut out around, in an endeavor to pass the Joneses.

Adolescence: When children seem to grow younger and parents do grow older.

One of the biggest satisfactions in modern life seems to be to get caught up on all the payments so you can start some more.

Della said it made her feel cheap. Maybe she doesn't realize it, but she seems to judge most of our furnishings by their price tag.

"Della is a nice girl. Something is eating on her. I wish I knew what it was."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"Riley's belief that his wife was on the verge of a nervous crackup was well founded. In our opening interview Della disclosed the classic symptoms—exaggerated fears and anxieties, tensions, inexplicable depressions. It was obvious that her children were being harmed by her moodiness, her undisciplined behavior. It was obvious, too, she had made Riley's existence so intolerable that he had retreated from his marriage into work, as his father had done.

"Neither Riley nor Della had been blessed with a happy childhood home which they could emulate in establishing their own home. Intellectually, both wanted and expected to find love, warmth and close companionship in their marriage. Emotionally, neither was equipped to be a good and helpful companion to the other. Riley was kindhearted, but he had trained himself to close his ears to feminine problems. Della was in almost desperate need of sympathy and understanding. As soon as he understood this, he gave it in full measure.

"Della's surface complaints—the complaints that were driving Riley farther and farther away from her—were so numerous and all-inclusive that I immediately surmised she was suffering from a serious inner trouble, or 'conflict,' as we say. There appeared to be no sound reason for her chronic wretchedness, her haunting sense of failure. After all, as she informed me during one of our early interviews, she had achieved most of the objectives for which she had yearned in her girlhood. She had three children, she had a husband who was clever and ambitious even though he was away a great deal, she had an attractive home. Yet almost deliberately (or so it seemed) she was throwing away these prizes in life. Why? Answering this question, uncovering the deep inner trouble responsible for Della's gnawing dissatisfactions and ever-present feelings of inadequacy, was far and away the most difficult part of this case.

"It was comparatively simple to suggest ways of alleviating some of the day-to-day annoyances in the marriage, so many of which originated with Riley's mother. To begin with, at my urging, Della followed Riley's wise example, bundled up the dresses she disliked and never wore and sent them to her favorite charity. Next, she pruned her household of the furnishings that weren't to her taste. The draperies in the master bedroom and the children's bedspreads were replaced. The dinette set and the living-room carpet were too expensive to discard and replace, but in a tentative way Della began to feel for the first time that she was gaining a vote in decorating her own home. Riley's encouragement in the pruning project was vital. Without him, it could never have occurred.

"Even more helpful was his co-operation in fending off his mother's continuous interference by means of the daily visits and repeated telephone calls. These visits and phone calls had been almost as much of an irritant to him as to Della. For, inevitably, he was treated to a blow-by-blow account of every verbal skirmish. Riley felt, with some justice, that he had served his time as a listener and emotional prop to his mother in his boyhood. At the same time, he had the vaguely filial belief that she was entitled to company. With his marriage, he had nominated Della to keep his mother company and keep her off his neck. He ignored Della's lack of talent for the role and her marked inability to duck unwelcome plans made for her by others. Also, he failed to reflect that his mother might blame her daughter-in-law for the loss of her old companionship with him, which happened to be the case.

"Indeed, Riley's mother retaliated for his withdrawal and pointed lack of interest in her affairs by attempting to punish him and his whole family. In the first place, she endeavored to keep Riley, Della and their youngsters under obligation to her by a continued flow of gifts with the promise of more gifts to come. But she saw to it that every gift contained a barb. Always there was the implication that Riley was unable to support his wife and children properly but that his poor old mother would gladly sacrifice to supplement, cover up his financial failings and help out in any way.

"Della correctly sensed the subtle hostility in every telephone call, in every visit, in every gift; a part of her intense dislike of her mother-in-law was based on loyalty to Riley. Even so, she couldn't bring herself to refuse the gifts or to say good-by and hang up the telephone. Once Riley understood what was going on, he was quite capable of dealing with his mother because he knew and loved her, faults and all. (Incidentally, Riley's mother dearly loved her son at the same time she hated him for eluding her domination.) Riley went to see his mother, explained Della's nervous state, and flatly requested that all visits and telephone calls to his home be stopped for the time being. Not surprisingly, his mother responded with outrage, injured feelings and a practically alphabetical list of favors she had done him and Della.

"It wasn't easy for Riley to stick by his guns, but he did so. He realized that a brand-new deal for Della was a therapeutic must. Eventually he consoled his mother with flattery and prevailed on her to expend some of her boundless energy on other kin. He agreed to visit her with the grandchildren at least once a week. He took another step, which I did not suggest. He refinanced the mortgage on his home and repaid his mother's loan.

"Della was almost pathetically grateful for Riley's show of interest and his support. In many ways, the marriage improved. Della's complaints dwindled. When she ceased to dread a drop-in from her mother-in-law, she gave up the compulsive housekeeping that had kept her exhausted and in a frenzy of unnecessary busy work. She handled her children with more love and more skill. But her depressions continued. And the basic questions remained.

"Why was she so upset by Riley's mother? What was behind her almost obsessive aversion? Why was she unable to stand up for her own rights and beliefs? What was the explanation of her fears and confusions, the feelings of personal unworthiness and guilt that she frequently expressed to me? In short, what was her conflict?

"One significant clue was that Della's nervous outbursts, her seeming inability to behave reasonably, had started after her divorced parents, whom she had left to travel off to college, followed her to California. It didn't require remarkable shrewdness on my part to suspect Della had unconsciously attempted to leave behind uncomfortable memories and experiences of her childhood. Clearly her mother and her father must figure in these memories.

"From the beginning of our counseling, Della was quite open in discussing her relationship with her mother. As to her father, she was very brief. She merely said that she detested him. The reason she advanced was that he had lived in luxury and left her mother to live in poverty. This criticism of her father was valid, so far as it went. It took months of painful probing to get at the real truth of Della's experiences with her father, a truth so ugly that it was buried deep in her subconscious memory. She had suffered far more than the average child from a divorce. Her father, a sadistic show-off, had consistently mistreated his small daughter, perhaps in an effort to revenge himself upon his ex-wife. While visiting the family he was often alone with Della and often he had abused the helpless child. It would be pointless to enumerate his many cruelties. One incident, which Della had long banished from her conscious mind, will illustrate. Her father, racing at top speed along a country road, told his terrified five-year-old daughter she was about to die and then deliberately removed his hands from the steering wheel at the risk of both their lives.

"When Della reported her terror to her mother, her story was not credited. Her mother chose to regard the ugly truth of her ex-husband's brutality as childish fiction; it is possible she was motivated by worry her alimony checks would cease if she dared to bring out the natural beauty of your hair

CONTINUED ON PAGE 127

Glinting with color in the lamplight . . . shining, silky-smooth, Noreen flatters your well-groomed locks with new, delicate and natural-looking color. Takes only three minutes to apply and the lovely Noreen color lasts until your next shampoo.

Try Noreen soon . . . surprise yourself, but only yourself, because the change is too subtle to be really obvious. With 14 flattering shades to choose from, with ease and speed of application and modest cost, you can lift your hair from drab to any of several shades of blondeness . . . make auburn hair truly auburn . . . put cool excitement into dark hair shades . . . make gray or white hair shine like new-minted silver. Noreen is your simplest and best approach to hair beauty whether you have a professional application in your beauty salon or do it yourself at home.

Write for literature and FREE sample offer:
Noreen, 450 Lincoln St., Denver 3, Colo., Dept. 12.

Noreen COLOR HAIR RINSE

ARE YOU MOVING?

If you are moving to a new home, the best way to be sure that your subscription to the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL reaches you promptly is to send us the new address at least 30 days before you move, together with the old address label cut from your magazine.

■ Each year about 2,300,000 subscribers to Curtis magazines change their addresses and ask us to send the magazines to their new homes. We are happy to do this, but equally unhappy when delays occur. Sending us the label from your magazine will cut in half the time required to place the new address on our lists. Please send the old label and the new address at least 30 days before you move.

John Fredericks Dress by Roamer

COBBIES
A RED CROSS SHOE

Nicest place to spend a summer

These are the fun-loving, sun-loving Cobbies you'll love to wear, this summer. Every gay and colorful pair with a delightful exposure . . . to cool breezes and open compliments. Pretty sandals. Light and airy wedges. All with the easy-going air . . . with the wonderful fit you find only in Cobbies. Styles illustrated: above, SUMMERTIME: lower left BIMINI; lower right ROAMER.

Other smart young Cobbies 8.95 to 11.95

E UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

"Such a difference in comfort..."

. . . the new Kotex napkin with gentle Wondersoft covering won't rub, won't chafe, fits perfectly—gives you the instant and complete absorbency you need.

And the new Kotex belt has a special clasp that won't "dig in" like metal. This self-lockin clasp holds the napkin securely, never lets it or slide. The specially-woven elastic, too, sta flat and snug—the edges won't curl or twist.

Talk about comfort . . . this is it!

More women choose Kotex than all other brands

KOTEX and WONDERSOFT are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 124

nvestigate and protest. At any rate, Della vas forced to live out her childhood not only n constant terror of her father's next visit but vith the self-doubt that assails a youngster o one believes. Deep within her there devel- oped the conviction that it was impossible to esist a strong, determined person, regardless f the right or wrong of the situation.

"Riley's mother was a strong, stubborn, letermined person; in fact, in character and even in mannerisms, she was very much like Della's father. In a flood of revelation, Della t last understood why she had weakly al- owed Riley's mother to trample underfoot ier rights and wishes. For Della to puzzle out he reason behind the weakness of which she vas so ashamed was very difficult. The cure vas fairly simple.

"Directly she comprehended that she as- ociated her mother-in-law and her father and he psychological cause for her reacting to oth with debilitating, frightened passivity, he changed her tack. She became able to see ier mother-in-law socially again and, in moderation, accept her company. Overnight, or so it seemed, Della learned to say no. At once Mother B's dominance lost effectiveness. It is unlikely Della and her mother-in-law will ever be close, but they are conventionally friendly and she and Riley reaped an un- expected bonus. They became acquainted with his father, previously overshadowed by his voluble wife. Della's father-in-law is welcome to drop in any time. Next fall Riley is counting on an all-male camping expedition with his father; the honor guest is to be young Johnnie, who has become less rambunctious now that he sees a little more of his dad. Riley still works very hard.

"Where Della's father was concerned, she was confronted with another unpalatable reality. She had absorbed some of his false, mercenary standards. She faced the fact that she had secretly hoped for an eventual legacy for her children from his estate and also faced the fact that this sneaky hope fed her confusions and feelings of guilt. No legacy, she granted, was worth such a price. She and Riley have cut off even a casual relationship with her father. It seemed better to them.

"Riley still works abnormally long hours. Della no longer feels threatened and abandoned during his absences, since during her long course of counseling she received solid proof of his devotion and support. She has stopped her feuding and fussing with his partner. Della and Riley are now a team, working together, trusting each other and enjoying real emotional security in the love they know they share."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

BETTER LIVING FOR ELDER-AGERS—LA JOLLA, CALIF.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 31

White Sands, selected a room and made a down payment.

All over the state, Presbyterian ministers were making similar announcements to their congregations. Some Episcopal ministers also had been asked to tell their people about it, since White Sands was to be interdenominational. And across the country, Presbyterian Life magazine was carrying the story to other prospective residents.

Mrs. Russell, living alone in Atlantic City, New Jersey, had got into the habit of skipping a meal or two every day, instead dropped in at the corner drugstore for a cup of coffee "just for the company." On doctor's orders to find "companionship, good food and peace of mind," she decided to write to White Sands and later she packed up and drove some 3000 miles to make her new home in La Jolla.

By June of 1956 nearly half the rooms had been reserved and ten men and women not yet 65 had made down payments of $1000 each to be on a list for future vacancies.

It was a truly human tombstone which bore the inscription: "I expected this, but not just yet."

At White Sands, the residents themselves participate in making rules and policies. Recently they met as a group to decide the hours to be set aside for guest use of the pool. There are specific dining-room hours (meals are attractively prepared by a Danish chef and served by waitresses), but residents may dine whenever they choose during those hours, sit with whom they choose at white-linen-topped tables for four, and order from a varied menu. Miss Alice Owens with the perky blue hair bow tells you, "That first day we were so busy getting acquainted we spent six whole hours in the dining room."

The slender vase of chrysanthemums on each table is the work of Miss Hazel Brobst, former schoolteacher. Her decorating workshop, just off the library, is stocked with colored art paper, vases and unusual stones she is planning to use later in both the lounge and dining room. Before coming to White Sands, Miss Brobst thought long and hard about selling her eight-room house. "I hated to give up my garden—but I had met so many stubborn, unhappy old ladies living alone year after year that I decided I'd gain much more than I'd give up. As you grow older, it's just as important to make new friends as when you're young, don't you think?"

On the office walls and in the lounge hang many attractive oil paintings—several by Mrs. Genevra Osterman. One of the seascapes is the view from Mrs. Osterman's second-level room. Her room, too, is filled with her own paintings. Just before selling her home in Seattle, Mrs. Osterman announced to friends by post card the big social event of her season: a sale of her original paintings, art objects, furniture, china, glassware and linens. She has redecorated her studio room to provide a soft background. Her walls and rug now are muted brown, and sheer beige drapes from Mexico cover the sliding doors opening onto the lanai.

In the hall two prospective residents from Toledo, Ohio, are welcomed by Dr. William Crosby Ross, a former minister whose sense of humor sparks many a dinner-table conversation at White Sands. Doctor Ross conducts a Bible-study class Wednesday mornings and is on call at almost any hour to escort visitors about the building, take them to rooms several of the residents have volunteered to show, and answer questions. (Sample—from a widow: "Suppose a widow and a widower meet at White Sands, decide to get married and occupy one room. What becomes of the extra room that's been paid for?" Answer: "A refund would be made.") Today's visitors are interested in the bulletin board—swarming with notices announcing a bridge class, a colored-slide showing, book-review group, a schedule of free transportation to downtown La Jolla, a chess list (but no names on it), a place to sign up for a chartered-bus trip to the Imperial Valley. A tall, attractive woman on her way out stops to greet the visitors.

"My friends think I'm making a mistake," one of the prospective residents says. "But I'm so tired of living alone and eating alone."

"Oh, I know exactly what you mean—we all do," the resident tells her. "Actually I expected to spend all my time here sitting reading and knitting, but I haven't had time."

Sometime this year the Southern California Presbyterian Homes Corporation will open its second home—"Royal Oaks Manor," in Duarte, a ten-minute drive east of Pasadena, with somewhat more modest accommodations. Other homes with complete medical care for prospective residents in the middle-income group will probably be located in Riverside and Orange counties, metropolitan Los Angeles and Santa Barbara in the not-too-distant future. END

The danger in waiting for your child to outgrow pimples

by MARCELLA HOLMES NOTED BEAUTY AUTHORITY
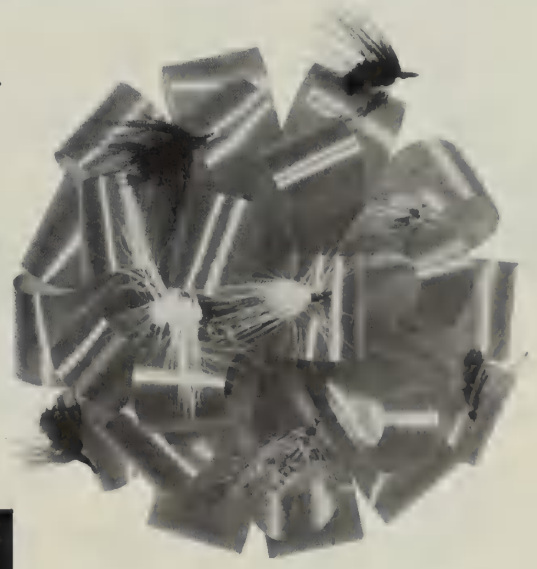
(former beauty editor of "Glamour" magazine)

Of all the letters that reach a beauty editor's desk, there are none so urgent as those from adolescent girls with pimples. That's why I want to alert mothers to the double dangers of this problem. Psychologists tell us pimples undermine poise and self-confidence, can cause permanent damage to a child's personality. Skin specialists warn that acne-type pimples, if neglected, can leave permanent scars.

Fortunately, today you can help your child with a modern, scientific pimple medication that really works. It's called CLEARASIL. In doctors' tests on 202 patients, 9 out of every 10 cases were completely cleared up or definitely improved while using CLEARASIL.



Oil in pores helps pimples grow and thrive. So don't use skin creams which contain oils pimples 'feed' on. Use a true oil-absorbing medication—CLEARASIL, which helps remove these oils, actually 'starves' pimples.

CLEARASIL is skin-colored to end embarrassment immediately. Greaseless, fast-drying, antiseptic . . . it's guaranteed to work for you, as it did in doctors' tests, or money back. Only 69¢ at all drug counters (economy size 98¢).

Special Offer: Send 15¢ in coins or stamps for generous trial size of CLEARASIL to Eastco, Inc., Box 260-E, New York 46, N.Y. Exp. July 31, 1957.

Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . . with crisp
Sasheen®
the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

Man-style "Magic Bow" for Father's Day (or your June graduate) is sure to help your gift make a hit! Tie a "Magic Bow" from the easy directions on your roll of Sasheen Brand Ribbon. Then, if he's a fisherman, tape a sunny selection of trout flies to the crisp, perky loops. If he's a golfer, attach bright tees. Be sure you use Sasheen—your favorite store has he-man colors galore!

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE 23835

"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons

3M MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, St. Paul 6, Minnesota © 3M Co.

bringing up baby®

hints collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, mother of five

foot-loose and fancy free

That's the way toddlers like to be these soft summer days. Your little busybody will love to run barefoot—enjoy the silkiness of grass; the sun-kissed warmth of sand. (Can't think of a more delightful way to strengthen little feet, either.) However, before you turn baby loose, be sure his traveling grounds are free of sharp bits of stone, glass or shells.

meal planning made easy

Summertime . . . and the eating is easy. That's because Gerber offers over 30 good-tasting Junior Foods. All are famous for appealing colors, true flavors and a tender, evenly minced texture. 7 Fruits • 6 Vegetables • 10 Soups & Dinners • 4 Meats • 3 Desserts • Junior Egg Yolks & Ham.

Introductory idea. If your baby is just starting on Junior Food, mix small amounts with the Strained Food he's been having. As he gets used to the difference, increase the amount of Junior Food.

sunning suggestions

Now that it's open season on sun-bathing, here are a few reminders for sun-minded mothers:

- Be lavish with lotion or oil. It protects baby's skin, speeds tanning, keeps skin soft.
- Be time-conscious. Start with 2 minutes a day, dividing time between tummy and back. Increase time by 2 minutes each day; Never expose baby for more than 30 minutes.
- Shun blazing midday hours. Beware the cloudy day. Sun burns just as hard through a haze.

dietary measure

Rapidly growing babies and active toddlers need a daily quota of proteins for growth and strength. Gerber Strained and Junior Meats help fill this need beautifully. Made from selected Armour cuts, they're carefully processed to remove most of the fat and coarse tissue. 8 Strained varieties, smoothly pureed. 4 Junior Meats for tots who can chew.

ARMOUR

travel plan

If you take to the highroads with baby this summer, you might remember these hints for happier driving. (1) The cool of the early morning or evening is the ideal driving time. (2) Gerber's Orange or Apple Juice or cool water will take care of the thirst department. (3) A few favorite toys make good distracters. (4) An extra sweater for baby is good insurance against temperature changes.

menu of the month

*Any Gerber "Main Dish"
Junior Green Beans · Junior Peaches
Graham Crackers · Milk

*Your choice of 5 flavorful Gerber Vegetable and Meat Combinations: Vegetables & Turkey · Split Peas with Ham · Beef & Noodles with Vegetables · Chicken Noodle Dinner · Macaroni, Tomato, Beef & Bacon. The unusual, grown-up flavor combinations and tender, minced texture make them ideal transition foods between strained and family table foods.

babies are our business . . .
our only business!

Gerber® baby foods
FREMONT, MICHIGAN

4 CEREALS • OVER 75 STRAINED AND JUNIOR FOODS, INCLUDING MEATS

"WHEN I ENTERTAIN"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

chicken tarragon (roasted with a liberal sprinkling of tarragon inside, which flavors the whole chicken). With the two cold main dishes, Salade Russe, mixed cooked vegetables tossed in mayonnaise dressing; and a green salad, liberally bedecked with grated egg yolk. There is a big platter of assorted cheeses and some pâté, and perhaps orange halves, hollowed and filled with orange sherbet. Tiny sugary cookies would go with the sherbet.

Another pet menu for a buffet dinner party might include a delicious Casserole Espagnole—"The casserole that has everything," says Mme. Alphand. "It's made with shrimp, spiced sausage, saffron rice and chicken. Then there's another hot casserole of sliced eggs in a marvelous bacon-and-cheese sauce; cooked Lima beans and green beans marinated in French dressing, and chilled." Dessert is a creamy Tarte Bordalone—an inspired combination of golden custard, currant jelly and pears, in a baked pastry shell, sprinkled with toasted almonds.

For a smaller, seated dinner party, Mme. Alphand might serve a fluffy light-as-air fish soufflé as the first course—it could be made with lobster or shrimp—and a very special French dish, Jambon en Croute, which is easy to prepare, and spectacular to behold. (The ham is wrapped in a flaky shell of pastry before baking, which takes on the delicious flavor of the ham.) Puréed mushrooms are perfect with this, a plain green salad goes along, and the dessert is a heavenly mound of vanilla ice cream topped with spiced cherries and peaches.

Here are recipes for Mme. Alphand's favorite party menus:

CASSEROLE ESPAGNOLE

Cook until tender a 6-to-7-pound chicken in 1½ quarts water with seasonings—salt, pepper, onion, celery tops and a few sprigs of parsley. Remove from stock and take the chicken off the bones in good-sized pieces. Save 3 cups stock and skim off the fat. Brown 2 cups converted rice and 4 cloves garlic, crushed, in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Stir in 1 can tomato paste. Meanwhile, reheat the chicken broth, dissolving in it ¼ teaspoon powdered saffron. In a very large kettle mix together the saffron broth, the rice, the chicken pieces, 1½ pounds cleaned and deveined shrimp, 2 pepperoni sausages, sliced very thin, and ½ cup chopped pimiento. Season with 1½ teaspoons salt. Bring mixture to a boil, then reduce to simmer. Cook for 20 to 25 minutes until rice is tender and the liquid is absorbed. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

OEUFS ENTERALLIÉS

Hard-cook 1½ dozen eggs. Cool, peel and slice thinly. Sauté ½ pound bacon until crisp. Drain and crumble. Make 2 cups medium cream sauce, using ¼ cup butter, ¼ cup flour, 1 cup light cream and 1 cup milk. Add 1 pound grated sharp Cheddar cheese, stirring until cheese is melted. Season with 1 small clove garlic, crushed, ¼ teaspoon each of thyme, marjoram and basil. Add ¼ cup chopped parsley. Pour some of the sauce into a greased baking dish. Add a layer of egg slices, then bacon crumbles and more cheese sauce. Continue until ingredients are used up, ending with sauce. Sprinkle with buttered bread crumbs. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 20 minutes until bubbly and crumbs are browned. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

TARTE BORDALONE

Bake a 10" pie shell. Cool. Spread the inside of the shell with 1 cup softened red-currant jelly. Pour over this 1 cup custard filling. Arrange quarters of cooked or canned pears, about 6 in all, in the creamy filling. Spread the top with 1 cup whipped cream and sprinkle with crisp, toasted almond slivers. Chill 3 to 4 hours in refrigerator. Serves 6.

Custard filling: Mix in the top of a double boiler 2 egg yolks, 1 tablespoon plus ¾ teaspoon cornstarch, 1½ tablespoons sugar, ⅛ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon nutmeg. Slowly pour over this 1 cup scalded milk, stirring till the sugar is dissolved. Heat, stirring constantly, about 6 to 8 minutes, till custard coats a metal spoon. Remove from heat and add ½ teaspoon vanilla.

SHRIMP SOUFFLÉ

Prepare a cream sauce as follows: Melt 6 tablespoons butter. Add 6 tablespoons flour and blend over low heat 5 to 10 minutes. Slowly stir in 2 cups light cream. When it is smooth and boiling, stir in 2 cups finely chopped cooked shrimp, ¼ cup finely chopped celery, ¼ cup chopped parsley and ¼ cup minced onion. When these ingredients are hot, reduce the heat and stir in 6 beaten egg yolks. Cook and stir a little longer to permit the yolks to thicken. Season with ¾ teaspoon salt, 2 tablespoons lemon juice, 2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce and 1 teaspoon curry powder. Cool these ingredients slightly. Whip until stiff 6 egg whites. Fold the hot mixture carefully into the egg whites. Bake the soufflé in an ungreased 2-quart baking dish in a moderate oven, 325° F., until it is firm, about 1 hour. Makes 12 servings.

JAMBON EN CROUTE

Mix together 1 cup soft bread crumbs, ¼ cup lemon juice, 1 teaspoon each thyme and dry mustard and ½ teaspoon nutmeg. Rub this well into the fat of a whole precooked ham. Bake the ham for 1 hour in a moderate oven, 350° F. Then cover with the following pastry. Return the ham to the oven and continue baking in a very hot oven, 450° F. for about 30 minutes, or until the pastry is a golden brown.

Pastry: Cut 1 cup plus 2 tablespoons butter into 3 cups flour until well blended. Add ice water just until the mixture holds together (about ⅔ cup). Chill the dough for ½ hour. Roll on a slightly floured board into a rectangle. Brush lightly with melted butter and fold over in thirds. Roll and fold the dough again and return to the refrigerator to chill for another ½ hour. When ready to cover the ham, roll the dough into a sheet large enough to hold it, wrap well and seal by moistening the edges with water. If you want, cut out fancy shapes of the pastry with a cooky cutter and decorate the outside. Secure these with a little water also.

PURÉE OF MUSHROOMS

Wipe 2 pounds mushrooms with a damp cloth, and chop them very finely, caps and stems. Place the chopped mushrooms in a saucepan, add ¼ cup butter and simmer them very slowly, uncovered, for 10 minutes, stirring them from time to time. They should be golden in color. Season with ½ teaspoon salt, a pinch of pepper, ½ teaspoon nutmeg and a squeeze of lemon juice. Add 2 cups béchamel sauce to the mushrooms, mix all together, and correct the seasoning if necessary. Serves 6.

BÉCHAMEL SAUCE

In a saucepan melt 4 tablespoons butter. Mince 1 small onion, add to the butter with ½ small garlic clove, crushed, simmering till onion is golden but not brown. Blend in 6 tablespoons flour, add 1½ cups very strong chicken broth and 1 cup heavy cream gradually, stirring till sauce is thick. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

SPICED-CHERRY-AND-PEACH SAUCE

For vanilla ice cream. Drain the juice from 2 cups canned, pitted Bing cherries, and add ¼ cup sugar, a small piece of stick cinnamon, 2 tablespoons lemon juice, ¼ teaspoon powdered cloves, ¼ teaspoon nutmeg. Simmer very slowly for 10 minutes, then remove the stick of cinnamon and add 2 tablespoons cornstarch which has been mixed with 2 tablespoons cold water. Stir till thickened and the sauce comes to a boil. Then add the cherries and 2 packages thawed, frozen sliced peaches and juice. Heat all together, and serve over vanilla ice cream. END

For Father's Day

LET'S HAVE A CHICK-N-QUE

Dad dotes on barbecues. But on his big day make him the guest. Plump him down in a hammock while the chicken cooks and the Coca-Cola and Cranberry Sauce are a-cooling. (Secret: a Chick-N-Que is easy to do!)

Start your fire early. When it's down to glowing coals, wrap potatoes in Reynolds Wrap and snuggle into embers. Brush young chickens with Chick-N-Que Sauce and lay, skin side up, on a grill 12″ from coals. Cook slowly—1 to 1¼ hours—turning and basting frequently. To test doneness, twist a joint. When bones part willingly, call the crowd.

Now brighten each plate with two slices of chilled Ocean Spray Jellied Cranberry Sauce—red and tangy—or with spoonfuls of Whole Berry Sauce. Relax—and enjoy the day.

• • •

P.S. Have an Oven-Chick-N-Que indoors—any season. Place chicken, skin side down, in shallow pan lined with Reynolds Wrap. Baste with sauce. Place in hot oven (450° F.) about 25 minutes. Reduce to 325° F. Turn, baste frequently, bake till tender.

Now in Canada, too

Chick-N-Que Sauce. For 3 broiler-fryers, mix well: ½ cup Mazola Oil, ¾ cup lemon juice or cider vinegar, ¼ cup water, 1½ tbs. salt, 3 tbs. sugar, 1¼ teaspoons Tabasco Sauce. Heat to boiling. Keep hot, well mixed.

If you prefer a highly seasoned sauce, increase amount of Tabasco and add mustard and Worcestershire sauce.

For a holiday flavor any day—serve Ocean Spray CRANBERRY SAUCE

THE DEVIL WITH COOKING

Deviled Ham Salad Sandwich . . . your lazy-day lunch!

Recipe for Underwood's light, yet satisfying, Deviled Ham Salad Sandwich: Spread Underwood Deviled Ham on a slice of your favorite bread . . . circle with alternate slices of cucumbers and tomatoes on a bed of lettuce leaves . . . top with a slice of cucumber . . . add a dollop of mayonnaise and serve. Quick, easy, and so delicious . . . thanks to the unique flavor of Underwood's fine ham and natural seasonings.

THE SECRET OF WHOLE-HAM FLAVOR

Underwood is made from whole hams, chosen for quality, perfectly cured, and blended with a secret formula of spices. Result: all the goodness of whole hams . . . plus ■ delicious, can't-be-copied flavor.

When You Shop For Food

SUMMER SALAD DAYS

Glistening garden salad sparked with sour-cream dressing is the ultimate in cool, beautiful eating.

Salads take shape as appetite teasers, handsome and hearty main dishes, or double as dessert. Here is a sheaf of them, all exceptionally delicious.

Some unexpected fillips in a mixed green salad are as welcome as discovering a waterfall on a woodsy stroll. A few added attractions to remember are:

1. Tomato wedges dipped in grated Parmesan cheese.
2. Sliced, drained water chestnuts.
3. Canned or cooked frozen artichoke hearts.
4. Flaked sardines or anchovy fillets.
5. Julienne beets and crumbled blue cheese.
6. Hearts of palm with slivers of smoked tongue.
7. Croutons browned in garlic butter.
8. Avocado slices, crisp pieces of bacon and hard-cooked-egg quarters.

The dressing is the very essence of any salad creation. Shake up a quart or so of classic French dressing, using herb-flavored or wine vinegar, and store it in the refrigerator. Then, on occasion, blend into a part of it caviar, various herbs, curry powder, mustard, celery seed, snipped chives, chopped chutney, grated lemon rind, chopped water cress or pimiento. Try combinations and make your motto "A new salad every day!"

Garden Salad With Sour-Cream Dressing

Hot shrimp soup or oyster stew (the frozen variety), plus thin whole-wheat bread and butter sandwiches are pleasing partners for a pick-of-the-patch salad. And with blueberry pie and cheese—call in the new neighbors.

Garden Salad: Soften 2 envelopes and 2 teaspoons unflavored gelatin in ½ cup cold water for 5 minutes. Add 1 cup boiling water and ½ cup sugar and stir until gelatin is dissolved. Blend in 1¾ cups cold water, 1¼ cups cider vinegar and 2 teaspoons salt. Chill until thick. Fold into the gelatin mixture wafer-thin radish slices (about 2 bunches), 2 medium cucumbers, peeled and sliced, 1¼ cups sliced scallions—use part of the tops—and a teaspoon of dill. Mix thoroughly; pour into a 1½-quart mold. Chill until set—about 5 hours, or overnight. Unmold on a chop plate. Garnish with lettuce, water cress, tomato wedges and ripe olives. Makes 12 servings.

Sour-Cream Dressing: Mix 1½ cups commercial sour cream with ½ cup mayonnaise, ½ teaspoon salt, 2 teaspoons sugar and 2 teaspoons vinegar.

Curried Chicken Salad in Tomato Petals

Dolled up with an exotic Indian flourish or two, chicken salad is especially good when a few deviled eggs are tucked round the platter and cream-of-asparagus soup is passed. Have assorted crackers, too, and replenish them when you come in with a fruit-and-cheese tray.

Curried Chicken Salad in Tomato Petals: Steam a 5-pound roasting chicken. Don't boil it. Cool. Remove the meat from the bones and cut into largish pieces. Add ½ cup diced celery, 1 cup diced tart, peeled apple and 2 teaspoons grated onion. Blend 2 teaspoons curry powder with 1 cup mayonnaise and ¼ cup light cream. Season with 1½ teaspoons salt and a sprinkling of pepper. Then add ⅓ cup toasted slivered almonds. Mix well. Chill. Cut 6 tomatoes into sixths—almost but not quite through. Place tomatoes in lettuce cups, then fill with spoonfuls of chicken salad. Place parsley here and there.

Stuffed-Celery Salad

When coals glow in the outdoor fireplace and father puts on a steak, it's your cue to toss the upcoming salad. That is, provided tomatoes are sliced and some frozen French-fried potatoes heated. Let folks make their own sodas for dessert.

Stuffed-Celery Salad: Select 8 to 10 fairly large celery stalks. Wash and prepare them for stuffing. Mix well together ½ cup blue cheese and ¼ cup cream cheese. Stuff the celery with the cheese and chill the stalks for about an hour or until ready to use. To make the salad, break up a quart of salad greens—whatever you like. Romaine, lettuce and endive are an ideal trio. Add ¼ cup chopped green pepper and ¼ cup pitted sliced ripe olives. Slice the stuffed celery into ½-inch pieces and add also. Season the salad with ¼ teaspoon dried tarragon and toss with a sharp French dressing. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Jellied Fruit and Cottage Cheese

Here's a fruit medley to follow New England clam chowder. Be sure ome buttered banana bread and iced tea are handy.

Jellied Fruit and Cottage Cheese: Have ready 1 cup watermelon balls, 1 up casaba melon, cantaloupe or honeydew-melon balls, and ½ cup seedless reen grapes. Soften 1 envelope plus 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin in ¼ up cold water. Let stand 5 minutes. Dissolve in ¾ cup hot water. Add ¼ cup lemon juice, ½ cup fruit juice (the juice from the melons that collects as you cut them may be enough, but add orange juice to make it up if ou need to), 1 tablespoon grated lemon rind and 3 tablespoons sugar. Chill until slightly thickened. Peel and slice 3 peaches. Mix with the rest of he fruit and fold into the gelatin. Pour into a cold 2-quart mold. Keep the nold on ice or in the refrigerator while you prepare the cheese layer. Soften envelope unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cold water. Let stand 5 minutes. Add ¾ cup hot water and stir until dissolved. Mix in ⅓ cup lemon juice nd 5 tablespoons sugar. Press 2 cups cottage cheese through a fine sieve. Gradually add the gelatin mixture and blend thoroughly. Pour this over he fruit layer when it is partially set. Chill until firm. Unmold and surround with greens and fruit. Makes 8 servings. Though none is necessary, it nay have a sour-cream or mayonnaise dressing.

Shrimp Salad With Rémoulade Dressing

If there is anything to equal—or surpass—shrimp cocktail, it is shrimp sauced in the following way. To go along, have plenty of feathery popovers, mushroom consommé, and wind up with, say, fresh pineapple and strawberries with coconut flakes.

Shrimp Salad with Rémoulade Dressing: Chop 4 hard-cooked eggs. Add 1 teaspoon dry mustard, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, 2 tablespoons chopped green pepper, 1 teaspoon grated onion, 4 teaspoons anchovy paste, a few drops of Worcestershire sauce, 1 cup mayonnaise and 8 stuffed olives, thinly sliced. Combine 1½ pounds cooked, cleaned shrimp, fresh or frozen (cut in half if they are large), with ¾ cup diced celery and enough of the dressing to coat it nicely. Serve in a lettuce-lined bowl and garnish with additional stuffed olives. Makes 4 to 5 servings. In smaller portions, it is a fine hors d'oeuvre.

Cold Zucchini-and-Lima-Bean Salad

This is a whole vegetable course in itself—excellent with your favorite ham-and-spaghetti casserole. Add some crackly, crusty rolls. And close with an easy Melba parfait of peach ice cream layered with raspberry sauce.

Cold Zucchini-and-Lima-Bean Salad: Wash well 8 small zucchinis. Slice into circles and cook until just tender in boiling salted water. Cook 1 package frozen baby Lima beans according to package directions. Drain both squash and Limas. While they are still hot, marinate them in the sharpest of garlic French dressings for 3 to 4 hours before serving. Arrange in lettuce cups with sprays of water cress. Makes 4 individual salads.

Now—

Velveeta is extra good for youngsters and young mothers, too!

*Now richer than ever in high-quality protein, calcium, phosphorus, riboflavin

Now your old favorite, Velveeta, is richer than ever in vital non-fat food values from milk!*

When you put two ounces in a husky sandwich for your youngster the Velveeta gives him more milk protein, more calcium, more phosphorus, as much riboflavin and more vitamin A than he gets in a big 8-ounce glass of fresh, whole milk.

And because the extra goodness of this famous pasteurized process cheese spread comes from the non-fat part of the milk, Velveeta is especially good for you, too, both before and after the baby comes.

While you're watching your weight, and also trying to get your needed supply of milk nutrients, enjoy Velveeta and crackers and Velveeta and fresh fruit. Delicious Velveeta can be a big help to you!

VELVEETA BY KRAFT

is full of health from milk!

Let's try Green Beans Vinaigrette

Try any style—
Whole, Cut, French Style

These are the canned green beans that live up to your proudest recipes!

Carefree meals are good meals with

Del Monte®

green beans

To make this famous dish at its very best, you need cooked green beans of firm yet tender texture and rich yet delicate flavor. With never a string, of course.

So what better time to discover you can buy canned green beans like that? Yes, canned—perfectly cooked Whole or Cut, and ready for the sauce. And just compare DEL MONTE Blue Lake Green Beans for texture and flavor with any you've ever had the bother of cooking yourself!

For these green beans are an improvement on an improvement—DEL MONTE's own special development of the famous Blue Lake variety. See what a hit they make for you in

GREEN BEANS VINAIGRETTE

1 can (1 lb.) DEL MONTE Brand Green Beans—Whole or Cut
2 tablesp. oil
2 tablesp. vinegar
1 tablesp. chopped parsley
1 tablesp. chopped pimiento
1 tablesp. DEL MONTE Sweet Pickle Relish
¾ teasp. each, salt and sugar
1 hard-cooked egg, grated

To serve cold, chill beans, drain well. Mix other ingredients; spoon on drained beans. To serve hot, heat beans, drain off liquid, add sauce to beans in pan and toss with 2 forks until hot. Serves 4. Delicious with hot or cold baked Canadian bacon or ham, or boiled tongue, etc.

SUMMER GARDEN BUFFET

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 90

well-greased 9″-long loaf pan, or any pretty mold you take a fancy to. Pack in well. Set the loaf in a pan of hot water and bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., until firm, about 50 to 55 minutes. Let it rest 10 to 15 minutes before turning out. Turn out upside down on a platter, first loosening around the edges. Garnish with the delicious stuffed mushrooms. Ten servings.

There is an old French proverb to the effect that appetite is the best sauce—you may not agree after tasting this flavorsome dill sauce.

DILL SAUCE

In the top of a double boiler, melt 3 tablespoons butter. Stir in 3 tablespoons flour until smooth. Add ½ cup strained broth from the canned or cooked salmon. Add 1 cup light cream. Stir until thick and very smooth. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Add 1 tablespoon chopped fresh dill or 1½ teaspoons dried dill. Just before serving, stir in 2 beaten egg yolks. Reheat, but be careful not to overcook, as the yolks will curdle.

These savory little stuffed mushroom caps have been called "heaven in a cup"! (If there's any of the stuffing left over, your husband will go off to work feeling like a raja if you mix it in with his scrambled eggs.)

PIQUANT STUFFED MUSHROOMS

Buy 25 mushrooms with large caps, about 3 pounds, that will be suitable for stuffing. Remove stems and cut off the tough ends. Cook the caps and the stems in 2 cans beef bouillon diluted with 2 cans water. Simmer the mushrooms until tender, about 20 to 25 minutes, depending on size of mushrooms. Drain. Chop the stems very fine. Mix in a bowl with ⅔ cup finely chopped celery, 2 finely chopped drained pickled walnuts, 4 tablespoons minced onion, 4 tablespoons finely chopped blanched almonds, 2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce, 2 teaspoons finely chopped parsley, 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon grated lemon rind, 1 teaspoon chopped capers and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Warm the filling in ½ cup melted butter. Fill the mushroom caps. Sprinkle with fine cracker crumbs and dot with butter. Broil, not too close to the heat, until browned.

COLD VEAL STUFFED WITH HAM, LIVER AND PISTACHIO NUTS

Buy the first cut from the top of the leg of veal, weighing 3 pounds. Have your butcher leave it in one piece and pound it thin as for scallopine. Drop ½ pound calves' liver in boiling salted water for 10 minutes. Then grind it, being careful to remove all gristle and membrane. Grind ¾ pound cooked ham. Mix ground ham and liver together with ½ cup finely chopped pistachio nuts. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon allspice, ¼ teaspoon thyme, 3 tablespoons minced onion and a dash of pepper. Add ½ cup melted butter and mix well. Spread the mixture over the surface of the veal and roll tightly, as you would a jelly roll. Secure with string, about every 3 inches. Dust the veal with flour, salt and pepper. Lay 5 strips salt pork or bacon over the veal and roast in an uncovered baking pan in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for about 2 hours, or until 180° on a meat thermometer. Chill well and remove string before slicing. Ten to twelve generous servings.

Buttermilk biscuits would be delectable under any name—just by saying the words "hot buttermilk biscuits" you can feel one melting, rich and tender, on your tongue. You should prepare the dough on the same day as the meal is to be served, but of course the actual baking should be done as close as possible to serving time.

BUTTERMILK BISCUITS

Sift 2 cups flour with 1 teaspoon salt and 2 teaspoons baking soda. Cut in ¼ cup shortening until mixture is the texture of corn meal. Add ¾ cup buttermilk or sour milk to make a soft dough. (At this point, use your hands.) Turn out dough on floured board and knead lightly. Roll out to about ½″ thickness and cut out with floured biscuit cutter. Bake the biscuits on a greased baking sheet in a hot oven—about 450° F.—for 10 to 12 minutes. Split and butter while hot and get them to the table as quickly as you can. Makes 1½ dozen small biscuits.

This coeur à la crème may very well turn out to be your favorite way to feast on strawberries. Serve your cream-cheese heart thoroughly chilled, leave hulls on the strawberries, and make sure there's a little bowl of powdered sugar to frost them white.

COEUR À LA CRÈME

Allow 3 eight-ounce packages cream cheese to stand at room temperature until softened, along with 4 eight-ounce packages creamy cottage cheese. Press both cheeses through a fine sieve. Cut a piece of cheesecloth to fit a 2-quart mold—a heart mold, if you have one. Dip the cheesecloth in cold water, wring out the excess water, and fit cheesecloth into mold. Fill with cheese mixture, pressing gently, and fold edges of cheesecloth over top of mold. Refrigerate overnight. To serve, unmold on serving platter and remove cheese cloth. Serve with unstemmed strawberries, and a bowl of confectioners' sugar. Makes 10 to 12 generous servings.

Your guests are in the garden, everyone has been around the buffet table twice (or maybe three times!), and friends have put in clamorous requests for recipes. Everyone is relaxing with strawberries and coeur à la crème and hot coffee—everyone will agree contentedly that this has been a very special occasion. END

"Yoo-hoo . . . we shopped at an auction!"

Speedier shine—more free time—with

New BRILLO soap pads

Polish off pots and pans fast—have time for things you really enjoy

There's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

Give pans twice the shine in half the time with New Brillo Soap Pads! Brillo whisks away greasy scorch and burned spots fast! Nothing shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads. Wonderful for cleaning stoves too! Results guaranteed! A new utensil free if Brillo fails to clean!

Brillo Soap Pads (red box)
Soap-filled metal fiber pads
Brillo Cleanser (green box)
Metal fiber pads plus cake of soap
Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

THRIFTIER!
5 and 12 pad boxes!

P.S. to husbands—
Brillo speeds up your clean-ups, too!

WANTED—WOMEN TO HELP

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

she needs to be lifted and turned at frequent intervals. She's an amiable, nice-mannered old lady, but gets confused and forgetful. She can't remember to push a buzzer, Marian says, just calls out loudly when she needs attention. It all adds up to round-the-clock nursing—somebody always at hand. The doctors say that will be absolutely necessary as long as she lives."

"Marian can't possibly lift her," said I. "Are there any other relatives?"

"No, absolutely none. Marian was able to get three nurses to care for the old lady while she was in the hospital—at a staggering cost. But when she had to leave, and Marian tried to arrange to care for her in her own home, there wasn't a nurse who would undertake to come for more than a few days—at any price."

"Does she have to have real trained nurses—R.N.'s, you know?"

"No, indeed. All she needs now is some simple mechanical attendance. Anybody with two hands and two feet and a kind heart could give it."

"Practical nurses, then?"

"They charge almost the same as the R.N.'s, and anyway, there aren't any available. This is a dreadful part of the country in which to get nurses, prosperous and populous though it is."

"What about a nursing home?"

"Same problem. None would take the old lady without special nurses, three a day. So the doctors say."

"What's the answer, then?"

"There isn't any final one. But Marian had to send the old lady to Bevington, off in Massachusetts, where they have spent their summers and have friends, and where there are some kindly women who, at a price, will nurse the old lady."

"So it's settled, for the moment?"

"Except that the nursing—they don't live in—costs Marian a thousand dollars a month and that's all the income she's got. She's using up her savings fast. And suppose that she herself cracks up and has to be hospitalized, as is quite likely."

"It's tragic," said I. "What's the good of keeping people alive to old age with our modern miracle drugs and treatments and then leaving them in a bleak world without care?"

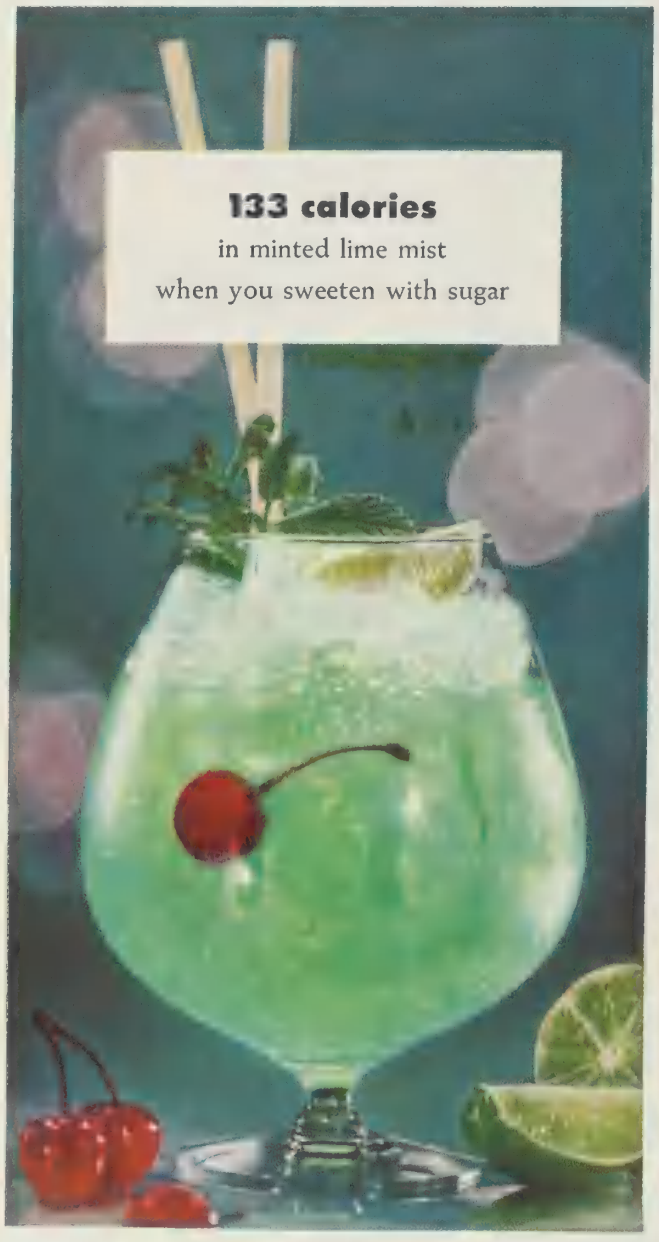
"The trouble lies partly, I suppose," meditated the Skipper, "in the fact that we've never got the nursing profession properly organized. The great leaders of the past raised its standards higher and higher. And we're certainly devoutly thankful for the highly trained nurses when we're gravely ill. But they're too scarce and too expensive for ordinary middle-class people except in brief emergencies. So we've been trying the 'practical nurses,' but now they're scarce too and cost almost as much as the trained ones. Where do we go from here?"

"It's one of the grave shortages that afflict the nation," said I. "You hear complaints on every side—from hospitals, training schools, health services, suffering families with invalids young and old, difficult situations everywhere. There simply aren't enough nurses, trained or practical, enough nurses' aides except in a few hospitals, enough sturdy, kindly women, untrained but willing to lend a helping hand to the old and the crippled in time of need, at a wage the middle class can pay."

"And there won't be," concluded the Skipper, "unless some miracle produces a supply of visiting angels."

"Have you ever," asked the Skipper one winter evening, "watched a rather feeble teacher trying to handle forty husky boys and girls in an overcrowded classroom in a junior high school?"

"Happily, no," said I. "Have you?"



"Yes. Joan Elmont, you know, is on the board of education in her town, and took me to visit one of their schools. She's very concerned about the shortage and quality of teachers, and I don't wonder. Out in her state things are even worse than here. That poor young teacher I saw faced a class twice too big for her and she hadn't the brains or the force of personality to control them or to hold their interest. Some of the bigger boys were noisy and insolent. When she rapped and called 'Order, please,' they shouted 'Make mine beer'—copying Marlon Brando, you know. I longed to have a try at them."

"Did you get a chance to talk with her after the class?" I asked.

"Yes, and found her upset and depressed, on the verge of a nervous breakdown, I'm afraid. She's overworked, teaching one class right after another, with hundreds of papers to correct and clerical work to wade through after she escapes from the school; and a crippled, invalid sister to take care of when she gets home."

"Can't she get a practical nurse to look after her sister and give her a chance to rest?" said I.

"I asked her," answered the Skipper, "but she replied that she couldn't possibly afford a

You can save a lot of calories by sweetening with Sucaryl and you can't taste the difference

Sucaryl makes it easier for you to watch your weight...by giving you wholly natural sweetness in your diet . . . without one single calorie. You'll find Sucaryl sweetens all your favorite summer beverages—lemonade, limeade, iced tea, iced coffee—to perfection. Use it for fruits and cereals; cook with it, bake with it; use it practically anywhere you would sugar. Any Sucaryl-sweetened dish tastes just like its sugar-sweetened twin. Sucaryl, of course, is for anyone sensibly counting his or her calories, and for those who cannot use sugar. You get Sucaryl in tablets or solution; low-salt diets call for Sucaryl Calcium. Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Ill. and Montreal. Abbott

MINTED LIME MIST

2 cups warm water
½ cup fresh lime juice
⅛ tsp. mint extract
4 drops green food coloring
1½ teaspoons Sucaryl solution
1 pint dietetic lime carbonated beverage

Mix all ingredients except beverage. Chill several hours in refrigerator. Add beverage, pour in glasses filled with crushed ice. Garnish with maraschino cherry, wedge of lime and fresh mint. 6 servings.

Sucaryl®

Non-Caloric Sweetener—No Bitter Aftertaste

Join

GOLDEN DEED CP CRUSADE

UNITED CEREBRAL PALSY

se. A teacher's salary, she protested, is y about the same as a nurse's nowadays."

It's all very disturbing," I mused.

More than disturbing," said the Skipper. ow are our children going to get really cated?"

God knows," I answered. "Because poor hat teacher you saw was, ten years from v there won't be half as many teachers, n as good as she, in proportion to the tly growing number of children we ought educate."

Unless," echoed the Skipper with a wry le, "some miracle produces a supply of demic angels."

Academic angels!" I protested. "Even y would be appalled by the statistics of the nbers they'll have to teach a few years n now, because of the soaring birth rate. berts have figured that if we're to have even erably educated teachers for the children of ew years from now, then half of all the duates of all the colleges of the country will e to enter the teaching profession. You and oth know that there's not the faintest nce of their doing that. There are too many er attractive fields of work, far, far more ractive to the great majority.

So," I continued, "even if Congress appriates many millions of dollars to help

To the budding personality, an orderly home is more important than church or school or society. By the time these institutions begin to exert an influence, for good or evil, the child's nature has already developed its more enduring traits, which can be modified but not eradicated. This is why women as mothers are the cultural and moral arbiters of the race, an appalling responsibility, which too many American women try to ignore without being able to forget it. Woman represents the continuity of life. It is she who is the dominant influence on her children during the impressionable early years. She determines their unconscious responses to life.

AGNES E. MEYER
Out of These Roots
Published by Little, Brown & Co.
and Atlantic Monthly Press

ild more classrooms, as the President asks, ssrooms will be of no use, without teachers them."

'Besides that," added the Skipper to inease the gloom, "of the graduates who do into teaching, with glorious exceptions, we ely get the top people."

'The teachers' colleges," I objected, "say t situation is improving: that they're getg a better quality of candidate now; but n so, the supply is far too meager. No, atever our efforts to make teaching a more rative and socially alluring profession, re's just no chance of our achieving even a derately good teacher for every classroom. e'll always have a few born teachers who uldn't be hired to do anything else, but ——"

But look!" interrupted the Skipper. "What out this idea of teaching by television that me people are pushing? You know, put a eat teacher in every classroom—on the teleion screen. Then, they say, one person can ch thousands and thousands. Of course at's not so."

"Not really," I agreed. "Still, there's someng in it. It could help a lot—always proded that besides the great personality on the een and the scenes and demonstrations own there, you have real teachers, more like tors, perhaps, to be in close human contact th the pupils, in small groups, to interpret them, answer questions, oversee their rk and activities—be sure that they did rk and were active, not just an absorbing onge, a passive audience. I'm perfectly sure at most children and young people need the rmth, the spark, the push they can get ly from human contact with a real, live, present teacher. Abraham Lincoln didn't need it, but then there aren't many like him."

"That's a possible scheme," said the Skipper meditatively. "I can see it working in lots of places—helping and supplementing the regular staff. And these 'tutors,' as you called them, wouldn't have to be very mature and experienced, would they? With supervision, couldn't you manage with a lot of young assistants, keen young people, trained as apprentices?

"You remember the 'engineering aides' we trained during World War Two, because of the dangerous shortage of engineers? Well, this is a time of dangerous shortage, too, one which threatens our country with masses of ill-educated citizens, and a feeble-minded electorate.

"A good many of the 'tutors' might get fascinated by the work—because of course there's nothing more fun than teaching, if you like it—and go on to become wise and experienced teachers." Her hopeful voice died down.

"No," I lamented. "It's no good. We couldn't possibly get enough young people to want to try being apprentice teachers—not enough to make a go of it on any considerable scale—not unless some miracle changed the minds of a lot of young Americans."

We fell into silence and gazed at the dying fire. We are both teachers, the Skipper and I, and sometimes we don't like the present look of our profession. It was late. The red embers paled to gray.

I was walking along the main street of a busy, tidy small city on a crisp, sunny morning. At the post office the Stars and Stripes flew as usual, as it did on another large, official-looking building next door, which bore the sign "Women's National Service Corps." Coming and going briskly through its swinging doors were young women in a uniform

CONTINUED ON PAGE 137

You get such good things in new

Dinty Moore Beef Stew

Lean beef, tender young carrots, firm white potatoes . . . all in a well seasoned beef-rich gravy! That's what the Hormel folks give you, in Dinty Moore Beef Stew. That's why it's America's favorite... Why don't you try this wonderful easy way to give your family a meat-and-vegetable main dish? (There's plenty of everything in the big 1½ lb. family-size can!)

Even better now—in the new "picture" can:

GEO. A. HORMEL & CO. AUSTIN, MINN.

Beautiful way to treat company...

CROWN JEWEL JELL-O

When you want a really special treat to draw admiring "ohs" from your guests . . . try this elegant new Jell-O gelatin dessert.

FIRST, prepare separately a package of Raspberry, Lime and Black Cherry Jell-O, using 1 cup hot water and ½ cup cold water for each. (Or create your own bright combination of flavors!) Pour into 3 shallow pans and chill until firm. Cut into ½-inch cubes.

NEXT, make the fluffy filling by heating ¼ cup sugar with 1 cup canned pineapple juice to boiling. Dissolve 1 package Strawberry Jell-O in the hot liquid. Add ½ cup cold water. Chill until just syrupy. Whip 2 cups cream (or non-fat dry milk, if desired) and fold it into the syrupy Jell-O. Fold in the little Jell-O jewels.

Now, line two 9-inch pie plates with ladyfingers (about 2 packages), and pour in the Jell-O mixture. Chill about 4 hours. Crown Jewel Jell-O serves 16 beautifully . . . and tastes every bit as delightful as it looks!

JELL-O BRAND GELATIN DESSERT TEN DELICIOUS FLAVORS

JELL-O IS A REGISTERED TRADE-MARK OF GENERAL FOODS CORPORATION

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 135

range to me, horizon blue with collars and rm insignia of various colors—lemon yellow, ark blue, crimson, white—and smart caps ith a silver eagle on the front.

Presently I found myself inside and entering large assembly hall, where hundreds of oung women not in uniform were seated. hey rose and stood politely when an efficient nd friendly-looking older woman, in the orizon-blue uniform, appeared on the speak-rs' platform. She smiled cheerfully, and in-ited them to be seated.

"Recruits of the Women's National Service orps," she said, "I am the commandant of his fifteenth district. I welcome you to the ervice of your country, to those duties of umanity, healing and care, education and nlightenment, which have been for centuries he peculiar functions of women.

"You will all recall today the dramatic ircumstances in which our corps was born, he tragic state of the world and the grave ufferings and dangers in our own country aused by the extreme shortages of workers n these humanitarian fields. So serious was he situation that the new President of the Jnited States declared a state of emergency nd called upon the women of the nation to ally to its aid.

"The great organizations of women, the vomen of the churches, the schools, industry, ose in reply. They formed a council to speak or them and the council sent to the President hat message which has become historic:

"'We, the women of the United States of America, claim equal right with our brothers to erve our country. As we share equal rights of itizenship, we ask to share in return equal duties. As our brothers are drafted for military service, we ask that we be drafted for services which are traditionally and naturally the peculiar duty of women—the care of human beings in adversity and bitter need, the beneficent work of nursing, and the teaching and guidance of the youth of the nation.'

"This moving appeal from the women was granted, and so this corps of ours was born. In it you now have the proud privilege of serving.

"You will receive here some basic instruction and will be consulted and tested to determine where you should be placed in the three great divisions in which our work is classified: nursing, home helping, teaching. Then you will each be given some special preliminary training in the work of the division where you belong, before you pass on to your apprenticeship in one of these great fields of useful and satisfying service.

"May you be happy in it and do credit to our corps, and may your experience in these years of national service make you stronger and more understanding during all the rest of your life!"

I awoke reluctantly, warmed with pride.

"You've been nodding," said the Skipper.

"Yes, I slept a bit and I had a dream—that was not quite all a dream." I described it.

"Goofy!" exclaimed the Skipper. "Draft American women! I can't imagine anything less likely to happen!"

"Yes," I agreed. "It couldn't happen. Only a miracle could make it happen; and we don't go in for miracles these days. But then, what are the women of America going to do to meet these crying needs of their people?" END

NEXT MONTH

THE SCHOOLTEACHER AND THE BANK ROBBERS

She didn't know who they were—but there were 38 pupils in her care and when the man with the gun said, "Get in that car or I'll pick off every one of these kids," Ruth Madison obeyed. "Captive," by the Gordons, tells the story. This is the first of two installments.

PRETTY DAUGHTERS OF FAMOUS FATHERS

They're among the loveliest girls in Hollywood, though you've probably never seen them. Their fathers are a director, a dancer, a comedian, a dramatic actor and a great producer. You will see them in beautiful summer fashions every girl would love to wear: Gretchen Foster, Ava Astaire, Linda Hope, Jane Fonda, Sharon Disney.

SHOULD A BACHELOR MARRY A WOMAN WITH SIX CHILDREN?

Paul Willing was in his 40's, with no intention of marrying anyone until he met Cristine and realized he couldn't live without her. But could he live with her brood of six "strong personalities"? Lucy Cores' gay novelette, "Cristine's Children," is complete in this issue.

WHEN ROSALIND RUSSELL ENTERTAINS

she likes to serve deviled Swiss steak, which you can try in your own kitchen with her recipe from "Box-Office Dishes." Also favorites to tempt the appetite offered by such stage and screen stars as Robert Taylor, Katharine Cornell, Gladys Swarthout and Helen Traubel.

"CONVERSATION PIECE" SKIRTS

They're so easy to make that in a few hours you can have gay, inexpensive additions to your summer wardrobe that will bring many compliments. Nora O'Leary tells you how to choose fabrics and colors and what to wear with what.

HOW TO MAKE A ROSE JAR

Would you like to keep the fragrance of your summer garden year round, just as grandmother did? You can—and with much less effort—by following Marie Ross' instructions for drying the flower petals, adding mint and rose-geranium leaves and the right spices. Suggestion: why not make several for special Christmas giving?

NOTHING TO GET SO HOT ABOUT

There are dozens of new ways to keep housework from raising your temperature on the hottest days. You can prepare complete meals, even bake potatoes with no oven heat, serve sautéed shrimp and mushrooms, or spicy pineapple upside-down cake made in an electric skillet. Margaret Davidson describes the new plug-in appliances, advises about care and suggests menus and recipes in "Cool Cooking."

And in addition short stories by favorite authors, "Man in the House," Dr. Adams' page on marriage problems, Dr. Spock's advice for mothers, and many other features, all coming

IN THE JULY JOURNAL

ENTERTAINING IDEA . . . for fashionable little evenings and big formal dinners . . . Syracuse, the fine, beautifully designed translucent china.

CELESTE 11.95, five piece place setting

HARMONY 16.95, five piece place setting

SYRACUSE China

Member of the American Fine China Guild

Write for color brochure of Syracuse patterns with suggestions on choosing, using and caring for your china. Syracuse China, dept. LH657, Syracuse 1, N. Y.

Important to present owners of Syracuse China: If you are experiencing difficulties in obtaining replacements on older patterns, write Department M above address.

CHILDBIRTH WITHOUT FEAR AND WITHOUT PAIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 73

pools and beds of water lilies. I might come across a great pike lying basking on the surface behind tufts of reeds. Grebe dived and bobbed around the boat, playing hide and seek.

Even during my boyhood, I was tremendously impressed with the beauty of the newborn. I loved to have a fledgling on my hand. I loved to watch the butterfly come out of its cocoon, and I would sit for hours patiently waiting for its appearance so that it could dry its wings in the sun on my hand.

Sometimes I was allowed in the farm buildings when the cattle and the mares gave birth. I would see them lick their young as they lay by their side, the flashing, protective eyes glaring a warning to the human intruders: "Come one step nearer, if you dare."

Yet even when we were very small, if a pregnant woman came to our home to tea, we would all be sent upstairs to the nursery. Childbirth in those Edwardian days was never referred to openly, but was mentioned only through veiled insinuations and carefully chosen words.

Becoming a medical student was not easy for me. From my stock I did not inherit the kind of brain that takes smoothly to intellectual learning. There had been no professional ambitions in our family on mother's or father's side for years. Successful farmers and businessmen, on the other hand, flourished.

I failed to get my matriculation, which I needed in order to go up to Cambridge.

It was a terrible blow, but fortunately I was a good athlete, and a good athlete is always popular with the masters in an English school. Our classics master felt sorry for me and offered to coach me for two terms at home.

To everyone's amazement, including m own, I got through the papers, even throu part two of the examination, which enabl me later to take an honors degree at Ca bridge in my favorite subject—Natural Scienc

Very much in the medical news during m Cambridge days was John Ballantyne, Edinburgh obstetrician. In 1899 Ballanty presented a paper in which he dealt with an natal body care and hygiene. He was t pioneer in the practice of caring for the e pectant mother and unborn child during pre nancy. Resisting opposition and demandi an opportunity to prove his theories right, succeeded, in 1901, in being endowed for th purpose in the Royal Simpson Materni Hospital in Edinburgh—with a single bed!

This maternity hospital was named aft another famous Scot, Sir James Young Sim son, Professor of Midwifery at Edinburg University. He was the discoverer of chlor form anesthesia, which brought down on his head a furor of fiery discussion.

It was on moral grounds that his use chloroform was condemned, for it was allege that it "robs God of the deep earnest cries" women in labor! It is said that he persuade Queen Victoria, in 1853, to be anesthetized f the birth of Prince Leopold.

Anesthesia had come to stay, but Jol Ballantyne was still considered a bit of a jok I remember very well hearing him criticize while I was at Cambridge:

"What does he want to see a wom for before she is having her baby? Wh can he do for her then? Stuff and nonsens Ha-ha."

Was it nonsense, I wondered, when n training in midwifery at London Hospital b gan and I was profoundly shocked to see last the reality of what I had so far onl been able to imagine—women in childbirth women who often suffered excruciating an apparently unavoidable pain, for chloroform provided only a partial solution? It alleviate the woman's distress only to the poin where the use of chloroform could be safel expected not to endanger the life of the com ing child.

I felt I knew absolutely nothing about mid wifery when I was called out to the first case had to handle entirely on my own. In fact I had never seen a normal birth. I can we remember the sweat breaking out on m in waves of doubt and alarm as I pedaled furiously on my bicycle toward one of th tenement houses in Whitechapel's gloomy an poverty-ridden back streets.

I clattered up a flight of rickety stairs, an knocked on what I hoped was the door of th right room. As I gazed at the woman waitin for me on the bed, my mind was overflowin with a confusion of extracts from midwifer books.

I scrubbed up in the best way possible in m surroundings, going through in my mind th book technique of child delivery.

There were four old women in this room their canny, shrewd eyes piercing through m as they crowded round the bed, adding to m terrible discomfort. The woman on the bed was a mother who had given birth already t several children, and she could see at a glance that I was much more frightened than she was herself.

"It's all right, dearie. Don't you worry," she comforted me.

The baby, however, did not come as easily as she thought it would. I began to grow extremely agitated—trying to hide my feelings, of course.

Timidly I examined the mother's enormous tummy. I could feel nothing at all that gave me any clue to the pending state of activities. I made a further examination, terrified that I might hurt my patient, and I found that the baby was already quite low down in the birth canal. But, to my horror, as my hand encountered the soft and bulgy form of the baby, my finger went into a small hole that contracted about it.

It's a breech birth, was my horrified thought, and I broke out into the most profuse sweat. To my patient I exclaimed with all the confidence in the world:

©1956, The Cream of Wheat Corp.

Ice cream on hot "Cream of Wheat"

Honestly, it's good! Kids love it. In fact, just about everyone thinks it's wonderful (once they get over their surprise).

It's your favorite hot wheat cereal . . . with the sugar, cream and flavor served up in a new, fun-to-eat way.

It takes ideas to keep kids interested in breakfast. This one deserves a try, don't you think?

Guard your family with hot "Cream of Wheat"!

It's perfectly all right. Just try to work a e harder."

The mother did so as another expulsive con-tion came. Suddenly she gave a most un-ving shout, and clapping the mask to her e to relieve her from this distress that I ld scarcely stand myself, I cried, in most unfessional language, "For God's sake, give other shove and see what happens."

The baby emerged, its tiny face all pushed
but. I had poked my finger into its mouth!
was not a breech birth at all. But the mother ked at her baby most tenderly and rerked, "I've never had one that looked like t before!"

I was terribly pleased to get out of that
se. As I cycled back to London Hospital, p and exhausted, I reflected on the extent my appalling ignorance, and on what a or creature I was to have stood by that man's side.

Those were tough days. One day I entered room of a very powerful and uncontrolled gnant woman who had sent a call to the spital. I found her striding up and down, lly shrieking. I was strong and athletic, in early twenties, over six feet tall, but it took my force to stop her from throwing out window, to the danger of whoever might below, a large crockery basin she had zed.

As we struggled, a quiet, small White Ma-nity charity sister walked in. Up she came this huge, hysterical patient and gave her h a crack over her buttocks that this extant mother must have remembered it for time.

"You at it again!" this tiny sister exclaimed diminutive disgust. To my astonishment

God will do nothing without man. If God works a miracle, He does it through man. PARACELSUS

s completely uncontrolled woman became cile immediately. She relaxed and allowed rself to be led obediently toward the bed. I lized that here was something else I had to rn: the difference between real and simu-ed pain.

Most of our patients came from the White-apel district, and many lived under the most ful conditions in homes that were no better an hovels, with whole families crowding into e room in which the walls and boards were ested beyond any remedy except consuming
mes. The birth of children into these condins incited us to pity and rage, but to tender-ss as well.

I learned a lot from the sisters on the ma-nity wards in the hospital, especially from ster Victor and Sister Marie Celeste. They re tenderness personified in their treatment these women, especially when they were in stress.

A dark-haired girl, a very pretty Irish type appearance, came into the hospital during y early student days for her first delivery.
e was having an abnormal presentation and e was going through a very difficult labor. I nt into the ward where she was lying on a d, extremely distressed, twisting her head d clenching her hands.

"Doctor—can't you do something? Can't u do something?" she kept pleading. I was t even a qualified doctor. It was too early to ve her chloroform. I was standing by her, eling absolutely frightful because I could not ally help her in any way, when Sister Victor me in.

"Ah—come now, m'dear, come," she said ntly. She pulled a stool up to the bed and sat wn, made the pillows comfortable, and arted stroking the girl's dark hair, and sooth-g her. "Come now, everything is going to be l right." Sister Victor's confident presence as most inspiring to me and to the girl, who gan to lie quietly, just holding Sister Victor's nd.

Tenderness is one of the primary and most eeded emotions in any human relationship, nd, watching Sister Victor and Sister Marie eleste at work, it became my firm belief that to be able to bring real tenderness, without emotional sentiment, to a patient's bedside is one of the basic needs of every doctor and nurse.

Quite often I discussed childbirth with my two favorite sisters. They were both remarkable and clever women and they taught me a lot. As I went around the wards, or cycling to outside calls, I was beginning to wonder whether pain in childbirth might have its roots in the minds of women; but neither Sister Victor nor Sister Marie Celeste would agree to this.

Milling about in my thoughts were the theories on the sympathetic nervous system I had studied at Cambridge. The sympathetic nervous system is that part of our nervous system that is beyond our control. If something upsets us emotionally our sympathetic nervous system will react whether or not we want it to. It is now accepted that relaxation will soothe many of these disturbances.

It is a fact that a great bunch of sympathetic nerves supplies the uterus with nerves which react to emotional changes.

Although Sister Victor and Sister Marie Celeste would have none of it as they sat stroking the foreheads of these women and girls, I leaned more and more toward the idea that the pains of women in childbirth might be brought about by mental and emotional attitudes.

One wet murky night I was called out from my small sparsely furnished room in London Hospital to a Whitechapel maternity case. I went on my bicycle between two and three in the morning down Whitechapel Road until I came to the usual wretched row of tenements, on this occasion by the railway arches.

I groped and stumbled my way up the staircase and opened the door of a room about ten feet square. On a bed that was supported at one end by a sugar box lay a young pregnant woman covered with sacking and an old black

CONTINUED ON PAGE 141

"That's why Starlac® is called the heart of milk"

says Elsie, the Borden Cow

Borden's Starlac is the finest, pasteurized milk with water and fat removed. And it tastes just like what it is—the delicious heart of milk.

This modern nonfat milk mixes instantly, dissolves completely, even in ice water. Drink it and use it in all your made-with-milk recipes.

Starlac costs as little as 7¢ a quart when you buy it in the money-saving 12-quart family size. (The price is slightly higher in the smaller sizes.)

Put heart-of-milk nourishment in low-cost dishes

Pastry browns better when it's made with Starlac. Waffles made with Starlac are crisper.

Milk desserts, sauces and gravies are so much smoother when you make them with Starlac.

And every time you add Starlac to chopped meats and casseroles, you add extra nutrition.

7¢ a quart in the 12-qt. family size packages

SECOND 100 YEARS 1857

If it's Bordens, it's got to be good!

© 1957, The Borden Company

Platter flattery—the added flavor you get from French's, the light and lively mustard that cold cuts just can't do without!

On food

In food

Great New Idea . . . Mustard Bread made with French's—see easy recipe below.

no other mustard has FRENCH'S Light and Lively flavor

How can a mustard be more than a mustard? When it's French's—the mustard that owes its light and lively taste to secret spices and flavorings, plus specially grown mustard seeds. Little wonder, then, that French's adds more flavor on foods, brings out more flavor in foods! And its tangy taste won't fade out in cooking. So now you know why more people buy French's than any other mustard.

MUSTARD BREAD

1 small loaf of French, Vienna, or Italian Bread (about 15 inches long)
¼ cup butter
½ cup chopped green onions or sweet onions (including some of tops)
2 tablespoons French's Parsley Flakes or chopped fresh parsley
2 tablespoons French's Mustard
2 tablespoons French's Sesame Seeds or Poppy Seeds

Cream butter. Blend in onions and parsley. Split loaf the long way. Spread with butter mixture. Spread with French's Mustard. Top with French's Sesame Seeds. Cut bread diagonally in 1½ inch slices not quite through crust. Heat in a moderate (350 degrees F.) oven for about 12 minutes or until lightly browned. Hard rolls can be used instead of bread.

F R E N C H ' S M U S T A R D

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 139

There was a pool of rain lying on the beneath the broken window. The room t by one candle stuck in the top of a bot- the mantel.

e girl's mother, rough in appearance, but ently competent, was standing by. She ht me a jug of water and a basin and I d and dried my hands with my own soap and towel.

spite of the condition of this room I soon ne aware of a quiet kindliness and confi- in its atmosphere. It was the young first child, but she gave no sign of fear. glance went often to her mother's eyes from the looks exchanged between them birth progressed, she seemed to retain a dence I had never seen in any parturient an before.

ere was no fuss or noise. The girl did ev- ing she should have done to control her- nd to conduct her labor well.

ere was only one slight dissension. As the 's head made its appearance at the outlet birth canal and the dilatation of the pas- was at a stage where I felt there should scomfort and pain, I tried to persuade my nt to let me put the mask over her face so she could inhale some chloroform. But irl refused, saying that she had no need of help.

was the first time in my short experience chloroform had ever been refused by a an in labor. I was very curious and when about to leave some time later I asked, y would you not use the mask?"

is was the only moment when I saw her ant. She looked from me to her mother, she looked shyly into my eyes.

t didn't hurt. It wasn't meant to, was it, or?" she said.

walked down the stairway of that tene- in a bemused frame of mind. Dawn was breaking as I rode my bicycle down the dy street.

hy had this girl not felt pain? Why had thing gone so smoothly? Thinking it I remembered that during her labor I had the definite impression that the mother instructed her well beforehand, and that knowledge was a real comfort to the hter.

as it normal, or abnormal, when a woman hildbirth did not suffer pain? Every in- t in me shouted that this girl's happy de- y of her child must surely be every an's right.

hen I qualified as a doctor I was quite de- d to specialize in obstetrics. Instead, I t straight into the army. Britain was in the es of the First World War. I joined up as servist with the first hundred thousand, became an officer in the Royal Army dical Corps.

was placed in charge of the horse ambu- es, and of training men in sanitation in the l, stretcher drill and first aid.

n the night of August 6, 1915, I was sitting landing lighter that was close-packed with vily breathing men. The lighter was being ed by a small naval vessel from the island mbros toward Suvla Bay on the Gallipoli re.

e were going into action, and there was olute darkness ahead. I listened to the athing of the men around me. Some athed long and low, others breathed in rt gulps. The first shot came, a sharp uk!" that seemed on top of us. But it hit water alongside the lighter with a horrid, low thud. Someone asked in a scared tone, "hat was that?"

Another man laughed and whispered, ou'll soon know!"

was much too frightened to think of any- ng except the violence that lay immediately ead. As well as our medical kit, each A.M.C. officer carried a pistol, but it was use only in the defense of the wounded. I uld not see that any future lay ahead for me cept that I would soon be dead. My interest obstetrics had completely vanished from mind.

Yet on the island of Imbros, while we had en waiting for this embarkation, something ppened that interested me very much.

We were camped on a very barren, sandy spot, dotted with thorny shrubs, and we sometimes walked across to the other side of the island where it was pleasanter and more fertile. One day we saw a woman and a girl together. This Greek girl was obviously having a baby, and apparently with no trouble, for she was smiling and exclaiming to the woman with her.

My companions who did not have my professional experience were embarrassed, and as we did not seem to be needed we naturally did not stand and stare. It was clear that the two had been walking together when the girl had been caught out. She had not been able to get home in time to have her baby.

We all turned quickly away, but for some time that day I felt again that surge of intense curiosity. This was the second girl I had seen demonstrating my belief that childbirth should be a simple, natural performance.

For a time these incidents were to be completely wiped out by overwhelming experiences of my own. We were sitting on the beach eating our lunch a few weeks after our landing at Suvla Bay when a shell burst right over our heads and sent the whole bunch of us flying in various directions, rolling along the sand.

I picked myself up and got to my knees and roared with laughter, as everyone else did in the relief of highly strung feelings. I imagined I was unhurt, but soon my back began to pain badly. I was able only to limp about and one of my eyes felt as if it had a piece of dust prickling it constantly.

I remember getting through the night watch, but I have never recalled being taken across Valletta harbor from a hospital ship in a lighter to Malta and to the Blue Sisters' convent there.

I do remember waking up in a comfortable bed and wishing that I was dead when I realized that both my legs were paralyzed and that I could see nothing at all from my previously very clear-sighted eyes.

When I could hobble about on crutches I left Malta and after a course in a London hospital of electric baths for a fracture discovered in my spine, and various other types of treatment necessary to remove the toxins of a dysenteric infection, I was able to limp home to convalesce. My bad eye, which had been septic, also responded to treatment. My eyesight was completely restored.

Soon I was well enough to walk without sticks, and I was posted again, first to Colchester, and thence to active service abroad as a medical officer with the Fifth Dragoon Guards.

In the part of Belgium where we were sent for short rests behind the lines, those of us who had mounts used to play polo together on a scratch polo field. Late one afternoon I stopped behind after the others to knock a ball about by myself on the field.

Looking casually about as I reined in my horse for a rest, I saw a peasant woman, squatting, leaning her back against a high wall. As I observed her behavior, I realized that she was having a baby.

The Greek girl I had seen on Imbros had not been alone, but this woman was, and I was not hesitant these days about how to behave in unexpected situations. I rode my horse through the field gate, dismounted, and walked over to see if I could help.

Flemish French appeared to be her language, and I could not speak it, but I managed to indicate that I was a doctor, whereupon she laughed frankly, as if to say:

"I don't need to bother with that, thank you. I know what I'm about."

She was well into the second stage of labor, and I still had sufficient orthodoxy about my obstetric opinions to think that her exertions ought to be accompanied by some fear. She seemed, on the contrary, to be confidently determined and very pleased with herself. The baby arrived quite easily and the afterbirth followed almost at once and the woman herself severed the navel cord.

Still convinced that she ought to have some friend or a member of her family with her, I remounted my horse and galloped off to the village, about a kilometer and a half distant. Several peasant women whom I approached to tell them about this woman's predicament seemed as unconcerned as the woman herself. They smiled at me as if to say:

"Poor fellow. He does not understand what it's all about."

There was nothing for it but to gallop back in the direction from which I had come. I was amazed to meet this woman, returning to her village on foot, and carrying her baby wrapped in the shawl that had been about her head.

Such unusual incidents, always tying up with that pursuit to which I hoped one day to return, continued to cross my path.

During the Battle of Cambrai I, with my orderlies, was in a deep trench. There, behind a sheet of sacking hung down from the dugout's veiling, on the other side of which men lay groaning, cursing and dying, I worked one night and delivered a young French girl of her child.

Shells had destroyed the farmhouse in which she lived. She had struggled over shell-swept no man's land, knowing that shortly she was to have her baby, and hoping to see fluttering somewhere in one of the lurid flares that illumined the chaos of the night the red cross of an army doctor's flag.

When a solemn corporal led her to me she was so terrified that she was almost speechless. One gains a strange sense of confidence in a trench. To my surprise she was soon lying calmly on a bed of sacks found somewhere by my men, looking at me with a frank confidence, and no sign of fear.

Nothing but happiness emanated from her as she had her baby beneath the barrage around us, welcoming it with the radiance of a conscious mother's joy.

When there was a lull in battle in the early hours of the morning four of my orderlies volunteered to carry her on a stretcher to the nearest ambulance, an expression of tremendous tenderness lighting up their weary, bearded faces.

"Two of you are quite enough to carry her," I said gruffly. The two men I indicated picked up the stretcher and bore it more carefully than I have ever seen a stretcher borne, carrying away this little French girl with her baby tucked closely in her arms.

In 1919 I was demobilized. I returned to London Hospital where I was given an appointment as house physician under Sir Henry Head. This delighted me, as Sir Henry was a very great teacher on the causes of pain, on how the mind has its own strong influences on pain's origin and its effect.

Although I was nearing thirty and qualified as a doctor, I felt out of touch with learning and its disciplined routine, so I set my mind to get my Doctorate of Medicine, writing for the purpose a thesis on an aspect of bacteriology

MY HEART HAS LOVED BUT ONCE

By ELEANOR HALBROOK ZIMMERMAN

My heart has loved but once . . .
whatever voice
Calls to me on the wind of life is yours,
Whatever face my momentary
choice,
It must need hint of you if love
endures;
The grace of life, the music, and the deep Wild cataracts can never wash
you down,
You are the dream that rises in my sleep,
You are the sword, the candle,
and the crown. . . .

I have forsaken you, put you aside,
Buried you deep beneath a thousand hours
Of work and laughter with intrepid pride,
Yet am pervaded by your subtle powers
As one who wakes to find with an old pain
The candle of the morning blurred with rain.

For busy little bodies "on the grow"

KANTWET®

CRIB MATTRESSES

When Baby's awake, he's a busy little beaver, expending a great deal of energy. Asleep, he's gaining new energy and he's growing. That's why it is so important he has the right mattress. KANTWET mattresses are built scientifically to be firm yet resilient — as doctors recommend. Start your child right with a mattress by KANTWET — there's one for every budget.

Year-Round, Portable FOLD-A-CRIB
for indoors and outdoors

Indoors, it's a bassinette . . . easy to move from room to room and just the right height for tending baby. Outdoors, it's ideal with the easily removable draft-free shade and screen top. Fibreglass screening at one end provides ventilation . . . quilting at the other gives weather protection. Constructed with lightweight aluminum, four rubber-tire wheels and safety brake.

FREE! Handy Baby Sitter Memo Pad . . . get one at your local Kantwet dealer's.

best for health and safety
KANTWET®
BABY PRODUCTS

COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE

THE GREATEST NAME IN CRIB MATTRESSES

associated with puerperal fever in childbirth. A professor whose opinion I asked on the finished work which had cost me considerable effort told me quite sincerely that it was all trite nonsense, and that if I wanted to get my doctorate I should write a thesis on some other subject.

Recklessly I sent up my thesis just as it was and eventually the assessor who was to tell me my fate asked to see me personally at Cambridge.

"There was some doubt in the minds of some of the assessors about your thesis," he began to explain as I sat before him, sunk in the utmost despondency.

"Go on. I can take it. It's all right, sir," I interrupted dejectedly.

"Yes. I've read it very carefully myself," he went on, "and I think you've written an extremely important work. I want to tell you we propose to award you your M.D., and that you will be the only one to receive it at Cambridge this session."

I could not believe my ears. I could hardly thank him, and I returned to London feeling that I was walking on air.

I now realized that opinions can differ, even when expressed by the most learned of men. As a result, my growing confidence received a stimulating spur.

My enthusiasm for my work was carrying me along and I soon became senior resident accoucheur of the London Hospital—an appointment that was far from the topmost rank, but one that enabled me to begin to demonstrate and lecture in midwifery to students.

I was observing the behavior of women in labor much more closely. I noticed how tremendously their attitude changed when a doctor or a nurse in whom they had confidence came into the labor room. They immediately became calmer. It is in a woman's nature to look for protection and comfort in this time of her need. The protection of her man was usually taken from lized woman during childbirth, so she lo to her nurse and attendant for this con and protection, and benefited when they given to her.

Women wanted to know more about t selves, although other medical men woul mark to me, and some still say, "Don't t pregnant woman anything unless she you. The less they know, the better. It complicates events."

Occasionally, too, in many of the po homes I visited the husband dodged into out of the room when his wife was being e ered. I gradually got used to this. If his tionship with his wife was good, I did not him out. Often I found he was of enorm help in calming his wife. On the other ha his presence obviously disturbed and irrit her, I would not let him stay.

Not only was I closely observing the havior of women in labor. I was exami myself and watching other doctors and nu I saw at work. I began to divide doctors nurses into two distinct types—negativ positive, introvert or extrovert. Extro were able to give easily of themselves to patient, meeting with more success than introvert who, quite unconsciously, alar women especially with evidences of his o own reactions.

By being sympathetic and by calming patients, telling them a few facts about t selves, I might be helping those women in personal care to suffer less. But I had to a to myself that in my attendance on wome labor I was still nonplused over the caus pain.

Of one thing I was certain. Those wo who did not have much difficulty were n the natural course of events. In other wo some unnatural and destructive element being introduced.

As I read and studied, and watched by bedsides of women, I became more and n convinced that in those cases where l ought to have been normal and was not. difficulties that arose were based in the e tions. The destructive element that destro a woman's natural ability in this physiolo function, the only such function that c not be performed without pain, was—fear

I spent hours in studying. I read every b I could lay my hands on relevant to the ject of pain in childbirth.

Opinions were divided, but I read each c came across, making copious notes, tryin evolve a theory about pain in childbirth would connect with the structure of wom reproductive anatomy, and that would sa the minds of the professors and the mind women in childbirth.

I read that women of more primitive t did not suffer unless there were abnorm ties—women in the Sandwich Islands, Hi stan, the South Sea islands, Africa, C India and Japan. Even in my own experie was finding some women who seemed to l a closer understanding than others of t natural instincts.

But what I read of the history of childb in Western Europe convinced me that n women for centuries had been passing on f one generation to another a heritage of tense expectation of pain; during advan civilization, cultured Western woman had her primitive intuitive knowledge of gi birth.

It was generally agreed medically that woman was to have her baby without the normality of physical and mental distress, nerve-and-muscle harmony of her system n be maintained. It rarely did seem to be m tained, judging from the distress doctors nurses frequently witnessed.

I was certain that the cause of this frequ breakdown of nerve-and-muscle harmony fear, fear that affected the nervous mechan of the muscles in a woman's uterus and so peded the progress of her baby's birth.

Speaking in the broadest lay languag woman's uterus is provided with three set muscles. First there is a longitudinal group signed to expel the baby; secondly, there middle interlacing group that maintains rect circulation of the blood during the birt a child; thirdly, there is a circular group

New! The only permanent you dare wash at once!

Leaves your hair soft, sweet and instantly shampoo-fresh!

Takes ½ the time, ½ the work!

RICHARD HUDNUT'S New Quick LANOLIZED HOME PERMANENT

So easy! No need to shampoo first!

Only Richard Hudnut's new Quick has Crystal Clear Lanolized lotion. A lotion so pure yet penetrating, you can wave without washing first—and shampoo right after you wave! So easy! When your wave is finished, you shampoo instead of rinsing. No need to wait a week to wash away "new perm" frizz and odor. No fear you'll wash out or weaken your wave. It's locked in to last with exclusive Crystal Clear Lotion!

Wave and wash with ½ the work!

Quick's the quickest! Only Quick's exclusive Crystal Clear Lotion penetrates so fast, it lets you wrap more hair on each curler and still get a firm curl to the tips. You get a complete new-style wave with just 20 curlers – ½ the winding time – ½ the work! Shampoo instead of rinsing and, from the first minute, your new Quick wave is lanolin-soft, sweet to be near. Use Quick today—be shampoo-fresh tonight!

2 new-style waves for the price of 1

Crystal Clear Lotion can be recapped. Use ½—Save ½. $2.00 plus tax. (1-wave size, $1.25 plus tax.)

© 1957 Lambert-Hudnut Division, Warner-Lambert Pharmaceutical Co.

muscles arranged chiefly in the lower part of the uterus.

This third group of muscles is so arranged that it suggests its function is to stop the baby's being expelled from the mother's uterus until it is time for the child to arrive. This third group of muscles is also associated with changes in the tissues of the cervix—the gateway between a woman's uterus and vagina—so that this gateway is gradually opening up during the first stage of labor into a loose, spongy and dilated ring that will allow for the free passage of the child during birth down into and through the vagina, which is at the same time becoming very loose and elastic.

But unless nerve-and-muscle harmony is maintained, the muscles of the uterus cannot do their work of evacuating the child without causing the woman physical pain, especially if wrong nerve impulses cause two particular sets of muscles to become opponents at the wrong time.

The nerve impulses which make the circular muscle fibers close the outlet of the uterus are received from the sympathetic nervous system, over which we have no control. When a woman is afraid of childbirth these impulses come from the brain and resist the muscles that are trying to push the baby through the birth canal.

After several years as a practical observer in obstetrics, I had seen the result of the chemical influences of the emotion of fear on a woman in labor.

Fear created tension, tension created pain, pain created more fear, more tension, more pain, until only anesthesia could dull the awful effect of the mounting cycle, and allow the blood to circulate so that it could bring fresh supplies of oxygen to the uterine muscles and carry away the waste products from muscles that had used up oxygen.

The man who never alters his opinion is like standing water, and breeds reptiles of the mind. BLAKE

It made no difference whether the woman in labor was brave or a coward, whether she wished to escape the forces that threatened her or to turn and fight. She still experienced pain. For when the emotion of fear takes possession of the mind, Nature supplies the same chemical secretions for both impulses—fight or flight—so that all the muscles and organs in the human system not connected with those activities can be slowed down.

The uterus is not an organ that is used in either fight or flight, so its muscles, if the mind of a woman in labor is full of fear, are gradually weakened.

Only absolute faith in life and death could completely destroy fear. Who could attain such perfection in their attitude? As I sought about in my mind for some simpler solution to the problem my thoughts kept returning to a wartime experience of my own.

Near Boulogne Wood in the winter of 1917 we had a dressing station under a sugar factory. To attend the men we had to walk under fire for a mile and a half to where they lay wounded and dying on the freezing snow, while we were all being machine-gunned.

I suffered from a feeling of terrible frustration and responsibility because circumstances gave me so little real chance of doing anything very helpful for these men. I was most frightfully jumpy and I remained tense and strung up even when I returned to my billet to rest.

However, I kept these feelings to myself, and was surprised when the Indian noncommissioned officer, my senior medical orderly, who seemed a very calm sort of person, confessed quite frankly to the same feelings of nervousness which I thought I was covering up so well.

I thought none of us ought to confess to this sort of thing, and I was ashamed he had noticed my nervousness, thinking that if it was so bad that it showed I must be a cowardly weakling.

He began to explain to me the way in which he relaxed in order to rid himself of tenseness. He got me to lie down on the sofa, to breathe deeply and rhythmically, and to try to get all my limbs to go quite loose.

Rather self-consciously I began to let myself be influenced by what I was doing. I was astonished at the rapidity with which I was able to regain my mental and physical composure, although I had only average self-control.

This method of relaxation worked so well that I continued with it. At night, if I went to bed overtired or strung up, I could send myself right off to sleep.

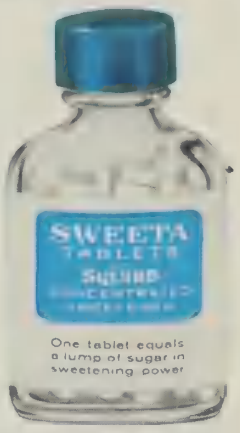
I was not thinking of sending women to sleep during childbirth, but the fear-tension-pain cycle interfered with the normal process of birth. Why should not women in childbirth benefit from this system of relaxation, which, correctly controlled, would allow the uterus to do its work without being impeded?

Women wanted to be able to have their babies well. I was sure of it. In some instances I had even seen them bravely bear pain without anesthesia, wanting to be conscious when their baby came, because they felt it a mother's privilege to welcome her child into the world.

The tremendous courage I had seen in so many women intensified my desire to be of help and service to them; especially now that I had seen with my own eyes at least four cases in which pain was definitely absent.

Meanwhile, in my own personal life, I was under considerable emotional stress. Having fallen in love and having married, and needing more money than I could earn at hospital, I had decided to go into private practice with an old-established practitioner at Eastbourne.

Almost immediately there began a series of frustrations and disappointments and personal griefs that set me effectively by the heels for several years, preventing me from going along with my plans to follow up my developing theories. At last I was able to establish



CONTINUED ON PAGE 145

Now...SWEETA* in TABLETS

Non-fattening concentrated sweetener

- No unpleasant after-taste of any kind. Just plain delicious.
- Really tiny, effervescent tablets dissolve readily in your cup of tea or coffee.
- Completely calorie-free! Ideal for sugar-free diets.
- Wonderfully handy to carry with you. Bottle of 100 tablets is only 2¼" high!

made by* SQUIBB...*get it at your drugstore

*TRADEMARK

Sweeta in liquid form is also available, in a convenient, squeeze-a-drop bottle. Excellent for iced drinks.

If you like to mix and match colors (and we know you do)

You'll love LUX

Now in 4 new colors

as well as pure white

This is the famous Lux Soap you know . . . mild and gentle . . . with its exclusive fragrance . . . its rich Cosmetic lather

One or more of the new Lux colors is sure to contrast or harmonize beautifully with your bathroom décor. You'll want to use Lux in Color—right along with your favorite White Lux.

Every one of the four new pastels is the same wonderful Lux you already know . . . famous Lux, the beauty care of 9 out of 10 Hollywood stars. And, like White Lux, Lux in Color is guaranteed by Lever Brothers to satisfy completely or your money back!

You'll find your favorite pure white Lux in familiar gold foil

Buy new color Lux by the color of its foil wrapper—choose from lovely shades of Pink Green Yellow Blue as well as white

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 143

myself more peacefully in a practice in Woking.

I began to build up a large practice, and those women who came to me to have their babies were enthusiastic about the methods I described and which differed from orthodox obstetric practice.

Education, understanding and relaxation were the three principles with which I hoped to remove the fears which I believed were at the back of the minds of most women, causing them to suffer abnormal pain when they gave birth to a child.

Although my intention was to eliminate fear from their thoughts, I did not tell my mothers that this was my aim. Nor did I confuse their minds with an attempted scientific explanation of their mental and physical behavior during parturition. Instead, I sought to make them interested in the simple facts, which I hoped would enable them to have their babies with less difficulty.

"What do you know about childbirth?" I always asked a woman when she came to see me for the first time. I was appalled at the replies I received from girls who were having their first child. Most girls knew how conception took place. But many had no idea of how their baby would be born, or that there was a birth mechanism or a birth canal through which the baby could come.

For all my mothers I drew a simple diagram showing them how their reproductive organs worked, how the birth mechanism worked at the time of the baby's birth, so enabling the baby to be expelled.

Based on my own athletic training and knowledge of anatomy, I designed a series of exercises to loosen and mobilize the joints of a pregnant woman's spine and pelvis, and to tone up the muscles connected with the baby's birth.

This alarmed some women. They felt that how they were carrying a baby such movements would be bad; that they would lose the baby if they did not walk or sit in a certain way; or that if they took any sort of purgative they might pass the baby in a motion. Common sense usually came to their aid.

As soon as I left the London Hospital I began to deliver my mothers in the second stage of labor, on their backs, at an angle of forty-five degrees, with comfortable pillows supporting their spine and head.

This is a version of the squatting position in which most primitive and many Eastern mothers give birth, and which I had observed in the two peasant women whom I watched having their babies in Imbros and in Belgium.

An English woman doctor, Dr. Kathleen Vaughan, who spent many years in India, extolled the merits of this position in a book in which she showed that there is an increase in the actual size of the bony outlet of the pelvis when this position is used; but her suggestions had not been taken up by other obstetricians.

Girls having their first baby rarely questioned this position. But I remember one mother who had borne a previous child in the orthodox way strongly resisting the idea when I asked her to turn on her back when the second stage of her labor began.

"I had my other baby on my side." Her protest was puzzled, and a little distressed.

"I've had all mine on my back," I replied encouragingly. "Try my way, and see how you get on."

After the next expulsive contraction was over and she was breathing quietly again she declared, "Oh, it's much better. It gives me so much more strength. I think it's a bit more dignified, too—although some mightn't think so," she added.

I never found one mother who wanted to return to the side position in labor's second stage.

I believed that the processes that stimulated the progress of birth, or hindered it, went on in the woman's head, so I always took up my position on a stool by her side where I could look into her face and eyes and watch what was going on in her mind.

By all that women told me during their pregnancies and deliveries, as they communicated their thoughts, ideas and resolutions to me, I was constantly helped. They were so keen to learn how to help themselves, so pleased when we met with some small success.

Over the first twenty-five or thirty cases, each birth showed some little improvement that made me think it was better than the last. Sometimes I would achieve what I felt was a perfect birth. Then some very difficult case would fling me into a state of disappointment and doubt.

But gradually my teaching, the use of the technique and women's understanding of it matured, and became the routine of all my obstetric work. One of the things I learned very early from women was that very few of them knew how to breathe. They had difficulty in breathing through the mouth as well as through the nose. At first they saw no connection between the use of a muscle and the intake of breath which supplies the oxygen a busily working muscle requires.

I understood now why I had seen some women actually turn blue in the face, especially when strong second-stage expulsive contractions took command, and the feeble amounts of air in a woman's lungs quickly gave out.

In teaching my mothers relaxation so that they could free themselves of the tension that caused unnecessary pain, I was still using the knowledge given me years before by my Indian army friend. Some of my mothers were too busy to practice relaxation during the day. They practiced it when they were in bed, and found that it helped them to have a restful night's sleep, an additional healthy preparation for the birth of their child.

A week before a mother's baby was due I concluded her instruction by showing her an X-ray plate of the fully developed baby inside her womb. I pointed out to her how her organs were now arranged for the child's delivery. At the same time I would show her the baby's tiny hands and feet, now visible.

From that thrilling moment her baby became a reality; and so did her sense of responsibility for giving her child a perfect birth. To escape from any part of her coming experience was, at that moment, the very last thing she desired.

"Why—it's my baby!" she would exclaim, a rush of happy color flooding her face, a glow of anticipatory excitement lighting her eyes.

In these ways I hoped that I was helping each mother to look upon the approaching birth as a happy and important event, creating in her mind a state of pride and confidence.

The test of my teaching naturally lay in the procedure of the actual birth. Sometimes a girl or woman who had believed herself quite confident would suddenly be overcome with fright when the reality of her labor began, particularly a young girl having her first child.

I never allowed any woman to lie alone, a prey to the destructive forces of an uncontrolled imagination. If I could not be with her myself, from the start, I made sure that someone was with her, her husband, mother or sister, to whom I had already given a little instruction on what to expect.

As soon as I arrived at the nursing home, I talked to her quietly, reminding her of everything we had studied together. Companionship of the right sort is the most important factor when labor begins.

I remember spending eight hours straight with one little girl who was in the most awful panic. I arrived at the nursing home at ten o'clock at night to find her quite terrified. I carried her through every stage of her baby's birth, telling her when and how to breathe; how to relax and conserve her strength; when to let the uterus do its own work; when to push, proving to her that all her fears were of her own making.

She had allowed these fears to sweep everything she had learned from her mind.

When it was all over and she was tucked up in bed, and looking absolutely beautiful, and so thrilled with her baby, she gave me a contrite look of sympathy.

"I'm terribly sorry I behaved in such a silly manner. You look far more tired than I feel. Far more exhausted."

"I'm not at all surprised. I've had more reason to be exhausted, don't you think?" I asked her, with a smile.

Some of these cases took me a long time; but I never regretted the hours I spent in this way, especially when it was a first birth and the mother could be sent home happy and healthy, without any of the complexes that can destroy family happiness in married associations.

I always tried to find out as much as I could during antenatal talks about the mother herself, learning how her mind would probably work.

A tall, fair girl, with large blue eyes, a thin, sensitive mouth and slightly tapering chin came into my consulting room languidly one afternoon. She was beautifully dressed, her figure attractively revealed, and under her arm she carried a small dog.

"He said he considered women the equal of men and then he asked me to go Dutch!"

She treated me as if she had just come into her own drawing room and found me there. She was going to have a baby and had heard through a friend that I was helping women to have their babies without pain.

"I am just too horribly frightened," she declared, in the most exaggerated language. "I always have been a dreadful coward and I just can't bear pain."

I did not believe that she meant a word that she was saying. I smiled and said quietly:

"My business is to help women have their babies as nicely as they can themselves: I don't help them to avoid the experience. Haven't you the guts to help your own baby into the world?"

For a minute she looked at me with angry and outraged pride. Then her whole expression changed, breaking into a disarming look of girlish appeal, and she asked if I would tell her what I meant.

Her baby was born while she was fully conscious, and my whole heart went out to this young mother, so different and so natural now, and an amazingly beautiful picture when she took her newborn baby into her arms.

Half an hour later when she was sitting up in bed looking astonishingly happy and well, six feet four of magnificent husband marched into the room. He did not notice me at all. At first a look of disbelief crossed his face at seeing the radiant picture his wife presented, then he had only one thought and one expression—adoration. I went out.

Such deliveries, and the happiness they brought with them, elated me. There were times, nevertheless, when I had strong hidden anxieties of my own.

Sometimes my orthodox training would rise up in my mind and I would be almost overcome by the impulse to change my approach, or to intervene in order to annul my own anxious thoughts and fears.

There were ways in which I could set my own fears at rest. I kept a constant and careful check on the reactions of the fetal heart as the baby's birth progressed, and on the pulse of the mother and her respiration during contractions. Pulse rates told me a lot about pain. A woman could make all sort of trouble, yet if her skin remained cool and moist and a good color, and her pulse normal, there was little real pain.

On the other hand, if a woman was quiet, with a pallor and a staring frown, perspiring in little beads of sweat above her mouth, with a rapid pulse, I knew she was suffering intense pain. Even though she turned her head away from the mask, wanting to achieve that which she had set her heart on, I insisted on giving her tranquilizing aid from the anesthetic apparatus by her side, or through injection.

Inevitably, as I delivered more babies, remarks from the mothers went from woman to woman, person to person, some of the facts distorted by repetition and misunderstanding.

Twice I was approached by the Medical Council because anonymous persons reported me for cruelty. On each occasion, in order to quash these rumors, I asked the Medical Council to send its own people to investigate any birth I conducted which they might choose to watch. I stated that I would willingly give up any practice they felt to be wrong.

This offer was never taken up, and I felt professionally reassured by the council's attitude. But it hurt me very much to think that such blatant misunderstandings of my intentions could occur.

In my casebook files I now had twenty-six cases—all perfect, natural labors. If some women could do this, I decided, why should not all women—and doctors—be given the information?

I was drafting out my first book on natural childbirth when a woman who had come to me for the usual reason—a friend had told her about me—asked curiously:

"My doctor says you are a hypnotist. Is it true?"

I was completely taken by surprise. I assured my visitor that I was not a hypnotist. But after she left me, I began to worry. Was it possible that my ability to calm women's fears was due not to the practice of the obstetric technique I followed, but to some strange power for which there was no reasonable explanation? I took myself off to a psychiatrist, whom I knew well enough to assume that he would not pull his punches.

"Of course, up to a certain point, we all have the best brought out of us by suggestion," he remarked after examining me. Then a gleam of humor developed into a broad grin. "But you can stop worrying about being a hypnotist. You haven't the brains to hypnotize a rat!"

Being told once more that I had no brains was the very best cure for my anxiety. I must be normal!

I was beginning to feel that I could no longer cope alone with my enormously growing general practice. The wish for an obstetric clinic where any interested medical person could see the work demonstrated had taken over my mind. My father-in-law was sympathetic toward my ideas. He said he would help finance the purchase of a suitable property.

A property was for sale in Woking at £5000, which was just what was wanted for this venture. There were two or three separate dwellings which would not be needed for our clinic, and within six weeks I had sold these for £3000. The large house remained in the name of my wife and myself, and a mortgage was arranged through her father.

In the meantime I persuaded a surgeon, a good physician and a heart specialist with senior degrees to set up practice in the clinic with me.

I was able to set up a part-time practice in Harley Street, something I had always wanted to do so that I could be near the center of medical affairs. Best of all, I could specialize absolutely in obstetrics.

By the end of the thirties, I was very much in command of the technique of natural birth. I now looked implicitly to Nature to teach me how to give back to human beings the lost knowledge of those natural processes which, rediscovered and reapplied, could lead to co plete happiness and success in birth and mot erhood.

For instance, when my mothers first sa their babies at birth, many of them instin tively moved to take the baby immediately their breast. This I encouraged, when I saw th frequency with which this impulsive, natur contact between the delighted, eager moth and her newborn child was followed by th almost immediate contraction of the mother uterus into a small hard ball. This was fo lowed by the easy expulsion of the afterbirt in nearly every instance, within twenty mi utes or less.

I encouraged rooming-in of the newbo babe with its mother. Very few health happy mothers wish to be separated fro their babies. They want to look at the chil to thrill with the miracle of this new arrival their own and their husband's life, to mak sure with their own loving eyes that the bab is all right.

The baby in turn feels the security of i mother's nearness while it is so new to strange world.

Since my early days in London Hospital had felt certain that the elimination of phys cal examinations mattered an awful lot to woman, both psychologically and physicall It helped to increase the sense of security an comfort so important to a woman's mind this time.

By about 1937 I had made such a lo series of observations of the stages of lab that I could tell almost for certain by a wo an's behavior, appearance and breathing ju what stage she had reached without making internal examination.

A woman seemed to reach her greatest ne for mental peace at the transition stage birth. The transition stage occurs when fir stage contractions that open up the birth can begin to pass into second-stage contractio that are expulsive ones, and a new nerve-an muscle harmony has to be established. At th time there can be pain also because the cerv is now fully dilated and the pressure of th baby's head may be felt as an ache in the re gion of the woman's lower back.

During the expulsion or pushing stage, noticed that the mother seemed to become a most entirely removed, mentally, from her su roundings. She would be unwilling to join in listen to any conversation, or to answer que tions, and often wished to sleep.

At first I was imbued with the old orthodo ideas that women in childbirth often becam lazy, intolerant, bad tempered, resentful, an that this was the lowest stage of their abilit Women believed this themselves and found alarming. Then I began to notice that th condition occurred in patients of every ten perament and type.

Sometimes I literally had to shout in woman's ear to make her hear what I was sa ing. Everything else about her condition wou be normal, and immediately she felt the ur to bear down to expel her baby every sign this apathy was absolutely, and sometim suddenly, dispelled.

My conclusion was that this remoteness w Nature's own anesthesia at what could be th most resistant stage of labor.

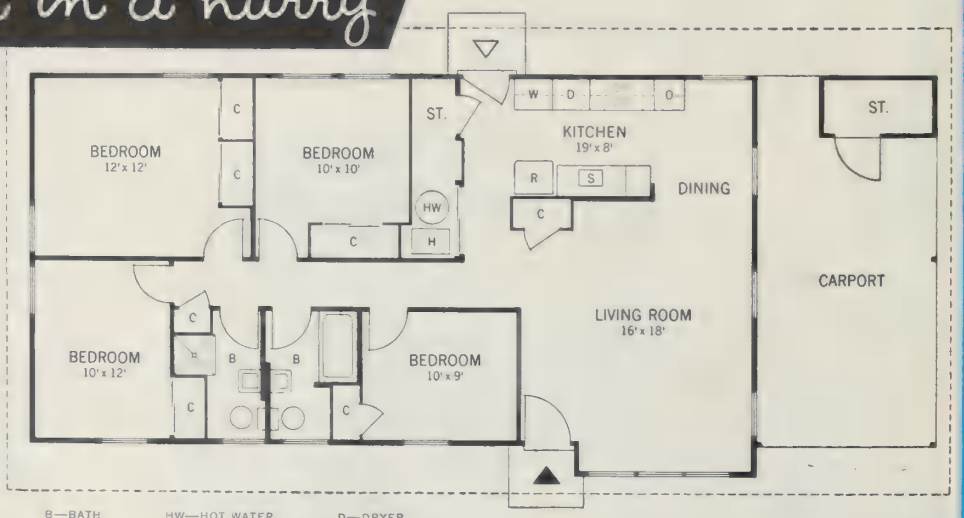
When my mothers were allowed to lie abs lutely quiet, not disturbed by any noise or in terference during this stage, they felt happ and at peace. When an expulsive effort bega they became active again.

During this period I had the exhilaratin experience of a succession of forty-nine birth within several months in which there had bee no need at all for me to think of using anes thesia, or forceps, or, indeed, to give any ac tive help at all.

Real-life cases are always more interestin when they are quoted from the greater deta of a doctor's casebook. Here are notes fro three instances of natural birth from my cas book of this time, which I have selected fo different reasons:

In the first case the mother was having h second baby. The birth of her first child ha been frighteningly slow and she was so terr fied the whole time, she confessed, that sh could not think of anything clearly, or unde

CONTINUED ON PAGE 148



DESIGNER: G. O. JOHNSON; PHOTOGRAPHER: RODNEY MC CAY MORGAN

4-BEDROOM PREFAB erected in a hurry

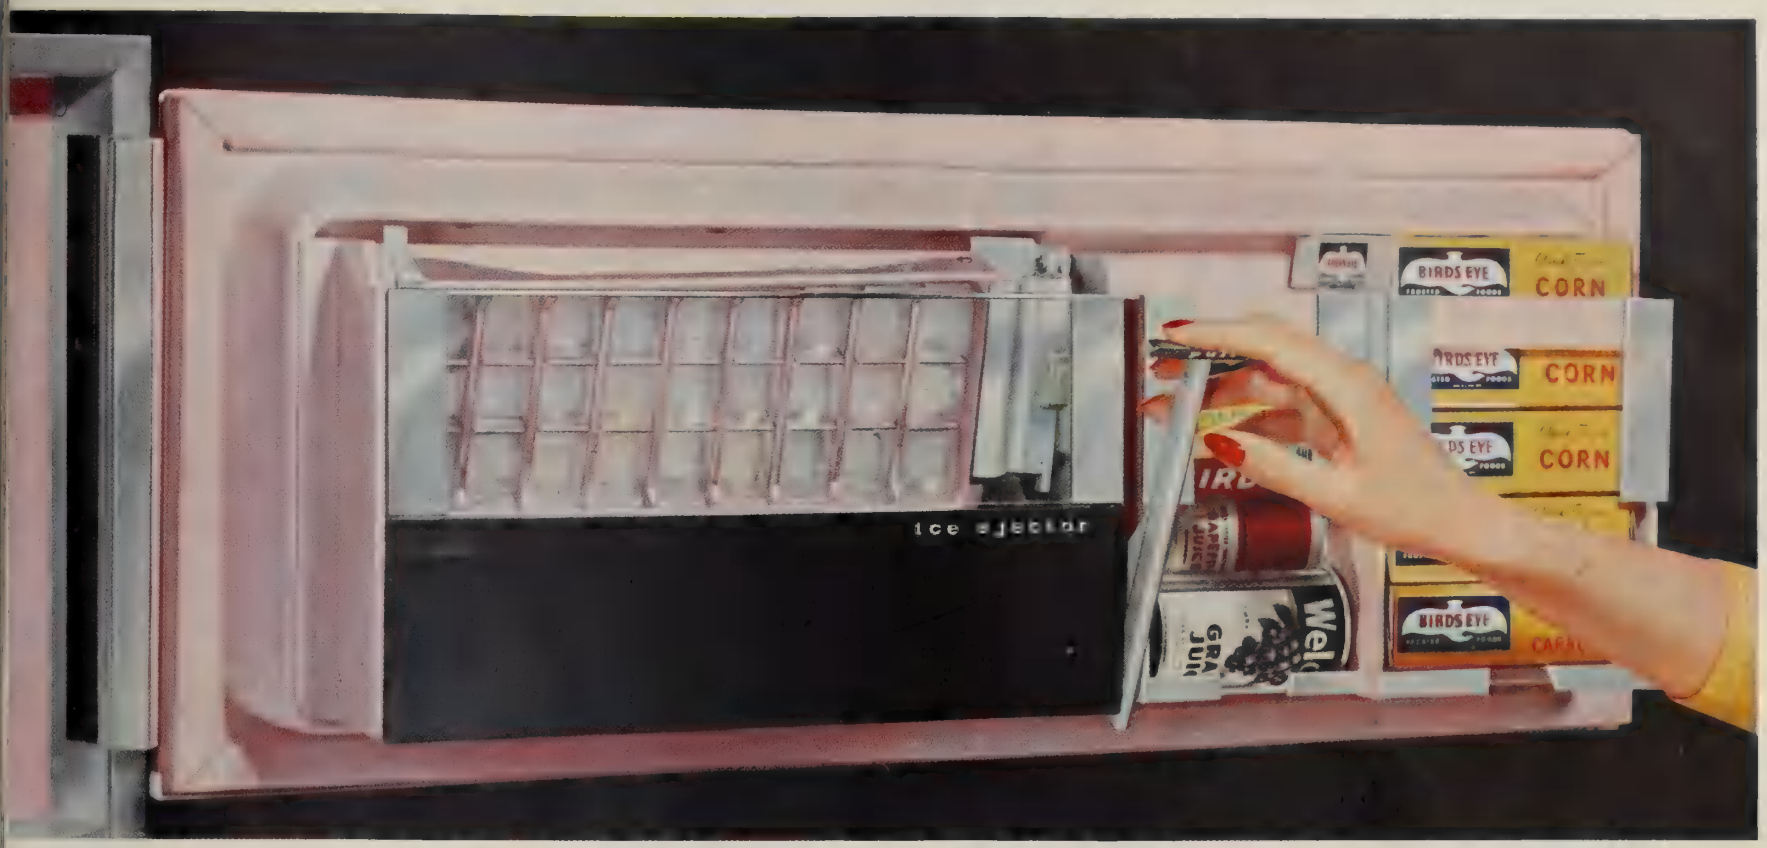
Just a few short weeks from delivery to moving day for this family-sized factory-built house.

By CAROL L. CRANE

B—BATH
C—CLOSET
ST—STORAGE
H—HEATER
HW—HOT WATER
R—REFRIGERATOR
S—SINK
W—WASHER
D—DRYER
—COUNTERTOP RANGE
O—BUILT-IN OVEN



A sturdy, livable house, ready for occupancy in record time, results from assembly-line fabrication and time-saving erection methods. After the builder-dealer has prepared the foundation, all the factory-made components are shipped from plant to building site in one truckload. In a single day roof and walls are assembled in place on the foundation, and interior finishing may begin immediately, without regard for weather conditions.

Variety and livability are built into this well-designed prefabricated house. The buyer selects the style of his home from a variety of five different exterior treatments, four window types, three roof lines, two arrangements of carport or garage—all available for use with the four-bedroom, two-bath plan shown here. He may have his house built on a slab, over a crawl space or above a full basement; he can choose a plan variation with dining space in the kitchen; he can select a model with larger bedrooms, or a larger living room, or both. Interior walls are a smooth, spray-painted finish or a waxed wood paneling; floors are hardwood or asphalt tile. Bathroom walls are waterproof wood paneling, or, for an extra charge, may be tiled.

The house pictured above, complete with all utilities, kitchen cabinets, built-in wall oven and countertop range, and tiled baths, can be built on the buyer's lot for $13,900 to $16,000, depending upon regional variations in labor costs and shipping charges. Laundry equipment and refrigerator may be purchased as optional "extras."

Write to us for further information about this house.

DRY ICE CUBES IN A BIN —JUST LIKE THIS

At lever touch, ice cubes tumble frosty-dry from tray into serving basket. Always enough ice on hand for lots of tall drinks.

MODEL FI-121-57

Everything in the new Frigidaire Refrigerator lives up to its Sheer Look smartness

From the amazing Ice-Ejector in the separate freezer door to finger-tip service of frozen juice cans—the surprises never cease in this all-new Frigidaire Food Freezer-Refrigerator.

For instance, by a marvel of ingenuity, doors swing open wide, yet need so little room at the side.

Then there's the Plan-A-Door. So flexible you can arrange everything where you want it.

Just a touch opens or closes either door, and each opens just as easily from the inside, too.

Roll-to-You Shelves? Of course! And now even tall bottles roll to you, too. All this in a color-gay interior enhanced by three glare-free lights so nothing can hide.

Yes, it's all new from top to toe – the handiest refrigerator ever! And the handsomest, too, with the new Sheer Look—now in all Frigidaire '57 Appliances, for that "made-for-each-other" look. Blends right in—looks beautifully built in, in your kitchen. See them all—in glamorous colors—at your Frigidaire dealer's. He's listed in the Yellow Pages of your Classified Telephone Directory under "ELECTRIC APPLIANCES."

MODEL FI-121-57

MODEL CP-123-57

Charcoal Gray, as well as other colors, available on some models. Another fashion-first for the Sheer Look, the all-new style triumph from Frigidaire. How you'll love the sheer square lines that make every corner count.

And to top it all—Frigidaire now sells its four glamorous colors at NO extra charge.

Look for the Sheer Look

'57 FRIGIDAIRE

AMERICA'S HANDIEST REFRIGERATOR

Frigidaire – Built and Backed by General Motors

LIVE BETTER ELECTRICALLY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 146

stand anything that was going on except that she was in awful pain, and, eventually, she simply had to seek relief in anesthesia. She told me that at the time of her baby's birth she had been unconscious and did not see the child until some time later.

This mother's second labor began with a tightening of her abdomen at nine-thirty in the evening which she recognized as the beginning of first-stage contractions. She went into the nursing home apprehensively, but we had a little practice in relaxation together, and I reminded her of all the sensations she must be prepared for and not be alarmed about.

I forgot, however, to remind her once more of the breaking of the waters, that bag of water in which the baby is enclosed for protective purposes while the mother is carrying her child in her womb, and which must be ruptured before the baby can be born.

My patient apparently had absolutely no recollection of this occurring during her first baby's birth. When the rush of water suddenly came she was very frightened, and immediately she went rigid for a few seconds, preventing the child from continuing to come. I blamed myself for this little fright she had. It was caused by my omission, for which I apologized.

She was a very small woman, but her eight-pound baby came into the world most comfortably when she had been in full labor for only five hours. When I told her the baby's head was through the birth outlet she could not believe it was true. She put her hand on my shoulder and took hold of my arm and exclaimed with excitement and disbelief:

"Impossible! It can't be my baby yet."

When the little boy finally arrived, she could not take her eyes off him.

As she held the baby tenderly to her, her uterus went down, bang, into a hard ball. The afterbirth came out into the vagina very soon afterward and she was able to push it out herself with a minimum loss of blood.

When I saw her later in the ward she was sharing with several other mothers, she was a very fit woman.

"I feel like getting up and going home," she laughingly said.

I replied that it would do her good to enjoy a few days' rest and that on no account must she think of getting up yet; although often I wondered to myself in these cases—why not?

She repeated that she had felt this birth to be an unbelievably lovely experience. I noticed marked surprise on some of the faces of her roommates!

Sometimes I came across a labor that forced its natural simplicity upon a woman who had doubted the truth, although willing to try to have her baby naturally.

At five o'clock one morning the husband of a patient, also having her second child, rang up to say he thought his wife had started labor.

"Get her to the maternity home as quickly as you can," I replied. I had attended this woman in her previous labor. She had a tremendous amount of pain and was one of the most terrified patients I ever have had.

I was not looking forward much to the arrival of her second baby, as I truly doubted if it would be possible for a woman with her highly strung temperament to have a natural birth.

I had not even time to leave the house when the telephone rang once more. It was my patient's husband again, and he said, in a very calm voice:

"You will be pleased to hear that I have a son. I would like you to come to the house as quickly as you can."

I sent for a nurse from the maternity home, and rushed round at once. I found that as my patient was preparing to leave for the maternity home she had had her baby.

When I arrived she was calm and extremely happy, though embarrassed.

It was rather amusing to see her cuddling this newborn baby to her when I arrived. She had not wiped the baby, and it was lying there in its very natural state.

At my arrival she burst into a torrent of excited remarks.

"Fancy a baby looking like this when it is first born. What a funny-looking little thing. Do you think it is all right? Isn't it too pink? Its nose looks awfully flat."

When I left about an hour or so later she said proudly:

"You know, I have always firmly believed, despite everything you have said, that my first labor was an ordinary one, because it seemed to me that it was the sort of labor most of my friends had been through. I'm quite sure none of them will believe that this is possible, any more than I did until I experienced it."

Nature had asserted itself!

Sometimes I was almost carried away by the idea that one day there might not be any need at all for obstetricians. Again Nature presented me with her own reply.

On the Christmas Morning of 1939 I had been back to bed one hour after having seen one Christmas baby into the world already, when I took a telephone message that a patient of nineteen, expecting her first baby, had gone into hospital.

This, too, turned out to be the most perfect first delivery, short and easy. The baby's head came down slowly and gently, the birth beautifully controlled, and as I told the mother that her baby's head was just appearing and that it looked a lovely baby she laughed happily and said:

"What an extraordinary feeling! I am so excited. When shall I see my baby?"

"If you will be patient for just about two more minutes, I will be able to show your baby to you," I replied. The body of the baby followed on very quickly, the birth outlet remaining absolutely intact, and here was this baby, 9 pounds 4 ounces, lying in my hands, without her arrival having caused any thought of discomfort to the mother.

I held it up to this young, laughing girl, and she exclaimed:

"Oh, she is the loveliest thing in the world. If that was having a baby I never want anything lovelier in my life."

The placenta came away in about a quarter of an hour, in rather an odd way. Then to my alarm followed a hemorrhage. I wondered if the mother had torn her cervix. Subsequent examination showed that she had not. We worked away at her and gradually the flow of blood ceased, although she was very weak through the loss. It was difficult to understand why this had occurred in a perfectly natural labor in a healthy girl of nineteen.

My thoughts went back to those women I had seen when I was a young medical officer in the First World War, having their babies in the open, on the island of Imbros and in a Belgian field. If this girl had been in their position, in spite of her lovely, easy labor, she might easily have died without adequate medical attention.

Despite the fright we had both received, we were very proud of this labor, and knowing that the girl's mother was a trained midwife, I asked what her mother thought of it.

"She doesn't believe me," the girl said. "I told her I had no pain at all and that I did not have any stitches, and how much I enjoyed it when the baby arrived; but she still believes that sister and I are pulling her leg." There it was. Some people simply could not believe!

Yet I had a very great respect for midwives. Among them I was finding some of the greatest supporters of natural birth.

For some time I had been giving lectures to branches of the Royal College of Midwives. From the beginning, the attitude of the majority was one of respect for this new teaching, and I was very keen to maintain their interest.

The intimate, friendly attitude of the midwife to a woman whom she is attending in the mother's own home came close, I felt, to the principles of a natural birth. The midwives themselves confirmed this belief.

When I was lecturing at Colchester one evening, a girl came up to me and said, "It's so nice to hear a man talking as you have. I never have to give an anesthetic. All the girls are my friends. They never make a noise. My mother and grandmother were midwives before me. I have never once called in a doctor."

This girl had been born into a knowledge of women's feelings and experiences, and so in her work she was a great success.

IT COULD HAPPEN TO YOU

● Multiple sclerosis, mysterious crippling disease of the central nervous system, strikes mainly at the young adult. There are more than 500,000 sufferers in the United States alone. MS is not a mental disease. It is not contagious. Where it hits, it hits for life, sometimes resulting in complete paralysis.

MS research clinics, patient aid and other services need your support.

Send contribution now to:

MS HOPE CHEST
National Multiple Sclerosis Society
257 Fourth Avenue
New York 10, N. Y.

for DEPENDABLE MOVING

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER
...he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES ▪ WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

ne midwife came to see me at the end of a ure I gave at St. Alban's. She walked ight up to me and in the most censorious ner looked into my face.
"Well, doctor, you've done it," she deed.
"What do you mean?" I asked.
"I've been a midwife here for eighteen
s. And I've been courting for as long. Yes, young man has been after me for eighteen s, and now he can have me—you've made want to get married and have a baby!"
laughed with her, not really taking her ment seriously. But this midwife did get ried almost immediately, and she asked to deliver her of her first child. She was y when this child was born, and she had most perfect birth, and with the two her children she bore later on.

ne of the arguments used against natural dbirth by its critics is that only highly edu-d girls and women can understand and ctice its principles. This is so wrong.
he intellectual woman is usually the worst ural bearer. She fights instruction and nts to analyze every incident. The women o achieve natural birth best are those who accept natural birth intuitively.
his is why so many of those who live close Nature, peasant women, farmers' daughters wives, are naturally better at birth. These ural bearers are usually the very quick ones n they have also been trained in the prines of natural birth.
am not saying that all educated women are r childbearers. A highly educated girl can be mentally uninhibited.
t is almost impossible to judge a woman's self from her surface manner and appear-e, so deep do veneers of civilization dend. But the elements of a woman's nature forced to the surface when she comes face ace with the biggest rock-bottom reality of life—childbirth. Then the real woman nes out.
A charming woman who had been an opera ger came to our consulting rooms. At the of forty-three she fell in love and married.
was terrified when she found she was preg-nt and believed she was too old to have a t baby. Talking to me about the contradic-ns of her feelings, she broke down and wept:
am longing to have this baby above all ngs in the world. What ought I to do for best?"
examined her very carefully. I had no iety about her ability to carry out the essary breathing and relaxing exercises, bese of her training as a singer. I comforted and told her she had no need to worry, as was not the oldest woman I had attended ving her first baby.
explained also that at forty-three a woman es not have the physical strength of a girl of enty. "In this respect you must be properly pared," I emphasized.
The birth of this mother's child when she s forty-four was most beautifully managed, ause she had handled her preparation ticulously in every respect. Her little ughter was one of the loveliest children we d ever seen.

ince the late twenties I had tried to get hers to come in on their wives' experiences childbirth.
Originally, because of the men's interest in gger and boxing, in which I was then very ive, I was able to get the men at fathers' ubs and men's missions in London's East End talk about these matters with me. Our talks veloped into actual lectures.
The first thing that struck me was the acute erest of fathers and their terrible and terri-d ignorance. Some of these shy chaps hadn't e vaguest idea of how to behave to their ves.
I spoke to them about helping with the
by:
"When your missus is having a baby you ve to take your place in the home and realize at she would like you to do a bit of cooking, look after her, to see that she gets every-ing she wants. Take some interest in the
by."
At first there were roars of laughter, but nen I went into the homes of these men unexpectedly I often found a father changing the baby's nappy most lovingly, under conditions which would today be considered very insanitary.

Some of the most detached fathers are busy and highly successful businessmen who have little time to give their families. Their lack of love is a great loss. I wonder if it is made up for by the money they earn.

I attended a mother at one time in the birth of each of her three children. Her husband was one of the pillars of a big publishing firm. He had very little close association with his children, and was even rather distant from his wife. She remained happy because she was intelligent enough to make herself contented, in the circumstances.

For the birth of this mother's third child I brought the father into things. I rang him up and asked him to come and see me when he could find the time. I told him then that he must join in.

"They are your children, and you must see they are your responsibility apart from providing for them."

When this third child was about three or four months old he came into my office to see me again.

"What has happened," he said, "seems inexplicable. I have entirely different feelings toward this child, and that feeling is spreading to the other children. I have become a part of my family for the first time."

I am sure that if a father chooses to obliterate himself from family intimacies, or if he is pushed out by a prudish wife, both will pay the price. They also run the risk of the mother's compensating herself by putting too much feeling into the care of her children. There must, however, be interest and willingness on both sides in this sharing.

The most successful father-mother relationships are those in which the father has studied the principles of birth with the mother. I have never seen anything lovelier, or more likely to in 9 minutes!

Ironed...pressed...and dressed...

with the GE STEAM & DRY IRON

$15.95*

It took just a few quick minutes to iron this little girl's cotton blouse and wool skirt with the new General Electric Steam & Dry Iron. Fast? Wait till you see how it whips through a whole week's wash!

You see, General Electric's Even Flow steam penetrates deeper. Turns out crisp, satin-smooth ironing in seconds.

Saves sprinkling everything except heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics. Lets you press like a tailor, too, without a damp cloth!

Use it as a dry iron. It changes instantly from "steam" to "dry." No scorching! "Dial-the-Fabric" control keeps the temperature right for every fabric.

And these are only a few of the many laborsaving features. Why not take a few minutes and save yourself hours? Visit your dealer's right away! General Electric Company, Portable Appliance Department, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.

Handy Cord-Lift keeps cord off fabric—allows you to iron with right or left hand. The light weight of this iron saves time and work.

Even-Flow Steam System gives you a steadier flow of steam . . . better penetration. Does a thorough ironing job every time.

Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price.*

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

establish the emotional security of married life, than that look which is exchanged between husband and wife when each has just seen their baby born.

A father may be nervous at first at the thought of seeing his wife's delivery and his baby's birth, but nearly every father will admit that he resents the role he is usually expected to play—that isolated figure in the hospital corridor.

One of the fathers who helped attend their wives during their childbirth is shown on the color film we made of the last four deliveries of mothers I attended at Marymount. (Not one of the mothers we approached faltered in saying "Yes" when we said we would like to make this film, and would like them to be subjects.) The father is shown rubbing his wife's back at the transition stage of her labor, helping to relieve the tension ache when the cervix became fully dilated and there was pressure from the baby's head.

Saturday morning was baby morning at our clinic. Fifteen to twenty babies would be brought in to us. Mothers brought the fathers, too, everyone dressed in his best.

I carried the babies around, made fun, ragged the parents, and generally enjoyed my babies very much. They rarely cried, and this the mother always remarked.

There is now no civilized country in the world where knowledge of natural birth is not circulating, and the books in which its principles are set out are translated into many languages.

A big influence in the spread of the principles has been the recent support of the Roman Catholic Church. It has accepted the idea of natural childbirth and other physiological benefits to a mother. In October, 1956, the Pope received us at the Vatican in Rome to give his blessing to the progress of this work.

The enthusiasm for natural childbirth of Prunella Briance, a young English mother, has resulted in the foundation of The Natural Childbirth Association of Great Britain, a voluntary women's organization, which held its first meeting in January of this year.

The association hopes to organize a center where natural childbirth will be taught and which will supply a practicing diploma to those doctors, midwives and nurses qualified to attend women in this method of birth.

Do not be carried away, however, into thinking that the enthusiasm of some will bear a baby naturally for others. The preparation for natural birth must be done meticulously and consistently by every woman herself if she hopes to succeed.

Birth is natural, but natural childbirth must be a science yet because the civilized way of life has taken the power of naturalness from us. In birth, as in many other respects, it has to be relearned and rediscovered.

In seeking to free themselves of pain and disappointment in birth, women are discovering a new philosophy of love.

Many of the chronic neurotic states in women arise from the bad effects of unhappy births on sex life.

Through fear of the cost of childbirth in varying ways, men and women lose a great deal of the happiness of sex.

Through fear of pain some women cannot feel the absolute respect for, and loving responsibility toward, the new soul which they bring into the world.

This is an age of anesthesia in more than one way. In all sorts of panaceas our sick world seeks oblivion from pain, but it will find relief only when it accepts love as the first principle of life.

I believe that it is women who have the power to change the outlook for us all. Love begins in perfect motherhood and all the motherhood requires of patience, understanding and tenderness.

"When did you last kiss your baby's bottom?" I have made this little jest hundreds of times with so many mothers when I have called at their homes to see them after their baby's birth.

Always, half-ashamed blushes mingle with their smiling admission, "Why—every morning, of course."

Why should any woman, or any man, be ashamed of tenderness in the smallest way? Who can tell, indeed, if conscious tenderness entered each life at the moment of birth, when love, the follower of tenderness, might lead us? Perhaps to a happier world and a new age.

ETHEL

To do dishes with the greatest of ease

there's no liquid or powder like Lux Liquid

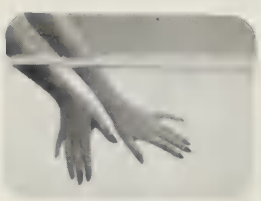
COMPARE! We guarantee you'll find it better for dishes than anything else.

(Incidentally, you can have your money back if you don't.)

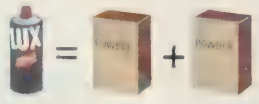


Old-fashioned powders waste time

—are slow about dissolving, slow about removing grease! And you have to rinse thoroughly to get rid of the powder residue that streaks your china, glasses.

Lux Liquid cuts under grease instantly

—splits it up into tiny particles that disperse immediately. Grease can't settle back, rinses away fast. Glasses, china come sparkling, hygienically clean.



Treats hands right—Lux-mild Lux Liquid!

No powder—no other liquid—is Lux-mild. You'll see and feel the wonderful difference on your hands, as soon as you start using Lux Liquid for the dishes.

Fast... thrifty...

1 can does the work of more than 2 boxes of the leading powder

Lux Liquid is concentrated for economy. Just a teaspoonful does a whole dishpanful—saves you money!

no other liquid is Lux-mild on hands!

MRS. WEST AND HER SON RAPHAEL

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 89

either his homeland or to his royal patron and was designing murals for the king's chapel at Windsor at the same time he was drawing up plans for a monument to George Washington in Philadelphia. Apparently he rode the storm well, however, since he does not appear to have been regarded as a quisling in America or a rebel in London. When he died, in 1820, he was buried with full pomp and circumstance in St. Paul's Cathedral, mourned on both sides of the Atlantic.

The story of his marriage to Miss Elizabeth Shivell, the subject of this portrait, is equally fantastic.

West met and fell in love with her when she was eighteen in Philadelphia. She promised to wait until he had made his name. At last, in London, five years later, he sent for her to join him.

Miss Shivell's brother was furious, and when the ship to take her was ready to leave he locked his sister in her room. Three friends came to the rescue with a concealed rope ladder. Elizabeth climbed out the window in the dead of night to the waiting carriage below and was smuggled aboard the ship. Nor has history forgotten the names of the three helpers who engineered the elopement: Francis Hopkinson, the poet; William White, later to become first Episcopal bishop of Pennsylvania; the third, none other than Benjamin Franklin.

HEREWARD LESTER COOKE

DETOUR IN SUMMER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 83

hadn't said anything, which made me feel she understood it was too hard for me if anybody said anything. "Ask Mrs. Brown to answer the phone," said Barbara, "and take the message and hang a white rag out one of her upstairs windows. We could see it."

"Check," I said. I asked Mrs. Brown and she said she would and even though she added, "You children run along and have fun," I forgave her because she was kind.

It was quite a job to get the canoe over to the creek. It's an old canoe, and heavy. We had to set it down every few yards, but we made it. I went back and got the worms and the rods and we shoved off and paddled up the creek. We sat on a mudbank and ate our sandwiches and then we sat in the canoe by the bridge—there's a hole there—and fished. I caught two eels and Barbara caught one. I thought even she would scream because they thrashed all over the canoe, but she didn't.

"Do we want 'em?" I said. Somehow I felt like not killing anything, even some old eels.

"Let's throw them back," she said. We threw them over and they slithered away. Barbara was sitting in the bow seat facing backward. She pulled in her line and said very quietly, "Rick, there's a white rag."

We made the water sing against that canoe going back. She was a good paddler and she picked up my idea of a short fast stroke and stayed right with it. I jumped out into the water and ran across the grass and the sand road and into Mrs. Brown's.

"It's good news," she said right away. "It was your mother, and your father's better. The crisis has passed. She's on her way home." She put her arms around me and kissed me and I didn't mind. I said, "Thanks a lot," and I think I meant for everything.

I ran back to where Barbara was pulling up the canoe and told her and suddenly I was crying and suddenly she was crying too. We stopped quite soon and laughed and we hauled the canoe back to the yard and it seemed to have lost a lot of weight. Without even saying we were going to, we ran down across the beach and swam out to the raft and kept diving and swimming back and diving again until we were out of breath. I saw the Prescotts' boat coming in and we swam ashore and she got her crab net and said, "So long, Rick," and I said, "So long," and that was all. The kids came home and my mother came home and it was true.

After I was in bed I could feel that whole day inside my head—the creek and the crabs and the sun and wind and sandwiches and eels and silence and Barbara panting over carrying the canoe and paddling so fast when I needed her to—and it all seemed to have led up to the good news at the end and to have been one of the best days of my life and it seemed like Barbara had made it that way.

So in the morning before I even took a look at what kind of day it was, I decided that I was going to be interested in women. I told Andy when we met after breakfast. He snorted. "Well, why not?" he said. "They have their points." He'd been interested in women ever since he got his driver's license. "You got a girl?" he said.

"Yeah," I said. He looked surprised. "Barbara Thompson," I said. His jaw fell open as I had feared it would.

"You're off beat," he said. "Barbara Thompson. For the birds. Strictly."

"Shut up," I said.

"Look, junior," he said, "I been around longer ——"

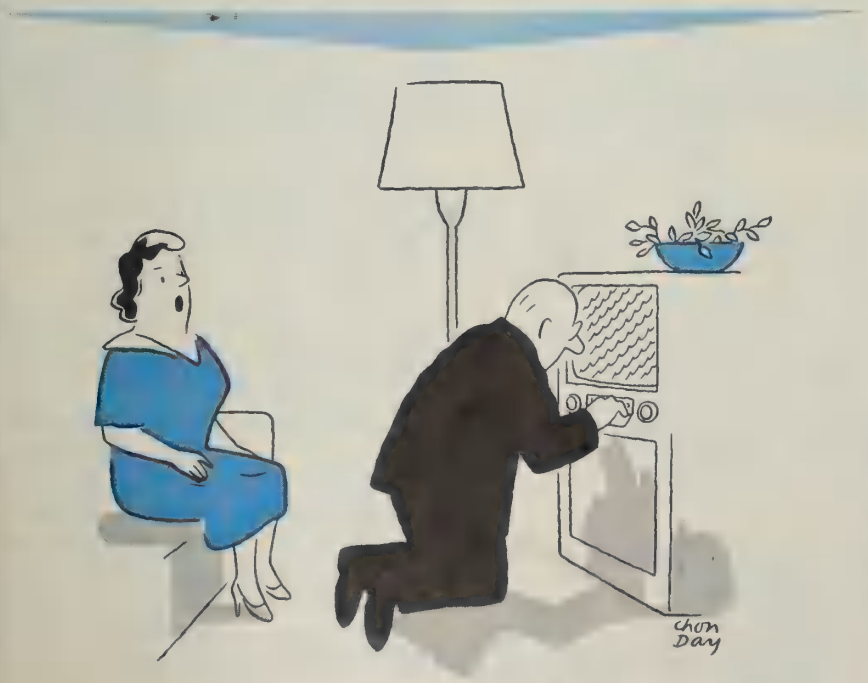
"You're only eight months older," I said, "and when I want your advice I'll ask for it."

"Don't get shook up," he said. "Want to go out in the boat?"

"No," I said. Then I said, "Well, sure." I didn't want to fight with Andy really and because I was interested in women wasn't any reason not to be interested in outboards.

So Barbara was my girl. It was still July, and there was lots of summer left and we were together almost all day almost every day. It wasn't exactly romantic. I tried holding hands once in the movies because I sort of felt I ought to, but she pulled her hand right away and it was all right with me.

Summer was riding high because my father was getting well and I had a girl and then it rode even higher because Barbara's aunt sent her a puppy. I have an aunt and she's O.K. but she never sent me a puppy. She sends me hand-painted ties. Our own dog had died in the spring of plain old age, and because of my father being sick we hadn't gotten around to getting another yet. This puppy of Barbara's was a Scotty and we named him MacDuff and he went everywhere with us. He rode in the bottom of the canoe. He rode in the bicycle basket. Puppies are so—well, puppies. Mac was fat and funny and smart and happy. He learned to sit up and to roll over and when we put a biscuit in front of his nose he wouldn't touch it until we said, "Lay on, MacDuff." He was so nice I liked to think about him after I was in bed—him and Barbara.



My father came home from the hospital late in August. He was a lot thinner but the same nice guy and he was really going to be O.K. He couldn't do much but sit in the sun and rest. He and I played a lot of gin rummy and then we took up Scrabble. My father liked to have Barbara play with us because she made up words that she thought really were words. My father said some of them ought to be. "Corbell" was one. She said it was some kind of flower. And "anobric" was another. She thought that meant sort of sweet. It was good to sit on the screened porch on a hot day, with my father right there, home to stay, and to see and hear him laugh at Barbara.

"I like your girl," he said one day after she'd left. "She's as anobric as a corbell."

I hadn't told him she was my girl, but of course he'd been around.

Every summer there's a special dance for teen-agers (I hate that word and will be glad when it doesn't mean me) at the tennis club on the Saturday before Labor Day. I had never been. In fact, I had always delivered a Bronx cheer at the thought. I'm not much of a dancer; and besides, to have to dress in anything else except swimming trunks or jeans seemed to me to be wasting good summertime. But that year I had a girl and that made me think twice. Finally I asked Barbara if she'd like to go, hoping she'd say no, but her whole face lit up and the braces showed from end to end and I knew I'd done the right thing and was for it.

One day a few days before the dance I was sitting on the raft alone. Barbara had gone off for the day with her mother, and Andy had gone to Barnett to buy a new casting reel which he had got the money for for his birthday. Everybody was somewhere else. The creek was full of kids and I smiled because I liked seeing them there and I liked the sun on my back and I didn't mind as much as usual that the summer was almost over because that fall I was going away to school, which was a pretty big deal when you thought about it. I was sitting there thinking about it, and I had just been sent in as a substitute and was making a seventy-yard run in the last two minutes for the winning touchdown, when a girl named Diana Pratt came along the beach and swam out, and pulled herself up beside me and said "Hi." I said "Hi," not much interested for a short space of time. She'd been around for a couple of summers. She'd gone steady the summer before with a guy named Horace French who was a louse and this summer with a much older guy named Robert Gallagher who was only there weekends. I'd never paid her any mind. She was at least a year older than me and her activities had never run with mine.

"Kick it."

She sat close to me, and put her arms around her knees and smiled at me; she sort of smiled through me—I mean the smile went all over me. She said, "All alone, man?" and went on smiling and the smile went on going all through me, and I was down for the count. I couldn't see how I could have seen her around all that time without noticing that she was the most beautiful girl there was. Her skin was tanned dark and her hair was dark and close cut and curly and her eyes were light blue. Her teeth were very white. No braces. I couldn't think of anything to do except to do a jackknife off the high ladder so I did that. "Nice," she said when I was back on the raft, "very, very nice."

"What are you doing this afternoon?" I asked, surprising myself.

"What am I?" she said lazily, still smiling.

"Going to the movies with me," I said.

"That's what I'm doing," she said. She had her own car, a convertible (red), and she picked me up. I hoped everybody in town would notice us—except one person and she fortunately was away for the day.

I don't remember what the picture was. I don't believe I saw it. There wasn't any question about holding hands this time—she started it. Coming out of the theater, I wondered why the sun made me dizzy. She drove me home and just as I was getting out she said, "How about taking me to the tennis-club dance?" I said—I didn't know I was going to say it—but I said "Naturally," and she laughed and drove off.

My father was in the living room playing solitaire. He said "Diana Pratt." It wasn't a question so I didn't give it an answer. I fiddled around and snapped the radio on and off again and tried to read a magazine. My father said a long time later, "Atomic energy. The fall-out alone can reach for miles." That didn't call for an answer either and I was too busy trying to organize what was left of my thoughts to wonder what he meant.

The next morning I was very excited and at the same time unhappy, and breakfast didn't taste so good. Barbara appeared right after breakfast with Mac at her heels and said the snapper blues were running and how about it? I said lamely that I had to do some stuff around the place and she didn't seem to notice anything but just said, "Oke, I'll see you later."

I stuck to Andy that day. Diana wasn't around, but that night she stopped in her car and we went out the north road. She let me drive a ways. It was quite a car. Then we parked and she let me kiss her. "Let" isn't the word. At first something about me struck her funny, but afterward I didn't strike her funny. When I got home it was after midnight. My father was still up, reading. My mother thought he ought not do that after being sick, but he said he hadn't been to the hospital to have his independence removed. He said Barbara had been there and they had played Scrabble.

"Pelicious," he said.

"What?" I said.

"It means sort of sharp and hard, she says," he said.

I wasn't interested. I wondered if I looked different. I was. My father took off his glasses and looked at me.

"The thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts, if any," he said. That was all and we went to bed.

In the morning, I knew it had to be done and had to be done quickly. Barbara and Mac strolled around as usual and I said, "Barbara, I can't take you to the dance after all. I'm sorry."

She said "Oh," and then she turned around and walked away. Mac looked at me and at her like he was asking "What gives?" Then he ran after her. I had known I'd feel like a heel. I hadn't known the size of the heel. I had to do something. Maybe if I took her fishing or we played tennis ——

"Hey!" I yelled. But she didn't even turn around, just went on walking across the empty lot, not fast, not slow, but steady. Mac ran round and round her jumping up and down, but she paid no attention to him, just walked.

I went into the house, not watching her any more, but still seeing her. I thought everybody was out, and I put a record on the phonograph and practiced dancing with a sofa pillow for a partner. Something made me look up and Goofy was sitting halfway up the stairs watching me. He made a rude noise, very loud, and I grabbed him by the belt of his pants and hauled him downstairs and shook him til his teeth rattled. He yelled with rage and butted me with his head and we knocked over two chairs and a lamp and my father and mother came in and separated us. My mother was angry, but all she said was "Why?"

"I don't know," I said. I didn't. I slammed out of the house and walked along the beach all the way around the point and back, about five miles, trying to put on top of my mind what I felt should be on top—that I was taking Diana to the dance.

It started to rain and blow in midmorning the day of the dance. Usually I like weather—and the more the better—but I felt very depressed and I put it down to a falling barometer. I read a book that said that can affect your state of mind. It had never affected mine before, at least not downward. I hung around all day sort of bored, watching the rain and the water which was beginning to kick up plenty and wondering if it would get bad enough so they'd call off the dance. I hoped they would and hoped they wouldn't, which was confusing.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 155

What does the Gardener do in Summer?

The what, where, when, why and how of watering.

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

It was never Nature's notion to have lawns, flower beds, foundation plantings, vegetable gardens and patios, or to dig plants up from one place and put them in another. These were all man's ideas, and though some of them are wonderful, Nature makes it clear that any special care they may require is really not her responsibility. She supplies the sunlight, the seasons, and other basic and similarly rather miraculous matters, with reasonable regularity. But one department in which her undependability can cause considerable inconvenience, not to say ruin, where the gardener and his garden are concerned, is when it comes to raining—or, rather, not raining. So without any further fretting or fuming, let us proceed to what a gardener has got to be ready to do when the ground gets dry.

Watering is the most misunderstood and mismanaged of all garden operations. It doesn't matter whether you have a thousand-dollar de luxe sprinkling system or merely several lengths of hose with a nozzle, neither will do a decent job unless you know the how, why, when of getting the right amount of moisture to the roots of your plants. Let's begin with the when. The whys will come along of their own accord.

Some ground gets bone-dry, some gets powder-dry. Don't wait for either of those types or degrees of dryness. You naturally wouldn't water when the ground was wet—that's certain; though some people have been known to. Now after wetness comes dampness. I still wouldn't water. Then comes dry dampness, and I might decide to water. Or I might decide to wait for damp dryness. Then I would definitely water. There isn't a whole lot of difference between dry dampness and damp dryness, but there is some, and you get to know it. It is when the capillary attraction of the soil is greatest, when the soil seems to suck the water right down to the deep roots. Water penetrates slowly into saturated soils, and even more slowly, if at all, into bone- or powder-dry soils.

Give me dry dampness or damp dryness, preferably the latter, especially if it has been looking like rain. But don't let looking like rain keep you from watering well before the ground reaches the bone- or powder-dry stage. A heavy rain then might easily wash your ground away.

This is an aside, but apropos. Any open ground under cultivation, like a flower bed or kitchen garden, which could conceivably wash in a rainstorm, should be made level—really level. Then your watering and the rain do only good. If you think leveling a little patch of ground is too much trouble, look at the way the ancients in arid countries terraced whole hills, whole mountains, to catch and hold every drop of water that descended.

The best time of day to water is after sundown, in the cool of the evening, when the process of evaporation has slowed down or paused entirely for the night. On a hot day a lot of your watering never gets down to the roots; there is always danger of leaf scald, and the heat of the sun on the wetted surface of the soil causes caking—though "crusting" is a better way to describe it.

Now for a few hows. First in connection with the aforesaid crusting of the soil surface. For the way you keep the surface of the soil is part and parcel of the watering process. If your garden soil has a tendency to form a crust after a wetting (and subsequent drying), one thing you can do in the cool of the morning after you watered in the cool of the evening is to come out and scratch over the surface of the soil. Another thing is to keep the surface of the soil covered with a light mulch of peat moss, which not only helps to retain the moisture in the soil below but offers a quickly absorbent surface on which to water. This mulch will gradually work its way into the soil, which is all to the good. Just put on some more.

The main thing about watering itself is to put on plenty. How much is plenty? Well, on the average lawn or garden, when the watering has soaked down all over to a good six inches, you can turn it off and go to bed. You have put on plenty. But not too much. Too much is when the soil can't absorb any more. Even then, you may merely be putting it on too fast. Put it on like a gentle rain. To test the depth, drive an unpainted soft white wood stake into the ground; leave it in for a moment, then see how much is wet.

It goes without saying that the ground in which any seeds or plants are newly sown or planted must be kept properly moist at all times: somewhere in the dampness-to-dry-dampness range; never soggy wet. A gentle spray is ideal for the newly seeded lawn; never more water than the ground can readily absorb for an inch or two down. Copious watering on the lawn too early in the season promotes weeds and crab grass. Wait until a dry spell before you bring out the heavy artillery.

The paraphernalia of watering is of such wide variety that the beginning gardener may look upon it with bewilderment. To keep things simple and easy, let me suggest enough lightweight plastic hose to lead from the faucet to the farthest plant you'll want to water, with an extra length for good measure. Then a high-quality nozzle of brass or stainless steel which can be adjusted from a fine spray to a strong long-distance stream. And finally another high-quality piece of equipment; namely, an oscillating fan-type sprinkler—one that carries a good reliable guaranty and will cover a space of at least 20′x40′. The one I like comes equipped with a roller so that it can be pulled easily from one location to another. And there you have it.

Not that there aren't plenty of other fascinating devices. For instance, there is a water spike nozzle that you stick into the ground six inches to two feet for underground watering as well as feeding. Used with caution against waterlogging or disturbing the roots, this has considerable merit, if you have the time, patience and understanding to use it properly.

There are many advocates of porous hoses and hoses with tiny spray holes in them, the latter providing what might be called the poor man's sprinkling system. And of course it is every gardener's dream to have a truly terrific sprinkling system installed, virtually invisible, which covers his lawn and garden with lovely rain at the turn of a valve. But as these can become quite a production and quite an investment, my advice is to consider first all the facts and figures.

FOR the main thing is not the equipment. The main thing is the welfare of your lawn and garden. You can't depend on Nature. You can depend only on yourself.

In September:

WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN FALL?

HAT BY SALLY

because you are the very air he breathes...

He's yours, and you know it. It's love, and you show it. What fabulous fun being female, at a time like this! Don't let anything mar this moment. Double check your charm every day with VETO... the deodorant that drives away odor ...dries away perspiration worries. (Remember, if you're nice-to-be-next-to... next to nothing is impossible!)

VETO is for you in more ways than one

Cream

Spray

Stick

Aerosol Mist

Veto
deodorant

One touch of VETO dries away perspiration worries!

NEW MIRACLE RINSE

MAKES YOUR WASH LUXURY-SOFT

NuSOFT FABRIC SOFTENER GIVES WASHABLES A SOFT, FLUFFY FEEL

Just one magic cap-ful!

in the final rinse puts back all the softness today's washing agents take out! Towels, blankets, bedspreads fluff up. Sheets are smooth, socks and jeans comfortable. Corduroys—wrinkle-free.

Cuts ironing time!

Many pieces are so smooth, no ironing's needed. Others so wrinkle-free, ironing's easier. Use NuSoft in any machine or hand wash—and no matter how you dry. Economical too—it's concentrated.

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NuSoft is a fabric softener–not a water softener

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 152

I took a bath and got dressed before supper. They didn't wear Tuxedos to those dances, which was a good thing because I didn't own one. I put on my gray slacks and plaid sports jacket and a tie (from my aunt). It was the first time I'd worn a tie since June and the collar felt tight. My brother looked as if he was going to make a snide remark, but he wasn't speaking to me again yet. My sister said, "You look sort of nice." She sounded surprised. My father said, "Pelicious." I'd forgotten what it was supposed to mean. My mother said for me to be sure to wear my raincoat. I'd been going to wear it, anyway. It is a good-looking English-type mackintosh and when I turn the collar up I can feel like a gangster or an FBI man, whichever I feel like feeling like. There is something, though, about something that somebody suggests, especially your mother, and you don't want to do it. However, on account of my good jacket, I guessed I would have to wear the raincoat. I hoped she would suggest rubbers so I could not wear them, and she did and I didn't.

"You'd better let me drive you and Barbara over," said my mother.

"Diana's picking me up," I said.

"Why, I thought——" began my mother, but she stopped so suddenly I knew my father had looked at her in a certain way he looks.

The dance was supposed to begin at eight, which is a silly hour for a dance to begin, and to end at twelve, which is likewise. It was quarter of nine before Diana came for me. I'd bitten all my nails and my collar was mussed because I'd kept pulling at it. It was raining and blowing great guns by this time. Diana beeped her horn and I hauled on my raincoat and yelled good night to the family and ran for it.

"Rough night, man," she said. She had on a blue raincoat and hood that just matched her eyes.

There is a long curving road that follows the line of the point where we live. Our house is at one end of the curve and the tennis club is at the other end on the other side of the point. Barbara's house is right at the end of the point. It's a bad spot in stormy weather, but it's a good strong house and has stood up all right except for some lost shingles now and then or a dug-up lawn. We had to go right past it now and I stared at it, telling myself I was looking to see how the water was. The lights were on and the shades were up and I could see Barbara in the living room and I could see, much too clearly, that she was crying. Some men might enjoy knowing they had made a woman cry, but I didn't. I had time to notice, too, that the spray was hitting the porch windows and that a line of water had crept around into the back yard.

It was coming down like crazy when we got to the club, and we couldn't hear the orchestra on account of the wind. "You park it," Diana yelled. I ran around and helped her out and she dashed inside. There were a lot of cars and I had to go way back to the end of the lot to find a place. I parked and shoved the keys in my pocket and got out. I just don't remember making any decision about it, but where I walked was not toward the club but back along the road. I had to bend double against the wind and my shoes were full of water in the first five minutes.

I walked into Barbara's house without knocking. She looked up sort of hopefully and then her expression changed and she said, "What do you want?"

"I'm sorry, Barbara," I said. "I'm sorry." I couldn't seem to move on from there.

"Do you think I'm crying about you and the old dance, you dopey drip?" she said. She swallowed and made herself stop crying and said, "Mac's lost."

"Oh, no!"

"The back door blew open when I was upstairs and I didn't know it. I've hunted and hunted. Dad and mom are up in Hawleyville playing bridge. I telephoned—they've started back on account of the storm. I've asked all the neighbors. He isn't anywhere. He's probably drowned."

She set to work crying again and I all but joined her. Mac was my friend and he was so little and the wind and rain were making so much noise.

"Get your flashlight and put on your stuff," I said. "We'll find him."

She stopped crying and put on her sou'wester coat and hat and some rubber boots and got her father's big electric lantern and we went out the back door. Right behind the house there was a lull, but when we got to the side the wind nearly knocked us over. Barbara kept calling and I kept whistling, but the wind took the voice and the whistle away so fast we couldn't hear them ourselves. We hung on to each other and yelled together, but it was no good.

"Hang on to the porch rail," I said. "I'm going under the house." I crawled under on my stomach and flashed the light all around. The water was beginning to trickle in there from the west, but there was no puppy. We circled the house. We had to run across the front between the sheets of spray. We circled the next house, which was empty. The people who had rented it had left. I wanted to get underneath that one too. It was harder because there was latticework all around, but there were a couple of holes a little dog could have crawled through. I found a sort of gate which opened and I went under there. No puppy. I was about to go out again when I heard something. I stopped and lay still. I couldn't be sure whether it was only a different whine the wind made because of the latticework. I lay still, and I heard it again. It was a whine, and not the wind's. I swung the light again, but there was nothing under the house except some old boards and a rusty tin pail. I crawled out and got hold of Barbara again, and said, "I heard him! He's around here somewhere."

"The bathhouse!" said Barbara. "I forgot about it."

There's a bathhouse built on the back of that house with a separate door. The door was shut, but it might have blown open—and shut again. It wasn't locked. We opened it and went in there, and the door blew shut behind us. It was queer and still out of the wind. The bathhouse was empty. Just an old rag of a towel on a hook and a pair of rubber bathing shoes in the corner. We took hold of each other again and went out and the door whammed shut behind us.

"I know I heard him," I said. "Seemed like from that side of the house." I wished the wind would let up for a second, so I could listen for that small sound.

"Let's go round the house again," I said. "Slowly. Listen all the time." We went around the house slowly and listened all the time and couldn't hear anything except the waves socking against the sea wall, and the wind and the beat of the rain. We'd gone all the way round when my light picked up something in the yard and I dropped Barbara's arm and ran and lifted the heavy lid of a sunken garbage pail—and there he was! The guy who collects must of left the thing open and Mac had fallen in and the lid had come down. There was water in the bottom of the pail and would be more.

I got him out and gave him to Barbara. He was choking and wet and cold and he was trembling all over. Barbara stuck him under her sou'wester and we went back to her house and I built a fire and she dried him with a bath towel and wrapped him in a sweater and sat in front of the fire, crooning to him. Then her parents came home and that seemed to be that.

"Thanks," said Barbara. "I mean—well, gosh ——"

"I guess I better go back now and sort of . . . explain," I said. Barbara looked up from where she was sitting and smiled a funny little crooked smile with one corner of her mouth.

"Old double trouble," she said. "Have fun."

I sloshed back to the club. Naturally Diana was going to be sore, but naturally after I had explained she would be glad I had gone and been able to find the little dog. I hung my raincoat in the dressing room and emptied the water out of my shoes into the washbowl and wiped them off with a paper towel and tried to dry my hair a little with another. I'd forgotten to bring a comb, so I did the best I could with my hands and went out on the dance floor and

SEPARATION

By THOMAS CARNICELLI

The sun,
My delicate enemy,
Is far too persistent today.

Its rays
Refuse my brain
Occasion for self-reflection.

I am
As trees and lakes,
Selfless in the warm light.

I smile
To see my soul
Surrender itself skyward.

At last
The sun finds
Me empty and at peace.

Let BUDS do it!

Baby care . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS for baby's most delicate cleansing needs. The soft cotton is tight-spun—won't slip off!

Soap in the ears. . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse ears, nose gently. Only the softest, finest cotton is used on BUDS.

Skinned knee . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse open cuts safely, to apply medication. Tight-spun BUDS won't "fuzz up"!

Treating hangnails . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse and treat tiny skin wounds easily, accurately . . . to apply cuticle cream.

100% STERILE

Made by the most trusted name in surgical products

Johnson & Johnson

This is a good habit to acquire!

reach for Self-Seal®
ENVELOPES
"They Seal Without Licking"

Once you use them — you always will! For this is the envelope that has no glue to lick. You seal a Self-Seal envelope by lifting a tab and pressing down the upper flap. So convenient! Pick up a package at the stationery counter of your favorite chain variety store. Here's a good habit that's easy to acquire, easy to keep . . . millions of women already know it! Do you?

Raise lower tab — Press down upper flap

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Self-Seal Envelopes were originated by UNITED STATES ENVELOPE COMPANY
Springfield 2, Massachusetts
World's Largest Manufacturer of Envelopes

KEEP FREE OF ROACHES
SILVERFISH-WATERBUGS-CRICKETS
Keep your home free of these insects the clean, easy, thrifty way. Get Gator Roach Hives! They're different! No mess, no odor; round-the-clock protection. Longlasting. If your store has none, send $1 for 9 Hives. De Soto Chemical, Dept. 26, Arcadia, Florida.
Money Back Guarantee!

corns?
JUST RUB ON MOSCO
CORN and callus removal guaranteed or money back. Fast, easy, economical, invisible. Get Mosco today and ease those corns away! At drug stores everywhere. Regular jar, 35c, large economy jar, 60c. The Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

JARS 35c 60c

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH STAINLESS
Campho-Phenique
(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)
WHEN USED ON PIMPLES-ACNE
CAMPHO-PHENIQUE HELPS PREVENT THEIR SPREAD AND RE-INFECTION

It's wonderful, too, for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils, cuts and scratches, minor burns caused by book matches, hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam. Campho-Phenique relieves itching of insect bites, poison ivy, etc. Just apply Campho-Phenique next time and see how fast this pain-relieving antiseptic goes to work. And it doesn't stain the skin! Get a bottle today.

cut in on Diana. Instead of dancing, she walked away from me across the dance floor and out into the hall. I followed her. This, I knew, had to be.

She was white and her eyes were blazing. They weren't as pretty that way. I told my story and then waited to see her relax. She didn't.

"You think I'll dance with anyone in the state you're in?" she said. "You're disgusting. This will teach me not to go out with children." I really thought she couldn't have heard my story, or at least that she hadn't understood it.

"Barbara's puppy was lost!" I said. "We found him."

"So what?" she said. That's what she said. I looked at her and I saw—and I wondered why I hadn't seen it all along—that she was the kind of girl who would say "So what?" about a lost puppy.

"Give me my keys," she said. "You can get yourself home. The sooner the better."

"The pleasure," I said, "will be all mine." I wanted to walk away slow and dignified and sort of loose at the knees like Gary Cooper, but I'm not that tall and anyway my shoes squished.

In the morning, which was sunny and calm with no sign of the night's hoopla except some dead grass and extra driftwood, I went over to Barbara's. She was sitting on the front steps staring at the ribbon seaweed.

"How's Mac?" I said.

"He's at the vet's," she said. "He's awful sick. I can't even stay with him, because he's got to be very quiet. Doctor Brown thinks he can pull him through all right, but he's not sure. He won't promise. He should know by tonight, he says. I just got to wait."

I didn't say anything then. I knew what to do. I went home and got my net out of the garage and went back. She was still sitting there.

"Want to go crabbing in the creek?" I said. And she did. And she's my girl.

HINTS FROM A PATIENT TO HER VISITORS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 34

and never, come flood or earthquake, fail to show up if you have promised.

It is best not to go into the sickroom while another visitor is there. People are exhausting. Wait outside until the first visitor has left. On entering you can say at once, "You look much better than I expected! I don't see how you do it." If the patient has had the bad sense to glance in the mirror she knows she looks as if she'd been pulled out of a rathole, so you can lay it on a bit here. Encouragement will help morale.

Before paying your visit it is well to telephone. If your sick one is too ill to speak to you, there will be no phone by the bed. If she can speak, she will enjoy the small diversion of a phone call. A patient is able to converse briefly on the phone before she is strong enough to receive friends.

Bring with you some little gift nicely wrapped up. Opening it is one of the few physical acts the bedridden can do with pleasure. Possibly you can lend something far nicer than you could afford to buy—that dressing gown you got for Christmas, perhaps. A woman will love to have a pretty spread to counteract the stark severity of the hospital room, your grandmother's cashmere shawl for her knees, a bed jacket or light wrap, a soft little pillow in a nice cover, something becoming to tie about the tousled head, a deck of cards.

Books, of course, are excellent, and the convalescent period a time when reading aloud will give pleasure. Have the daily paper or a news digest under your arm. To read a newspaper aloud is harder for some reason than to read Chaucer. The tendency is to sit there fluttering pages, to run your eye up and down columns and mutter, "There is nothing in it anyway." This is very irritating. Visitors should also suppress a strong tendency to keep their present of illustrated magazines to themselves. If they must identify people standing from left to right at the races, they can at least share this pastime with the patient.

An invalid may welcome a friend's suggestion to write thank-you notes that need only to be signed. Offer to make out checks, but if you can't do both things without asking where you find pen and ink, what paper shall you use and are there any stamps, then go away. You are not the type to be there at all.

Allow the patient to be well on the road to recovery before bringing any bothersome mail from home or the office. I was sent the household bills on my fifth postoperative day. So accustomed a task as paying them threw me into a cold sweat of anxiety and fatigue.

The sick may easily and rapidly become full-time egoists. Even as I swam up from the depths of anesthesia, I recognized the symptoms in myself and gave in to them at once with pleasure. When someone is in your room, you expect their whole attention. You begin to discover that the phrase "enjoying ill health" is not so empty after all. It is delightful to be waited on with such ardor; the concern of those dear to you, the surprise of finding yourself remembered by people you never dreamed cared anything about you mean more than you could have imagined. Your conscience pricks to think how remiss you have been over friends in like circumstance.

At our mother's knee we were taught that we must be patient with the ailing, expect them to be unreasonable and to show other aspects of illness toward which I had always taken a dim view. Only now do I understand what it is to be overcome by moods that never raised their unpleasant heads before in my vigorous life. Fits of depression or sudden fear akin to panic may overcome one like a tidal wave, weakness bring tears that cannot be controlled. There is a limit to courage.

A person unused to illness is new to the frustrations of being helpless. It is humiliating, you are ashamed to ask assistance for every need. The one who can anticipate an invalid's small wishes is truly heaven-sent. Furthermore, this helplessness makes the disabled ten times more intolerant of delay. It is enormously satisfying to have commissions, no matter how trivial, executed quickly.

A doctor friend of mine, herself recently recovered from a nearly fatal illness, insisted her own profession could do with some stern tutoring in bedside manners. Now, she said, she knew the power a warm heart had to heal, she had found that tact and understanding ranked among the miracle drugs. END

Neither God, nor man, nor we ourselves, can command our love, so far as love means only the sentiment of affection. In this sense, all the compulsions and injunctions of heaven and earth must end in futility. But if we take "love" to mean the doing of kind, generous and tender offices, there is indeed a duty to love. And if we take "love" to mean that the execution of those offices should be accompanied by tones and attitudes and gestures fitting to a lover, then in this sense, too, there is a duty to love. And we may go on to trust that according to the general course of human nature, love in its strictly emotional sense will follow as the sure result of doing these things in this way, and thus the duty we are able to command of ourselves fulfills the duty we are unable to command. It is just because we know family affection cannot be commanded or coerced that we look upon it as a priceless gift. Where it resides a sacred spirit takes dwelling and suffuses the hearth with happiness.

EDMOND CAHN
The Moral Decision
Published by Indiana University Press

A new kind of deodorant ...

ban®
rolls on!

More effective than messy creams, easier to apply than drippy sprays.*
Not a crumbly stick!

Here's a wonderful solution for your perspiration problems. Without mess, drip or smear, that revolving marble in the top of the BAN bottle spreads on just the right amount of quick-acting lotion deodorant. BAN protects you against odor a full 24 hours, won't harm clothes—is perfectly safe for normal skin. Get BAN today!

*In a recent survey against the leading cream and spray deodorants, 7 out of 10 prefer BAN.

Ban works as no other leading deodorant can!

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS. MAKERS OF BUFFERIN AND IPANA

Another shortening was used in these biscuits. They look good, until you see the biscuits on the right!

Golden Fluffo was used in these biscuits. Never before could you get this appetizing, all-over golden browning.

Something Golden Happens

(golden fluffiness you've never gotten with any other shortening)

Pure shortening, not a table spread.
Golden yellow from pure, wholesome carotene.

Expect surprising results when you use Fluffo; it's an altogether surprising shortening. To make it, we had to break down old-style shortening to its very molecules, and improve them: it takes the cream of the crop to make golden Fluffo.

No other leading shortening gives you such light, fluffy, golden-brown biscuits, golden yellow inside even before you butter them. No change in your recipe—just a wonderful change in results.

No other kind of shortening gives you such crisp, light, golden-brown fried foods. Everything fried right and light in Fluffo is beautifully browned all over—and just as digestible as it looks.

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try golden Fluffo; how can you possibly miss?

Will you have ENOUGH MONEY ... when you Retire?

By ROBERT PETERSON

A retirement columnist points out that you'll need to supplement your Social Security funds if you expect to get the most out of your retirement years. He tells how a family man of forty with a $6000 yearly income can build a sound program of personal security for $10 a week now—and twice that amount after the home is paid for.

Ted Kendall is 40 years old. He makes about $6000 a year as a draftsman in a small manufacturing firm. He owns a new Chevy, likes his work, loves his wife, Betty, who's a year younger than he, and swells with pride when he talks of Jimmy, 10, and Johnny, 12.

And he wasn't putting aside a penny for his retirement years.

"Why should I?" he inquired. "I'm going to get Social Security when I retire. After all, retirement is a long way off."

Ted Kendall's attitude toward retirement is not unusual. In my ten years' experience in gerontology—the study of aging and retirement—I've made it a point to talk with a great many youngish moderns. I'm constantly amazed how many of them casually assume that retirement will take care of itself. Yet the primary rule for successful retirement is: Make sound financial plans for the years ahead.

According to the book Economic Needs of Older People, published in 1956 by the Twentieth Century Fund, "the aged population is distributed income-wise about as follows: 36 per cent have no personal income of their own; 38 per cent have $0–$999 a year; 11 per cent have $1000–$1999, and 15 per cent have $2000 or more." More than a third of our aged Americans have less than $1000 a year, and a similar number have nothing at all.

THE NEED TO PLAN

It requires considerable effort for young people to think ahead. But unless they make the effort and begin planning their future finances—soon—they'll have to pull in their belts when they retire. Social Security, and the savings they're likely to have by then, just won't be enough to give them the kind of retirement most people want.

Social Security, in the form of Old Age and Survivors Insurance, will be forthcoming to most working Americans when they retire. Yet it's well to remember that the highest amount an individual can draw from this source is $108.50 a month (or $162.80 for a couple both of whom are 65). This maximum amount goes only to those whose earnings have been at least $4200 annually over a period of time.

Company pension plans for employees cover considerably less than half the working population. The average company pension being paid today is only about $1000 per year.

Instead of pinning all your hopes on Social Security or company pensions, it is wise to develop financial plans of your own. In that way you'll be personally prepared to supplement any funds you may receive from other sources when you retire.

OTHER ASSETS

Of course money isn't everything. Other assets that will contribute tremendously to your happiness include your physical well-being, your ability to make friends, and your interest in stimulating leisure-time avocations.

But if you're financially secure it's much easier to put up with the difficulties, such as illness and loneliness, that not infrequently arise in old age. As someone put it, "Money won't make you happy, but it permits you to be unhappy in comfort."

To get back to Ted Kendall, it seems that our discussion of retirement finances kindled his thinking. When I saw him later he said he wanted to set up a personal plan for his family security and he wanted to sit down with me some evening and talk it over.

As Ted's circumstances (40 years old, $6000 income, wife and two children) are very similar to those of the average wage earner, it occurred to me that any plan appropriate for him would be of interest to a great many others. With this in mind let's consider some of the items we discussed.

MAKING PLANS FOR PERSONAL SECURITY

1. Buying a Home

The primary step in your plan for personal security concerns housing. Buying a home that meets your needs and can be financed for not more than 25 per cent of your income is the soundest investment a family can make. The earlier a couple start paying for a home, the sooner it will be theirs. It should be every couple's goal to arrive at retirement with a substantial home paid for down to the last doorknob. Why? Because the homeowner always has something to fall back on, since a house adequately covered by insurance is a solid financial asset. Even if a severe emergency arises and income is cut off, a home and garden will still maintain the owner. If necessary, he can rent a room or apartment or even the entire house as a means of obtaining needed funds.

Among the happiest retired people today are those who bought homes years ago. Their homes have given them comfortable housing and in many cases a remarkable return on their investment. Due to gradually rising price levels, homes that cost only a few thousand dollars to build two or three decades ago are in many cases worth several times as much today.

Fortunately, the Kendalls are well on their way to owning a home. Ten years ago they bought a $16,000 home. After making a down payment they began paying off the 20-year mortgage at the rate of $80 a month—which includes property taxes and insurance.

2. Choosing Your Objectives

The second step calls for a definition of the kind of security you

CONTINUED ON PAGE 168

DID YOU KNOW . . .

Most workers eligible to retire prefer to continue working rather than retire at 65 on a company pension? Why do men and women retire? According to a study, 56 per cent retire because of their employer's policy on age; 26 per cent because of poor health; 9 per cent because their jobs were discontinued or because of illness in the family; only 9 per cent because they really wanted to.

The proportion of older people in America has doubled in the past half century? One in every twelve persons is past 65. Everything points to a continuing increase, thanks to the continuing conquest of infectious disease.

At birth, males have a life expectancy of 67.4 years; females, 73.6?

Older workers rank high in the opinion of their supervisors? Eighty-one firms evaluated some 3000 older workers; 80 per cent were rated as being as productive as younger workers, 91 per cent as having either less absenteeism than average younger workers or about the same absenteeism.

"I Didn't Want to Retire..."

But for the Arthur Waleses, of Tucson, Arizona, "now life is busier than ever."

By BETTY COE SPICER

In speaking of the Waleses—tall Arthur, whose crisp voice has a singer's resonance as well as a top executive's decisiveness, and small Hazel, who gave up an absorbing career job when she married to become "the best cook and homemaker in town"—a friend says, "They're the busiest people I know, and the most interesting. They have friends from eight to eighty and share interests with all of them."

Arthur is 72; Hazel, 70. Six years ago Arthur had to give up a position which paid him $25,000 to $35,000 a year as head of the Chicago engineering firm he himself had built to success. Hazel, who already knew about giving up an engrossing career for a quiet, home-centered life, was concerned about her husband's reactions.

"Women make adjustments more quickly and easily than men," she says. "Art had never lived quietly—whatever he worked at, he *over*worked. That's what he was doing when pneumonia hit him seven years ago."

Pneumonia was followed by severe rheumatism. Unused to being ill, dynamic Arthur fretted and worried. Finally the doctor ordered, "You are going to spend the rest of the winter in some warm, dry climate."

The Waleses chose Tucson, Arizona. They had good friends who wintered there regularly and came home to talk about the sunny brightness of "The Old Pueblo's" desert setting and the always-changing vista of towering blue mountains surrounding it. "We loved it on sight," Hazel says. "We still do." Today, every window of their home frames a view of those high mountains.

By the end of the winter Arthur felt pretty well. The Waleses headed back to Chicago, Arthur brimming with work plans. Almost immediately he became ill again.

Then began a period of shuttling back and forth between Chicago and Tucson. Through this period Arthur still planned to return to the work that was such a large part of his life. But at last the day came when he had to face a hard fact.

"It was just no go." Arthur Wales says those words flatly, but behind them lie many months of hope, discouragement and eventual acceptance.

"I didn't want to retire," he says honestly. "That is, I didn't want to retire without time to get things in shape, to work out investments so we'd be assured of an adequate income to carry out our retirement plans the way we had visualized them. As it was—well, I didn't have all the time I needed."

Taking stock, Arthur and Hazel found they had investment properties and Social Security payments that would give them $300 to $400 a month. Not much more than one tenth the income they were accustomed to. They broke up their Chicago home and bought the Tucson house that was to be their home from now on.

Both did some private worrying. Arthur was afraid that such a drastic alteration in their way of living might be a hardship for Hazel. Hazel's greatest fear was that retirement might not offer enough satisfying outlets for that boundless vitality of Arthur's.

Exploring trips around Arizona and neighboring Mexico, and "doing the house, making the changes that really made it home," occupied the first, most difficult months. The spacious roofed part of the patio was glassed in—"complete with fireplace; we practically live here." The kitchen was redone to make it convenient and efficient for Hazel. A dining room became an office for Arthur. (The sunny new patio-room took over as a dining area.) There were problems of finding just the right spot for a fine mahogany breakfront and other furnishings from their old Chicago home, of fitting in cherished books, family silver and crystal—this without sacrificing any of the bright informal feel of their desert house.

Gardens were carefully planned and laid out. A desert garden—all white sand and cactus—went in front of the charming six-room washed-brick house. At the back, a white fence and a velvety green lawn made a softer background for Hazel's bright flowers, shrubs and carefully transplanted trees.

If—with the baffled concern of a newly retired executive "with nothing to execute"—Arthur was still sensitive about the fact that "now most of our friends have hundreds where we have dollars," that concern soon disappeared. As Hazel had asked calmly in the beginning, "What difference does that make to real friends? Especially in an informal place like Tucson, where nobody cares a whit about keeping up with the Joneses?"

Loving music, sports, the theater, the Waleses found they had lost none of these things by moving to a smaller city. There were concerts, plays at Tucson's Corral Theater. Arthur's fine trained voice was a valued addition to their church choir—as his knowledge of music was to young friends who were studying at the nearby University of Arizona's music department. Saturday evenings found the Waleses cheering on the university football team. "There's so much to be said for retiring to a college town," they agree.

As they became more and more part of the community, they found volunteer work playing an increasingly important part in their lives. "We both love people. We couldn't not do some sort of community work," says Hazel. (Even at her busiest she had always found time for church, Red Cross and women's-club work.) "We found ourselves giving the lion's share of our time to political work. Perhaps being no longer in a position to make large financial contributions led us to contribute our work instead. And we learned that there is real satisfaction in giving yourselves, not just money, to a crusade you believe in."

As deputy registrar—and with Hazel's help—Arthur registered more than 1000 voters in the last voter-registration period, 450 of them in the last three days. Hazel is historian of the Pima County Republican Women's Club.

Aside from acting as deputy registrar, a list of Arthur's jobs might include precinct captain, district leader, secretary of the Pima County Central Committee, member of the Executive Committee and the State Central Committee—"I might have forgotten something," CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

BILL SEARS

"If, as we do, you love music, sports, books, plays, community work—choose a college town when you retire."

"Interests keep you young." Football (University of Arizona games are night games), gardening, patio parties "informal Western style"; perhaps most satisfying of all, volunteer work. "The days aren't long enough." To vigorous, thoughtful Arthur, sixty seems a good age to retire. "But it shouldn't be compulsory. People differ too much. Some are old at forty—some never. And retirement should always be planned for as far ahead as possible."

SHELLY GROSSMAN

Fall colors the hills of home with glory, crowds even remote country lanes with wide-eyed visitors. "They tell us 'how beautiful!' To us it's just what we're used to." Philip and Nellie Dashner have the Vermonter's disdain for "fancy talk" and the Vermonter's abiding pride in being able to cope with a problem.

"I Was Laid Off at 70..."

Yankee resolve finds the answer for the Philip Dashners, of Rutland, Vermont.

By BETTY COE SPICER

"I wish I could be with you on this happy occasion," the mayor's letter said. "These days it isn't everybody who can celebrate a fiftieth wedding anniversary . . . an honor ——"

Reading of the letter finished, 72-year-old Philip Dashner, "slicked up" in a dark suit with a carnation buttonhole, smiled across the room at his wife Nellie, pink-cheeked and excited in her new blue silk dress and yellow-rose corsage.

"Dan always was nice and friendly," Philip nodded, recalling a time when he and Rutland's Mayor Dan Healy ("both a lot younger then") worked side by side.

Guests came crowding into the Dashners' small yellow-and-brown house on the outskirts of town. Its rooms were bright with flowers, candles, gifts and cards. The dining-room table groaned under a load of festive food that set off the party's center of attention—a towering white wedding cake lovingly made and decorated by the Dashners' daughter-in-law, Eileen.

In the entry, friends stopped to sign the fiftieth-anniversary guest book presided over by pretty young neighbor Joyce Fredette. Joyce hopes that her soon-to-be marriage to Jimmy Gasco, the Dashners' roomer ("but more like a son," they both say affectionately), will be as long-lived as the Dashners'. Their well-wishers moved on to greet the guests of honor. "Haven't seen so much kissing and handshaking since our wedding day!" Philip's dry tone is belied by the broad grin on his ruddy face.

On her wedding day Nellie's dress was blue, too, she recalls. "Alice blue. A matching hat with a curly white plume." The dress had a twenty-inch waistline. The hat framed a shy, pretty face and gleaming black hair that an admirer once called "the most beautiful I have ever seen."

Nellie recalls, too, how "Phil" once won a contest as their home town's handsomest man. This brings a little snort of derision from Philip, not much given to flattery or soft talk.

Born less than fifty miles from Rutland and a Vermonter all his 72 years, Philip Dashner is very much a part of his state's hardy tradition of independence. Not a tall man (he tops five feet by no more than three inches), he seldom thinks of asking help in tackling personal problems. Even the big problem that came two years ago.

After fifty years of work, twenty with the same company where he was first a lathe operator, later an inspector, 70-year-old Philip Dashner was laid off. He was given a week's notice—no severance pay. Despite union efforts, the company he worked for had no pension plan.

On the last day of that dark week, a still-bewildered Philip picked up his final pay envelope plus $78.51 accumulated vacation pay. His union presented him (and eleven other men laid off at the same time) with a billfold containing $15. Aside from a tiny nest-egg savings fund which they didn't want to touch ("It would go so fast!" Nellie worried, remembering how slowly they had built it up, saving dimes and every dollar not needed for living expenses), that was all the money the Dashners had.

Philip was realist enough to know that at 70 the chances of his getting another steady job were slim. Only a week before, a 50-year-old friend had told of being turned down on a job for which he was well qualified—"Sorry. Too old."

Philip felt no deep personal bitterness about being "retired" in this manner. It was just a fact—a hard fact. Together the Dashners looked the situation over. On the credit side, they did own their home—or would, after three more small monthly payments. Furniture and household equipment were theirs. They were not in debt. They did have that small nest egg.

The Dashners were eligible for Social Security. Even independent Philip felt honestly entitled to that—"I've paid into it for almost twenty years." But would $115.40 a month pay for food, clothing, fuel, water? Pay property taxes that had more than doubled (from $44 a year to $101) since they bought the house thirteen years ago? What about medical bills? They had no hospitalization insurance. Both needed new glasses.

After two years the Dashners' nest egg is untouched. The house is fully paid for. "We're warm and comfortable, we eat well, we don't owe anybody," Philip says with pardonable pride.

How did they do it?

"By spending only for necessities—food, heat, taxes, utilities and the most vital repairs on the house." Nellie's long bout with a particularly maddening ailment—shingles—piled up medical bills of more than $150 that first winter of retirement. The fact that Jimmy Gasco had moved into one of the unused upstairs bedrooms temporarily—paying $5 a week—helped stamp those bills "Paid." And each month a little money was put by toward autumn's inevitable budget staggerer—$127.50 for five tons of coal, with a sixth almost certainly needed before spring. Vermont winters are long and cold. ("Not as cold as they once were, though," Philip insists. "Used to be, snow clear buried the fences and there were times you couldn't get around even in a sleigh.") They recall a time when their winter's coal cost $39. Milk was 10 cents a quart then; coffee, 20 cents a pound.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 173

ERICH HARTMANN

Six rooms—six people. Three generations, three incomes "plus love, consideration and a plan" run the dream house.

With Barbara, Marjorie and Carl working, Diane in school all day, Thomas and Margaret have to themselves the hilltop home they all pitched in to build, take care of its two-acre lot, gardens and fruit trees. "Evenings we try to see that all the others have privacy too," Margaret explains. House rule: "Knock on doors!"

"We Pooled our Resources..."

The Thomas Flynns and the Carl Schefflers, of Basking Ridge, New Jersey, find "six can live better than two."

By BETTY COE SPICER

If, some evening, you should drive past a trim six-room white house on the outskirts of the pretty pre-Revolutionary War village of Basking Ridge, New Jersey, see lights streaming from every window, hear bursts of laughter, chatter and music—well, that's likely to be the house where the Flynns and the Schefflers live, three generations of them.

They pooled resources in order to build the dream house which neither family alone could afford. It took two years to build and every member of each of the families helped. For them, the investment has paid high dividends, not only in money saved but in close family companionship.

The Flynns are two—retired news dealer Thomas, 72, and his wife Margaret, 73. The Schefflers number three—Carl, Jr., 50, Marjorie (nee Flynn), 44, and Diane, 17. Until recently they were four. Their elder daughter, Barbara, was married not long ago. Even with their still-fresh memories of the wedding—Barbara lovely in bridal lace and satin, Carl stepping forward to give the bride away while mother and grandparents watched with pride and inexplicable tears, irrepressible Diane in her pale blue maid of honor's dress suddenly quiet and a little awed as the wedding party started down the aisle of the gracious old tree-shaded church—even with this great scramble of vivid memory pictures, the Scheffler-Flynn household hasn't got used to thinking of Barbara as just a visitor.

About the only thing Diane likes about it is that now she has a room all to herself.

"But we managed beautifully with all six of us at home," says slim, youthful Marjorie Scheffler, who has a cheerful easygoing philosophy. She glances around the big living room with its stone fireplace, pine-paneled walls rubbed to a soft gleam, wide picture window overlooking the rolling, tree-clad landscape. Then she turns with her ready smile. "I really do think that we get more out of a house than almost anybody!" she feels.

That isn't hard to believe if you drop in on an evening like this. In the corner near the television set Thomas and Margaret are reminiscing with an old friend from thirty-mile-distant Westfield, where they lived for many years. Carl, Barbara and her husband, Charles, are engrossed in planning a set of shelves Carl has offered to build for their new apartment. Marjorie is urging a group of friends and relatives toward the supper table set up on the wide screened porch at the far end of the living room.

In an excess of affection, Cally, a six-month-old boxer pup, keeps getting underfoot and finally has to be banished. "She's going to be as big as a young horse," Marjorie laughs, "and she thinks she's a lap dog." From his cage in the kitchen window Chippy, the canary, is trying to outsing the whistling teakettle.

Downstairs in a room that is twin to the living room, even to fireplace and paneled walls, teen-age Diane and some of her classmates from Bernardsville High are dancing, listening to—or arguing the fine points of—a new rock-and-roll tune. (A pastime that occasionally causes her more sedately brought up grandmother to bristle a little—as she does when Diane teasingly calls her "Mag" and her grandfather "Tom." But then Margaret remembers Diane dashing in excitedly to consult about a dancing dress, or the evenings Diane spends playing two-handed canasta with her because she senses that in this new, isolated home her grandmother misses old friends. It isn't hard to overlook a little noise and teasing when it is more than balanced by love and thoughtfulness.)

This downstairs living room is, Carl Scheffler feels, "the smartest thing we planned." (After many family conferences, Carl drew the plans himself, had them blueprinted, then did a major share of the house building.) "This second living room and the apartment for Marjorie's mother and father." The apartment "really makes a joint household workable for all of us," Marjorie adds. "And our agreement never to intrude on each other's privacy. When their door is closed we don't disturb mother and dad. And even when it is open we don't just barge in—we always knock. And they are wonderful about giving us time to ourselves."

The Flynns' one-room-and-bath apartment has pale gray walls and sunny windows. There are a studio couch, bed, two big comfortable armchairs, a drop-leaf table and a serving pantry with an electric plate for making tea or coffee. Conveniently, the apartment adjoins the pretty pink-and-white kitchen.

Mornings are the household's hectic time. Carl and Marjorie must both hurry. Marjorie works as receptionist and "girl Friday" to a busy Bernardsville doctor, "a job I love." Carl must sometimes drive thirty miles to work each day, "depending on where our current construction job is." Diane generally snatches her breakfast as she races for the school bus.

Margaret and Thomas prefer to wait out this first morning rush. They get up at eight for a more leisurely meal—"leisurely meals are one of the joys of retirement." Breakfast over, Thomas heads for the garden, gets out the pruning shears or the power mower if the big lawn needs cutting. In the winter there are maintenance chores—tending the coal furnace, repairing and painting screens—"I have no trouble keeping busy," he says.

Cally teases every day to be taken for a ramble through the nearby woods. (She isn't allowed to run free. A few months ago the family's adored collie, Penny, was killed by a car. Thomas and Margaret are now growing fond of the boisterous new puppy, but they still mourn quiet, well-mannered Penny.) CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

"Everybody can do Something..."

Proof . . . Petra Davis, of Coral Gables, Florida.

By BETTY COE SPICER and JEANNE HOLMES

"If you've got will, you can always find a way." That's more than just a copybook maxim to widowed 70-year-old Petra Davis, of Coral Gables, Florida. When she says it, there's a firm note of conviction in her soft voice and her small figure stands erect and self-reliant in its crisply becoming blue cotton dress. Her pretty face (she was once judged Miami's prettiest white-haired lady, a fact that still astonishes and amuses her—"Isn't that silly?" she dimples) is serene as she surveys the sunny, pastel-painted rooms of her house. Petra Davis knows what she is talking about. She knows what will can accomplish.

Her white stucco house has six spotless attractive rooms. The well-tended lawn has small palm trees, flowering shrubs and purple bougainvillaea. A tidy back-yard guest cottage is rented "to the nicest people!" There's a savings account at the bank and a small store of carefully chosen investment stocks. All these assets testify to the efficacy of Petra Davis' favorite maxim.

Not long ago her liabilities far outweighed any visible assets. "On discouraged days, it sometimes seemed there weren't any assets."

Her husband, tall, handsome Harry Davis, had possessed qualities of sweetness and gaiety that still shine brightly in the memories of Petra, their two sons, "H. C." and Jimmy, and their pretty daughters, Kathryn and Mary. "But Harry wasn't a businessman," Petra admits with gentle honesty. "He just didn't have the ability to make—or hang onto—money."

The Davis home, bought in 1939, was mortgaged and in poor repair when, at 60-plus, Petra took over the task of earning her own living. In the season of Florida's lashing tropical rains, the roof leaked so badly the living room was useless. The kitchen stove was crotchety, the yard bare except for weeds, the garage useless since she no longer owned a car. There were debts—and no income.

Any one of the four Davis children (they are all married and live in widely separated parts of the country) would have welcomed Petra. She didn't think that was the answer. This was her home. "I loved Florida," she will tell you, "my independence, the friends I'd made here, the Sunday-school work I'd begun when my own children were grown. I didn't want to be dependent on my children, financially or emotionally."

Petra Davis took a long clear look at her situation. It was not particularly cheering. "But I was healthy—my mother lived to ninety and never a sick day. I told myself 'Every person has something he or she can do to make money.' I added up the things that I could do. I could sew. I'd had my own successful dressmaking shop before I married and I'd always made my own clothes. I have always loved children and I raised four wonderful ones of my own—that ought to qualify me as a baby sitter. I didn't any longer need the whole house for just me; maybe if I did some painting and prettied up the yard I could rent rooms."

At this point her speculative eye fell on the empty garage. Like the house, it is a sturdy white stucco building. Perhaps it could be converted to a guest cottage, a one-room efficiency with bath and kitchenette? Such cottages were in great demand during Florida's winter season. . . . Engrossed, Petra sketched her plans and set about carrying them out.

Through friends and her church, she made it known that she was available as a baby sitter. "The most available baby sitter in town! By the hour, day or week."

Children responded to the warmth of her interest and affection. Parents sighed with relief at finding someone experienced and reliable.

"Mrs. Davis can find ways to manage the most obstreperous youngster and make him like it," one parent said as she urged Petra to "come early tonight and have supper with the children, won't you?" (This sort of invitation now comes to Petra Davis so often that it has helped reduce her food budget to $20 a month.)

Because she saw many mothers of young children swamped by household tasks that somehow never got finished, Petra found a way to increase her baby-sitting income. The basic fee of 50 cents an hour (75 cents after midnight) went up to 90 cents for hours spent doing mending or ironing after her young charges were asleep. Harassed mothers greeted this innovation with joy. Baby-sitting nets Petra about $1000 a year now.

Her sewing project brought regular customers. Delighted with her skillful work ("Good dressmakers are so hard to find these days!") and admiring the spunk she was displaying in building this new life for herself, Petra's "regulars" brought her as much work as she could handle—an average $400 worth a year. They brought her gifts too. Cake, pie, special rolls or muffins. "People must think I look hungry," she says with a twinkle. "Everybody wants to feed me."

One customer always brought twice as much material as the dress she'd ordered required. She'd say offhandedly, "Petra, can't you make yourself a dress out of all this leftover material? The color is lovely for you." Somehow it always was. Result: "My clothing bills are almost nothing. About the only things I buy are shoes and an occasional hat for church."

"When people see that you're trying," Petra Davis says with understanding and gratitude, "they always help. People are wonderful."

Bit by bit her earnings paid debts and rejuvenated the shabby house. The leaky roof was repaired, rooms were painted soft cool greens, blues and aqua. Petra did most of the painting herself. "I love to paint and it saved money." A new stove was installed. Exterior walls gleamed with fresh white paint. The bare yard bloomed with grass, shrubs, flowers and vines. "I didn't buy a thing!" Petra says proudly, surveying the expert results of her gardening efforts. "Friends gave me slips from their gardens."

Converting the empty garage into a guest cottage was her major investment. Money had to be borrowed to pay building costs, buy kitchen appliances and furniture. "I wanted to do it right," Petra says. CONTINUED ON PAGE 168

JACK HOLMES

"Being alone didn't change my desire to keep my home, my friends and my independence."

"Without a man around the house, I suppose my repair bills run high. But it's surprising the household maintenance jobs you can learn to do yourself. Pruning trees, mowing the lawn, painting, rewiring lamps, refinishing furniture—I'm getting expert at all those. It saves me a lot of money and"—with a twinkle—"it makes me feel so competent!"

Brand-new, exciting...

PYREX®

Oven-Freezer-Server Set

Lets you prepare your favorite party dish in advance...at your leisure ...then heat and serve it in minutes!

1. PREPARE

Prepare it at your convenience, days, weeks or months ahead—any time you're in the mood. Then you'll always be ready to serve it when you want a very special dinner in a very special hurry. It's the modern method of carefree entertaining—and to add variety to everyday family meals.

2. FREEZE

Freeze and store after you've prepared dish. Put space-saving metal cover in place, seal with freezer tape and place in freezer. All the freshness, goodness and aroma are sealed inside.

3. BAKE

Bake it when you want it, after removing freezer tape. Place PYREX cover on dish, and bake in oven. Food frozen in PYREX ware can go directly from freezer to pre-heated oven.

4. SERVE

Serve it in style in the same smart, PYREX dish you used for preparing, freezing and baking. It's beautiful enough to go with any table setting. Store what's left in very same dish.

• Set consists of 2 qt. casserole, 1¼ qt. casserole, 2 aluminum lids for freezer storage, clear lid for baking and serving. (Doubles as extra baking or serving dish or tile.) Choice of turquoise, white or charcoal with snowflake pattern, or pink with daisy pattern. Complete set, $5.95. Each space-saver casserole with individual glass cover may be bought separately. 2 qt., $3.50—1¼ qt., $2.75.

New PYREX Cradled Decorator Casserole

• A great companion piece to the Oven-Freezer-Server Set. Comes in smart yellow with charcoal flower decoration. Beautiful brass cradle. 1½ qt. size, $3.95—2½ qt. size $4.95.

There's only one PYREX BRAND Ware, a product of CORNING GLASS WORKS, Corning, N. Y.

VISIT THE CORNING GLASS CENTER, CORNING, N. Y. CORNING MEANS RESEARCH IN GLASS

Our Favorite Recipes

Made and remade for years at the family's request

By HAZEL WALES

Now, on a retirement income, these recipes are our meal mainstays. Here are our favorites. The quantities are for four to six, even though I cook for only two now. This one is a recipe given to me by a friend many years ago. It is very elastic—I use whatever is on hand or is cheap, but have written the recipe as I like it best.

Odd-and-End Ham Loaf. Mix together 1½ pounds ground cooked ham, ½ pound ground veal and ½ pound ground beef. The cheaper cuts of beef and veal have the best flavor. Add 1 cup soft bread crumbs, ½ cup milk, ¼ cup catchup and 2 eggs, slightly beaten. Also add 1 cup finely chopped onions, 2 tablespoons finely chopped celery and 2 tablespoons chopped parsley. Season with 1 teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon poultry seasoning, ¼ teaspoon pepper and ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate. Turn into a baking pan and shape into a loaf. I usually score the top slightly for decoration. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1½ hours. Makes 6 servings.

Macaroni and cheese with a ruff of crushed potato chips is oh, so economical. This, too, can be a mixture of lots of things—but I prefer it this way:

Crisp Topped Baked Macaroni. Cook 8 ounces elbow macaroni according to package directions. Drain well. In the top of a double boiler make a cream sauce, using 3 tablespoons butter or margarine, 3 tablespoons flour and 2 cups milk. When smooth and thickened, add 1½ cups grated sharp Cheddar cheese and 3 tablespoons grated Parmesan cheese. Stir until the cheese melts. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon grated onion, ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, a pinch of cayenne pepper and ½ clove garlic, crushed. Mix well and add cooked macaroni. Pour into a 2-quart casserole. Sprinkle a handful or so of coarsely crushed potato chips on top. Dust with paprika and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 20–30 minutes or until bubbly and hot. Makes 4–6 servings.

SEARS

I always get a helping hand from Art—even when it comes to serving.

STUART

My ham loaf and crisp topped baked macaroni, ensalada and tortillas are planned for a relaxed patio meal.

Baked beans can be prosaic and they are cheap—but with these, even the aroma while they are cooking is out of this world.

Baked Baby Lima Beans. Soak overnight 1 package dried baby Lima beans in enough water to cover. Drain, reserving the liquid. Put the beans in a heavy kettle, cover with warm water and simmer for about 1 hour. Drain, reserving this liquid also. Peel and score a small onion. Place it in the bottom of a bean pot. To the beans add a strip of bacon cut into small pieces, ¼ cup molasses, 2 tablespoons catchup, 1 tablespoon dry mustard, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon prepared horse-radish and a dash of cayenne pepper. Pour the beans over the onion in the pot and then bury a scored piece of salt pork on top of the beans. I usually use a piece weighing about ⅛ pound. Leave the rind exposed. Add enough of the bean water which you have saved to cover the beans. Put the lid on the bean pot and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., 5½–6 hours. Add more bean water during cooking if necessary to keep the beans from drying out. Remove the cover during the last hour to brown the salt pork. Makes 4–5 servings.

I wonder why more people don't prepare their creamed potatoes in this fashion. It's so easy.

Quick Creamed Potatoes. Peel and coarsely grate enough raw potatoes to make about 2¼ cups. In a skillet mix the potatoes with 3 tablespoons chopped onion and ½ cup milk. Cook very slowly, cutting through the potatoes repeatedly until thickened and tender. Don't let them overcook or they will become mushy. Add 2 tablespoons butter or margarine and season with salt and pepper to taste. Just before serving, stir in 2 teaspoons chopped parsley. Makes 4 servings.

A crisp tortilla is usually served with Mexican foods. These, though not truly Mexican, may be easily made anywhere.

Tortillas. Roll packaged refrigerator biscuits into very thin circles on a floured board. Pull and stretch the dough if necessary to be sure it is very thin. Bake on a medium-hot ungreased griddle until both sides are a flecked golden brown and the bread is crisp. Make ahead. Spread with melted butter or margarine and reheat just before serving. Makes 10.

Hot peppers are a Western must. They are served on relish trays, in salads and entrees—in any part of the meal except dessert.

Ensalada. Mix together 1 clove garlic, crushed, 2 finely chopped hot pickled red or green peppers, 2 peeled, seeded and quartered tomatoes and ⅔ cup sharp garlic French dressing. Tear up 1 quart crisp salad greens. I prefer Bibb lettuce, chicory and endive (if I can get it). Just before serving, add salt and pepper to taste and toss with the dressing. Serves 4–6.

Un postre—a sweet conclusion to any meal.

Maple Sherbet Delight. Mix together 1 cup maple-blended syrup, 1 cup buttermilk, 1 tablespoon lemon juice and ⅛ teaspoon salt. Pour into freezing trays and freeze for about 2 hours, until firm. Break into pieces and turn into a chilled bowl. Beat with a rotary or electric mixer until smooth, but not melted. Fold in 1 cup heavy cream, whipped. Return to the tray and freeze until firm, about 2 hours. Makes ¾ quart.

You'll like Borden's biscuits best...

from start...

The easiest-to-open package!

Exclusive with Borden's . . . No strings, no twisting, no cutting. Pull Easy-Grip Flap... new all-foil package pops open and out come 10 biscuits. The "pop" means they're fresh!

...to finish!

The finest texture and flavor!

Just bake Borden's Buttermilk Biscuits 10 minutes and they're ready, all golden-brown. So rich in buttermilk, they even smell butter-y... taste extra light and fluffy!

Try Borden's Sweetmilk Biscuits, Too!

Borden's

For 100 years folks have been saying, "If it's Borden's it's got to be good!"

Borden's Milk • Fine Cheeses • Ice Cream • Starlac

See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice," "Queen for a Day" and "Fury" ©1957, The Borden Company

"WE POOLED OUR RESOURCES"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 162

Margaret hurries through dishwashing, laundry, tidying the apartment. She supervises Chippy's morning bath and coaxes him to sing. "He used to sing so long and loud people began shushing him. Now you have to coax him—or put the whistling teakettle on.

"The morning just flies. I'm so anxious to get outside to my garden." She grows roses—her favorites—from slips traded with friends and "can hardly wait to see how the new ones turn out."

The garden is a budget aid, too, providing vegetables and fruit. As soon as they chose their lot—even before they began to build the house—the Schefflers and the Flynns spent weekends planting trees. "Last year we had five bushels of apples, and peaches and plums."

The Flynns eat their main meal at noon and at night Margaret fixes a light supper in their own apartment. "Marjorie and Carl like to have their dinner at night and this arrangement gives them the house to themselves when they come home. We always share Sunday dinner, and perhaps a drive afterward, or visits with friends."

On Tuesdays, her day off, Marjorie drives her parents to Bernardsville to do their weekly shopping. (She has her own car, since Carl's work demands daily use of his.) The Schefflers shop on Friday evenings. Both families plan their week's meals in advance. Busy during the week, Carl, Marjorie and Diane all pitch in over the weekends to do household jobs like cleaning and cooking.

"Carl is a better cook than I am," says Marjorie, who admits she's "not the most expert housekeeper in the world. He makes a basic meat sauce that we use in dozens of favorite dishes—over spaghetti, in casseroles, as a hot sandwich over toasted buns."

That there are problems in sharing a house the Flynns and the Schefflers readily admit.

"You have to work things out," Marjorie says. "Remember all you agreed on. Be considerate of each other's feelings and methods."

Margaret admits that it isn't easy to condense into one room the accumulated possessions of a lifetime. "And I did miss seeing old friends for a while after we moved up here. So did Tom."

But both families feel strongly that the advantages far outweigh the disadvantages.

"We don't have to worry about mother and dad," Marjorie says. "We know they are all right. We know that there will be someone in the house each day when Diane comes home from school. And we think it's fine when children have grandparents at home, as well as parents, to love and learn from."

To tiny, bright-eyed Margaret—who clips favorite poems from newspapers, worries whether her new (and vastly becoming) silver-blue eyeglass frames might be "too girlish," and still describes with a pink-cheeked glow a flowered red velvet hat she wore on her honeymoon—there is one really compelling advantage.

"Tom worked hard all his life," she says simply. "When he retired our only income was Social Security. It isn't easy to live on $112.70 a month. This arrangement means a little ease for Tom in the time we have left to share."

HOW THE FLYNNS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Income: $112.70

Food	$45.00	Recreation	1.00
Clothing	6.00	Church and charities	1.50
Rent (Because the Flynns contributed approximately one third the cost of building the house, they pay no rent.)	00.00	Household cleaning supplies	1.00
		Dry cleaning, shoe repair	1.00
		Club dues	1.25
Utilities	5.00	Magazines, newspapers	1.60
Insurance	6.50	Cigarettes	7.02
Medical and dental	15.00	Misc. (Christmas and birthday gifts)	5.00
		Total	$96.87

HOW THE SCHEFFLERS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Income: Gross, $692.00; net, $584.80. Carl's income varies with the season. Total includes Marjorie's salary, $45.00 a week.

(Food (all three eat lunches out)	$125.00	Furniture and appliances	15.00
		Car expenses (for two cars)	40.00
Clothing	25.00	Car payment	34.31
Payment on mortgage, taxes	68.00	Dry cleaning	4.00
Fuel, light, water	27.00	School expense (Diane)	10.00
Telephone	4.00	Magazines, newspapers	4.00
Insurance	45.76	Savings fund	136.93
Medical and dental	10.00	Income taxes	98.00
Recreation	10.00	Union dues and assessments	10.00
Church and charities (occasional extra donations)	10.00	Payment on cemetery plot	5.00
		Misc.	10.00
		Total	$692.00

another year ...another notch?

Stop and reflect. Isn't it time for Diet Delight Foods?

Actually, the only way to halt that steady thickening around your middle is to replace pound-adding foods with those that are low in calories. And with Diet Delight Foods you do just that—without giving up the fun of eating! Your grocer has a good, delicious variety—Fruits, Juices, Vegetables, Salad Dressings. Try 'em all. They're low-calorie: packed without added salt or sugar. Fruits and Juices are sweetened with non-caloric Sucaryl® (calcium cyclamate). Many tempting recipes in FREE booklet. Write Richmond-Chase Company, San Jose, California, Dept. DL.

"I DIDN'T WANT TO RETIRE"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 160

he muses. Then his busy phone rings and he forgets about listing titles as he responds to a new project—a local business firm would like him to act as consultant occasionally.

Hazel knows that Arthur is probably overworking again. But she also knows that he wouldn't be completely happy any other way. So she shares the work and keeps the worry to herself.

Hanging up the phone, Arthur went out on the porch to release their highly vocal (and adored) pet parakeet, Pat, from his cage. People had been coming and going all day and Pat, who generally has the freedom of the house, had stayed caged. Pat had a lot to say about that.

When the phone rang again it was Hazel who answered it. Hazel had been busy packaging some bootees and a tiny sweater made for a new grandchild, "the ninth." In a moment she called to Arthur, "We are going to the football game tonight, aren't we? Or shall I say you're too busy?"

"Wouldn't miss it," Arthur grinned. "Tell them we'll be there."

HOW THE WALESES SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Present income varies from $300 to $400 a month: $125 from Social Security, balance from investment properties.

Food	$85.00	Recreation, entertainment	25.00
Clothing	12.50	Church, charities	20.00
Property taxes	41.70	Car expense	20.00
Fuel, light, water	18.00	Household cleaning supplies	4.00
Telephone	11.00	Dry cleaning, shoe repair	2.50
Insurance (house, car, life)	25.00	Club dues	2.50
Medical and dental	10.00	Magazines, newspapers	2.75
		Total	$279.95

"When there's a surplus, we use it for travel. If an emergency arises, we dip into principal."

The Koehlers' large kitchen includes a paneled dining area with a yellow wall telephone.

Mrs. Koehler especially enjoys the convenience of her green bedroom phone.

The red phone in their teen-age son's room harmonizes with its cheerful furnishings.

Mr. Koehler, owner of a restaurant supply company, often takes business calls on the ivory telephone in the den.

"Having phones handy is such a help" says Mrs. Harold Koehler, Indianapolis, Indiana

"Seems as though I used to be running up or down stairs all the time," says Mrs. Koehler. "Now with phones where we need them most I save many steps every day.

"We depend on the telephone a lot. We all use it to visit with other members of the family who live far away, and I often shop by phone. Mr. Koehler relies on it a great deal in his business and community activities.

"I probably use the kitchen phone more than any other. Like those in the den, the master bedroom, and our son's room, it's one of the new color telephones. They look nice in any room."

Why not enjoy additional telephones in your home? It's the mark of modern living. The cost is small. A call to your local telephone business office will bring this convenience to your home, too.

Working together to bring people together

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

"EVERYBODY CAN DO SOMETHING"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 163

"Cheap things never last." Finished, the charming little white cottage rented immediately. "It has been occupied all but two weeks since, and those two weeks I needed for redecorating." The cottage adds $500 a year to Petra's income. "And renting it has given me companionship and many good friends."

Her life is far from being all work. There is her church, the First Presbyterian Church of Coral Gables; there are many invitations from friends—and their hospitality to be returned. Small dinners, usually, with bridge or canasta to follow. "My sister Olga, also a widow, lives just down the block. We often 'gallivant' to Miami [half an hour and 20 cents away by bus] for movies, concerts, and shopping trips when our favorite stores have sales. I buy everything at sales, watch for things to be marked down, plan my meals around weekly specials at the market."

Every other summer comes her reward for meticulously banking $30 every month in a special fund. Petra Davis packs up and goes to visit her four children and nine grandchildren. It's quite a trip—Colorado, Illinois, Alabama, North Carolina. It costs $800 and to Petra it is worth every cent.

"The children are happy to see me. They plan parties for me, always have so much to show and tell me." Petra stays an announced-in-advance two weeks in each place, savors every long-anticipated minute of it. One indication of the pleasure her visits bring to her children: she is never asked to baby-sit. Vacationing, mother is an honored guest.

The children come to Florida for visits too. "That's one reason I keep up my home, so they'll have a place to come. Jimmy and his family will be here this year. Two Christmases ago Kathryn and Mary came with their families. You should have seen us! Suitcases all over the house, youngsters racing around. Oh, it was wonderful, it truly was." Petra smiles in remembered happiness. "I'm so lucky in my children, in-laws and all."

Asked to give advice to women who find themselves in a situation like hers, Petra Davis' suggestions would be simple:

"If your income isn't adequate, figure out what you can do to earn money. Everybody can do something. Stay busy and interested. Don't 'let down'—keep yourself, your clothes, your house as pretty as possible, your meals appetizing.

"Don't be uprooted. Stay where you have friends. Friends have contributed so much to me—companionship, advice, help. I couldn't do better than to pass on the advice a friend once gave me. 'Every time you get lonesome or depressed, Petra, get out of the house. Go somewhere, see somebody, do something.'

"I guess I just followed that advice."

HOW MRS. DAVIS SPENDS HER MONEY EACH MONTH

Baby-sitting provides about $1000 a year, sewing $400, rental of guest cottage $500—an average monthly income of $158.

Food (many sitting jobs include meals)	$20.00
Clothing ("I make my clothes")	2.00
Taxes (including garbage collection)	6.83
Household maintenance ("Usually much lower; this year it includes painting house, major refrigerator repairs.")	28.90
Utilities (includes guest cottage)	16.50
Telephone	4.27
Medical and dental	5.66
Recreation, entertainment	6.00
Church, charities	9.00
Furniture and appliances (repair, replacement)	4.33
Transportation	1.80
Dry cleaning, shoe repair, launderette	5.50
Drugs and hair care	2.00
Vacation fund	30.00
Income tax	1.00
Savings (investment fund) "whatever is left."
Total	$143.7[illegible]

AT LAST... Glamour IN A

20 GAL. TRASH CAN

The trash can you never need to hide! Another Loma original, this polyethelene beauty comes in lawn green, autumn red, harmony gray and lemon yellow . . . Gay colors to add a bright patio note! And the exclusive Loma lock-lid cover keeps unsightly trash safely out of view.

Built to take plenty of hard knocks, the sturdy Loma trash can won't break . . . bounces right back in shape . . . can't rust . . . can't retain odors . . . and so easy to clean! Available at better stores everywhere.

Actual capacity – 22 gallons.

ANOTHER LOMA Ware ORIGINAL

A product of LOMA Plastics Inc., Ft. Worth, Texas

WILL YOU HAVE ENOUGH MONEY WHEN YOU RETIRE?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 159

want in the years ahead. "Betty and I were talking about this the other night," said Ted. "We decided that when we retire we'd like to have an income of at least three hundred dollars a month, including Social Security.

"Then we'd like to have better insurance protection—all I've got now is a small term-insurance policy that expires next year. We'd also like to be more systematic about savings. We've been married thirteen years, but we've only six hundred dollars in the bank for emergencies and to take care of the boys' future education. We've told the boys that we hope they'll be able to work their way if they go to college, but we'd like to have some money available to help them out if they really need it. Finally, we'd like to have a nest egg of maybe twenty thousand dollars or so when we retire—just to make us feel prosperous and secure. But golly, how much would it cost to buy a dream like this?"

I made some rough calculations and told him he could have all these things, and possibly more, for about $10 a week now—and double this when his home is paid for.

His first reaction was to doubt that these enumerated wants could be had for as little as $10 a week now—and twice that later on. But his next reaction was to ask how he could afford to put 10 per cent of his take-home pay into this program.

"Here," said Ted as he jotted some notes on a piece of paper, "is a list that shows pretty accurately where my weekly pay check goes."

$20—mortgage, taxes, insurance
28—food
10—clothes
12—payments on car, gas, oil
12—electricity, heat, phone
10—Ted's lunches at work, carfare
10—recreation, church, misc.
$102—weekly take-home pay after income taxes and deductions

Although Ted had a pretty good idea w his money was going, he admitted they di have a written budget to guide them in ma their expendit That's where next step come

3. Budgeting I Achieve Objec

The third ste volves setting written budge help you ac what you wa the years a Without one, a ily is destined t the years pass nothing accum ing for future r and pleasures. a written budg family will l to trim and par nonessentials from their expenditures an regard their allotment for personal sec in the same essential category as their b eted items for food, clothing and shelter.

If you find your expenses are really h and, even with hawklike surveillance ove penses, you simply can't afford this iten security, the obvious solution is to find a of bringing in a little more cash. Inger families manage to do this all the time— haps renting out a room, putting mor work afternoons giving piano lessons finding pop a weekend job at the co haberdashery.

Though it may be painful at first to op under a strict budget, you'll soon find, great many others have found, that th something downright pleasant about sa money. The pleasure comes when you b basking in that warm aura of satisfaction that comes from knowing you have a businesslike approach to your financial future.

IS THERE A CLUB for older people in your community? This is one of the most easily established of all organized programs for the aged—and one of the most useful. At random we note a Silver Age Club in Arlington, Virginia; a Sunset Club in Manchester, New Hampshire; the Old Guard, White Plains, New York; literally hundreds of Golden Age and Senior Citizens clubs. Many give members opportunities for worth-while civic and humanitarian projects as well as social interests.

The Kendalls spent several evenings setting up a strict budget and found that without jeopardizing their standard of living they could—and would—allot 10 per cent of their take-home pay for personal security—and twice this amount later. They also wisely decided to stick to this percentage arrangement so that in the event their income rises they will increase their allotment for personal security accordingly.

4. Investing Your Security Funds

The fourth step is to invest your funds in such a way as to provide you and your family with sound protection and good future returns. Investments from which you may derive a retirement income include the following:

Annuities
Bank savings
Bonds (government, municipal, industrial)
Insurance
Mortgages
Mutual funds
Real estate
Stocks (common and preferred)

There are, naturally, many opinions as to the best investment plan for a middle-income couple such as the Kendalls. Some go overboard in favor of insurance and annuities. Some cautiously suggest that you stick with bank savings or bonds. Some optimistically advocate major reliance on stocks or real estate. And a few misguided souls forswear all of these and tuck their retirement dollars into the nearest mattress for safekeeping.

Except for the last, each of these views has merit, depending on the circumstances involved. But for purposes of simplification and general applicability, it is best to say that the average small investor will probably be wise to stick with insurance, bank savings and common stocks. As diversity is an important factor in making sound investments, it is recommended that the individual apportion his investments more or less equally among these three. Here are some points for consideration:

Insurance

Though I haven't the remotest connection with the insurance industry, it's evident to me, and to just about everybody in the field of retirement counseling, that insurance is a must for any family that depends on work for an income. The breadwinner must have insurance so there will be funds to keep the family going if he should pass out of the picture. It is less important that the wife be insured because in most cases she does not contribute dollar-wise to the family income.

The big question is—how much insurance should the breadwinner carry? In my opinion, the amount should be equal to at least twice his annual salary. This should be adequate in most cases, because in the event of his death the family would receive not only the insurance but, assuming that he was fully covered under Social Security, would also receive survivors' benefits amounting to $75 per month for the unremarried widow as long as she has children under eighteen years of age, plus $62.50 per month for each child up to 18 years of age (up to a total maximum of $200 per month). The unremarried widow would also be eligible for additional benefits beginning at the age of 62.

The two most popular forms of life insurance are straight-life and family-income. The former pays the face amount of the policy in the event of the insured's death, and also carries a cash value. The latter provides greater protection in the years of greatest dependency. For instance, in a ten-year family-income policy the family would, in the event of the insured's death, receive payments each month for the balance of those ten years, and the face value at the end of that period. The policy also carries a cash value.

It would require volumes to describe the hundreds of different forms of policies and features that can be obtained to give a family this or that protection. Though each of these has merit, it's obvious that complete insurance protection just isn't practicable. If a man expects to be insured against all the exigencies his mind might conjure up, he'll be spending all his income and more for insurance policies.

In my opinion, the family breadwinner should carry straight-life or family-income insurance equal to at least twice his annual income. Any additional features or policies he might buy should be dictated by his special needs and by the funds available.

The Kendalls decided to put $6 a week into insurance. For this amount they are buying a $12,000 straight-life policy. If Ted lives, the policy will have a cash value of $6000 by the time he's 65. At that time he can, if he wishes, buy an annuity that will pay him and his wife about $30 a month as long as either of them lives.

What is an annuity? It's an ingenious income plan that guarantees you a fixed income no matter how long you live. The companies

CONTINUED ON PAGE 171

NEXT MONTH

Steve Ambrose and Judy Dorlester met each other at the University of Wisconsin. First, it didn't take. She turned him down. He dated her roommate by mistake. They argued. So he was surprised to hear himself saying: "She's the girl I'm going to marry. . . ."

CAMPUS ROMANCE
By ABBOT MILLS

HOW AMERICA LIVES
In the July JOURNAL

People use CHI-NET® Plates

in all kinds of places for all kinds of meals

CHI-NET®
the paper plate everybody likes

Outdoors and indoors . . . for picnics and parties . . . for quick meals and snacks . . . for breakfast, lunch and dinner, CHI-NET molded paper plates are always right for modern, easy living.

CHI-NET paper plates are molded to shape . . . they stay rigid even when piled high with food. And they have such a wonderful smooth, white finish you are proud to use them.

Look for CHI-NET paper plates at leading food or variety stores. Available in three popular round sizes for breakfast, lunch or snacks, compartment round dinner size and Square Meal Trays, especially popular for TV dinners. Look for the CHI-NET oval on the package.

KEYES FIBRE COMPANY
WATERVILLE, MAINE

Be Wise-Buy KEYES
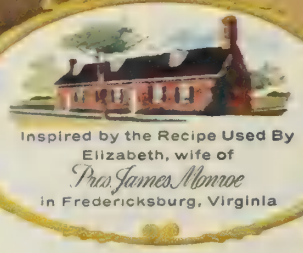
MOLDED PRODUCTS

NOW! DROMEDARY COMBINES ITS



Treasured Historic Recipes

with "STAY-FRESH MAGIC"

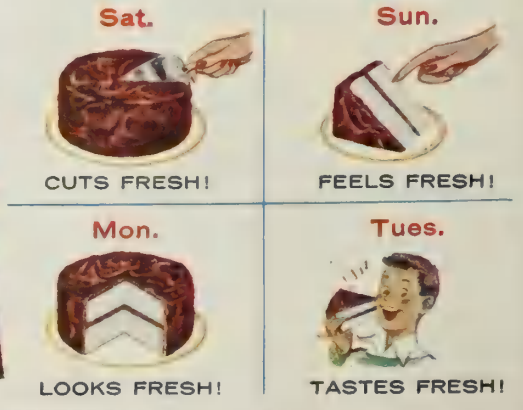
Photographed in President Monroe's Law Office in Fredericksburg, Virginia

Only Dromedary Guarantees:

"No Other Cake Tastes So Good Yet Stays So Fresh...day after day"

The better the recipe the better the cake! No wonder New Dromedary White Cake tastes so good yet stays so fresh! It is the only cake mix inspired by a treasured historic recipe of Elizabeth, wife of President James Monroe—and now it's combined with "Stay-Fresh Magic"!

The better the ingredients the better the cake! New Dromedary Mixes contain only the finest ingredients! Dromedary's Miracle Shortening and scientific blending always insure a cake with perfect height and texture!



The better the directions the better the cake! You always get a perfect White Cake with Dromedary—directions are so easy to follow! And with "Stay-Fresh Magic," you can now bake ahead of time, serve later!

Guarantee: Women everywhere tell us Dromedary Cakes taste like, stay fresh like, the best homemade! If you don't agree, send box top to Dromedary, 110 Washington St., New York 6, N. Y., and we'll refund your money.

®

"Stay-Fresh Magic" Makes A Difference!

Copr., 1957, The Dromedary Company, Division of National Biscuit Company.

Only New Dromedary

MAKER OF THE FAMOUS GINGERBREAD GIVES YOU SUCH OLD-FASHIONED GOODNESS THIS NEW-FASHIONED WAY!

DROMEDARY received the rights to this recipe from the James Monroe Memorial Foundation, member of the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 169

ıe ell annuities have accumulated mortality
:a tics over the years and from these they ar predict how long the average person will v t any given age.

hen you buy an annuity the company, in ff , gambles that you will not live more than c ain number of years beyond your present
g lf you live a little less than they estimate, n ompany makes a profit (should you live s than a certain number of years, your e ficiary will get a rebate). But if you live r er than the company estimates, you make n rofit.

nnuities are an excellent investment for n older person. They guarantee him a fixed n definite income no matter how long he v This is something that can't be achieved ri savings because it's possible to exhaust o savings—something that happens to ny people every day in the year. Neither a t be achieved with stock dividends, which u uate from year to year.

s a good idea for couples buying an anu to get one with a joint and survivorship e re so that the annuity will continue to be va as long as either of them lives.

pparently annuities agree with people vi take them out. At any rate, studies reveal h annuitants on the average live longer h the general population.

ngs avings should play a role in your plan for be onal security. They permit added diversity n our investments, complete safety, and cash e ves for emergencies.

uring the past depression many banks a d and depositors lost their savings. But h can't happen again. Savings accounts in ıc edited banking firms are now insured by th Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ap o $10,000 per individual. As a result, sav-n up to this amount are as safe as the Gover nent itself.

ou should be able to get at least 3 per cent n rest on your savings. If your present bank or savings-and-loan association doesn't pay this much, just shop around until you find one that does.

A couple who are serious about their program of personal security should vow when they open their savings account that (1) they're going to stick to a regular deposit plan, and (2) they're going to keep their fingers out of it. One big disadvantage to a savings account is its accessibility. For this reason some people advocate buying Government bonds (which also pay 3 per cent interest). One may have the best intentions in the world, but let a minor emergency come up and there's a temptation to say, "Well, I'll borrow a little from my savings account and then pay it back next month." Such a tendency spells ruin for a savings program.

The Kendalls decided to put the remaining $4 of their weekly security stipend into savings, beginning right away. Ten years from now, when their home is paid for, they'll increase this amount to $6 a week. If they follow this plan religiously, and if they don't have to withdraw any funds for their boys' education, they'll have nearly $10,000 by the time they reach sixty-five. At that time they can buy an annuity with this lump sum that will pay them approximately $50 a month as long as either of them lives.

Common Stocks

There's a very good reason for including some common stocks in your plan for personal security. First, appropriately selected common stocks can give you a better rate of return on your money than you are likely to get from other sources. Second, the stocks stand a good chance of increasing in value as time goes by. Third, if inflation hits and prices soar, the value of your stocks and the amount of your dividends can be expected to follow suit.

Investing in common stocks used to be a headache for the small investor because he was subject to the inconvenience of accumulating the full price of a share of stock before he could buy it. This is no longer a problem. The New York Stock Exchange has now developed a pay-as-you-go plan under which small investors can buy stocks by paying as little as $40 a quarter and buying fractional parts of a share of stock until it is owned outright. Today, two out of three stock-market investors have incomes under $7500 a year.

Many people are apprehensive about buying common stocks because they remember vividly the market crash of 1929. However, the stock market today is much safer than it was then. An important stabilizer is the U. S. Securities and Exchange Commission that now maintains close scrutiny and control over market operations. Even if the market were to decline drastically, the small investor holding the stocks of reputable companies need not be unduly concerned. Though his stocks would likely decline in value for a while, the chances are they would snap back—just as happened after 1929. Many of the great corporations today successfully survived the crash of 1929 and have never missed paying a dividend in the past half century. What's more, their stocks have steadily increased in value over the years.

What stocks should you select to provide you with retirement funds? It's best to sit down and talk it over with a reliable stock-broker. With his help, and after careful study on your own, select four or five high-grade "growth" stocks representing different lines of business. Be sure in your own mind that the firms (a) have a long-standing reputation for both soundness and progressiveness, and (b) manufacture goods or provide services for which there appears to be increasing demand.

Mutual-fund companies permit you to simplify your stock-buying program. These companies own hundreds of different stocks. Thus, when you buy a share of "mutual stock" you automatically spread your investment among the stocks of a great many corporations.

The Kendalls decided that ten years from now, when their home is paid for, they are going to start buying some common stocks. For the ensuing fifteen years, or until they reach sixty-five, they plan to put $8 a week into four or five well-selected "growth" stocks and reinvest all dividends.

No competent broker will hazard a guess as to what a weekly investment of this amount might be worth at the end of fifteen years. It just isn't possible to predict what a stock will do in the future. About the only way of getting a rough idea of what your stock might be worth in the future is to check its past performance.

For instance, let's see how three reputable "growth" stocks—General Electric, General Motors and Du Pont—performed over a fifteen-year period. The record discloses that if a person had invested $8 a week in any one of these stocks beginning in 1940, and had reinvested the dividends, his nest egg in common stock after fifteen years would have been worth about $30,000.

However, to be on the conservative side, let's say that the stock the Kendalls buy over a fifteen-year period is worth $20,000 by the time they retire. They could then reinvest this "growth" stock into "income-producing" stock under the guidance of a competent broker or investment counselor and could probably get dividends of at least 5½ per cent, totaling about $1100 a year.

Is there any assurance that the U. S. economy will continue to expand and that well-selected stocks will tend to increase in value? One can merely cite various well-informed opinions. For instance, President Dwight D. Eisenhower, after consulting with top economists, has stated, "All the economic factors . . . point to a continuation of good times." Time Magazine, in a special report on the economy, has stated, "Few economists question the fact that the U. S. economy is on basically stable ground, or that the ballooning U. S. population will eventually absorb all the goods—and more—that industry can produce." And as stated in the book Save It, Invest It, and Retire, by Donald I. Rogers, financial editor of the New York Herald Tribune:

"Anyone who does not believe the stock market will go higher over the years does not really believe in the future of America."

ADDING UP YOUR ASSETS

As seen from the foregoing, the Kendalls are planning to apportion their security investment in the following manner:

	Weekly Until Home is Paid For	Weekly After Home is Paid For
Insurance	$6	$6
Savings	4	6
Common stocks		8

In exchange for their prudence in sowing these sums weekly beginning at the age of forty, the Kendalls will enjoy (a) life-insurance

THE THINGS I DON'T KNOW

By MARGARET PARTON

I have a college degree, and I value the information it represents. I know a little (in some cases a lot) about French Impressionists, Russian ballet, English literature and American folklore. I can dance, swim, play tennis, "touch typewrite," and drive any kind of automobile made. I am supposed to be educated.

BUT: When my small son had a poison-ivy rash the other day I thought it was measles, and called the doctor in a panic.

When I try to cook I have to hold a cookbook in one hand, and stir with a spoon in the other.

When the floors look scuffy, I don't know whether to hose them down or to use wax. When I was a girl my mother used to talk about something called "lemon oil"—but I didn't pay much attention, and I wasn't made to. I was too busy practicing my tennis serve, or memorizing Keats.

I don't know how to sew buttons on my husband's shirts; are you supposed to use a thimble? And how do you use a thimble?

The meals in our house are healthful, but more because of the fact that I happen to like fruit, vegetables, meat and milk than any knowledge of mine about nutrition. Sheer luck.

I don't know how to shop; when I have to economize after too many steak dinners, I must rely on the butcher for advice—or feed the family peanut-butter sandwiches.

More importantly, I find that I am unprepared to face the deep and elemental experiences of life: when my father died I was emotionally unable for a long time to face the fact of death. When my mother is in pain, I am baffled and helpless. When my child suffers I do not know how to handle his suffering, or my own.

Before he was born I studied natural childbirth, and the birth—prolonged as it was—was easy because at every moment I understood what was happening and I knew what to do about it. The feeling of power and of happiness came because I was prepared for that particular job.

But I was never prepared during the long years of growing, either by myself or by those who "educated" me, to assume my role as a woman in today's world.

My job as a woman is to succor and comfort and care for those I love; to remain strong and confident in life even in the face of illness and death. These things I am learning, many years later than they should have been learned. Daily I thank God for the loving and sometimes laughing tolerance of my family.

If I had a daughter, her training would be different. Tennis and Keats, yes. But more. much more.

protection of $12,000 effective at once, and (b) retirement assets something like this:

$4000—approximate annual retirement income ($162.80 monthly from Social Security; $50 monthly from annuity purchased from savings; $30 monthly from annuity purchased from cash value of life insurance; and an estimated $90 monthly from common-stock dividends).

$20,000—estimated value of nest egg consisting of common stocks.

When you add to this a home paid for in full, it is clear that the Kendalls can look forward to entering the retirement years financially prepared to make old age "the best of life for which the first was made."

The experience of the Kendalls shows how a family of moderate means can initiate a financial program of their own. Naturally, a family will be able to accumulate even greater personal security if they're in a higher-income group than the Kendalls, if they can save a higher percentage of their income, and if they get started at an earlier age.

SOME MISCONCEPTIONS

Life Expectancy

Why do many young couples neglect to plan for their later security? The reason may partially lie in their assumption that age 65 is more or less the end of the road. They may cite current life-expectancy figures indicating that men can expect to live to 67.4 years and women to 73.6 years.

This assumption, of course, is incorrectly based. Life-expectancy figures refer to the number of years a person can expect to live beginning at birth. If a person survives into his middle or later years, he has an expectation of living a great many years beyond these figures.

If, for instance, a person lives to be 65, he has an average remaining period of 14.4 more years, according to findings of the National Office of Vital Statistics. And if he lives those predicted years and reaches 79, they predict he'll live another 7.2 years. And if he lives those predicted years and reaches 86, they predict he'll live nearly 5 years longer.

Though it may be stretching the actuarial facts a bit, I like to refer to the later years as "at least a quarter of a lifetime." If we think of the years after 65 as representing a substantial segment of our total life, we'll be more inclined to make constructive plans for those years.

Living Costs

Some younger people discount the need for financial planning because they assume living expenses in retirement will dwindle to practically nothing. They may argue convincingly that their chicks will have left the nest, their home will be paid for, and their income taxes will be lower (Social Security is not taxable and annuities and company pensions are partially tax free).

True, over-all costs will likely be a little lower. But don't forget new entries that should appear on your retirement budget—for instance, an item of ample proportion for travel. This is a diversion which most men and women look forward to enjoying in retirement and in my opinion every retirement budget should include an item of at least $500 a year for trips and vacations.

Your medical costs will probably run higher than you're accustomed to. The annual medical bill for the average American is $65, but for people past 65 it is $102.

You'll also want to include an ample item in your budget to cover new retirement interests; e.g., boats, shuffleboard courts, do-it-yourself equipment, and gardening paraphernalia. You may want to remodel your home. You may want to do more entertaining. You may want to make up for your modest contributions in the past and give bigger donations to your church and to local charities. And you may want to give periodic gifts to your children and grandchildren—something that many oldsters consider one of the more pleasurable pursuits of the later years.

> FAMED geriatrician Dr. Edward Stieglitz has wisely stated: "The pattern of later life is set in youth. If it is sensible for the child to make an effort to learn how to be an adult, then it is essential for the adult to learn how to be aged."

Working After 65

There are those who don't bother to plan for retirement because they insist they don't intend to retire. They may enjoy their work so much that the thought of retiring is much less appealing than the thought of staying on the job. Since retirement is not on their calendar they see no reason to plan for it.

Yet the blunt fact is that they may have little to say about it. Unless they are self-employed, they may encounter restrictions on their employment, since many firms are reluctant to retain employees, or hire new ones, who are past 65 years of age. Or their health may fail and they may be forced to join those (perhaps 25 per cent of all past 65) who are physically unable to perform regular work.

MULTIPLE SKILLS—FOR ADDED SECURITY

Even though your financial blueprint suggests that you're all set for the later years, it's well to bear in mind that the best-laid plans sometimes go awry.

For instance, consider the Gerhard Ehlers—a refugee couple who came to the U.S. after a ten-year nightmare in Germany. They saw their collapse of their personal security program that had included homeownership, insurance savings and investments.

"I'm coming to believe," Mr. Ehler told me, "that the most personal form of financial security is represented by your skills. Now that my wife and I are in our sixties we must start all over. But we are fortunate in having four

All the food you serve deserves the protection of

WAXED PAPER

Fresh-Baked Crackers . . .

Crackers · Butter · Frozen Shrimp · Potato Chips · Popcorn —protected in Waxed Paper and Waxed Glassine Paper so crisp and flaky . . . a clever compliment to your favorite foods . . .

FLAVOR-SEALED in WAXED PAPER for your protection

Whether it's a quick-fix snack or hearty full-course meal, everything tastes better with crisp, crunchy crackers. Always delightfully fresh and flaky, too, thanks to Waxed Paper and Waxed Glassine Paper. Some even with inner and outer wraps for double protection—double assurance of new-baked goodness down to the last satisfying cracker.

It's easy to see why crackers, bread, butter, cereals, frozen foods, potato chips, candy—nearly every food you serve is protected by wonderful Waxed Paper packaging. Seals in all the appetizing flavor, freshness and nutrition, yet it's so very easy to handle, open and reclose.

Be sure your family gets this promised protection. And keep the Waxed Paper roll handy. Waxed Paper Merchandising Council, Inc., 38 S. Dearborn St., Chicago 3, Ill.

Cereal brisk and crunchy . . . | Bread wholesome and nutritious . . . | Candy fresh and tasty . . . | Frozen foods rich with flavor . . . | Butter delicious and dairy-sweet . . . | Potato chips golden and good . . . | Waxed Paper roll . . . a thousand uses!

marketable skills between us. I know carpentry and diamond cutting, and she knows dressmaking and typing. If we cannot find work in one trade, we have other skills with which to support ourselves."

Though the experiences of the Ehlers may seem rather remote, there are instances occurring all the time that underline the importance of having more than one skill. You may recall that for a while following World War II the market was glutted with war-trained engineers. All that was changed by the boom in construction and research that began in the late 1940's. But for a period of two or three years there were many engineers who wished they had an extra skill or two to which they could turn.

Right now we're on the brink of the electronic age. It is quite possible that many skills regarded today as basic and essential will become obsolete one of these days through the introduction of automation and integrated data-processing methods.

The need for multiple skills was impressed on me a few months ago at a job clinic held for older people who needed but could not find employment. It was clear that those in attendance at the clinic had neglected to follow a systematic plan of saving money during their productive years. In addition, they had failed to diversify their skills and now found it exceedingly difficult to find work in their particular fields.

One sad-faced man of 65 said he had been a machinist all his life and had no other trade. No jobs for old machinists, he said. A former barber of 70 said his feet were bad and he could no longer ply his trade. No jobs for old barbers with bad feet, he said. A widow of 68 said she was just a housewife. No jobs for old housewives, she lamented. A former grade-school teacher of 66 said there was simply no work for old teachers. Had she learned any other occupations? "No," she sighed, "it's an age of specialization—you've got to pick your trade and stick to it."

Though a person needs to have a specialty, this does not prevent him from learning auxiliary skills at which he could earn a living if it ever became necessary. There are many foresighted people—and some housewives among them—who have taken the initiative to learn an extra marketable skill so that if circumstances should require they're in a more advantageous position to find work.

In addition to having marketable skills it's also prudent and practical to tuck away in the back of your mind any ideas you may have on operating a business of your own. In view of the prejudice that many employers have toward older workers, the only sure-fire recourse of an older man or woman who needs work is to set up shop and go into business for himself.

HERBERT HOOVER offered some sound advice on his eighty-second birthday: "There is no joy to be had from retirement except by some kind of productive work."

SUMMARY

Early financial planning is the best preventive for the financial ills that so frequently accompany old age. You can achieve financial independence in your later years by practicing thrift and by allocating part of your income for use in old age.

This doesn't mean practicing thrift to such an extent that you sacrifice essentials today in favor of luxury tomorrow. Rather it means being foresighted enough to put aside for later use a modest per cent of the income with which you are blessed in your most productive years.

If there's a moral to this piece it's simply this: don't rely too heavily on others to provide you with the funds necessary for a comfortable old age. It's much wiser to put together a personal plan for your future security.

"I WAS LAID OFF AT 70 . . ."

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 161

Grocery shopping isn't easy. The weekly round trip to the big market in town costs Philip and Nellie 60 cents on the bus. "We can't walk any more—it's a couple of miles and all uphill going in." This rules out regular church attendance, too, a deep regret to them both.

Nellie admits that Philip is the canny shopper of the house. He weighs values carefully, has devised favorite economies that keep their food bill down to $8 to $10 a week. Day-old baked goods save 10 cents an item; a special 29-cent tin of lunch meat makes economical sandwiches for a light supper; instant coffee "goes farther" than the regular kind; and evaporated milk at 13 cents a can "tastes just as good as expensive coffee cream when you get used to it." Philip figures into his grocery expense the 30 cents it costs to have bulky purchases delivered.

The Dashners don't get out very often—an occasional drive with neighbors, or a family visit. But (except for church) they feel no sense of loneliness or of being cut off. In part that's due to the handsome new television set in their small lace-curtained living room. Money for the set was a gift from Philip's two younger brothers: "Why don't you buy a TV for you and Nellie? You're both here all day—it will bring the world in to you."

"And it did," says Philip. "More of the world than I had seen in all my seventy-two years."

He is fascinated by television and prides himself on being well informed about what's going on in the world. They both love dramatic programs, "especially Westerns—such interesting country! Plays hob with our sleep, though." Philip grins. "Used to go to bed at eight-thirty or nine. Now it's near midnight some nights."

Philip thinks that his sudden unannounced "retirement" has worked out pretty well, on the whole. "Feels funny at first—not working," he says simply, "but after a while you get used to it."

He has two bits of advice. For people faced with retirement, voluntary or involuntary: "Before you reach sixty-five, find out where you stand financially. Find out about pensions; talk to your Social Security office. If you know what to expect, you can work things out."

Second—with a smile at Nellie: "Get married young. Otherwise, you'll never make that fiftieth-anniversary celebration!"

HOW THE DASHNERS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Income: $115.40 a month Social Security payments.
$20.00 a month rent from roomer (temporary).

Food	$50.00
Clothing (many gifts from Philip's brothers)	2.00
Property tax	8.42
Fuel	13.00
Light, water, oil for cookstove	6.00
Insurance (life, fire insurance on house)	4.70
Medical and dental	10.00
Charities	2.00
Transportation	3.00
Cleaning supplies	2.00
Newspapers and magazines	1.00
Cigarettes	2.60
Maintenance (lawn cut, garbage collected)	4.25
Total	$108.97

EVERY DAY IS FRY-DAY!

with the wonderful, new automatic

MIRRO-MATIC
completely immersible
electric fry pan

Casual weekend living, every single day, is coming to your house, with the remarkable new MIRRO-MATIC Electric Fry Pan, made for easiest handling, of sturdy stamped aluminum. And, it's the electric fry pan you can wash completely under water, like an ordinary pan!

Eleven inches square, it's big enough for big family meals, deep enough for stews and cakes and casseroles. Quick-reference temperature guide on handle and signal-light in plug assure crispy, delicious frying, every time, for all kinds of food.

See the smartly styled new MIRRO-MATIC, at your department, hardware, or home furnishing store, soon. Today is fry-day, with MIRRO-MATIC!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

your best buy

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

COMPLETELY IMMERSIBLE!

When control is removed, pan can be completely immersed in water and suds, handle and all, for easy, safe, thorough cleaning!

SELECTIVE MIRRO-MATIC HEAT CONTROL PLUG

Accurate Heat Control built right into the plug! Just dial the right heat for whatever food you're cooking. Signal-light tells you when heat is right, for non-stick frying.

MIRRO
THE FINEST ALUMINUM

only $19.95

with exclusive MIRRO-MATIC Heat Control and cord, Fed. Tax incl. Fitted high-domed cover, of thick, stamped aluminum, with cool plastic knob and adjustable steam vent for spatter-free browning and quicker crisping, $2.50 additional.

ALUMINUM GOODS MANUFACTURING CO., MANITOWOC, WIS., World's Largest Manufacturer of Aluminum Cooking Utensils

A CLIMATE OF FREEDOM

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

The Madeira School: large spaces, freedom from city noises, simple buildings.

This June, after more than fifty years as headmistress of the Madeira School in Greenway, Virginia, Lucy Madeira Wing will retire. The school, founded in 1906, was a pioneer in liberal education for girls at a time when "finishing schools" were fashionable; it is holding fast to its educational standards today, when society is re-examining the question of how a young woman is best educated for life. Is the Madeira School, and others like it, outmoded? Is there a place in America for girls' schools which emphasize the "impractical" subjects of mathematics, history, Latin? The very existence of the Madeira School seems to provide at least a partial answer. ED.

Lucy Madeira Wing—"Education is a journey in the country of the mind."

On a sunny May morning in 1896, a young girl sat in a classroom and heard her favorite professor read the words which were to influence her whole life: "The world must someday return to the word 'duty,' and be done with the word 'reward.' There are no rewards, and plenty duties; and the sooner a man sees that and acts upon it like a Christian or a fine old barbarian, the better for himself."

The girl was Lucy Madeira; the words which so impressed her came from the Vailima Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. A senior at Vassar, with Commencement Day at hand, Lucy was seriously concerned with her own duty—to her family, her life, her world. Years later, speaking to Madeira students on her seventieth birthday, she said, "I could never forget that May morning. It was a beautiful morning, the light glistening, and on the quiet air came this message. It became the motto of many of us for our lives—to seek our duty and not to desire rewards."

Those who know Lucy Madeira Wing—the 220 girls in neat green uniforms who work and play on the secluded elm-shaded campus today; the thousands of far-flung alumnae who remember the school with nostalgia—know equally well the story of how the vague dream of an idealistic college girl crystallized into reality, how the small boarding school she opened fifty years ago (with a borrowed $6000, thirteen students and considerable optimism) has grown and flourished, while never swerving from the firm ideals on which it was founded.

What are these ideals? A student, stopped on her way down to the stables for an afternoon ride, answers lightly, "Festina lente. That means 'Make haste slowly'—or, 'Don't put your horse at a fence too fast, or you'll have a fall!'" A housewife, with two small children underfoot and company expected for dinner, thinks back to her own Madeira days and says, "Try to keep calm in the center of one's being. Miss Madeira was always telling us that, and believe me, sometimes it helps!" A college girl, facing final examinations with a good record and a strong temptation to coast through on past performance, quotes rather ruefully, "Finish in style!" and returns to her study with strengthened determination.

These, of course, are the offhand explanations—well-remembered mottoes that convey some of the flavor of the school, but not its whole philosophy. This philosophy is perhaps best expressed by three very basic ideas: a belief, first of all, in the dignity of the individual and the responsibility of the individual to the community; a conviction that each person is morally bound to give no less than his best to each and every undertaking; and a realization that man is most productive in a climate of freedom—of the intellect and of the spirit.

The climate at the Madeira School is free; it is also rigorous. A new student who announced her intention to take only subjects in which she excelled was firmly chastised: "That is a negative attitude. You should take subjects in which you do not do well. What is education but a pushing back of the darkness of the mind?" The passing mark at Madeira is 60 and a girl who cannot maintain that average receives no diploma, but only the face-saving "recognition of the school." No prizes or awards are given for distinguished work, for every girl is expected to do work of distinction. Yet the school is not for the brilliant student alone; girls are admitted on the basis of potential ability, and faculty members work hard to develop that potentiality. Athletics, dramatics, extracurricular activities of great variety, and an active student government are all part of the school program—but the real emphasis is placed on the academic.

"Why study Latin, the Greeks and the Romans?" Mrs. Wing, more familiarly known on campus as "Miss Madeira," admits that she is occasionally asked this question, and is always surprised at being asked. "These ancient people gave us our first record of democracy; a great deal can be learned from studying their civilizations. Mathematics seems to me the most valuable study in learning how the world is made up. History helps to explain people—their successes and failures, and how they influence one another. These studies, together with science, a modern language and of course English, will fit a girl for her role in life, whatever it may be."

And what of the traditionally feminine accomplishments—cooking, sewing, housekeeping? Miss Madeira believes that these skills are best learned in the home, and freely admits that one flaw in the boarding-school system is that it keeps a child too much away from home. She adds, "In my opinion, one of the three most important occupations in the world is that of the mother—the two others are teaching and healing. It is only logical that a girl, who as a mother will be responsible for the earliest development of young minds and spirits, should be as carefully educated as a professor or a physician. I feel that a thorough liberal education is really more important to a girl than to a boy."

The Madeira School's successful formula for this liberal education is composed of three vital elements: excellent teachers, small classes, and the inquiring minds of the students CONTINUED ON PAGE 204

Out of the blue . . . the whitest, brightest nylon ever!

NEW LA FRANCE BLUING with its special nylon-brightener restores even the dingiest nylon in just five washings. And it won't turn fabric yellow as most bleaches will.

What's more, regular La France care actually prevents "graying" of new nylon. Try it tonight . . . La France is detergent, nylon-brightener and bluing all in one handy box.

P. S. La France is perfect for all your family wash . . . no special bluing rinse needed.

washes away "nylon gray"

La France is detergent, nylon-brightener and bluing all in one handy box.

Another fine product of General Foods

ESCAPE TO THE MOUNTAIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 62

"Non, non," a girl's voice protested at his left. "Get away, you big boy! This is for the little one!"

She was reaching far out over the rail, one hand holding to a white hat with a blue scarf around it, the other raised to throw the sou. The wind was playing with the long scarf ends, and they whipped across Tom's face. "Pardonnez-moi," she said, grasping at the streaming silk. Then she was staring at him, her eyes, the color of the scarf, widening.

"Why," she said in English, "you're Tom Carruthers, aren't you!"

"Yes, I am." He removed his Panama. He couldn't place her at all, and yet she was familiar to him.

"I am—I was Medora Hardin," she said, and extended her white-gloved hand.

"I should have known. What are you doing in Martinique? Taking a sea voyage?" he asked her.

"No, this is my home now. I am married, to Paul Durand. His family owns Bellefontaine." Her hand went back to her sailor hat again. "But what are you doing here?"

He told her that he worked for Hitchcock Company.

"It's strange I didn't know about your being here," she was saying. "So few Americans come to St. Pierre. But then, until just before I left, we'd been at the plantation. Paul's parents went to stay in France, and he took over."

"And now you live here? In the town, I mean?" He was not really interested, but she was looking at him with such a pleased expression (meeting someone from Colesville in faraway Martinique) that he couldn't end the conversation abruptly.

"No, not permanently," she said. "We've just been staying at the family house on Morne d'Orange because Paul had a bad spell of fever and he thought the height there would be healthier for him." Porters were moving about them now, picking up trunks and portmanteaus and lowering them to the boats. "We will probably be going right back to Bellefontaine," she added. "I love it there."

Because he knew she would expect it of him, he asked her politely, "How is your father?"

"Poor father. He's just had a serious operation. That's why I've been in New York—he lives there now. But he was making a splendid recovery when I left," she added. "The Hardins are a strong breed."

"Yes," Tom said. "They always were."

She rested an arm on the rail, her hand still holding the sou, forgotten. "Oh," she exclaimed, "it's so nice to see someone from Colesville! I've never forgotten it: the sweet old house, and those beautiful, sparkling winters. I used to watch you when you played with the other boys, going down the hill on your sleds. Once you got into a snowball fight, right in front of the house, and you sent three other boys running. You were my secret hero then." She smiled up at him, a smile of amusement at the child that she had been. Small freckles sprinkled the bridge of her nose. "You almost broke my heart, Tom," she said, "when you didn't come to my birthday party, that winter before we moved away. Why didn't you?"

"Because there would be girls at the party," he invented. "At thirteen, I couldn't see any reason for girls." He remembered the day of that party very well—and why he had not gone.

Her laughter had an almost boyish ring and it was accompanied by a crinkling up of her nose, and shaking shoulders.

"It's been a pleasure," Tom began, but she had noticed the coin in her hand and held it out to him.

"Do throw this for me," she said. "If you throw it far out, one of the little boys will get it. The big ones crowd them back."

He tossed the sou for her, and then she gave him a whole handful of them. They leaned out together as he flung them one by one. But old memories echoed like the ringing of the bell buoy that warned of the dangerous shoals at the harbor entrance. He wanted nothing to do with a Hardin. For his family, "Hardin" had spelled disaster.

Suddenly something was happening down there in the water. The boys had stopped diving; they were streaking for their packing-box boats. Then above the confusion the warning call rose: "Requin, requin!"

"Shark!" Medora cried. "Where is it? Do you see it?"

"Not yet." The boys were tumbling into their canoes and plying their paddles.

And then Tom was aware of a swift movement close by. Someone was throwing another coin. The sun caught it: not a copper one, but gold. He cursed angrily under his breath. But surely, not even for a gold coin ——

One of the retreating boats had stopped, paddle suspended. That boat had only one occupant, small, and black as bituminous coal. The boy was standing up now, balancing, looking toward the spot where the gold piece had gone down. You could see the hesitation, the gripping fear, and you could see all the rest of it, too: the thatched hut of some poor fisherman, without even a bed in it, probably; the desperate gathering together of the sous with which to buy manioc flour, a little store of rice, a candle to burn before the Virgin.

The boy was poising to dive, crossing himself. Tom cupped his hands and shouted, "Non, non, petit!" But the little figure went over the side.

He went down and then he came up, gulping air. As he dived again, everyone could see it now: the dark, glistening fin cutting through the water.

Then there was a concerted movement of relief among the passengers and Tom could hear his own breath going out. For the boy had come up, he was in his canoe, and he was holding up the gold piece for which he had risked a life that couldn't have counted at most more than ten or eleven years. In seconds his craft was skimming away, into the shallows, and that black fin had turned.

When you have got a thing where you want it, it is a good thing to leave it where it is.

WINSTON CHURCHILL

"Why would anyone have done that?" Medora demanded. Her face was very white.

"As an experiment," Tom said. He still felt shaken, and cold with fury. "To pit hunger against fear, I imagine."

"It was horribly, savagely cruel!"

"You mustn't dwell on it," Tom said. "And now if you'll excuse me, Mme. Durand ——"

"I called you Tom. Though that was probably very free of me. Now I'll feel embarrassed if you don't call me Medora. Although I don't like my name, you know—because of the mine." Then, obviously recalling what the Medora mine had meant in his life (at least the part she knew about it), she gave him a stricken, oddly desperate look. "Forgive me for bringing that up. I always seem to be saying or doing the wrong thing." The clear, happy expression of her face was gone. She was like a porteuse wearily taking on some familiar weight. "I try, but ——"

At that moment someone called her name and she whirled around. "Paul!"

The man who came toward her, smiling, was slight and not very tall. He was fair for a Frenchman, with light brown hair and lively blue eyes, and in spite of a nose that was pronouncedly aquiline, he had a certain handsomeness. He took his wife's hands in his and bent to kiss her, and they talked rapidly together for a moment, in smooth Parisian French. Then Medora turned her head. "Come and meet my husband," she said, and Tom went over to them.

Durand shook his hand cordially. The hand he extended was bare, but on the other one there was a chamois glove. Just such a glove had been on the hand that tossed out the gold piece.

"We must invite Tom to visit us at Bellefontaine," Medora said, and she put her hand in the crook of her husband's arm with a simple, confident gesture. She looked happy again—the wife who has been warmly welcomed home.

"We won't be going there for a while; I'm afraid I'm not up to it yet." Durand motioned for a porter. "The household here is waiting to receive you, chérie. Gabrielle has everything shining, and flowers, flowers everywhere. You are going to feel like a little bride again," he said, and the bright intensity of his eyes, the impression he gave of finding life an amusing game and inviting everyone to play too, made him appear boyish, although, Tom judged, he must be somewhere in his early thirties.

"My husband spoils me," Medora said. "Un moment," she called to the porter, who was picking up the hand luggage, the expensive alligator bags. "Leave the jewel case. I will carry it."

Yes, of course there would be a jewel case. Just as there would be yearly trips to Paris, Tom thought, and gowns from Worth and Lelong, and drives through the Bois with a lace parasol, and the races at Longchamps. It was a world he had only read about, but he knew that she belonged in it. She might talk about Colesville, and she might even have seemed to him, for a brief moment at the rail, like a girl from there. But it had been an illusion. She would be as out of place in Colesville now as she had been as a child, even though, in fairness, that had not been her fault.

Amos Hitchcock sat at his desk in his black alpaca sack coat, his stiff winged collar, his whiskers and his gold-rimmed glasses. "Everything all right about the Hampton cargo?"

"Yes, sir," Tom said, sitting down as Mr. Hitchcock motioned to the chair beside the desk. "Everything was in order."

"Ah," Mr. Hitchcock said. "Mrs. Hitchcock told me to remind you that you are having supper with us next Monday night."

"Yes, sir, thank you. I am looking forward to it."

"Nell wants to go to the opera. Her mother thought you might wish to take them." Mr. Hitchcock removed his glasses and began wiping them with a clean handkerchief.

"I'd like to very much indeed, sir." Here it was again: Little Nell. It had to be admitted, though, that the Hitchcocks had a problem since he was the only eligible young man on the island; to them it was unthinkable, of course, that Nell should have anything to do with a Frenchman. This brought back into his mind the meeting on the ship. "We do business with Bellefontaine, the Durand plantation, don't we?" he asked. It wasn't a thing he would know, because his was the shipping end of the operation.

"Not very much. Their manager trades for the most part with Lassarres Brothers." Mr. Hitchcock replaced the handkerchief, meticulously folded. "Why do you ask?"

"I was introduced to Paul Durand this morning on the Hampton. He was meeting his wife, and I discovered that I knew her. She is from Colesville."

"Is that so?" Mr. Hitchcock looked interested. "I knew he had married an American girl. The family's affairs were in a bad way. They lost their sugar mill and the entire cane crop in the hurricane of 1891. Had to mortgage the next planting, which is a thing these fellows don't do easily—hurts their pride. Then with the beet sugar in Europe, and the United States taking over Porto Rico and giving the planters there a favored tariff, they were up against it, the way a good many of them still are. They might even have lost Bellefontaine. It was American money that put that place on its feet again."

"But Durand's wife didn't have any money. Her father went bankrupt."

"She inherited money, I understand. From an aunt."

In Western Pennsylvania every town seemed to have its one family who were The Family. In Colesville that family had always been the Hardins. The Carrutherses had traditionally been schoolmasters, and Tom had not been very old before he knew that schoolmasters had never ranked with bankers. Nor had he been much older before he realized that there was something wrong in his family's presen

CONTINUED ON PAGE 179

50 YEARS TOO LATE!

Grandmother would have had lots more time for croquet in her day if Archway cookies had been in the picture.

Oven fresh, with all the old fashioned goodness of grandmother's own secret recipes, Archway home style cookies are rushed to your favorite grocer's to bring you "ready-to-serve" convenience . . . and so much more old fashioned pleasure.

"Old Fashioned Goodness"

Stop milk bottle washing forever!

Ask for all your milk in disposable Pure-Pak cartons

Now that dairies most everywhere are making home deliveries in Pure-Pak, you, too, can enjoy the wonderful convenience of this disposable container all the time. Spacesaving Pure-Pak cartons are lightweight, shatterproof, far safer for children to use. The protective carton seals in milk's natural goodness, seals out vitamin- and flavor-destroying sunlight. Best of all, you know this sanitary carton is used only once, only for dairy products, only by your family! Ask your milkman for this modern milk service today!

Deliveries in Pure-Pak mean extra benefits for your milkman, too. He saves as much as a ton of lifting per day . . . no loads to shift, no empties to handle.

You'll have more room in your refrigerator when you get all your milk in Pure-Pak cartons.

Bob Considine, famous author, radio and TV star, narrates the wonderful "NEW STORY OF MILK" in a 27-minute, full color, 16-mm sound motion picture. Call your local dairy, or write us to arrange a showing for your school, club or church group.

20 million times a day, someone breaks the seal on a fresh Pure-Pak carton

Pure-Pak Division, Ex-Cell-O Corporation, Detroit 32, Mich.

FARM-FRESH TASTE

from the heart of America's farm lands...

by Stokely-Van Camp!

Stokely's Finest Tomato Catsup

- Richer-looking than ordinary catsup—made with redder, riper tomatoes.
- Spicier-tasting—due to secret sugar-and-spice recipe.

Stokely's Finest Tomato Juice

- Redder than other tomato juice—sure sign it's loaded with vitamins.
- Thicker—made with solid, healthier tomatoes, seasoned only with salt!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 176

tionship with the Hardins, that the very ntion of the name seemed to cause a strain ween his father and mother.

There had been argument at the time that father, after a succession of failures in ious small engineering jobs, had gone to rk in the office at the Medora mine. But a opy family they had been, right up to the t. His father had done well at the mine, and d finally been made superintendent. Then Medora mine blew up.

And now Medora Hardin was living in artinique. If she remembered the occasion which she had last seen him—the only ne, actually, that they had spoken to- her—it could have no real significance for r. Not any more than it had had for him at e time.

It was the night after his father's funeral, n days after the explosion, and he and his other were alone in the house. Relatives and ighbors had wanted to stay with them, but s mother had said no, she wanted to be one. "Just with Tom."

It had started to snow, and the hard flakes attered against the windows. The snow ould be piling up in the lonely churchyard, d Tom remembered how his father had ted snow and cold, and all the time his omach was knotted with the stunned be- lderment, the sick shame. His mother kept aring straight before her, at the shining ack of the stovepipe.

"Tom," she announced, "I'm going out on errand. You can come with me. Mind you t on your gum boots."

e didn't tell him where ey were going, and he dn't ask her.

A maid in apron and cap swered the door and ex- aimed, "Why, Mrs. Car- thers, ma'am!"

"Good evening, Mary," s mother said, brushing the snow on her jacket. Please tell Mr. Hardin that I've come to see m."

In a moment the maid was back. "Will you me this way, please, Mrs. Carruthers?"

"You wait here, Tom," his mother ordered.

The maid looked at him kindly. "You can into the parlor," she said. "Best give me ur coat."

The parlor was brightly lit, the gaslights ining down on a Turkey-red carpet. Then he w Medora, in the winged chair. She was olding a book of fairy tales, and she wore a lue velvet dress with a wide lace collar. Her ir hair was cut in bangs across her forehead nd fell down over her shoulders, curling up t the ends.

"I know who you are," she said. "You're om Carruthers. Mary told me your name. Don't you want to sit down?"

"I don't mind," he said, and sat down on e edge of the silky sofa.

She closed the book, one finger keeping her lace, and put her other hand up to a garnet ecklace. "Il fait froid, n'est-ce pas?" she sked.

He stared at her, startled. "Huh?"

"Oh, don't you speak French? I forget ometimes that people here don't," she said.

He could hear, from behind the closed door cross the hall, the sound of his mother's oice. Once he caught the word "justice," lear and emphatic. He wished that she hadn't eft him here with this girl who was showing off.

"There's a stereoscope on the table if you'd ike to look through it," Medora said. "There re some pictures that we brought back from he Riviera last summer. Do you like the Riviera?"

He didn't know what she was talking about, but he wasn't going to tell her so. She went right on chattering. She told him that she had been in London and that she had seen Queen Victoria riding in her carriage, and that she could play The Dance of the Fairies polka. He thought he had never heard so much bosh, and he wondered what it was that his mother was telling Mr. Hardin.

"Do you know any riddles?" Medora asked. "I know one: 'I never was a fish and yet some scales have I. I boast of many strings but cannot make them tie. I own a set of keys but I never tried a lock. And I have some sturdy legs but don't know how to walk. Who am I?'"

Just then his mother came into the parlor, the long black veil swaying from her bonnet. Her face appeared pinched, as though she was cold, and her shoulders drooped. She looked paler and tireder, even, than she had at the funeral that afternoon. "We're going now, Tom," she said, and then she glanced past him. "Oh—you're Medora, aren't you?"

"Yes, ma'am." Medora made a bobbing curtsy. "How do you do."

"Well," his mother said gently—gently and, it seemed, sadly—"you look like a dear little girl."

Medora Hardin's face flushed a deep pink. She stood tongue-tied, twisting at a fold of her velvet dress. Somewhere a clock struck slowly, solemnly.

Katie Carruthers turned away, buttoning her glove, and Tom saw then that her hands were shaking. "Come, Tom," she said.

It was snowing harder by the time they reached home. "Come and help me lock up," his mother said, when they had taken off their wet things. They went around together, locking all the windows on the first floor, just as his father had always done, and with the taking over of that ritual he knew at last that his father was really gone forever. He stumbled into a kitchen chair (his father had always been going to fix that wobbly leg) and buried his face in his arms, on the table. He cried then as he had not been able to cry at the funeral.

His mother bent over him, smoothing his hair. "I know, I know," she whispered. Then her voice became stronger. "But listen to me, dear. We must never, never be ashamed of what he—of how he died. He was very tenderhearted, and the terrible things he witnessed were too much for him. His mind was affected, and so he didn't know what he was doing. You must believe that, dear."

But of course she knew that wasn't the whole truth—she had found the note and she had taken it up the hill with her. He had been too young then to be told the truth.

The cathedral bell rang out. Tom looked at his watch, and walked over to the window to get his hat. Glancing down, he saw a carriage and a white parasol. Nell Hitchcock had arrived to fetch her father for their noonday dinner.

He heard her slippers on the stairs as he started to leave his office. Then he hesitated, because as she reached the landing, André Khan came out of the storage section. He had a distinct impression that André had been waiting there, and he was reluctant to interrupt.

"Good morning, Miss Hitchcock." André bowed. "I was just thinking about you this minute. I was wondering if you would care to read something that I happen to have in my desk. It's a work on astronomy."

"Astronomy?" Nell sounded dubious.

"That's the study of the stars."

"I know, but isn't the book very scientific?"

"Only in parts, and you can skip those." André's voice had become eager, insistent, as though it meant something to him to have her accept that particular book. "Wouldn't you like to learn the names of the stars?"

"Well . . . yes, I would."

"Then I'll get it for you," André said hastily. Tom started on down the stairs. He felt an unreasoning anger against the girl waiting on the landing. No doubt she regarded mere civility to André Khan as great condescension on her part.

"Good morning, Tom," she said, and she began twirling her parasol. "So warm today, isn't it? One becomes quite fatigued by it."

She had a small, pretty face and it was not stupid, but only, as yet, meaningless. It might become anything—it might even, God forbid, become in time like her mother's, grim with self-righteous piety.

Tom said impulsively, "Nell, you mustn't be too friendly with André."

Her brown eyes, which had that misty look of the slightly nearsighted, regarded him with surprise. "Why, I thought you were most friendly with Mr. Khan. I flatter myself," she said, "that I am as broad-minded." Now she was the gracious lady. "I truly believe that we are all the children of God."

"I hadn't quite thought of it that way." She had missed the point entirely, and he couldn't explain it to her. Not here, not now.

"Good morning, madame," Gabrielle said. "I hope that madame has slept well," and she placed the small silver tray with the morning coffee on the table beside the bed.

"Yes, thank you." Medora picked up the thin cup, watching as Gabrielle moved to fold back the inside shutters, and the light surged in. How strangely beautiful she is, she thought, with her gold-colored skin. I don't know why we are so superior about being white. The unconscious elegance of the native costume was so completely right for the girl, with its barbaric and yet formalized splendor. Sometimes, when she herself was dressed for callers and Gabrielle came into the parlor to take a final look at its perfection, she had a sense of fading into insignificance.

E E E E E

Enjoy your life without comparing it with that of others.

MARQUIS DE CONDORCET

E E E E E

REPUBLIC'S

Polly Flex ®

POLYETHYLENE HOUSEWARES
(flexible)

Smartly designed for easier living.....by the Greatest Name in Plastics!

Beautiful—Matching Colors
Guaranteed Unbreakable

VIRGIN ALL POLYETHYLENE

1	Rectangular Wastebasket	2.49
2	Utility Pails	2.98
3	Drainboard Tray	1.69—1.98
	Wastebaskets	1.98
5	Dish Pans	1.79—2.49
	Sink Mat	.69—1.00
7	Cutlery Tray	1.49
	Utility Basin	1.98
9	Mixing Bowl Set	1.98
10	Bread Container	2.49
11	Crisper	2.49
12	Baby Bath	3.98
13	72 oz. Pitcher	1.49
14	Cookie Jar	1.49
15	50 oz. Decanter	.79
16	Diaper Pail	6.98
17	Rectangular Pail	3.49
18	Large Wastebasket	3.98
19	Refrigerator Top Tray	2.49
20	Oval Clothes Basket	3.98
21	Round Clothes Basket	2.98

Large Indestructible GARBAGE PAIL
11 gal. capacity
- Flexible
- Dentproof
- Rustproof
- Non-corrosive

$7.98

UTILITY BASKET
Suitable for all general purposes around home, yard, farm, picnics, etc. Also flexible. Large bushel basket size.

$3.98

Be Sure...buy "Republic"

Available in all Leading Department, Hardware, Housewares and Variety Stores

©1957
REPUBLIC MOLDING CORPORATION • 6465 N. Avondale Ave.; Chicago 31, Ill.

AN ORIGINAL PAINTING FOR FRISKIES BY DOUGLASS CROCKWELL

Puppies "dig in" when dinner is Friskies

—the balanced diet meat-loving dogs love!

IT'S A JOY to watch how Friskies clean, meaty taste satisfies eager appetites . . . to know that your dog is getting the well-balanced diet he must have for growth and vigor.

REAL MEAT NOURISHMENT. Friskies Meal contains in convenient form all the food values found in finest steaks, chops, roasts. Friskies is rich in meat meal, bone meal, liver protein — plus essential vitamins, minerals and other wholesome nutrients to develop firm flesh and sound bones.

BALANCED DIET. Friskies Meal is a complete dog food—made to the high standards of the Carnation Company.

EASIEST OF ALL TO MIX... and quickest, too. Mixes instantly. Just add water. Ready at once, no waiting. Won't mush. No mess. Feeding bowl rinses clean.

For Variety—Canned Friskies

Principal ingredient lean red horse meat. Fully nourishing. Provides up to twice the nourishment of low quality dog foods.

Carnation quality products

ALBERS MILLING CO., DIV. OF CARNATION COMPANY, LOS ANGELES 36, CALIFORNIA

"Will there be anything else, madame?" Gabrielle stood in that polite, impenetrable stillness of hers.

"No, thank you, Gabrielle. It's very warm for this time of year, isn't it?" Medora said.

"Yes, madame." There was no expression on Gabrielle's face; she waited, remote, enigmatic, a carving in smoothly polished wood. "But soon it will be very hot, of course. The heat is hard on those who have not been born to it. M. Durand's mother, who was from France and not of Martinique, could not bear up under it. She had to go away."

"I know, but Mme. Durand was frail. Fortunately I am quite strong. You may take the tray now."

"Yes, madame." Gabrielle left the room, closing the door behind her without a whisper of sound. Although, unlike the other servants, she wore shoes, her heels never clattered on the tiles.

Now why must I see some subtle, hidden meaning in whatever she says? Medora asked herself impatiently. Why must I feel that, for some reason I don't understand, she is my enemy? She is never anything but polite and willing, and, as Paul says, she is an excellent servant.

They had finished their breakfast an hour or more ago, and now they sat together on the veranda in the long-seated rocking chairs. Medora leaned back, one arm up behind her head, rocking gently.

Paul and his great-uncle were discussing the banana blight now, and she watched their animated faces. There wasn't much family resemblance between them. She wondered if Uncle Robert's hair had once been as brown as Paul's, and if he had moved then with Paul's quick fluidity, had his restless zests. But his interests would never have been the same as Paul's. His talk was always of weather and crops, and cattle and horses. They were things that she liked to discuss too: the clouds that predicted rain, the training of a horse.

Often in the two years of their marriage she had thought that she must bore Paul by her inability to share his wide range of culture. Not that he ever gave any sign that she did. He was always charming to her. They never quarreled at all. Sometimes marriage seemed like a house party, with Paul the attentive host.

Paulette appeared with a glass on a tray. "The morning concoction," Paul said. "Medora thinks her figure is too thin to be fashionable, so she drinks milk between meals."

"The milk hasn't made any difference yet," she said, taking the glass.

"You need more exercise, to build up your appetite," Uncle Robert told her. "If you were at Bellefontaine you could ride every day and swim in the surf."

"Medora isn't one of these modern Amazons," Paul said, "like so many American and English girls, I'm glad to say. I am perhaps old-fashioned, but I happen to admire womanly reserve and dignity."

A kind of nausea began to seize Medora. The milk began to rise in her throat. She felt the sweat breaking out on her forehead as she gripped the arms of the rocker.

"Medora!" Paul exclaimed. "Aren't you well?"

She shook her head helplessly, not daring to try to open her mouth to answer him. The light seemed to shimmer in waves around her. She jumped up from the chair and ran toward the door; but no, she would never make it, and she turned wildly and dashed down the steps, reaching the driveway just in time.

Then she was clinging to a flower urn, horribly, convulsively sick, her head whirling, her knees threatening to give way under her. Paul had run after her, his hands were gripping her shoulders, and she could hear Uncle Robert loudly shouting for a servant. And then it was all over, Paul was holding her firmly, Paulette was there, sponging her forehead with water from the fountain, sponging the front of her dress.

"Put your arms around my neck," Paul directed. "I'm going to carry you."

"Mais non," she protested weakly. "You aren't strong enough."

"You're very light."

He picked her up and carried her into the house and on up the stairs and laid her gently on her bed. She kept her eyes closed, dark spots revolving against her eyelids. The milk had tasted queer, she told him.

"It's more likely that you've been eating too much heavily spiced food since you returned, and it has caught up with you," Paul said, rubbing her hands between his.

"Still, I think the doctor should be sent for," Uncle Robert's voice declared, on the periphery of her sinking, rising, sinking.

"And so do I. Can you sit up a minute, chérie?" Paul's arm began to lift her head. "Can you take something to settle your stomach?"

She opened her eyes, and he was holding a spoon to her lips, smiling at her encouragingly. Gabrielle was standing there with a bottle. There was a frightened look in her eyes.

Paul lowered her head to the pillow. "I'll send Philomèn for the doctor myself," he said. "Otherwise he'll take forever to saddle up."

"I'll stay here with Medora," Uncle Robert said. "The rest of you clear out." He was standing by a window, jingling coins in his pocket. The inside shutters had been closed again, to keep the blinding light out of the room. In the dim filtering of sun the deep furrows in his face were lost, and he looked younger, sterner, more forceful. Now he approached the bed. "Tell me—are you quite happy here in Martinique, little one?"

"Yes, certainly," she told him, because, surely, if ever she knew a moment of unhappiness it was her own fault. She had every reason in the world for happiness. "I've fallen in love with this island," she said. It was true, and she gathered it to her now drowsily: the soft air, the scent of flowers, the bells that had begun their ringing.

"And Paul—he is a good husband to you?"

"So good. Better than I deserve."

He lifted his snowy eyebrows. "Now why do you say such a thing as that?"

"Paul's so fine, so sensitive"—she groped for the words—"he—he's not like other men."

"Tiens!" He put his rough, but cool, hand on her forehead. Paul was coming up the stairs, and he lowered his voice. "Now I want you to remember this: I am your great-uncle, as well as Paul's. If ever there is anything you wish to discuss with me, as you might want to do with a father, you have only to send me a note, and I will come."

"You are so very kind."

"Nonsense. I'm a wicked, fierce old man, and everyone is afraid of me!" He scowled at her.

She was laughing when Paul came into the room, and they both looked at her approvingly. Then they went out to the upper veranda, within call, to wait until the doctor arrived.

Doctor Blanchard gave her some powders and she slept most of the day.

In the morning she felt a little weak, but not really sick at all. "Madame appears much better this morning," Gabrielle said politely, bringing in her morning coffee.

"Yes, I am much better." It was a lovely morning, and everything seemed simple and right.

Gabrielle began the ritual of opening the shutters. In the floodlight a dark bruise became visible on her cheek, under the left eye.

"What did you do to your face?" Medora exclaimed.

"I stumbled and fell in the courtyard this morning. There was a loose stone. But it is nothing." She picked up the vase of pink anthurium. "These flowers need freshening," she said.

"Thank you, Gabrielle." There was a fleeting expression of sullen despair in the eyes above the waxy flowers, and something trembled between them, an intimacy, a knowledge that she couldn't understand. She wanted to say, "We can be friends," but Gabrielle had lowered her eyelids and gone quickly from the room.

"Bon jour, M. Carruthers," Paul Durand said, rising from a chair beside the center table and holding out his hand. The room was more luxuriously furnished than were most Martinique parlors: Aubusson rugs laid on the tiles, chairs and sofas of the Empire period with yellow damask coverings. Between two windows hung a full-length portrait of Medora.

"I see you looking at the painting of my wife," Durand said. "It was done by Chartran, just after we were married. His flesh colors, you know, are remarkably fine."

"C'est charmant," Tom said, and it was. What struck him most was the spirit of the portrait—a vitality about it, as though she couldn't rest decorously there in the frame, but was about to step forth from it in all her young eagerness. "She looks so alive," he said. ("That's my last duchess painted on the wall, Looking as if she were alive.") The coincidence of his own words had brought Browning's poem to his mind. But Durand was no murderous medieval duke; he seemed genuinely proud of his wife, gratified to have her portrait admired.

"Ah, here comes our petit penche. I hope you've become accustomed to the midday potion of the planter."

"Indeed I have," Tom said. A girl came through the archway carrying a tray, moving with that inexpressibly beautiful walk of the Martiniquaise, in which there was no bending at the knees. She wore the costume du pays, the madras dress in electric hues, a canary-yellow silk scarf knotted at her throat.

"Over here, Gabrielle," Durand directed. "Place it on this table. And then will you adjust those persiennes on the south? There's too much light coming in here."

"Oui, monsieur." She set the tray on the marble-topped table. She had a classically straight nose, full but not heavy lips, and the distinctly modeled cheekbones and large, dark eyes that meant Carib Indian blood.

Durand picked up the decanter and began pouring a little cane-sugar syrup into each of the two short glasses. "Don't you find the local costume enchanting?" he asked. "It seems a pity to me that some of the people are changing to European clothes, and wearing hats. Hats don't suit them."

Tom said nothing at all. This discussion, with the girl still in the room, embarrassed him, although he agreed with Durand. The Martinique turban, with its two high points and the filigreed golden pins that quivered and caught the light, had a touch of Oriental splendor.

"The earrings and those masses of beads which they wear are sometimes of solid gold," Durand continued, "and the whole worth several thousand francs, as you perhaps know. To have gold means a great deal. They often buy their necklaces a bead at a time." The girl was returning to the center of the room, and he addressed her without moving his head. "Are your beads real gold, Gabrielle?"

"No, monsieur. I could not afford the gold," she answered him, her eyes concealed by the lowered black lashes. "Have I brought enough of the lime, monsieur?"

"Yes, this will be plenty. Gabrielle is a sang-mêlée—only one thirty-second African," Durand said, as she left the room. "There's East Indian blood in her, as well as the obvious Carib and preponderant white. It seems to produce a particularly refined type, although there always remains a touch of the savage."

Tom felt self-conscious and clumsy. Under all Durand's politeness there seemed to run a little undertone of habitual mockery that had begun to antagonize him. It was a relief to hear quick footsteps descending the stairs and crossing the tiles of the hall. He rose from the stiff gilded chair.

"Do forgive me for being late." Medora hurried toward him, her voice slightly breathless, her hand extended, with a bright welcoming smile. In her shepherdesslike white dress, she created the effect of a picture. But it was not quite like the one on the wall.

"As you see, we haven't exactly waited for you," Tom said as he took her hand, and then he noticed with surprise that it wasn't at all as the artist had painted it. It was small and rather square, and it made him think of his mother's hands, darning by lamplight, transplanting seedlings. It was an unexpected hand for a Hardin to have, and he wondered whose idea it had been, to falsify those hands in the portrait.

"It's odd," Durand remarked, "that you two should meet here in Martinique, when you were friends in that town with the name I can never remember."

"Colesville," Medora said, the bright smile back again. "But we weren't really friends. There was a great gulf between our ages then; and besides, Mr. Carruthers saw no reason for girls."

"And have you discovered the reason now, monsieur?" Durand asked, lifting an eyebrow drolly.

"The reason for them, but not always the reason in them," Tom said.

"Ah, but does one ever know a woman? Or, for that matter, does she always know herself?" He drained his glass and set it down. A servant appeared in the archway and announced lunch.

The conversation went on, urbane, superficial, all through the soup, the fish fritters, the lobsters, the roast chicken and heart-of-palm salad and the coconut ice. The waitress moved about with the wine bottles. The crowns of the palms in the distant ravine curvetted daintily. It was all delightful and charming, but not for a moment could Tom feel a part of it. There was something not quite right. The sun was slanting lower, bringing a sharper light into the room. He realized that what bothered him was the face of Medora Durand; she didn't look like the portrait in the parlor. That eager, confident look was no longer there.

"Have you noticed that water color to the right of the buffet?" Durand asked. "It's a Fortuny. I picked it up at an exhibition in Rome. Look how the light falls on it now, Medora. Didn't I tell you that would be exactly the right place for it?"

In the fraction of a second Tom saw Durand swiftly exchanging his champagne glass for his wife's.

"The sunlight seems to change the colors." Medora was still studying the water color. "I've always loved seascapes."

Durand watched, faintly smiling.

The servant approached the table again with the champagne, the bottle wrapped in its white napkin. She poised it above Medora's empty glass.

"I think you'd better not have any more, my dear," Durand said with a little admonitory smile, a shake of his head.

She looked at her glass, astonished, and then a slow, red flush crept up her neck, rose to her temples and the tendrils of hair. "But I—I'd scarcely touched it."

"One gets to talking and doesn't notice how it goes." Her husband was still smiling, gently, kindly, indulgently. "But one really has to be careful in this climate. Alcohol has an increased effect here. Haven't you observed that, M. Carruthers?"

HANDLE WITH CARE

By L. V. FRANCIS

For wee baby Cheryl,
All things must be sterile—
From clothes lined with tubbable plastics,
And nipples and didies,
And ribbon-trimmed nighties
To toys for her carriage gymnastics.

Wee Cheryl is thriving
And we are surviving.
We thrill to each musical coo,
As she lies at our feet
On a sterilized sheet.
Cutting teeth on the heel of my shoe!

Only CLOROX-clean laundry is safe enough for my baby!

You get a CLEANER WASH with CLOROX®... whiter...brighter... sanitary, too!

THERE'S no substitute for Clorox cleanliness in your wash for Baby ...and for your whole family. No other home laundering product equals Clorox in germ-killing efficiency. And, while Clorox disinfects, it removes dinginess, stains and odors, too. So always Clorox your white and color-fast cotton and linen and white 100% nylon, rayon, Dacron, Orlon and Dynel. It means extra health protection... and you'll take extra pride in that fresh, clean, Clorox-laundered look!

Every time you use CLOROX you protect family health!

And remember: A Clorox-clean house is as important as a Clorox-clean wash. See label for many ways Clorox can save you work and safeguard family health!

"When the weather's very hot—yes," Tom said carefully. If Durand's purpose had been to embarrass his wife, he had succeeded. Her face was still flushed, and she wasn't touching the fruit on her plate. It was probable that there had been a quarrel and this was Durand's way, small and spiteful, of punishing her.

And yet he had a conviction that this little scene represented something far more subtle. It gave him a strong feeling of uneasiness, and suddenly he was reminded of a walk he had taken through the Jardin des Plantes with Sylvestre, and how the boy had stopped abruptly, drawing in his breath, nostrils flaring, minutes before the long, red-brown shape of the fer-de-lance went gliding across the path ahead of them from its hiding place in the rotting undergrowth.

He didn't know French law, but could it be that if a woman left her husband without good reason, or was judged incapable of handling her own affairs, the husband then had control of her money?

Medora had recovered her poise, but when once, briefly, she lifted her eyes, there was an expression in them that seemed . . . "haunted" was the word that came to mind.

The servant who had admitted Tom appeared. The plantation manager had come to see M. Durand, she said. "You will have to excuse me, then," Durand said, and rose. "Medora, you must show M. Carruthers the gardens."

She walked ahead of him, holding up her skirt, speaking dutifully, like a child bidden to entertain a visitor. Medora, it was obvious, had nothing to do with the garden. Her husband would supervise it, and the gardener, kneeling now in the bed to the far left, would care for it. She would never dig in the warm earth, worry over a touch of blight, help to tie a graft. Nor, Tom thought, would she ever go into the kitchen to make some specialty of her own, to taste and season. It was not that she wouldn't care to do these things, but in this house everything would be taken care of. Everything was perfect, and all that would be expected of her would be merely to be perfect too.

He couldn't resist asking her, "What do you do with yourself all day?"

She turned in the path, regarding him in some surprise.

"Why," she said, "there are often guests here for luncheon. And sometimes I go to Fonds-Coré to swim with Paul's Cousin Hortense, the one who attended the convent in France with me. She's married and living in the suburb now. There are the band concerts, and there's Mass on Sunday. . . . And I have my piano. I don't play well, but I practice nearly every day."

"I've got it now!" he said, and snapped his fingers. "It's a piano, that's what it is. I can't tell you the sleepless nights I've spent puzzling over it all these years."

She straightened up, staring at him, as if he had gone mad in the heat of the sun.

"The riddle," he explained. "It has scales and yet it isn't a fish. It has strings it can't tie. It owns a set of keys ——"

"Oh. Oh!" She had remembered, and she began to laugh, with that intriguing mannerism of hers, crinkling up her nose and shaking her head. The way she had laughed on the Hampton.

"You were such a little prig," he said. He couldn't help finding her amusing now.

"Oh, no!" She was still laughing helplessly. "I wasn't! I was a lovely, intelligent child. Everyone said so. You were the prig. Nasty, superior boy!" She gathered up her skirts with a quick, impulsive gesture, and now she looked almost exactly like the girl in the painting.

To the west, over the sea, the sky was darkening, but to the north it was still light, except for the circle of white cloud that almost always hung about the peak of the volcano.

"The mountain seems very close today," Medora said, following the direction of his gaze. "It's nearer at some times than at others, almost as though it moves." She brushed back a flying wisp of hair. "I'm getting to know it so well, in all its moods. It has such a presence. I'm always aware of it, I can feel it at my back."

"The people of St. Pierre call it their watchdog," Tom said. "They don't seem to be afraid of it, even ——"

"Even though it's showing signs of activity? The servants talk about it all the time, the sulphur, the shocks that have been felt on the northern slopes. They don't seem to be afraid either."

"And are you afraid?" She had moved closer to him, and he was aware of the rose perfume of her hair.

"Not of the mountain," she said. "But I keep wondering how I would behave in the face of a disaster. I've never been called upon for courage." She picked a yellow blossom from the allamanda vine. "I don't know what to expect of myself."

"I don't imagine anyone knows that before a test comes."

"But that's just it. You can think you know yourself, when actually you're only following guideposts set carefully before you. Then you take a new road." She was tearing the petals from the flower, one by one. "In the unfamiliar landscape you can become . . . unfamiliar to yourself."

When they rounded the house the carriage was waiting. Paul Durand had come out to say good-by, to apologize for having been called away. "You must come again," he said cordially. "Medora doesn't have much opportunity to speak English."

"Yes, do come," she said, with her practiced hostess smile. "Now that you've found the way. You see, I can still sound very American."

As the carriage drove off, Tom looked back. The two of them still stood on the steps, and Durand had his arm about his wife's shoulders.

"Did they feed you well at the house of M. Durand?" Coraline asked.

"Well enough, for people who don't have a good cook." Tom gave the expected answer. He hadn't told her that he was going to the Durands', but he had become accustomed to the fact that she knew everything he did, sooner or later.

"At least it appears that you have not been poisoned," she observed.

The remark startled him. He sat up in the hammock. "Why should I have been poisoned?"

She grimaced. "Did you see Gabrielle, who calls herself their housekeeper?"

"Yes, I saw her," Tom said. "She's striking-looking."

Coraline put her free hand on her angular hip. "Why is it that she now wears the madras, when she was raised under the hat?"

Coraline's questions were usually those to which she knew the answer, and it was his part to reply like an end man: "Why does she now wear the madras?"

But this time Coraline shook her head. "Ah, who knows? Who knows anything about that girl? She was taken into the house of old Mme. Durand as a little one. She was always at madame's side, to thread her needles or carry her flower basket. The nuns taught her to read and write. She wore white dresses, and when she went to Mass she wore a hat. Yet now that madame has gone to live in France she dresses like a girl of the people."

"Perhaps she prefers not to try to live in a white people's world," Tom suggested.

"In whose world does she live, then?" Coraline demanded. "She keeps herself apart. But I have heard a strange thing. It appears that a couple of days ago she was observed slipping out of the house of a quimboiseur."

"A charm maker?"

Coraline nodded. "One can buy a powder to put in the drink of someone whose love you wish to win. And there is another to drop into the glass of a rival so that she comes to hate the man you want for yourself." Coraline rubbed her finger thoughtfully along her nose. "But who is her lover? No one knows. Not one of our men of St. Pierre, I think. She didn't even appear here to dance at the carnival."

"I was dressed as a devil at the carnival," Sylvestre said dreamily. "I had horns and a tail."

"And so you have now," Coraline retorted, and went on into the kitchen.

H H H H H

A man who can be a hero to his wife's relations may face the rest of the world fearlessly.

MEREDITH NICHOLSON

H H H H H

He didn't know how he had let this sickness get hold of him. How he, André Khan, could have lost all that he had worked so hard to attain: his singleness of purpose, the cool detachment with which he had accepted his position here—or, rather, his lack of one.

He could wait, as he was doing now, at the top of the street, just to see Nell Hitchcock as she returned from the opera and went into the house, while at the same time another part of him looked on his behavior with contempt. Yet the feverish dreaming went on. In Paris, as a distinguished scientist, he could have standing, and a mixed marriage would be socially acceptable.

Two weeks ago he had happened to walk up this street, just because he often walked at night, and he had seen her step out onto the

Mrs. W. H. of Wisconsin writes us: "She was just a handful of bones when a friend recommended Puss 'n Boots. You should have seen her dive into it! Now she is a big, beautiful cat always ready to play."

Family of rare Burmese cats. For a full color 8" x 10" print of this photo by Chandoha, send 25¢ to Cat Pictures, Dept. J-37, Box 6856, Chicago 77, Ill.

"Big...Beautiful...always ready to play!"

...thanks to Good Nutrition

As Mrs. W. H. says in her letter above... her cat literally dove into Puss 'n Boots. And so will yours. For cats just naturally love Puss 'n Boots. But your reward will come from the knowledge that you're nourishing your cat properly for health and beauty. Here's why...

The Importance of Fish Fillets

Nutritionists agree that fish is unusually rich in life-giving proteins. However, the high quality proteins are concentrated in the tasty fillets...the costly parts usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots Cat Food.

The Difference in Proteins

A protein molecule is made up of tiny "building blocks" called amino acids. There are many different amino acids but at least 8 of them are essential. Unless the protein contains all 8 of these indispensable amino acids in sufficient quantities and in proper balance, the protein is of poor quality.

HIGH QUALITY Proteins from fish fillets show a full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Every essential amino acid is there in sufficient quantity. Other colors represent less important amino acids.

LOW QUALITY Proteins, from the mere fish "frames," lack the full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Part-empty blocks indicate essential amino acids that are wholly or partly missing.

Vitamins, Minerals, too

By processing the whole fish—not just scraps—Puss 'n Boots also supplies the minerals and vitamins of the liver and glands. Selected Cereals furnish all-round nutrition. And there's extra Vitamin B1 added to every can as a "margin of safety."

Puss 'n Boots Cat Food provides every nutrient a cat is known to need. Feed it regularly...watch your cat grow "big, beautiful...always ready to play!"

The Natural Life Balance of WHOLE FISH Is Retained in Puss 'n Boots

COSTLY FILLETS, rich in high-quality proteins. Usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

LIVER AND GLANDS, for minerals and vitamins. Vital for health. Often extracted for medicinal use, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

BONE STRUCTURE, for valuable calcium and phosphorus. Made soft, crumbly and easily digestible, and retained in Puss 'n Boots.

PUSS'n BOOTS is good nutrition

Coast Fisheries, Div. of The Quaker Oats Co., Chicago, Ill.

America's largest selling cat food...adds the plus in health, beauty, and vigor.

ony. Her hair was down about her shoul-and silvered by the moonlight, and some , loose thing she wore was whipped inst her body by the wind, so that he could the outline of her young breasts. She was the figurehead of a ship, a ship not yet ched. He had stood there trembling.

le was afraid of this emotion. He was rly all Indian in his spiritual make-up, and ians did not handle emotion well. They e weakened by it, broken by it, sometimes ddened by it.

nd yet, every other night or so he walked way and stood in the shadows, where he ld see the balcony. She might come out in to look at the stars, and then there uld be that special tie between them, bese now she would be seeing the stars with eyes: his friends, Jupiter and Venus and Southern Cross. He had given her his ok.

She wouldn't know what this gift had been.
wouldn't guess that it was different from other book, that it was The Book, that it d changed the whole course of his life.

At Sainte Anne, the De la Grandville plan-ion, two hundred Indian coolies had lived, a long double row of thatched huts below sugar mill. He had been born there, Aziz Khan. His father, a Mussulman, had n the family coachman. His mother he rcely remembered. She was Chinese, daughof the Chinese cook. She had run away one y, to St. Pierre, they said, with a mulatto dener.

He had been enormously proud of his far and the splendid way in which he drove.
s father liked to make the horses go like wind, his eyes flashing, the whip curling.
en one wet day when his father had been rening alone from Basse-Pointe the horses d been frightened by something, perhaps a -de-lance crossing the road. The carriage
d gone over, tumbling into a deep ravine.

He had been eight when it happened, and he d run and hidden in the woods, like a small imal, wild with his grief. The old headman, Hindu, had found him and taken him by the nd to the house of the French overseer.
ne overseer's wife wanted a boy to keep the es scrubbed and to fetch and carry for her.
ne was a kind woman, and she taught him to eak French and even to read and write it.
ne only reading matter at the overseer's ouse had been French magazines, and in me he had been able to struggle earnestly rough descriptions of the gowns worn at ongchamp.

The Book came to him by accident. There as an overflow of guests at the big house, and ne of them had stayed at the overseer's and ft the book there. Madame had told him he uld have it. He couldn't read very much of but it excited him more than anything he d ever known in his life; more, even than iving with his father. The stars in the heavns had names, and he, Aziz, knew them, and o one else in all the huts! He would steal out night to a rise above the mill, finding the ars on the charts and shaken by his wonder-ul knowledge.

He would take his book from the box that ontained his only possessions—the book, and dagger with an embossed silver handle that ad belonged to his father—and sit with it.
He had no way of learning the meaning of all ne words that he didn't know, but he held the olume like a talisman.

He was sitting there the day that the boy ame wandering down from the plantation ouse. "What have you got there?" the boy emanded, a brown-haired boy, older than he.

"My book," he said proudly.

"Let me see it." The boy snatched his book nd ran.

He didn't run after him. In the red mist of is fury, he darted into the room behind him, nd when he came out he had his father's dager in his hand.

He dashed up past the sugar mill and along he hibiscus hedge that marked off the lawn of he plantation house. The boy was strolling cross the green grass, leafing the pages of the ook, and perhaps he would not have heard is pursuer at all if a bird hadn't fluttered up.

Turning, the boy saw the nearly naked figure—and the dagger. For a moment he stood his ground. "You crazy coolie!" he said. "Go back, do you hear?"

Aziz leaped the hedge, the dagger uplifted. All the fierce blood of the Mussulman was surging in him; he meant to kill that boy. Then a hand clamped down on his shoulder and another jerked and twisted his wrist. The dagger dropped and lay gleaming at his feet, as he struggled, panting and clawing, to get free.

"He's crazy, Uncle Robert," the French boy said. "All I did was to take a book from him. I was only teasing him. I would have taken it back to him."

"You were 'only teasing.' There's a streak of cruelty in you, Paul Durand, and don't think I'm not aware of it!" It was the voice of the master; it was M. de la Grandville himself. Aziz ceased struggling. He knew it was hopeless, and he wondered, with fatalistic calm, what would happen to him. Would he be staked out for ants to eat?

"Hand him his book," M. de la Grandville ordered, "and you, boy, you're coming with me."

The master propelled him across the terrace, opened a door, and they were in the long room, like a gallery, that extended across the entire rear of the house. It was dim and cool in there. The master spoke to someone: "Get Aïa." Aïa was the present coachman.

Bare feet departed softly, and at the same time the strong hand on Aziz's shoulder ceased to grip him. The room was very still while they waited.

"What is your book?" the master demanded abruptly.

"It is about the stars."

"And can you read it?"

"Yes," he said. And then all his despair burst out of him. "But only the little words. Only the very little words!"

"A-ah," M. de la Grandville breathed.

Aïa entered and made a low salaam.

"Tell me, Aïa," the old man said, "who is this boy?"

THE HIT OF THE PARTY

Delicious Watkins Beverages

The bright, refreshing drinks you make from Watkins Beverage Concentrates are fun to drink! The small-fry love 'em because they taste so good. You'll prefer them because they're non-carbonated and cost less than 2¢ a glass. Just add water, sugar and chill. Six delicious flavors . . . Orange, Cherry, Lemon, Raspberry, Grape and Lime-Lemon.

Your Watkins Dealer has a bargain offer right now on Watkins Beverage Concentrates, so stock up with a variety of flavors! Buy them when he calls at your home . . . or, if he has been missing you lately, look in your phone book for WATKINS QUALITY PRODUCTS.

6 delicious flavors
LESS THAN 2¢ A GLASS

Watkins
THE SHOPPING SERVICE SINCE 1868 THAT COMES TO YOUR HOME

THE J. R. WATKINS COMPANY . . . WINONA, MINNESOTA • NEWARK • MEMPHIS • OAKLAND • MONTREAL • WINNIPEG • AUSTRALIA • NEW ZEALAND • SOUTH AFRICA

The boy was the son of the dead coachman, Aïa explained, and he was most intelligent. He could read and write French, even, and he had never been any trouble to anyone. Well, not much trouble.

"I see. His father was a fine man. You may go now, Aïa." The master began fanning himself with his hat as the coachman bowed and left. "Never take after anyone like that again," he said sternly. "You are not a savage. Now—tell me. Do you wish to grow up to be a coachman, like your father?"

"No," Aziz said. "I wish to learn things. In books."

The old man regarded him fixedly for a moment. "It might be better if you wished only to be happy," he said at last. "There's no telling what the world outside the plantation might do to you. It's a risk. You see, you are not white, not in the Martinique sense, and so it could go hard with you, because you will be denied pride of birth. You must learn to find pride in yourself, and to belong to yourself. Do you understand me?"

"Oui, monsieur." He didn't understand very well at all. But the words remained with him.

"Good. Go along now." M. de la Grandville walked out to the terrace with him. Then Aziz saw the shine of the dagger on the grass and hesitated. "Pick it up," the old man said. "I'm going to trust you with it."

Two weeks later Aïa took him over the mountain to St. Pierre and left him with an Indian couple. They were to be paid to take care of him, Aïa explained, while he went to school at the lycée; and he had better stop being a heathen, so that he could give thanks to Allah, who would expect it. Robert de la Grandville had never expected thanks. It had been a thing he did because it was in him to do it, and that was the end of it.

All that seemed a long time ago. Even his name was different—he was André Khan because that made him sound less alien at the office. Of his two boyhood mementos he had now given away the book, but he still had the dagger, on the desk in his room, as a paperweight.

Tom dismissed the carriage as soon as he had seen the ladies Hitchcock safely inside their door. It was a fine night, and he preferred to walk back to his house. He stopped on the absurd little sidewalk and rolled and lit a cigarette. Then he saw a figure move up there in the shadows on the other side of the street.

"Good evening, Tom," André Khan said.

"Good evening, André." The news Sylvestre had given him was true, then. André did watch the Hitchcock house. He flipped the match into the running water of the gutter as André approached. "Taking a walk?"

"Yes, I often walk at night. I sleep better for it." André's face was still in shadow. "You've been calling on the Hitchcocks?"

"I took Mrs. Hitchcock and Miss Nell to the opera." André had seen him bring them home, but the pretense that he had just now happened along must be kept up, it seemed.

"Aïda, wasn't it?"André crossed the narrow street. He was bareheaded, carrying his coat over his arm. Even in his badly cut, locally tailored suits he always had grace and bearing. Put him in an Indian costume and in the proper setting, Tom thought, and Nell Hitchcock would be as nothing beside him.

"Yes, it was Aïda," he said. "The voices were poor, I thought. Wouldn't you like a drink before going to bed? We might go to the Café Rouge."

"It ought to be lively at the Café Rouge," André said. "They have a special orchestra tonight, from Fort-de-France."

It was intermission time as they took a table, and the dancers stood talking out on the floor or sat at long tables ranged against the walls, under the balcony. A waitress came up and they ordered a carafe of wine.

"It was better before there were the electric lights," André said. "The kerosene ones made it more picturesque."

"Everything has always been better. My father said that once." Tom poured the wine into their glasses. "He said, 'Never be disappointed in the present, son, because someday it will be the past, and then it will almost certainly be better.'"

"Your father was a philosopher," André grinned, his white teeth flashing. He took up his glass. "I'm sorry you didn't enjoy the opera. And didn't Miss Hitchcock like it either?" he asked elaborately.

"I don't think so." André wanted him to talk about Nell, he wanted to hear what she had said, how she had looked. But he wasn't going to oblige. He would like to say, "André, it's no use. Nothing but trouble lies that way. You've got to get over this."

André was smoking one of his thin cigars, rolling it in his long fingers. "You seem very keyed up tonight, somehow, mon ami."

"It's the kind of night. There's something electric in the atmosphere. Didn't you notice that while you were standing there across from the Hitchcocks'?" It was just as well, after all, to have it out in the open.

André knocked the ash from his cigar. "Don't laugh at me, please," he said with dignity.

"You know I wouldn't laugh at you. But I can't understand it. One can't help feeling sorry for her sometimes, but she's affected and ——"

"I know she seems so to you." André studied the end of the cigar. "She is gauche, and she isn't at ease with you. She's aware that her family hopes you will marry her, and that's a bad position for a girl to be in. But with me—she is different. She isn't like that at all," he said proudly. "She is natural and simple when she talks to me."

(Because you don't count. Because it's as if she talked to a pet dog, or that parakeet that flew around their house until a cat got it. Her not trying to impress you is a form of insult!)

"I'm not entirely a fool, however," André was saying. "I recognize the fact that there is a gulf. Still ——"

The music started up just then.

The Café Rouge was closing, the members of the orchestra putting away their instruments. They followed the tide moving out into the street.

"Pelée is very clear tonight," André observed. "I didn't tell you that I made an excursion up there Sunday with Lucas. We went as far as L'Étang Sec. It's no longer 'the dry lake,' though. It's partly filled with water that boils against its sides, and there are four new fumaroles near it."

"What does Lucas say?" There wasn't a cloud near the mountain now. Medora had said that meant bad weather tomorrow.

"Lucas is the best scientist in the country, but he is not a volcanologist. And even those who call themselves volcanologists wouldn't know what the volcano is going to do. Something happened to me up there on Sunday, Tom. It was like your Saint Paul on the road to Damascus. You will forgive me if I seem blasphemous." André made a deprecating gesture. "I thought, 'This is the science I want to pursue! If only I could learn to read you, you murdering mountain.' I looked down on the cane fields, and the Sunday peace of the town, and I hated it—the volcano. It has no right to have such power over us. We all go about our decent, little lives, and someday that thing up there will choose which of us shall live and which shall die. I tell you, I felt Death breathing up there!"

But Death was always sniffing about, Tom thought, choosing one here, one there. It was only when Death grew careless, striking down thousands in a disaster, somewhere, that its naked horror was revealed; that you saw Death as the one great enemy, always to be feared, always to be fought—that you saw the betrayal of life to Death as the one great betrayal.

"Now you will say I'm being Oriental and mystic," André said with his half-apologetic smile. "But no, you won't. You're always very tolerant."

"We are all the children of God," Tom quoted Nell solemnly. "I try to have respect for even the lowliest."

"You are a noble sahib." André made a mocking salaam. "Good night, O Lord of the Stars and the Moon."

Medora had lit the lamp beside her bed because she couldn't sleep. She had tried to read, but her mind wouldn't concentrate. It was the opera, she told herself, that had left her in this exhilarated state. And she was buoyed up, too, by the thought of returning to the plantation. She hoped that Tom Carruthers could go with them, and it had been nice of Paul to invite him. Tom would like Bellefontaine. He seemed to have a great capacity for enjoying himself, but perhaps that was an American trait. It was strange that though she hadn't lived in America since early childhood she had remained so American, and that because of this when she was with Tom she had a feeling of home-coming.

A sound like distant thunder arrested her. A storm must be coming up—and yet the night had been so clear. She slipped out of bed and went to the window, and there was no sign of storm.

The wind blew against her filmy night robe and she shivered. Then there was a light tap and her door opened. "Did you hear it?" Paul asked.

"Yes. It was the volcano, wasn't it?"

"It must have been. Don't be alarmed. Old Pelée has rumbled before." He walked slowly toward her, yawning. "He's just snoring in his sleep. I doubt that the old fellow has murder in his heart."

"I'm not frightened," Medora said, yet now, all at once she was; she was seized by a profound, unreasoning terror. It was something in that last phrase he had used.

"We would probably be wiser to remain in St. Pierre, where the hills are between us and the mountain." He knotted the cord of his bathrobe. "I have a fancy, though, to go to Bellefontaine just now. I don't think we need change our plans."

"No, I don't think we should." She was trying to keep her teeth from chattering.

"You must get into bed. You'll take a chill." He put his arm about her, drawing her to him. She felt no response to his touch. She let him lead her back to the bed. He drew up her coverlet, bent and kissed her. "Good night; and don't be troubled about the volcano."

She heard him go into his room and close the door, and then she got out of bed once more. She went to the side window again. She couldn't see the distant mass of the volcano. The clump of bamboo at the corner of the house grated and rattled.

She was afraid—she had always been afraid.

Tom was wakened by the ringing of the plantation bell, calling the workers to the cane fields and the sugar mill.

They had arrived at Bellefontaine last night in darkness, a caravan of carriages, one in which he had ridden with the Durands, another containing Hortense Jubilier and her husband, and a third bringing the girl Gabrielle and two other maids from the St. Pierre house. On the last stretch of the road there had been the turbulent Atlantic on the one side, and long stretches of banana plantings on the other. Then they had turned into a palm-bordered drive, with the house, a gray stone pile built on the lines of a French château, huge and forbidding in the drowning moonlight.

But the interior was oddly attractive. Two family parlors, an enormous dining room, a "gallery" that must be sixty feet long; plantation rocking chairs, marble-topped center tables, and smaller tables against the walls, holding bowls of flowers. "Come, let me show you everything," Medora had cried eagerly, running before him through the rooms with their rows of overhead kerosene lamps, pushing back the folding shutters that served as doors and permitted the breeze to flow all through the house.

"I always feel so at home here," Medora said.

He had been right; she wasn't at home in that house in St. Pierre.

The clangor of the bell ended. Tom put on his robe and slippers and descended to the first floor. Behind the house stretched a broad lawn, and beyond that, as the land rose steadily toward the distant mountain, there were the plantation buildings: stable, barn, sugar mill, huts of the workers—like a small village. The mountain was hidden in mist. For two days now steam had issued from it, a white column rising to the sky and dispersing lazily. It had come into view and out again, all the way during the drive here. "That's a good sign," Louis Jubilier had observed wisely, when they stopped for a picnic lunch. "Like a teakettle, you know. Getting rid of the pressure that might otherwise be building up inside."

To the right of the house a formal garden rose in a series of three terraces, with stone retaining walls. From the top of the highest one a path led to the bathing house, tin roofed, partly open at the sides, with a pool large enough to swim in. The clear, cold mountain water ran constantly down into it, and then out, through underground pipes. Tom splashed around vigorously, and then he climbed out and rubbed himself dry. The sun, which rose earlier on this coast, was bursting from the clouds. It ought to be a fine day.

As he descended along the path, Durand appeared on the lowest terrace, waved to him, and waited.

"We're the early risers," Durand greeted him as he came closer. "I'll wait for you here if you would like a little walk before breakfast."

"I'd like nothing better," Tom said. "I won't take long."

The dew was still heavy on the grass as they started their walk. As far as one could see the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

"I don't know whether Rose looks happiest when the grandchildren come over, or when they go home."

Really new taste discovery!

IMPERIAL-REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

imperial

has real natural taste!

The instant you taste it, you know. Imperial has real natural taste. And natural aroma, too. On toast or muffins, melting over hot vegetables—any way you use it, Lever Brothers Company guarantees complete satisfaction (or your purchase price refunded). Imperial costs a little more, but adds so much more to your enjoyment of good food. Serve Imperial—always in good taste.

P.S. To keep it fresh, always keep it refrigerated.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 184

green fields extended, rising and falling with the hilly terrain. In the field that lay nearest the house the cutters swung their flashing machetes and an oxcart waited for the loading of the stalks.

A huge black fellow with a crushed-in nose was standing beside the oxen. He removed his broken palm-fiber hat with a flourish as they approached.

"This is our sorcerer," Durand said. "No well-equipped plantation seems to be complete without one. This fellow's quite remarkable, though. Would you like to see a demonstration?"

Tom said that he would, having no idea what the demonstration might be, and Durand spoke to the man in a rapid patois that he couldn't follow.

"Oui, patron," the black answered, and then he turned and walked away, to where the field ended in a thicket partly filled with large boulders.

In a moment he was visible again, striding toward them. A long, red-brown body thrashed furiously about his loins. It was the deadly fer-de-lance. He held the snake just below its head, and now you could see the darting of its wicked tongue. The cane cutters had drawn a little nearer, their faces fearful but fascinated. No one made a sound. The oxen shook their horns.

The man muttered something—it might have been a spell—and with his left hand he detached the snake's coils from his body. Then, with a violent motion, he threw it to the ground.

Durand didn't move, and Tom, too, stood his ground. The Negro lifted his ox goad and began moving, in a ritualistic dance, around the snake. He made cabalistic motions with his free hand and touched the snake with the prod. It struck furiously at once, but futilely. Before it could coil again, the sorcerer darted in, and with an incredible quickness and dexterity seized it once more just below the ug flat head.

Tom glanced at Durand. He stood tensel his eyes fixed on the snake, a half-smile on h lips, his narrow nostrils drawn in. He was er joying this savage spectacle.

I'm not even at the beginning of estimatir this man, Tom thought, and he realized tha until now he had, half contemptuously, pu Medora's husband down as the overcivilize dilettante. Even incidents in which Duran had seemed to persecute his wife had appeare to him, after consideration, as merely the cal culated spitefulness of an immature, basicall weak character. Now he saw that Durand wa not that, but a man who was cool and con trolled, and that expression on his face wa one of appreciative amusement at the com plete helplessness of the fer-de-lance unde the skilled maneuverings of the black.

Behind them, the cane cutters were calling to the sorcerer to kill the snake, but the mar gave them a disdainful look and marched back to the thicket. He unrolled the coils care lessly from his arm and threw the flailing body in among the rocks, where it vanished in stantly.

"He should have killed it," Tom said. speaking for the first time since the show had begun.

Durand shrugged. "What is one fer-de-lance more or less?"

"At least it can't be said that you don't entertain a guest." He was angry now, because all along there had been the chance that the snake would elude the Negro and strike one of them, and he had been forced into the position of standing close, like a schoolboy accepting a dare.

Durand slapped him lightly on the shoulder. "There was never any danger, I assure you, mon brave. And now if you will excuse me, I must find the overseer, to have a word with him."

As Tom passed the gallery he glanced in, since the shutter doors were folded back. Medora was arranging some roses in a glass vase, resting her hands for a moment on the back of a chair and setting it to rocking. In the long, dim room it was a shadow play. The chair kept on rocking, like an old man nodding to himself. He could see the curve of her mouth, the slender neck, the small, delightful nose, and he began to scent her perfume, a wistful essence of her, stealing out, reaching to him.

Noiselessly, he backed away from the door, ascended the stairs to his room and stood by the window. The long green-and-white leaves of the lianas hung motionless from the ceiba tree that was just beyond the first terrace. Every feature of the landscape stood out with a peculiar sharpness. It was like a world just discovered, each individual flower clamoring for attention, every blade of grass on the smooth lawn asserting its own individuality. Everything looked different, because now he knew that he was in love with Medora Durand.

"Those musicians of yours are magnificent," Hortense Jubilier said at lunch. "Paul, we should have a dance!"

Durand gave her a cousinly smile. "I've already thought of it. Philomèn has been sent off with invitations."

At eight o'clock the cane workers came. Already some of the neighboring planters had arrived, their carriages beginning to line the drive, the women in their light summer evening gowns. They came as whole families, from grandparents to boys and girls still in their teens. All the guests assembled on the porch formed by the overhang of the second story.

The musicians grouped together on the terrace and began to play a polka, and the dancing started. The older guests sat in the ranks of chairs, fanning in time to the music.

Tom danced first with Mme. Jubilier. "Medora is beautiful tonight, is she not?" she said, and she gave him a teasing, speculative look.

He must learn to be always on guard.

Out on the wide-spreading lawn the plantation people had begun to dance, too, their own version of the polka. The polka was followed by waltzes. He didn't ask Medora to Like waving a magic wand!

new

BLUE DUTCH*

turns sparkling blue the instant it touches water foams-bleaches-cleans
... blue-white clean

NEW BLUE DUTCH works so fast—it makes all other cleansers seem old fashioned! When the blue suds rinse away, so do grease and grime. And NEW BLUE DUTCH is speedy rinsing. Never leaves grit behind! The smoothest cleanser you've ever used, NEW BLUE DUTCH pampers you and your expensive appliances. It's modern magic for modern young housewives like you!

PUREX

*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. ©1957 PUREX CORPORATION LTD

he didn't go near her. Would this, too, ceable? He saw ahead of him all the f weighing his every action, his every s De la Grandville who brought Me- him, holding her by the hand, as Tom a dance, beginning to feel the growing at didn't seem to bother those who orn to it. "Here, young man," De la ille said as Tom got to his feet (too ? not eagerly enough?). "I call on you this waltz for me." He shook his head. u! I must be getting old."

but you're warm, Tom, you don't have e," Medora said. "Let's go outside and he plantation people for a while."

ouldn't tell her that it wasn't wise for go off alone together, because the de- ake her in his arms had become almost rable. He couldn't burden her with the dge of his love for her any more than, sake of seeking compassion, he would some incurable disorder. On the other he couldn't stop seeing her. He had beyond the possibility of that surcease, e he had already extended friendship to id if he ignored her now she wouldn't tand and she would be hurt.

followed her, threading through the s, to the stone porch. The moon was ow, silhouetting the palms. The musi- rinned at them, their black faces shin- h sweat, their heads and shoulders ac- a faster rhythm. "It's cooler out here," id, and he put out his arms to her.

danced the length of the porch, swept e galloping beat. "Oh, I do love to " Medora said, throwing back her head e up at him.

was happy because she was with him, tightened his hold on her and then ed it again. She didn't know that this y she was happy, and she believed that uld be completely herself because she fe with him. It was the myth of their ille relationship, her self-cherished that gave her the freedom to this hap- she didn't have to question.

The drummer threw up his sticks with a final flourish. The music stopped. "We may as well go in," Tom said.

"But it's so nice out here!"

And then he saw Durand in the doorway.

"So here's where you've run to," Durand said, with that "let's all play" manner. "I don't blame you. It's hot inside. There's iced champagne in the dining room, however. Shall we all drown ourselves in champagne?"

Gabrielle came in with more bottles on a silver tray. "Where's Raschid?" Durand asked as she reached them.

"He's with the foal." Her low voice was apologetic. "I told him you wished him to help in here, but he said the foal was sick."

"My foal!" Medora set down her glass.

"Now, chérie, Raschid is very good with horses. He's more of a veterinary than a coachman," Durand soothed her. "If it's anything serious we can send for ——"

"I'll go out to see!"

"Not by yourself. You need someone with a lantern, to look out for snakes. I'll send one of the servants —— Ah, M. Carruthers, would you go with her? The servants are so busy."

Tom said that he would be glad to go, and a man was sent for a lantern. This would be all right: a dozen people had heard the conversation, heard Durand's suggestion. But—too eager? Or not eager enough? He was reminded of André Khan, carefully considering his attitudes in an alien world.

They scarcely needed the lantern as they went up the grassy slope. The moon had shaken off the few clouds; it bleached the buildings and traced the path before them.

"Tom," Medora said. She stopped walking and lifted her head. "Tom! The crickets!"

"I don't hear them." Then he knew that was what she meant. They were far enough away from the house so that the strains of the orchestra had become muted. They should be hearing the great wood crickets and the tree frogs, the questing calls of the night birds. But there was nothing. No sound from the hedges, the trees, the fields. Only a vast silence in the moonlight.

"What does it mean?" She turned to him, her hand at her throat. "I've never known it to be like this before!"

"It must be something in the atmosphere. A storm brewing on the other side of the mountain."

"Yes, that must be it." She resumed walking. She wasn't a country girl; she didn't know that the crickets would be chirping more loudly before a storm. Tom looked up at the looming hulk of the mountain and saw nothing unusual about it. And yet ——

Then the stillness was broken. The cattle started bellowing, and from the stable, just ahead of them now, came the terrified whinnying of the horses. Medora caught her breath

E E E E E E E

What is celebrity? The advantage of being known to people who don't know you. CHAMFORT and clutched his arm. "What is it? Oh, Tom, what is it?"

E E E E E E E

"I don't know. I think we ought to go back to the house."

"Let's look in on the foal first." Medora darted ahead of him into the stable.

The saddle horses were still whinnying, their eyes rolling. The foal stood close to its mother, looking surprised, too young to understand fear. "Raschid must have run off," Medora said. "The foal looks all right to me. I think Raschid just made an excuse not to work in the house. He thinks it's beneath him." She rubbed the small sorrel's face, and then wiped her hand on her handkerchief. "Let's go back now."

"You're shivering," Tom said.

"I'm shivering because I'm scared out of my wits, that's why!"

"And who wouldn't be?"

Her eyes weren't cornflower blue now; they were the blue of the bay on a dark night. She was trying to smile. He set down the lantern. He pulled her to him and kissed her, full on the mouth. All his careful thinking was gone to nothing. As he took his lips away, he heard the quick, almost sobbing, intake of her breath. And then she had thrown herself against him, her mouth was pressed to his. Even as he felt the fierce singing of triumph in his blood, she broke away from him and stumbled to the door.

He grabbed up the lantern and followed her. He paused to close the stable door. As he did so there came again that rumble as of thunder, but this time he knew that it would not be thunder, and he turned to face the mountain. Black against the sky, blotting out the stars, a thick column of smoke rose, and across it ripped flashes of light, like the summer lightning on a rainless night.

At the house, by the time Tom reached it, panic had struck, carrying the plantation workers down the driveway in a purposeless, maddened flight from the direction of the volcano. It became a terrible, dangerous spectacle of pushing, screaming figures and rearing carriage horses. And over it all that impossible serenity of white moonlight.

Tom seized the shoulder of the nearest fleeing black, shouting at him to stop. He saw De la Grandville helping a crying woman to her feet, and he heard Durand calling to workers by name.

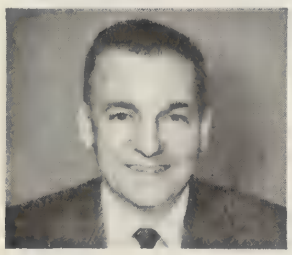
But the mountain was quiet now, and with the suddenness of a raging forest fire reaching a river the contagion of fear had run its full course. The mob broke into shaken, bewildered individuals. Several of them had been hurt, and a sort of dispensary had been set up on the porch, with the doctor in charge and Medora at his side, swabbing and bandaging. The front of the blue dress was spotted with blood.

The guests were hurrying to their carriages, calling to their coachmen. They were going home to make sure that everything was all right at their own plantations, to reassure their children. They said good night hastily to Tom as they passed him.

EW WESTINGHOUSE
UTOMATIC FRY PAN $22.95

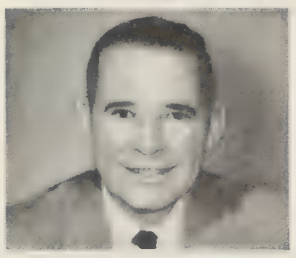
OK FOR THE SQUARE PAN WITH THE SQUARE ELEMENT

It's the cool electric way to give your family hot summertime dishes! Open Handle design prevents slipping during washing, permits sure, easy balancing when pan is filled. Coppertone Cover, $4.00; Glass Cover, $3.00.



YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse

...even when she shops she won't take risks



She's always satisfied most with a BRAND that's made a NAME for itself!

MANUFACTURER

"I MADE IT... and I know it combines top quality materials and superior workmanship at a fair price. That's the only way I can be sure my product will satisfy people and make a good name for itself."

DEALER

"I SOLD IT... recommended it because it's made a name for itself. Trusted brands give folks the widest choice and newest improvements. There's no confusion, no risks, and no lost customers!"

CUSTOMER

"I BOUGHT IT... and I'm satisfied it's the best for my money. I know what I'm getting with well-known brands. They take the risk out of buying . . . even when you have to order by phone."

THE BRANDS YOU SEE ADVERTISED IN THIS MAGAZINE ARE NAMES YOU CAN TRUST!
They stand firmly behind every product and claim they make.
BRAND NAMES FOUNDATION, INC. • 437 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

The night was still empty of any normal sounds; only the casuarinas moaning endlessly in the wind from the sea. In the light cast by a lantern held above her, he could see Medora's blowing hair as she bent over one of the last of the injured.

He must manage to see Medora alone, as quickly as possible. He must convince her that he had kissed her because he loved her, and that what she had felt, up there in the stable, was love too. He felt convinced that there was very little time remaining for any of them. Medora and he must get away, and in the strangeness of this night it seemed possible and even easy. He could see her meeting him at the stable, lifting the light while he saddled two horses, and then they would be on their way. Grande Anse, Trinité, Fort-de-France, a ship. . . . Beyond that he did not have to think.

In the plantation parlor, only Tom and the Jubiliers were left now, and De la Grandville, rocking himself by the window and looking pleased, like an old warrior who had been called back into battle. Durand was filling champagne glasses. "We were fortunate to have you with us tonight, monsieur," he said gracefully. "It looked quite bad there for a while. One sees that you are a man of resource."

He had actually done very little, Tom said, and again he had that feeling of clumsiness with Durand. He lifted his glass with an automatic "À votre santé." (To your health, mon ami, and I have every intention of running away with your wife.)

"We shall leave for Fonds Coré at the first hour of the morning," Jubilier said, "though I tell Hortense there is no reason to be alarmed about the children."

"And we shall go back to St. Pierre," Durand said. "It will be much safer there than here, where lava could run down the collines."

Heels clicked on the tiles and already Tom knew that particular rhythm. Medora had changed into a peignoir of dotted Swiss with a row of pink bows. She looked white and exhausted. "I've ordered coffee," she said. "I thought we might all like coffee now."

"You were a brave little girl tonight," De la Grandville rumbled. "A proper planter's wife."

"No one need tell me that I am a fortunate man," Durand said.

"Oh, please!" It was like a soft cry of anguish. Her hands gripped the back of a chair, the big square diamond on her left hand catching the light. "You—you embarrass me."

Durand's eyes were on her face. "We are all friends here, and family. Why shouldn't everyone know that I am a man very much in love with his wife?" His voice had a lazy, sleek sound to it.

"If I may have more champagne," Tom said hastily, getting up.

"And I will have more, too," Jubilier said. "This is like a hurricane. The best way to get through it is with plenty of wine under one's belt."

"The best way is by a visit to the priest," his wife said. She went on earnestly that she believed in original sin, and that she had often felt, within herself ——

"A desire to hold back a sou from the collection box?" her husband asked, and the men all laughed.

"But seriously," Durand said, "I not only believe in original sin, but in degrees of it. Just as there are people born with the seeds of a disease that will one day kill them, there are others who are born with the seed of self-destruction, something beyond their own understanding and control. Sometimes the victim is a woman gently born, who doesn't even recognize, until they're called warningly to her attention, all the small signs of that inherent recklessness and wantonness: the too-hot blood, the tendency to flaunt her charms. Small things at first, but inevitably she begins falling into the arms of any man who comes along."

(He knows, damn him! She hasn't the face for deception.) Tom dared not look at Medora now. Any glance, even any word of his, might be revealing.

"If the husband loved her, and he came to realize this about her, he would pity her," Durand said, and he looked musingly, sadly, at the winking bubbles in his glass. "He would pity her—and he would try to guard her fr herself."

"Ah, the coffee!" Hortense exclaimed. really do want a cup of coffee."

The servant set the tray with the thin c and the silver coffee service on the cen table and departed. "Will you pour, plea Hortense?" Medora asked in a thin voice feel . . . slightly faint."

"It's the reaction," Hortense said, ris from her chair. "The coffee will do you goo

It was all right to let his eyes rest on Med now, because everyone was looking at h with sympathy. She sat with her har clenched together in her lap, and she seem shrunken into the chair, as if age had stru her suddenly, making her small and fr huddled for warmth into a shawl.

He could understand how a man mi commit murder and feel no more compu tion than he would if he had scotched a fer- lance. And now he remembered the expr sion on Durand's face that morning when black had thrown the snake.

Tom found Gabrielle in his room, turni down his bed. She apologized for its havi been forgotten until then; but there had be so much disturbance. He was very tired a his head had begun to ache. His mind was a tomatically sorting out certain incidents of day, among which, instinct told him, a s nificant one had been overlooked.

Twice Durand had sent him off alone w Medora; the second time after their dance the porch, the champagne in the din room . . . out in the moonlight to the dist stable: a piece of cynically contrived st management. Durand had expected, h wanted him to kiss Medora.

As Gabrielle turned to leave, Tom put hi self between her and the door, closing it hind him. "Why did you lie about the s foal?" he demanded.

She took a startled step backward. "I do understand, monsieur."

"M. Durand told you to tell that lie. Y were hovering near him all evening, waiti for your cue. Monsieur was planning to se me to the stable, alone with madame."

"I don't understand," she repeated with patient, puzzled air. "But surely"—she lo ered her eyes—"madame would have fou her own excuse to be alone with you, mo sieur. It would not be the first time ——"

He gripped her by the shoulder. "What is trying to do to her?" He shook the girl sa agely. "Tell me the truth."

Her large Carib eyes, with their hint of centuries-old despair, looked at him in prin tive terror. "Get her away. Quickly, quickly she panted.

"I must see her privately tomorrow. C you help me?"

"No, monsieur." She started for the doo "I will not help you. He would know."

Refugees streamed down the road on Mor d'Orange. Even before the dawn, Medora h heard them: the creaking of carts, the bleati of goats. It was like the flooding Roxellan carrying down to the city the trunks of u rooted trees. For the most part the refuge went on foot, the men leading cows or oxe carrying trunks or boxes, and the women ba ancing on their heads trays piled with chin and kitchenware. The children cuddled chick ens or tugged at the ropes that dragged th goats or squealing pigs.

Medora couldn't remain in the salon in i impersonal perfection. She went out onto th veranda and then around the side of the hous The gardener wasn't working today, becaus it would be of no use. The rosebushes, coate with the blue-gray ash, were dead or dying.

From where she stood she could see th narrow gateway that was the entrance to th court from the road. It swung open and a bo appeared and stood hesitantly just inside. H didn't look like one of the refugees, for h wore a clean white shirt, and trousers in goo condition. Just then Gabrielle came out c the cookhouse, saw the boy, and hurried to ward him. There seemed to be an argumen between them, for the boy kept shaking hi head as he talked, while Gabrielle crowde him back to the gateway. Then he thrust a envelope at her and went off.

abrielle came back across the court, the elope flat on her hand. Her skirt was ed up around her hips, to escape the ashes. e boy of M. Carruthers," she said, ought this letter for you, madame. The was very insistent that it should be given ou privately," she said with a deliberate ertinence.

Then give it to me," Medora said coldly; could feel the color rushing to her face.

Gabrielle handed it over. "Madame need e no fear that I will mention the letter to nsieur," she said.

I don't know what you're talking about." her knees were suddenly weak.

The girl put her hands on her hips. "I'm not nd."

o now she had come to the ultimate, the hinkable shame. The servants always knew rything that happened, they said, and her n servants knew about that scene in the ole with Tom. One of them must have ked in on them, stolen away unseen; and w they talked about it, giggling among mselves. And this girl, who had always dis- d and resented her, no longer felt any need a mask of respect.

"Go," she said, the envelope shaking in her nd. "Go at once!"

Gabrielle didn't stir. "I was never fooled by ur innocent air, madame," she said scorn- ly. "And I think monsieur is no longer de- ved about you. One sees it in his face. He rs the day when you will openly disgrace n."

"I shall report this to monsieur. You will be missed immediately."

"No, I don't think you will report it." The rk eyes mocked and triumphed. "I have d you I can be quiet out this billet-doux. But rhaps madame might are me some of her lace ndkerchiefs."

This can't be happening me.

A great roar came from e direction of the cloud- vered mountain. The ices on the road rose to outs, through which she eard one phrase repeated: "The sea! The sea!"

She stumbled across the dying grass to the alustrade. The sea was retreating from the hore, and the people, black specks from that stance, rushed up from the Mouillage. Then e water hurled itself upon the land and upon e line of warehouses of the Place Bertin.

The warehouses! "Tom," she cried, and fear as an animal tearing at her throat. "Oh, no, h, Tom!"

She was beating her hands on the balus- ade. Before her eyes, those buildings were oing to totter and fall, collapsing like the nd castles that children built.

But the buildings stood, though she could e the water covering all the long place, and ooding up the bases of the steep streets of the ld section, while the mountain crackled. hen the tidal wave had reached its limit; it as drawing back.

Her thin peignoir clung clammily to her ack as she turned away from the parapet. he refugees, suspended for a while between reat of sea and of hills, were moving again.

She put her hand in her pocket, groping for handkerchief, and found the letter she had hrust there. She opened it and read it, almost alm again now, and then she tore it into pieces nd threw them over the balustrade.

Flames shot above the volcano for the first ime. They were clearly visible when Tom vent out for midmorning breakfast, passing hrough the ruined first floor of the ware- ouse, where workmen were clearing out the lebris and the clinging mud.

The water-front café was crowded, and he at down at a table already occupied by the captain of an Italian bark, a fat man with a leeply furrowed face.

"I've just come from the shippers'," the captain said. "I told them that if this were Naples and that mountain were Vesuvius and it ooked like that, I wouldn't remain. I informed hem that I intend to get under way and clear he harbor. You're an American and ought to e sensible. Why do you stay in this place?"

"For personal reasons," Tom said. There had been no message yet from Medora. If the day passed without one, he was going to make some excuse to go up to the house on Morne d'Orange that night.

"I'm making a stop at Dominica," the captain said. "If you want to leave with me, I can drop you there."

"You're very kind, but I can't leave just yet."

From the window of his office, nearly an hour later, Tom saw the bark move out of the roadstead, a lost opportunity that fate had thrown in his way, with a careless gesture.

Standing on the bridge that led to the house, Gabrielle saw the orange-red licking of flame rise and die down. In her fear, she crossed herself, although it was a long time since she had really believed in the teachings of the church.

The smoke reminded her of the caldrons of tar burning in the streets to purify the air, during the pestilence that had carried off her mother. They had lived then in a house in the Mouillage rented by the white merchant who was her father. The fever had killed him, too, reaching into his fine house on the Morne Rouge road, and he had made no provision for her. The sale of the furniture and trinkets had brought very little, and she had been left, a child of eleven, dependent on the neighbors. It was one of them, a cook for the Durands, who had brought her to this house on the morne.

Paul Durand had been sixteen then, a student at the academy. She had polished his shoes, run after him with forgotten books, darned his socks. "The little Gabrielle worships Paul," Mme. Durand had said, but that had never been true.

Even as a child, she had known him; and he had known her. He had known, for example, that she would readily lie for him when he was in trouble, but that she would have to be paid. She had kept in a box the brass rings with glass stones and other trophies of their connivance.

When he had returned from the Sorbonne he had seduced her—but she had not been his innocent victim. There had always been something between them that was even stronger than passion: the comfort of no pretense. A belonging together.

She had accepted the fact that he could never marry her, and that someday he must take a wife, and a rich one. But that had suited her very well, because she had plans. She wasn't going to be held cheaply, as her mother had been. When Paul had money, she would have a house of her own, down in the city; a servant, a horse and carriage. Yet when the new wife had come, the dream had had to be postponed. The girl had preferred to live at the plantation, and there the money had been poured out. "Have patience," Paul said, when he came to St. Pierre and stayed overnight at the house, which was always kept ready for him. "I have to be careful. She's not a fool about where the money goes. Wait. I will manage in time."

She looked down on the tile roofs of the city. A small house with a garden and a fountain. Not rented, but her own—and Paul all to herself, lazily watching her from a hammock, as she moved about the garden in the native dress that she was wise enough to wear because she knew very well what it was that held him to her. Oh, no, she would not suffer her mother's fate!

The flame had vanished from the mountain, but a cold fear remained with her as she lifted her eyes to the black canopy of cloud. Such terror as she had felt that night at the plantation when she had blurted out to the American that he must get Paul's wife away. She clenched her hands together. I must not be afraid and foolish again. I must not be afraid.

When Tom arrived at the house on Morne d'Orange, he thought at first that the Durands were giving a party. The salon was filled with people, and servants were passing after-dinner coffee and liqueurs.

In a moment Durand appeared, a brandy sniffer in his hand. "M. Carruthers!" he exclaimed. "How kind of you to make this unexpected visit. You must meet our guests. They're all relatives and friends who have come to stay with us until the danger from the volcano is over. I'm sorry Medora isn't here to welcome you, but she should join us presently." She had eaten supper in her room, as she wasn't feeling well, he said, but she intended to come down for coffee.

They made the round of the salon, and then Durand left him on a sofa with the Jubiliers. They seemed like old, close friends, after their experience at the plantation.

"I thought that you might already have left St. Pierre," Hortense Jubilier said. "We heard that M. Hitchcock is closing his warehouse."

"Yes, he is. It's practically empty, with nothing coming in since the ships have started avoiding the port."

"Poor St. Pierre," Jubilier said. "We're treated as if we have the plague. Of course we can't expect strangers to know our mountain as we do." It was the remark heard everywhere; the volcano might have been a naughty child whose vagaries the family understood.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 191

M M M M

No man in the world has more courage than the man who can stop after he has eaten one peanut.

CHANNING POLLOCK

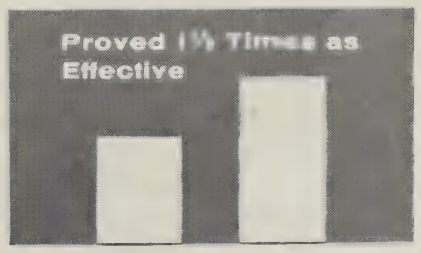
M M M M

Have Perspiration Stains Ever Ruined Your Dress?

New ARRID with Perstop* Stops Perspiration Stains-Stops Odor

DRAMATIC STEAMBATH TEST SHOWS HOW

ARRID with Perstop* was rubbed into this woman's forehead. Then she was put in a steambath at 104°. 15 minutes later . . .



. . . she was dripping with perspiration—but ARRID kept her forehead dry. ARRID will do the same for your underarms, too.

Just rub ARRID in—rub perspiration and odor out. When the cream vanishes you know you're safe, even on hot, sticky days.

ARRID with Perstop*, used daily, keeps your clothes safe from ugly stains, keeps your underarms dry, soft and sweet.

Doctors have proved in laboratory tests that ARRID with Perstop* is 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested against perspiration and odor.

Remember—nothing protects you like a cream. And no cream protects you like ARRID. Don't be half safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID to be sure. 43¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

Sparkling...

COLOR NEVER NEEDS POLISHING!

RANGE-TO-TABLE service in sparkling Hallite brightens your meals, lightens your work . . . reflects your good taste! These glamorous cooking-and-serving utensils are made of special thick aluminum that spreads heat quickly, evenly, gently—they cook food better. And the gay copper-colored covers always stay shiny, never need polishing! Wonderful to own, wonderful to give. Attractive leaf hangers included free! Sold at leading stores everywhere.

Hallite

by WEAR-EVER

WEAR-EVER ALUMINUM TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. HALLITE

THE ALUMINUM COOKING UTENSIL CO., INC. • NEW KENSINGTON, PA.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 189

"The tidal wave flooded the first floor of our house," Hortense told him. "The work there'll be, cleaning up!" She sounded just like Opraline.

People didn't come together to share fear, but reassurance. That mood was in the clinking of glasses, the outbursts of laughter.

"I talked to an Italian skipper this morning," Tom said, "who stated that if Vesuvius looked as Pelée does, he wouldn't stay in Naples. He left with half a cargo." They looked at him as though he had committed an indelicacy. "I think he was right. I'm getting out, too—soon."

"It is different for foreigners." An elderly man from Ajoupa-Bouillon, high up on the mountain, had joined them. "They have nothing at stake here, they have no responsibility. But the French whites of St. Pierre can't start an exodus."

"It's a matter of prestige," Jubilier explained earnestly. "The political situation in Martinique is already precarious. If the whites were the first to run away from here, you can be sure that political capital would be made of it. We have to show strength and courage."

"If you all die here," Tom pointed out, "the white leadership of the country would be lost forever, since most of the whites live in St. Pierre."

"That's the chance one must take," Jubilier said. "Here comes Medora."

She was wearing a white lace dress, and emerald earrings circled by diamonds. The beautiful dress was uncluttered by trimming, and the way she wore it made every other woman in the room look undistinguished.

She had seen him; their eyes had met. She made her way to him circuitously, stopping to talk to other guests. He could feel her approaching him reluctantly, making each pause painfully.

"How nice to see you again, Tom." That long line of governesses and tutors was behind her now, carrying her through this remeeting with gracious dignity. There might have been no moment in the dark stable, with the horses whinnying. It had been ridiculous to imagine that he might find an opportunity of talking to her alone.

"Surely you have observed them, M. Carruthers," Jubilier said.

"I beg your pardon. I'm afraid I didn't understand ——"

"The three American naval vessels that came to port this afternoon. I wonder why they're here."

"They're cruising in the Caribbean. I understand they're leaving early tomorrow."

Medora said, "I'm sorry I missed seeing them."

"You could probably see them now," Durand said. He had quietly joined the group and was standing at the end of the sofa. "There's some moonlight." He lifted the glass that was still in his hand, drawing in his nostrils to inhale the fragrance of the old brandy. "M. Carruthers would be glad, I'm sure, to point them out to you, ma petite Americaine."

Tom felt a strong impulsion to refuse, to stay where he was, but of course he wouldn't do that, and this Durand knew.

Pelée was hidden in clouds, but the sky above the roadstead was clear. Yet there was still that ominous silence, that absence of the night birds. Tomorrow there should be a new moon, but the dead night seemed to hold no promise of the moon's return.

Neither of them spoke until they had nearly reached the parapet. Then Medora said, "You shouldn't have written me."

"I had to see you, somehow. I had to tell you ——"

"I don't want to talk about us!"

"All right. Then we'll talk about you. You've got to leave here. It's insane to ——"

"But I can't desert my husband when there's danger. As long as he stays here ——"

"Durand doesn't love you. He's trying to break you to pieces, in order to get rid of you. He ——"

"How can you say such a thing! You can see for yourself how ——" She drew in her breath. "Where are the ships?"

"There," Tom pointed. "The three big white ones. I love you," he said. "And because I love you, I'm not quitting St. Pierre until you've come to me to help you to leave, or until I hear that you've gone. I'm giving you the responsibility for my life as well as your own."

"No, Tom! Oh, no!" She flung out her hands, as if she braced herself against the heavy air of the night.

"There's someone on the veranda," he cautioned her. Their voices would carry in that unnatural stillness. "We must go back to the house now. No, I don't know why the ships are cruising," he said loudly. "It may have something to do with Teddy Roosevelt's Big Stick policy."

"Please, Tom," she whispered frantically, taking stumbling steps beside him, then falling behind. When he stopped to wait for her she was like a wraith in the filmy dress, a lost wraith wandering through the ashes-and-moonlight landscape. Wherever she turned, he thought, she met with cruelty. Even his love had become cruelty for her, and he wanted to take her hand in his, that small, square hand that couldn't grasp or hold the things it was meant to have.

As Tom crossed the Place Bertin, the music from the Café Rouge was borne like a burden on the tired air. There was very little light from the new and untried moon, and he saw all the buildings, eaten away by shadows, as only remnants of structures: a wall standing here, a partially supported archway there. It was like seeing a beloved face, in a certain light, and becoming suddenly, forebodingly aware of the skeletal structure, the death's-head under the flesh.

He had left Sylvestre on guard at the house, with instructions to come running for him if Medora should send a message, but by now he had very little hope, and he had a new concern, because André had disappeared. It was possible that he might turn up at the Café Rouge.

When the waitress brought Tom his drink, the glass jigged on the tin tray, tapping out her fear. She had a listening air, but she wasn't listening to the music. At three o'clock that afternoon a series of deafening detonations had come from the mountain.

He was a fool to remain in St. Pierre. He must go; he must forget Medora. But in the blue smoke from the lamps she stumbled after him, wraithlike in white lace, and he struck his clenched hand on the table. The untouched drink before him sloshed out of the glass, and some of the liquid ran down the side of the table, like his own blood running out: drip, drip, drip, in time with the drumbeat.

He raised his head and saw André coming toward him. André wasn't wearing the white duck suit; he was dressed like a native, in shirt and creaseless trousers, and they were dirty and stained.

"Ah, Tom, mon vieux!" He leaned across the table to shake hands. He smelled of rum, and the pupils of his eyes were dilated. "Mon gaillard!"

It has happened, Tom thought. Nell Hitchcock. And he had seen her drive away at noon from the warehouse, with her father, and felt relief because she was departing for Morne Rouge almost immediately; because André was safe.

"Now you want to know where I have been." André had given the order to the waitress, and he put his elbows on the table. "Well, I went part way up the mountain this afternoon. I wanted to have a look at it. I saw all around me the gray twilight, ashes on the ground, and little birds lying there dead." He closed his eyes, intoning softly, like a chant. "And I heard, I heard the abandoned cattle bellowing, the wind rattling the dried cane, and then, above me, the mountain roaring, like a caged lion. And I felt." He swayed a little in his chair. "I felt how the volcano, fifty years ago, was seeking new vents to take the place of those that have been blocked up through the centuries, and now it's seeking them again—but this time with a greater, stored-up force."

Here, Tom thought, a sense of excitement running along his spine, is a born scientist! Because always, in the great discoveries, there had been that sure intuition, that flash of feeling. "Then you think there will be an explosion?"

"No. I do not think," André said with his too-bright, derisive smile.

"If you really believe," Tom said, "that the volcano ——"

"—— the volcano," André said. "I have a droll story to tell you, for your entertainment." André's hands cupped his glass convulsively. "I tried to propose to Miss Hitchcock. Don't you find this amusing—that I could have been such a clown, such a fool?"

THE GARDEN

By WILFRID THORLEY

(Rendered from an anonymous French song of the fifteenth century)

My love hath hid herself from me
Within her littel garden-close.
The mallow and the rosemarye
Growe there besyde the brier-rose.
(O Love, be kind ere summer goes!)

Fayre is that garden to the sight,
All flowers there doe sweetly showe;
A man might gladden day and night
Therein and never wysh to goe.
(Alas! that I should love her soe!)

Ah, me! no sweeter voice there is
For singyng than the nightingale's
At eve or when the morning pales:
When he is weary he doth cease.
(Thy lover onlye hath no peace!)

I saw her gather, hand in dew,
A violet from out the grass,
The loveliest that ever grewe,
The sweetest one that ever was.
(And she ungatherèd, alas!)

I see her there, and white she showes
As milk and soft as lambèkyn,
Nor not soe white when I looke in,
But red as anye littel rose.
(O Love, be kind ere summer goes!)

"Not very amusing," Tom said. "I'm acquiring some experience of being a fool myself."

André showed no curiosity. He continued to scourge his own flesh. "The scene would have delighted you. Very high drama! I was cast as the vassal who lifts his eyes to a queen." André couldn't be done with it. "I offered her love, and she couldn't even leave me with my dignity. She reduced the whole thing to a cheap travesty of a love scene." He shoved his glass aside. "In all the words of her trumpery novels!"

"They were the only words she had," Tom said, and again he felt a compassion for her. "She doesn't yet know how to deal with honest emotion."

"I should have realized that you would defend her," André said. The waitress set the glasses on the table, and André drank half of his at one gulp.

"I wasn't defending her, I was only trying to explain her." Tom took a sip of his own drink. It was the raw rum of the poorer classes and it burned his throat.

"After all, the 'whites' must stick together," André said, his tongue blurring the words.

"You aren't going to quarrel with me," Tom said. "I'm your friend."

"And my betrayer," André said furiously. "If I had never made 'white' friends, if I hadn't been led into the fallacy of considering myself almost one of you, I would never have let myself be debased as I have been." He was more than a little drunk now. "In time, I'm going to hate even the memory of you. Your religion teaches you that there is redemption by love. There's redemption by hate too. Good, clean hate. It's an emancipating emotion. Now I'm free to hate all of you."

"Very well," Tom said, "but let's get out of here."

As they stepped outside, they heard the steady growling of the mountain. The night was only shades of blackness, but they could see a lurid blue light playing about the peak of the volcano, and in that light smoke belched.

"Good night," André said shortly.

Tom started to hold out his hand, but this was not the gesture to make now. "Good night," he said.

"Still, I owe you something," André said, "and it is better to wipe it out." He had to put his hand against the building wall to steady himself. "I'm leaving for Sainte Lucie in my stepfather's boat, sometime before dawn. There will be a place for you. Go home and pack a small valise, and then come to my house."

"Thank you. I'll come." If he couldn't save Medora, he would save himself.

The last of their guests had straggled off to bed. Medora opened the door and went out to the veranda. She saw a glimmer of brightness on the other side of the cookhouse: a lantern light going along close to the wall, and then turning at the narrow rear gate, to be lost among all the other lights. One of the servants was running away. This would make the third to go, and she couldn't blame them, but still it left the house short one more pair of hands.

I should try to sleep, she told herself. How could one get through another day without at least a few hours of sleep tonight? But how could one sleep under the threat of death? If it were only her death ——

Death tonight in the sulphuric odor of the warm wind, in the strange blue light that cast its glow against the sky. Somewhere down there in the menaced streets of the town Tom might still wait. Wait with hope, and if he had hope it was because she had given it to him. Surely what actually mattered to her was that the life of Tom Carruthers should go on; that it shouldn't be thrown away. If she could find the right, the convincing argument, she might at least be able to send Tom on into the world of the living.

That servant had slipped away so easily—probably no one in the house but herself had noticed. You can keep close to the shadow of the house as you go, and once you've reached the other side of the cookhouse anyone looking out a window here would take you for another servant running away. You can go down there and be back before dawn. If someone sees you returning, you can say you were only walking about because you couldn't sleep.

She ran down the stairs, on tiptoes, as though something clutched at the hem of her gown. She closed the heavy door softly behind her, and then her shoes were slipping on the dew-wet coating of ashes on the lawn.

She was on the road at last, but it was like being in a dream, moving in the direction opposite to that the procession was taking. She tried to keep close to the low retaining wall on the cliff side, as it was outlined for her by the lanterns and the spreading blue light. She stopped and untied her silk sash. Then she pulled up her dress and bound the sash around her hips, as the porteuses bound up their dresses to leave their long legs free. Now she could walk more easily, she could swing into a stride. The wind blew at her back, and she felt a rising excitement, a thrill of freedom.

As she made the final turn into the town, lightning speared across the sky, and rain came down, like the dumping of water from the big clay jars into the gutters. She was wet through, her skirt lashing against her knees, when she reached the first paved street. Tom lived quite near the theater, and it shouldn't be hard to find her way, with the brilliant lightning to help her. She kept to the sidewalks, guiding herself by touch on the walls, between the flashes.

Once it occurred to her to wonder why she was no longer afraid.

The fierce rain had found openings in the shutters, forming little pools on the floor, and, as Tom packed, the rumblings of the volcano and the thunderings of the storm alternated, as though they had an agreement between them.

He had sent Sylvestre off to bed as soon as he returned home. Now he had finished sorting out the things he would take with him, working in his sleeping pantaloons because, with the shutters closed, it was stifling in his bedroom. From time to time he had to stop to towel his face and chest.

He would write notes for Coraline and Sylvestre. The boy could have his remaining clothes, and Coraline the various articles he had bought to add to the furnishings of his house. There was his watch which Sylvestre had always admired; he could have that too. Going away in this fashion was like dying—the personal possessions left to be sadly divided. He wished that he could take the two of them with him, but they weren't like pet animals, to be picked up and carried along. They had their families, their own ties.

Only he had no ties to this island. He would leave nothing behind—merely the very core of his heart.

The deafening noise had increased, the shutters rattled. Surely everyone must realize by now that some form of climax was near. If I wait one more day, he thought. After such a night as this, she may change her mind. He was like someone turning back into a burning building.

The volcano was making a new sound now, a nearer-seeming sound, like a pounding at his door. Then he knew that it was a knocking, at the street door.

The wind rushed in, with a sweep of rain. The lightning made an illuminated square of the doorway, and Medora stood framed in it. He saw her eyes wide and hesitant, the eyebrows like a grave question, before the light left her. "Oh, I hoped, I prayed you would be gone," she gasped.

"I was waiting for you." He wanted to shout with his exultation, and it didn't matter whether it was fear or love that had brought her. She was here.

She crossed his threshold, he slammed the door, and tried to take her in his arms, but she slipped away from him.

"You're soaking wet," he said.

"Of course." Her voice became almost saucy; it rang with a kind of secret triumph. "It's raining, you know."

"The first thing, then, is to get you dry." He took hold of her hand, pulling her along with him.

"Where are you taking me?"

"To my bedroom, where you can take off your wet things."

"You were packing," she said at once, seeing the valise on the floor.

"Yes, but I wasn't going. I was going to give you one more day." He took his folded dressing gown from the bed. "You can put this on," he said. "There are towels in the washstand."

"My clothes will never dry out," she said in a worried voice.

"I'll run out to the cookhouse with them and start a fire in the stove. Call to me when you're ready. Hurry." There was still time for them to get to André Khan, and André's stepfather must be persuaded to take both of them, but if that wasn't possible, at least he could give her his own place.

He heard her calling to him, and he took the narrow steps two at a time. She was sitting on his bed, his dressing gown falling in folds around her, her clothes piled on the chair. She had taken the pins out of her wet hair, and it hung about her shoulders.

"You look like a drowned mouse," he said.

"I know. And I'm lost in this." She smoothed at the dressing gown. "You're so big," and she gave him a faint, self-conscious smile. Then the smile went, and she asked anxiously, "Isn't this storm ever going to stop?"

"It's a bad one, all right."

He had never felt such love for her as he did now, seeing her huddled on his bed, her hair lank and dark with wetness, her face drawn and almost ugly with fatigue. He wished he could take her away like this—without even a shred of her own belongings.

"Please take the clothes," she said. "I must be back before dawn, before the servants start stirring about."

He couldn't believe that he had heard her correctly. "But you aren't going back! You can't go back!"

"You didn't think I'd left Paul? That I was going to run away with you?" She tucked her bare feet up under her. "Oh, Tom!"

"What else was I to think?" he demanded harshly. "Why did you come, then?"

"To beg you to leave." And then she told him, in words that sounded rehearsed, how if he died here, she would be responsible, and he must not put that guilt on her soul. She already bore enough guilt ——

"You're talking nonsense. In the first p you don't love your husband. You we overly sheltered girl, fascinated and pressed by him. You've given him qualiti delicacy and nobility that he doesn't poss
The light shimmered on the small poo water under the windows. They winked evil eyes. "Don't you know that your goo has become a temptation to your husbar weapon for him? He wants to get rid of to get control of your money."

"Oh, Tom!" she said sadly. There w louder cannonading from the mountain, she shivered. "Please go, please leave!
were packing, you must have arranged a

You'll find new beauty in MELMAC®... the quality break-resistant dinnerware

Exciting things have been happening to MELMAC quality melamine dinnerware. It's here now in elegant new designs, shapes and colors. Irresistibly beautiful, yet so practical that your family can enjoy it every day at every meal!

Yes, every brand of dinnerware identified by the MELMAC tag is guaranteed by its manufacturer for a full year against breaking, cracking and chipping. Absolutely safe in automatic dishwashers. See makers' brand names in column opposite.

Buy your favorite brand at your favorite store. Look for the MELMAC CENTER! MELMAC is quality molded dinnerware but not all molded dinnerware is MELMAC.

NEW BOOKLET! "EASY WAYS TO MAKE BEAUTIFUL TABLE SETTINGS."

Full of ideas, diagrams, color pictures. Experts show easy ways to create beautiful table settings, clever decorations, smart centerpieces. Send 25¢ in coin to Cyanamid, Dept. D., P. O. Box 20, N. Y. 10, N. Y.

CYANAMID

MELMAC is the registered trademark of American Cyanamid Company for quality melamine dinnerware and other products made under American Cyanamid Company's standards and specifications

MELMAC CENTER

LOOK FOR THESE BRANDS OF MELMAC® IN YOUR FAVORITE STORE

E-BRANCHELL

H-BROOKPARK

L-Classic

D,F-Harmony House

C-Holiday

K-Lifetime

B-LUCENT

I-Newport

J-PROLON

M-Russel Wright RESIDENTIAL

A-Stetson

G-TEXAS-WARE

to go." She got up from the bed. "I'm going to put on my clothes just as they are. I must get back. Listen to the mountain now! I think it means to destroy us all, any minute."

"Then stay with me. Stay here." At once he recognized that he wasn't going to be able to persuade her, that nothing he could say was going to make any difference to her. She didn't even answer him. She stood in her bare feet regarding him hopelessly—hopeless in the fetters that had been forged for her.

Her return to Morne d'Orange could be prevented in only one way, now.

He moved between her and the chair with its pile of wet clothes. "I love you," he said. "I love you more than life; and more than honor. It's because I love you ——" He was asking her forgiveness, but she couldn't know that.

He put his hands on her shoulders, and he pulled her to him and pressed his mouth hard against hers, forcing her back at the same time, toward the bed. She tried to turn her head, but his mouth pursued hers. She attempted to struggle free, but he was pitilessly stronger than she. The back of her knees struck the bed, and she lost her balance. Her hand clutched his arm and then tightened, and he felt her resistance ebbing, he felt the tide of her desire. It was the way the water had ebbed from the Place Bertin, and then rushed in, blotting out all the familiar landscape.

André and his stepfather would have departed long since, but there were other ways of leaving the town, and he would find one of them. Last night when Medora had turned her face to the wall and cried, and then, with a shuddering sigh, fallen into the swift sleep of emotional exhaustion, he had sworn, lying in the storm-beleaguered darkness, that she would find him adequate to the charge he had assumed. For he had taken on not only the responsibility for the problem of where she was to go now, how she was to leave the island, but the greater responsibility of her justification to herself.

Love, he thought, looking down at her sleeping figure. Surely all that was needed was simply to love each other enough.

As soon as Tom descended the side street to the Place Bertin, he saw the Topaze, of the Compagnie Girard, getting up steam, although it was at least an hour before its usual time of departure.

"There are no tickets," the policeman said. "The ship is overloaded already."

The wide doors to the livery stable were open and an old Negro sat on the sidewalk. "No carriages, no horses." he called.

At any minute now, up there in the house on Morne d'Orange, a servant would knock and receive no answer, and then, frightened, she would run to find the master. And Durand would fling open the door, to an empty room, to a lamp still burning, perhaps.

He would reason at once where she would have gone. Durand might even be on his way now, to find her alone in the house, in the dressing gown, defenseless.

Tom began to run.

Coraline and Sylvestre were in the cookhouse. They chorused their musical good morning as he appeared in the doorway. "I have pressed madame's clothes," Coraline said matter-of-factly. The white dress was neatly spread on the back of the chair. Paper had been stuffed in the stained shoes to help them dry.

"Thank you. I will take them up to her." Coraline could have carried the clothes to Medora herself, but she had too much delicacy. He noticed that she had said "madame." She knew well enough who had come to him in the storm.

"You will go away, now, mussieu?" She was making fresh coffee, the fragrance filling the tiny room, with its strings of dried peppers, the row of burnished copper pans.

"Yes. But I must have a horse and carriage," Tom said. "I have tried ——"

"There are none to rent. I could have told you that."

"Not to rent, no," Sylvestre agreed. "One of my cousins is coachman for a béké who has no intention of leaving St. Pierre. My cousin sleeps in the coach house, but he sleeps very soundly. I think he would not hear," he said solemnly, "if someone broke the lock and took away the horse and carriage. His master would be very angry, but my cousin is a good coachman, and if the carriage was returned he would not lose his position."

"The carriage will be sent back," Tom said. When you were running away with another man's wife, stealing horses could seem a small thing.

Tom began to pick up Medora's clothes. Coraline took a clay jar from the shelf and started out of the cookhouse, to get water from the fountain. "Name of God!" she cried. The clay jar smashed on the tiles.

"What is it? What's the matter?" But as he reached her side she could only point, with a shaking finger, to the sky. Huge, dirty-white thunderheads of steam billowed to the north, the wind driving them toward the sea. Higher and higher they piled on one another, darkening with every second. On the other side of the garden wall a dog began to howl. A woman's voice screamed.

He ran across the courtyard and up the stairs, rapped once on his bedroom door and then pushed it open. Medora was awake, sitting on the bed wrapped in his robe, her face in shadow. "My darling," he said, "we're getting out of here at once. I've arranged for a carriage." He put the clothes down on the bed beside her. "The volcano has never looked as bad as it does now."

"What is life's heaviest burden?" asked a youth of a sad and lonely old man. "To have nothing to carry," he answered.

E. SCOTT O'CONNER

She lifted her head. "You really think I will run away with you, don't you?"

He could only stare at her, not believing, not understanding. The dog next door howled on a rising note of frenzy.

"You made up your mind last night to 'save' me, didn't you? Even if it meant destroying me." She got up from the bed, drawing the robe more closely about her, her face set and wan in the filtered light. "You thought that if I stayed here I'd never go back to Paul, because I wouldn't have the courage to face him, after—after ——"

"I thought that you loved me. As I love you."

"Do you think love is a weapon, to be used to get your way?" she asked harshly. "Please go, so that I can dress. I'll try to slip into the house by way of the pontique. I'll confess to Paul what happened, and pray that, in time, he'll be able to forgive me."

"You can't get into the house unseen. Everyone will be outside, watching the volcano. They'll see you return, in that dress, and know you've spent the night down in the city. How will the Durand pride take that?" He wasn't going to put into her mind the thought that her husband might be on his way to look for her, to take her away with him.

"You always have an answer for everything! If I don't go back now, how could Paul keep the fact that I've disappeared a secret?"

"You can leave that to him. He could say that you became so terrified in the night that he sent you away. He may very well leave soon himself, with the volcano looking as it does." There seemed no reality in this scene. Not with that shared, rumpled bed behind her.

"No, he won't go. He's convinced that St. Pierre is a safe place."

"We can't stand here arguing," he said desperately. A confusion of voices from the street penetrated to that rear room. The air was growing strangely heavy. "When the carriage comes, you're going with me. I swear to you that I'll take you even if I have to do it by force; if I carry you to it fighting and screaming. It isn't a question now of whether you will eventually go back to your husband or not. I'm simply not leaving you here, in this danger of death."

She turned to the window, toward the court, where the darkness was clamping down like a lid over a well. "And you think that life, just being alive, is all that should matter now?" she said in her new, furious voice. "How easily you take responsibility! Last night and now—playing God with me, with my life. You're quite sure that you can make everything 'turn right' in the end, aren't you? It just comes down to a matter of keeping me alive." She lifted her shoulders. "Very well, I will go with you. But only because I seem to have no choice. Not because I'm afraid to stay."

Perhaps he had been wrong in taking the gamble of choosing the Morne Rouge route, Tom thought, as he urged on the horses. God alone knew what the volcano might be building up to—and how soon it might reach some fearful climax. Still, this way, he wasn't worried about pursuit. It would seem logical to take flight in the direction away from the mountain, not by going up to it.

He turned to Medora. "I wish you would come up beside me."

"I prefer to stay here." She sat with her hands clasped together in her lap, her eyes refusing to meet his.

She had been forced to take this attitude toward him, he thought now, with pity. Otherwise, she would have to admit to herself

Set your table right, morning, noon and night

ROYLIES and ROYLPRINTS

What a pretty way to brighten meals and lighten work! Roylies and Roylprints delight your family with fresh, crisp settings for every meal—enchant your guests with "Sunday-best" appeal. You serve in good taste and there's no waste of time and work. Save work too, for there's no linen soil...no laundry toil. All this ease and elegance...with economy, too! Complete table settings with Roylies and Roylprints cost only pennies. Choose Roylprints Paper Place Mats from a refreshing assortment of patterns and colors...spark them with Roylies in dainty, authentic lace and embroidery designs. Sold at Variety, Supermarket and Department Stores.

DESIGNED FOR Royal LIVING EVERY DAY

Royal Lace Paper Works, Brooklyn 1, N. Y. (Division of Eastern Corporation)

that it was love that had drawn her down the road to his house last night, and love that had kept her there. His optimism began to return, because, after all, there was still time for them. He hadn't lost her yet.

Under the cloud pall, the road seemed caught in a storm-hued dream in which nothing stirred, no birds rose from the hedges, no small animal ran out of a thicket. The only sound was the muted rhythm of their horses' hoofs, and a squeak of leather.

Now something was changing. Not in the scene, not in the slight, hot wind that fretted in the tree ferns. Something in the very air itself, running along his nerve ends, and he was seized by a shaking sense of urgency as he took the whip and lashed at the horses.

Medora sensed it too. "Tom!" she cried. "Tom, what is it?"

"I don't know."

A hundred, a thousand cannons roared. He jerked his head around. A great mushroom-shaped cloud shot from the southwestern face of the volcano, a cloud rushing furiously down on St. Pierre.

The horses screamed and ran and he sawed frantically on the reins, while a giant vacuum sucked at them. He saw the boulder just before the light wheels struck it. He dropped the reins and shouted, "Jump! Jump!" as the carriage toppled over. Then there was an engulfing blackness.

Consciousness returned, but the world was in total darkness. Somewhere in what seemed a vast distance, Medora was moaning his name out of the depth of terror.

He crawled and groped for her in the night of blackness. He thought, This is the end. We didn't escape, after all. Small stones rattled against the carriage, struck at him through the tangle of thicket. "Medora?"

"Yes." It was only a disembodied whisper.

"I love you," he said, as though it was the only prayer he knew, the only final justification of his life that he could offer. "I love you."

She didn't answer and he couldn't find her. He waited then for death, but the enemy had gone on, had left them behind. Suddenly the darkness was lifting a little and he could see the outline of the carriage. The horses had kicked free and disappeared. He got up and called to Medora again, and she materialized out of the murky light, near the other end of the carriage, tottering drunkenly. He ran to her and grabbed her arm and she looked up at him with glazed eyes, her face utterly devoid of color. It was the waxen face she might wear when she was old, and the years had taken the bloom, and a fire could no longer warm her.

"The mountain exploded on St. Pierre," she said in a flat, toneless voice.

"Yes." He tightened his hold on her arm. "We've got to go on. That may not have been the end of it."

The air vibrated with a series of crackling reports. Against the smoky sky flared a long, yellow light, an evil sunset in the early morning. From south to north, St. Pierre was going up in flames. The fusillade had come from its rum factories, exploding.

Medora began to run down the road. "Come back!" Tom shouted, but she ran on, and he skirted the fallen carriage and started after her. Medora had stopped running, she stood rigid at the curve. "We must go on," he said to her again, as he reached her.

Then he saw why she had stopped.

He saw the twisted, blasted and uprooted trees, the stripped and seared foliage. The landscape of a nightmare. "God in heaven," he said, his voice thin in the heavy, the dead silence. "We only just missed it."

She looked around her with that still-dazed expression. "This was only the perimeter. No one could be alive down there. And with the fire ——"

"Some may have escaped," Tom said.

"Only if they had run away. Like us. Morne d'Orange would have been in a direct line. . . . If only I could believe that Paul died without knowing ——"

"He would have thought that you were sleeping late. He wouldn't have discovered yet that you had gone." It was like the first box of roses offered in courtship, the first pair of gloves—this first, compassionate lie.

He stretched out his hand. "It's stopped raining. We can start on. Mrs. Hitchcock and her daughter are at Morne Rouge. We can stay with them until we find a way of getting to Fort-de-France." He looked at her anxiously: the white, pinched face, the enormous eyes, the thinness emphasized by the wet, clinging dress. He loved her so, and it seemed to him that somehow he should have managed things better. "It's a long way. Do you think you can make it?"

"Yes, I can make it." Her eyes went around again. "All dead," she said. "The people who were praying in the church, the nuns, the children. Hortense, who was so good. . . . And I am here—alive."

"You wouldn't be if we'd started only a few minutes later. We just barely escaped it, by a miracle."

"A miracle?" Her voice was edged with hysteria. "So that's it. A miracle! Let's have some truth now! When the steam clouds shot up, of course Paul would have wondered why I didn't waken, why I didn't appear. He would have gone to my room and he would have realized that I had gone to you. He knew very well why you came to the house night before last." Her knuckles were as white as bleached bones. "He died knowing he had a faithless wife. And because I was faithless, I am here, I was spared. That's your miracle! Why couldn't you have let me die?" Her small, strong hands pounded in agony. "How can I ever expiate this? How can I accept a life to which I have no decent right?"

The sweat was cold on his forehead. "Stop it! Stop this self-torture!"

"The torture hasn't even begun. I will have to look into the eyes of people who have lost everyone they loved. And they'll ask, 'How did you escape the catastrophe?' And what am I to answer? 'By running away with my lover!'"

At Morne Rouge, that second night after the eruption, they had gone to bed as soon as night fell, because the oil for the lamps was gone, and because they would make an early-morning start for the south of the island, for Fort-de-France.

All day the news had drifted up from below, like smoke from the still-smoldering city: "No survivors. No survivors." The death cloud had reached down the coast as far as Carbet, where it had been turned back by a strong counterwind, and there some had escaped. But in St. Pierre there were only the dead, lying in their houses, or piled up in confusion in what had once been streets. That furnace-hot mass of pulverized, gas-charged lava, engulfing the city like an avalanche, had killed them all, in seconds. Soldiers had already begun to burn the bodies, while over the whole north end of the island the steam of the volcano still canopied the sky.

Even in high Morne Rouge it was hot that night, and Tom turned, sleepless, on the thin mattress. Tomorrow they would all go to Fort-de-France, and then what was to become of Medora? A return to her father in America and a lifetime of self-immolation; a passing out of his own life forever? He said aloud, "I've got to think of something." He hadn't been able to manage a word alone with her since they had arrived at the Hitchcock house.

Somewhere a door opened and closed softly and he heard light footsteps in the hall. Someone was going down the stairs—a step had creaked. Nell, no doubt, remembering shutters she had forgotten to lock. Mrs. Hitchcock had been certain that, with the town in such a state of disruption, somebody would try to murder them in their beds.

If only he could take Medora to his mother. But of course there was no chance at all that she would go there; or that she would go anywhere with him, because he was now the symbol of her guilt.

His mother must believe him to be dead. The news of the catastrophe would be on its way by cable all around the world.

Whoever had gone down the stairs had not returned, and now he felt alarm. He got out of bed, lit his stub of candle, drew on his dressing gown and went into the hall. The door of Medora's room was not quite closed.

He threw it wide, saw the open wardrobe, saw that her shoes and borrowed dress were not there. He knew at once where she had gone. But she could not possibly make it, exhausted by shock, as they all were. She would fall somewhere by the roadside.

Returning to his room, he dressed quickly. He carried his shoes in his hand until he reached the front door, because he didn't want to waken Mrs. Hitchcock and Nell. It shouldn't take him long to catch up with Medora, to bring her back.

From time to time the volcano rumbled, as it had been doing since the explosion, with a deep, angry growl. He began calling Medora's name at intervals, fearful of passing her in the darkness. Already looters were descending on St. Pierre, robbing the dead. Medora hadn't once removed her diamond earrings, Durand's last gift to her. She could be killed for those earrings.

Out at sea a big American freighter still burned, and down in the city the lights of the pyres flamed and lantern lights flickered among the ruined houses. But the Morne d'Orange road was deserted as Tom climbed upward.

Now, by the uncertain starlight, he could see a crumbled wall ahead of him, and beyond a shapeless mound where the Durand house had been. Something was moving near the front of that heap of rubble: a wavering shadow, a barely seen fluttering of scarf ends. He opened his mouth to call, and then he saw another movement, another shadow, a black, half-crouched following shadow, only a few feet behind the first one.

He dared not shout to warn her, for the stooping shadow carried a club. He made a rush across the silent carpeting of volcanic ash, jumping the man from behind, knocking at the right arm as he did so. The club flew wide. Then they were down together on the ashes. He felt the hard sinews of the half-naked body twisting like ropes as he tried to keep his slippery hold, throwing his weight forward to press the face to suffocation in the dust, and calling at the same time to Medora to run, to run down the road.

The powerful cane cutter's back beneath him arched as he called to her again. Then it was he who was on the bottom, a knee thrust hard into his groin, hands at his throat. He tore at the hands convulsively.

And then suddenly the body above him was inert, a dead weight, the great hands fallen away from his throat. He drew air into his lungs in tearing gulps, struggled from beneath the motionless looter, and got to his feet.

Medora was standing there with a large stone in her two hands. "Have I—did I kill him?"

She looked so absurd, in the sashed dress, with her diamond earrings (those damned earrings) and with the stone still uplifted, that Tom wanted, crazily, to laugh. He said, "I doubt it," knelt and turned the man over, and felt his pulse. "He's alive," he said, "although he'll probably be unconscious for a while. But we must get out of here. It's dangerous to be alone."

"I came to look for Paul." She didn't ask him how he had discovered her absence, or how he had got there.

"I'll look. You go and sit somewhere—on the parapet."

She dropped the stone, and it sank without sound into the still-warm ashes. "All right," she said.

He took a cursory look around the ruins, aided now by a faint-shining moon. There were no bodies. They must be buried under that mass of stone and burned beams, unless one of the burial parties had already taken them away. He started as something black flapped above his head, and then dropped down on the wall, like a plummet. The vultures had returned to St. Pierre.

Medora was leaning against the corner of the smashed parapet. Tom told her, "They must all have been inside when the blast struck."

She made no comment. She was looking down at the city, which was partially illuminated by the glare from the funeral pyres. The long parallel lines of half-standing walls stretched away into black oblivion. One tower of the cathedral thrust upward, gaunt and skeletal. Above it all the crater of the volcano glowed bright red through its smoke.

"The silence," Medora said. "The terrible silence."

He might so easily have been looking for her tonight, back there among the stones, or he might have come, just now, too late, to find her murdered for her earrings. He was struck by a sense of the dreadful fragility of the human body: the too crushable bones, the flesh that a blast could shrivel. He had an impulse to reach out and touch her, not in desire, but to feel the warmth of her coursing blood. "Come, let's go," he said. "We'll try to find someone with a cart who's going back to Morne Rouge."

"I'm not returning to Morne Rouge. I'm going to Bellefontaine."

"To Bellefontaine!"

Did she, too, have some lingering doubt of her husband's death and hope to find him at the plantation? But she said that the one thing she could do for Paul now was to look after Bellefontaine, because he had loved it.

"But you can't stay there alone." From underneath that wreckage—if he was there—Durand could still reach her, Tom thought bitterly, where he could not.

"I'll have Uncle Robert." She brushed the damp hair back from her forehead. "He'll come over from Sainte Anne to be with me at night."

"You're out of your mind. Bellefontaine is too close to Pelée. And look at it. Look at it tonight!"

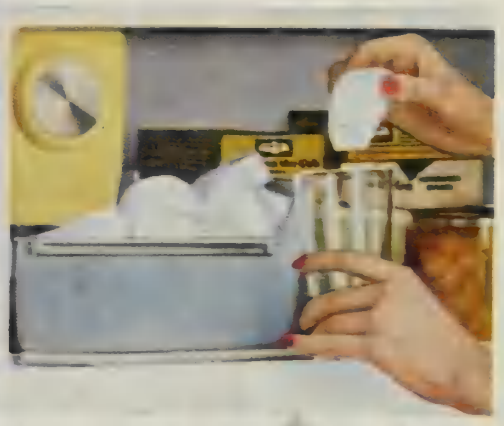
"Don't think you're going to stop me from going." She turned on him with her fists clenched at her sides. "Haven't you done

CONTINUED ON PAGE 196

"Of course he only wears it in our own home."

LOOK WHAT GAS OFFERS YOU TODAY

The cleanest, most modern kitchen money can buy!



Today's Built-in Gas Range Cooks Whole Meals Automatically. It's loaded with wonderful controls—it's automatic all the way! It makes difficult recipes as easy as boiling water. And when you cook with Gas, you have perfect control of cooking temperature on top of the range, in the oven, in the broiler. High heat when you want it hot; low heat when you want it low. No warm-up wait, no hangover heat. It's clean heat, too—the famous blue flame actually eats up smoke, prevents stains on kitchen walls.

Servel Gas Refrigerator Plops Ice Cubes Almost into Your Glass! It's Servel's exclusive ice maker—the handiest invention since the can opener. It makes ice cubes automatically, keeps a serving basket full, ready to use. No more messy ice trays! And Servel has no moving parts in the freezing system to wear out! No wonder it's backed by a 10-year warranty—twice as long as any other refrigerator. What's more, it works silently, dependably on economical Gas.

AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

BURNER-WITH-A-BRAIN makes any pan completely automatic. This new automatic top burner heat control has a sensing element that "feels" the heat of the pan, then raises or lowers the flame to maintain the right temperature. Food can't scorch or burn on this thermostatically controlled top burner.

ONE-ICE-CUBE—OR DOZENS! Here's a close-up of Servel's clever ice-maker—the magic invention that makes ice trays outmoded—no trays to fill, spill or refill! Plenty of ice all the time for cool summer drinks. Only the Servel GAS refrigerator has it!

Cabinets by Youngstown Kitchens

See the new Dixie built-in Gas range and the new Servel refrigerator in the New Freedom* Gas Kitchen display at your Gas company or Gas appliance dealer's.

Watch "Playhouse 90" with Julia Meade on CBS-TV. Sponsored by your Gas company. See local listings for time and station.

ONLY GAS

does so much more...for so much less!

*Reg. A.G.A.

The modern, economical fuel for automatic cooking • refrigeration • water-heating • clothes-drying • house-heating • air-conditioning • incineration.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 194

enough to me? But for you, I'd be at peace," and she made an impassioned gesture toward the remains of the house. "At peace!"

There were just the two of them, Tom and De la Grandville, in the family parlor, drinking second cups of coffee in the Sunday-morning quiet. Bellefontaine had received only a light coating of ashes from the eruption, but still it was like being under siege here. The enemy had leveled the port city—would it withdraw now, or was it gathering strength for a new assault?

You couldn't step outside without seeing the ugly yellowish vapor that hid the mountain, and from time to time, when the wind was still, you heard the crystals of the great chandelier in the gallery jangle suddenly and harshly together, announcing a subterranean shock from the volcano.

"We may have a little trouble here this morning," De la Grandville said, dumping more sugar into his cup.

"What kind of trouble?"

De la Grandville seemed calm enough, but one hand played constantly with his watch chain. What had he actually thought last night, Tom wondered, when he and Medora had arrived at Sainte Anne together?

"Oh, it may turn out to be nothing at all." De la Grandville shrugged. "Ah, here comes Medora." He got to his feet. "And Depoil, too, poor fellow."

Medora said good morning, looking only at De la Grandville, and crossed the room to kiss the old man's cheek. She apologized for sleeping late, and De la Grandville said that she had needed the sleep and patted her shoulder.

Tom shook Depoil's hand as they exchanged good mornings. But it would never be a good morning, a bright and promising morning, for Depoil again. He was a lawyer from St. Pierre who had come over to Grande Anse four days ago to take care of some business. His narrow, scholar's face was tallow-colored and his hands kept trembling.

"Sit down here," De la Grandville said to Medora. "I was just telling M. Carruthers that we may have difficulty. Since your manager took off, no arrangements have been made for funds with which to pay the men this morning. I brought over half of what I had at Sainte Anne, but it won't be nearly enough. And yesterday I heard disquieting rumors." He shook his head. "You've got a trouble-maker here, my dear. He's been trying to stir things up."

"Naud," Medora said. "It could only be Naud. I used to tell Paul he should let him go. He has too much power over the people."

"Well, whoever he is," De la Grandville said, "he's been telling the cane cutters that

All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing.

EDMUND BURKE

the Durands have been ruined in the loss of the St. Pierre banks and will never be able to pay them; that they should leave at once, and not go on working for nothing."

"But we can tell them we have funds in Fort-de-France," Medora said.

"It's a matter of convincing them." De la Grandville stroked his mustache. "I'll talk to them," he told her. "I'll promise them that someone will go to the capital at once, to get their money."

"I can do that," Tom said. Medora didn't even glance at him.

"I think you should let the men go," Depoil said. He had walked over to the window and then turned away as though he couldn't bear the daylight on his face. "And I think you should all leave this part of the island too. This was what I said to my wife, when I tried to get her to come to Basse-Pointe with me. Bringing the children, too, of course. She just kept insisting that she wasn't afraid."

"Yes, I know, mon vieux," De la Grandville said gently.

"She was in the galerie when I left. The parrot was on his perch behind her, picking at seeds. Da-Féfé was watching the baby as it crawled about on the matting. She had been my wife's da, you know." He kept opening and closing his hands with a sucking sound. "The boy was playing with his toy grenadiers. My wife was embroidering some bit of stuff ——"

"This does no good, my poor friend."

"No, it doesn't, does it? The boy would have made his first Communion today, and we had invited all our friends." Depoil sank down into a chair. "At night when I close my eyes, they are there, just as I left them. The boy doesn't even look up at me from his grenadiers. The music box is playing 'Les Cloches de Corneville,' and my wife goes on rocking and smiling, smiling at nothing." He struck his forehead with his fist. "Can you understand how, for a moment, one can almost hate the dead for their immunity?"

"Ah, yes." De la Grandville sighed.

"I think I hear the men coming," Tom said. "I hear voices anyway."

"I sent word for them to come to the house for their money." De la Grandville got up briskly. "I had a reason. I brought these with me. My dueling pistols. A table has been set up on the porch," he explained, "and I will sit there, doling out a little money to each of the men. You, M. Carruthers, and you, Etienne, will be in the galerie, watching through the shutters, which will be partly closed. This," he said with a little smile, "is probably only dramatics on my part. Still, one can never tell what may happen with people living in a state of fear. The first ones may try to seize their full pay. In that case, a shot or so fired over their heads should be sufficient."

"Bien entendu." Depoil nodded.

Tom took the pistol as De la Grandville extended the handle to him, balancing it awkwardly. He hadn't touched a gun since that day long ago when his own rifle had put an end to his father's life. He had never wanted to hold a gun again.

The men appeared around the corner of the house. They were dressed for Mass, wearing white shirts, ties, hats. They carried their polished shoes in their hands; they wouldn't put them on until they reached the town. They came silently, too silently.

Then De la Grandville stood up at the table. They all knew, he said, that because of the disaster all communications were disrupted. For this reason, money with which to pay them had not been brought this week. He had enough, however, to give each one an amount that would tide his family over with rice and codfish until more money arrived.

"Arrives from where?" a voice shouted at him. "It always came from St. Pierre. The banks of St. Pierre have been destroyed."

"Naud!" Medora whispered. She had drawn nearer to the window, and Tom shook his head at her and motioned her back.

"There's money in Fort-de-France," De la Grandville said imperturbably.

The man was shouldering forward, the others making way for him. "We're not fools. We're not going to stay here, breaking our backs in the fields on empty promises."

The man Naud had stopped, and Tom remembered a snake coiling and a black figure watching it, poised for that split instant in which he could move. This was the same man. This was Durand's pet sorcerer.

Naud said, "We have every right to collect what's due us, and there are things of value in the house, my friends."

Tom heard a click as Depoil, beside him, cocked his pistol. A shot over the heads of the crowd would have no more effect than a buzzing mosquito; you could feel mob spirit moving among them.

"I warn you." Now De la Grandville's face was slowly purpling. "I warn you to stay right where you are. Medora! Go back inside!"

Tom hadn't seen her leave the galerie, but there she was now, walking across the porch. Tom cocked his own pistol, and he felt the sweat breaking out on his forehead. Did she think that she could talk sense into those men? Could she never recognize a real danger when she saw it?

Halfway across the porch, she stopped, facing the cane workers. "M. de la Grandville has told you the truth," she said. "There'll be money here in a day or two from Fort-de-France. But you don't have to believe him. I have here a pair of diamond earrings and a diamond ring. It's all the jewelry I have, because the rest was lost, but it's worth many thousands of francs. It will be a security to you until the money arrives. You'll appoint someone to keep it. Then if no money comes, you'll have it. You won't have lost anything by staying at Bellefontaine and going on with your work." She moved on now, slipping into the chair, and the earrings and the ring were on the table beside the francs.

"I'll take the jewels," Naud said. "I speak for these people."

"You don't speak for me." It was a middle-aged man as big and strongly built as the sorcerer, springing up to the porch beside him. "We won't take your pretty jewelry, madame. We won't touch those things that our dead M. Paul gave you. If you will divide the money on the table among us, we'll take it. I'll take mine first, if you please. I don't wish to be late, joining the women for Mass." He added with a shrewd touch, "My wife has the devil's own temper."

Someone laughed. And then a strange, concurrent sigh came from the men, a sigh of relief, because the mood had been turned; because they had been saved from doing something disgraceful.

Medora counted out francs and handed them, smiling, to her champion. Then the others started filing by, each with a polite "Méci, madame." Glints of sunlight caught in her hair and in the diamonds, lying untouched on the table.

Tom put down his pistol. He knew, as well as though she had told him, that, waiting in the galerie, she had remembered the story of her grandfather and the run on the bank, when the old man had sat inside the entrance with the packets of his own money before him on a table, turning back the depositors with that particular Hardin aura of money and pride.

"That's a girl of courage," Depoil remarked.

"Oh, yes," Tom said. "She's a Hardin. You wouldn't know about the Hardins, but she remembered just now that she is one, and so she knew exactly what to do."

Depoil lifted his eyebrows quizzically. "You know, of course, that you're speaking in riddles," he said.

"I apologize," Tom said. "But I don't know why I didn't get some glimmering of the truth before. It's been the Hardin pride with her, all along, ever since the eruption." He was working up a rage, and there was a certain pleasure in it, probably because he was tired: tired of the emotions of pain and pity and inadequacy. Could you grow tired at last of any emotion—even of passionately returned love and of grief?

"Mme. Durand prefers unhappiness," Tom said. "It would hurt her pride to be let off too easily. And that's because she's a Hardin." He could see her getting up from the table now, the last of the men going off, counting his money. She was running the thin wires of the earrings into the tiny holes pierced through her ear lobes. "But you don't know about the Hardins. It's a long story."

"I know about some things when I see them," Depoil said. "And other things I can deduce." He turned his cigarette between his yellow-stained fingers. "She suffers and you're involved in her suffering, but you can do nothing to help her, and because of that you begin to feel a resentment, a kind of hate, even, growing out of your helplessness. Well, here they are!"

De la Grandville had his arm about Medora's waist. "Ma foi," he said, beaming at them, "but that was touch and go for a moment. I have a brave grandniece here. You saw everything, of course."

"I salute you, madame." Depoil kissed her hand.

"And so do I," Tom said. "The Hardins of Colesville, Pennsylvania, would have been very, very proud of you."

Medora gave him a brief, guarded look, but said nothing.

"We were having an interesting discussion, M. Depoil and I," he said. "The subject was pride. Pride, and how guilt is so often just a matter of pride. We say to God, 'You must understand that my sin is much greater than that of an ordinary person, because I am who I am. If You let me off easily, You're not showing proper respect.'"

"We'll not start a theological discussion, my Protestant friend," De la Grandville said amiably, and he opened his watchcase to check the time. "The carriage should be here to take us to Mass."

"Why shouldn't I leave immediately for Fort-de-France?" Tom said. "Then I could be there when the bank opens tomorrow."

"It's an excellent idea," De la Grandville said. "I'll send someone at once for the other carriage and a driver."

When Tom came down, Medora was waiting near the front door. She handed the draft to him silently. The amount surprised him. "That's a lot of cash to carry."

"It may have to last us for quite a while."

"There are always your diamonds."

"Why is it you want to cheapen my effort to prevent trouble out there?" she said furiously. "I'm not stupid. I understood all that sarcasm in the galerie. I was right." She pressed back against the doorjamb, the flush of her anger lying along her cheekbones. "Something did happen between your family and mine. You've hated the Hardins all your life!"

"Not all of them."

"Why any of them? What did they do to you?"

Now was the time to tell her.

"Answer me! You've talked of love, love, love all the time. Love, in coming between my husband and me. Love, in forcing me into the position of running away from St. Pierre with you. I think the word you should have used is hate."

NEW PABLUM ASSORTED PAK

with wider variety... more "freshness protection" than any other baby cereal

RE-SEALABLE POUR SPOUT—Pablum's is the only 1-oz. baby cereal package with this convenience. So neat. So sure to protect Pablum's freshness.

All the wonderful flavors in this Assorted Pak are made to Pablum's high pharmaceutical standards, prepared with that smooth, smooth texture Baby loves.

SO EASY TO POP INTO PURSE OR BAG when you go visiting with Baby. Just another convenience you'll love.

Pablum Products DIVISION OF MEAD JOHNSON & CO., EVANSVILLE, IND. Mfrs. of nutritional and pharmaceutical products.

He thought, almost impersonally, She's changing, she's toughening under the pressure of the things that have happened to her. She couldn't have made a violent scene a few weeks ago.

"You sneered in there at the Hardins' pride." She didn't lower her voice. "Isn't it the truth that you've wanted all along to humble one of us? To destroy one of us in any way you could?"

"That's a foul thing to say!" he almost shouted. He was as angry as she now. "I fell in love with you," he told her, "but it was certainly the last thing in the world I wanted to do. When I met you on the Hampton I had only one thought, and that was to keep out of your way."

"Because I was a Hardin! What is this old story we're playing out in Martinique?"

"It's one in which the Carrutherses are marked to be the scapegoats. Still, we seem to go on running your errands for you." He picked up his valise. "There's a fine irony in this. The perfect climax would be for me to be killed on the road—for a sackful of Hardin money."

Out in the harbor the sails of a French cruiser drooped under a sweltering tropical sun as Tom crossed the savane to the open kiosk opposite the Grand Hotel de l'Univers. It was nearly noon. His driver had flatly refused to make such a late start for Bellefontaine and had gone off to search for friends among the back-country refugees.

The kiosk was crowded. Tom rolled a cigarette, absent-mindedly, spilling tobacco. . . . And then he saw André Khan coming toward the kiosk, walking barefoot across the parched grass, and he lifted his hand to attract his attention.

André stopped still, and then his face broke into a grin. It was like the old André, the André before that last night together at the Café Rouge.

"So Pelée didn't get you," André said. "I was furious when you didn't show up, but all the same I seem to be glad you got away. How did you manage it?"

He had gone, Tom explained, to accompany Mme. Durand to Bellefontaine. She was there now, with M. de la Grandville, and he had come to Fort-de-France to take care of some business for them. He thought it all sounded convincing and reasonable.

"I hope your business isn't taking you back up there," André said. "Everyone expects a new outbreak from the volcano. Fortunately for me."

"Why fortunately for you?" The André of the grin had gone now, like a chimera sucked into the pulsating heat.

"Because people want to leave the country, and I'm taking them off—at my price—in my stepfather's boat." He put out an arresting hand as Tom reached for francs to pay the waiter. "No, I'll pay. I have plenty of cash. You must let me make a vulgar display of it." He shoved money at the waiter. He put his elbows on the table. "Queer to think of old Amos as dead."

"He waited for the mail," Tom said. He didn't like that "old Amos," the cheap familiarity that smacked of the self-conscious half-caste. "Mrs. Hitchcock and Nell were at Morne Rouge. I'm afraid they may still be there." The uneasiness stirred in him again. He would go straight from Bellefontaine to Morne Rouge.

"If you see them, tell them that if they want to go to Sainte Lucie, I'll give them a special rate." André swatted at a fly on the table. "After all, I owe something to Miss Hitchcock. When I'm a rich man, perhaps I'll raise a monument to her."

Tom said, "I like this new role even less than the old one."

"The old one?"

"When you were trying too hard to be the correct, earnest clerk."

"Ah, but don't most people play a role?" André said lightly. "They try to be consistent to the idea others hold of them. This makes it easy for everyone. People don't like their friends to be complicated." The cathedral bell jangled sweetly out of tune, and he checked his watch—a handsome gold one. "This," he said, "represents a family's passage to Sainte Lucie. An heirloom."

"I can see you're very proud of yourself," Tom said. He felt as though he had been drawn into some degrading scene. The night when André had talked with passion about the study of volcanoes might never have been. He began drinking his beer hastily. He was tired of this André.

"The trouble with you," André said, "is that you remain an idealist. I should think you would find it difficult now. A great catastrophe is supposed to bring people together in the compassion of humanity, isn't it? Have you listened to the talk that goes on in Fort-de-France? The mulattoes are saying that some of the planters went down to St. Pierre following the eruption and broke open the strongboxes of the banks that held records of their debts. The whites say that the mulattoes who are in charge of relief supplies will give food only to people of color. Stay in Fort-de-France and keep your idealism."

"I'm not staying. I have to go back to Bellefontaine."

"Ah, yes—Bellefontaine. M. Durand is presumed to be dead?"

"I don't think there can be any doubt of it," Tom said. "If he had escaped he would have gone to look after Bellefontaine. If he was injured and couldn't go, he would have got a message through—to De la Grandville, at least. He'd be concerned about Bellefontaine, if for no other reason than the money tied up there."

"How logical." André gave him a look of studied insolence. "And so now you think you may do well for yourself. Mme. Durand has always been rich, but now she is that desirable object, a rich widow, hein?"

"I could throw this drink in your face," Tom said, and it seemed to him that a hope came into André's eyes: a plea for an overt act that would provoke a physical struggle and release momentarily some of the inner rage that consumed him. "But it would be a stupid the toasted dog food!

Ken-L BISKIT
Ken-L BISKIT
Ken-L BISKIT

hing to do," Tom finished, and got up from he table.

"Very stupid." André stood up too. "I think hat if you did, I would kill you," and André's nand touched a dagger that was thrust rakishly nto his belt. "What a fool you are! What a sheep staked for the tiger," he burst out in a meaningless tirade. "Always the blind, unsuspecting fool! You sicken me. All of you sicken me."

"You must have loved her very much," Tom said. "I'm sorry, because I was your friend. I'd still like to be."

André's hand closed on the dagger hilt. "Spare me your insulting pity," he said, and walked away. Then he turned abruptly around and came back to the kiosk. "Give me a pencil and a piece of paper," he panted. Tom handed him an envelope and a stub of pencil, and André scrawled something. "There," he said, and this time he nearly ran from the kiosk.

Tom looked at the back of the envelope: a street address, numéro 7, rue des Cinq Soeurs.

The little Martinique blackbirds had stopped their calling, and now the tree frogs had taken over; they were like musicians that worked in shifts. Far out at sea the light of a ship moved: a brief, bright glow, and then a vanishing beyond the horizon. Medora sighed and turned toward the house.

"Madame!" It was a faint, high-pitched call behind her.

She saw the figure moving out of the shadows of the banana-leaf hedge, the high points of a madras. "Who is it? What are you doing there?" she demanded.

"Je suis Gabrielle."

"Gabrielle!"

The girl came slowly, limping. Medora couldn't see her face until she was almost beside her. It was worn and ravaged with fatigue, and the large Carib eyes were dulled like those of a sick animal. Her feet were bare and her dress was dirty and torn. Gabrielle had escaped; and if Gabrielle, why not others from the house on Morne d'Orange? She seized the girl's arm. "How did you get away? Did any one else, did monsieur ——"

"I ran away the night before."

The servant who had slipped out from behind the cookhouse, Medora remembered, just before she herself had taken to the road. "Come on into the house," she said gently. "How did you get here?"

"I walked. For a while I stayed with some people in a hut near Morne Rouge, but then there was no more food. So I started for Bellefontaine. I had no other place to go," she said in a toneless voice. "I thought there might be a chance that monsieur—that you —— But you asked about monsieur. So he didn't escape with you."

"No," Medora said. "How long since you've eaten?"

"I don't know, madame."

Medora lit a lamp and opened the food safe. She found some meat from dinner, fruit and a basket of eggs. Gabrielle had sunk into a chair, making no effort to help her, her head drooping until the purple madras points were almost parallel with the floor. The scene between them at Morne d'Orange, Medora thought, putting water on for coffee, seemed long ago and unimportant. Too much had happened since then, too much had been felt, and this girl was close to collapse.

"But he wasn't one to be caught, not in any way, that one!" Gabrielle said suddenly.

"Who?" Medora asked.

Gabrielle didn't answer, falling back into her dazed and trancelike state. It's right that she should stay here, Medora thought, breaking two eggs into a copper pan. She belongs to Bellefontaine.

Seven, Street of the Five Sisters. But this couldn't be the right place—not this handsome suburban house on the shaded square. It couldn't possibly be André's headquarters in Fort-de-France, and yet he must have some connection with it, and he must see André as soon as his boat came in again. No passenger ship was immediately due in Fort-de-France, but if he and Medora could go with André to Sainte Lucie, they would have a better chance of picking up a steamer there, and he hoped to persuade her of this. He crossed the street.

A maid answered his knock, greeting him in correct French. His question seemed ridiculous, even as he framed it: "Do you know of a M. André Khan?"

"Non, monsieur, there is no one by that name here." She had the self-schooled, impassive face of Gabrielle, in the house on Morne d'Orange. And this place had the atmosphere of that house: the clean mosaic tiles of the vestibule, the thick-leaved green plant in a niche on the stairway.

The rear doors of the vestibule led into a brick-paved court, and Tom could see a hammock, and a man lying in it. "You told me that there was no one here, but I can see somebody in the court."

"But that is M. Durand," the maid said. "You didn't ask for M. Durand."

Durand woke from sleep, rubbed his eyes, and smiled—the quick, boyish smile.

"Diable!" he said softly.

"This monsieur pushed past me!" the maid said indignantly. "I would have told him you were asleep, monsieur."

"It's all right, Marie. He's a friend." Durand indicated a chair. "Do sit down." His smile widened. "And so you have found me. Ah, well, Fort-de-France is a small place, and things do get out."

"You escaped, after all," Tom said, but he knew that he felt no surprise. "What are you up to?" he demanded. "Why haven't you sent word to Bellefontaine?"

"I wish you'd sit down." Durand threw back the sheet that covered him, and Tom saw then that his left arm was in a sling, and in the strong sunlight blue shadows showed up under the bright, restless eyes. "Yes, I escaped—thanks to you. I came after you, you know. The horse reared and threw me when the eruption came." Durand produced a handkerchief with a whiff of cologne. "And while I wasn't burned, I inhaled carbon monoxide on the edge of the explosion and it's left me very weak."

"That's over a week ago," Tom said. "You could have sent ——" But Durand interrupted him. How was he to know that Medora was at Bellefontaine, as he now assumed that she was? He hadn't even been certain until now that she was alive.

"You seem to forget that she had run away with you," he said. "When I first came here, to this house of friends, I could only feel like a man betrayed. I thought I hated her—both of you—and I thought I didn't care what had happened to her."

It all sounded so plausible. And yet, in this pleasant court, with the green parakeets fluttering in their cage, Tom had a sense of a trap laid and waiting. "And now you care?" he asked.

"Suffering is a great teacher." The banal expression didn't fit well on his lips; he wasn't given to such phrases. "Lying here, I've had time to think."

Lying here, Tom thought, waiting for her. Reasoning that if she lived she would have gone to Bellefontaine, but that eventually she would come down to Fort-de-France, to return to her father. Lying here, giving her time to scourge herself, through days and nights of believing him dead. Durand had never had any intention of letting her go.

"And have you thought," he said, "of the fact that she may love me and that she should be given a chance at happiness?" He recognized the feebleness of his remark; heard the ring of his own uncertainty.

Durand moved in the hammock. "This heat!" he exclaimed. "We've never had anything like it in May. You can almost feel it building up to . . . something." He rolled his handkerchief between his hands. "Monsieur, you must know that you have no hope," he went on. "Because I can give Medora something that you can't give her, something that will mean a great deal more to her than love. I can give her forgiveness."

Tom got up suddenly, knocking over the frail chair.

"Now I'll be frank with you." The too-charming, immature smile returned, a smile that might have accompanied a confession of stealing apples. "I was tired of Medora. Shall we say that I was interested elsewhere? That person must be dead, but even if she weren't it would make no difference, because I want Medora. I didn't love her to begin with, but I must have fallen in love with her without knowing it. And then when she ran away with

NEXT MONTH

You're sitting in your office when in walks a slim, dark-haired young widow. She's sophisticated, charming. You take her to dinner. Soon you are irrevocably in love. Then she tells you, "Perhaps I should have mentioned . . . I have six children!" That's what happened to Mr. Willing, Cristine and

CRISTINE'S CHILDREN

By LUCY CORES

Complete in the July JOURNAL

THE

CRAYOLA®

CORNER

Constructive projects to keep children quietly occupied:

On long car trips when children become restless, crayons and clay come in handy. The youngsters can color with crayons or make baskets, dolls, all kinds of things from clay. A little table for the back seat of the car will provide a good work area. Things seen along the way suggest interesting subject matter.

On vacation mornings parents often welcome the chance to sleep a little later. You can keep children quietly busy first thing in the morning by leaving CRAYOLA Crayons and shirt cardboards or paper out for early risers to play with.

Leaf prints! One of the most rewarding summer art activities is making leaf prints. A good and easy method is to color the underside of the leaf with CRAYOLA Crayons. Then put the leaf between two pieces of paper and press with a hot iron.

Sea shell collection: Children at the seashore like to collect pretty sea shells. (Or, in the country, unusual rocks or stones.) Wash them and let the youngsters color them with crayons. The shells make beautiful ash trays and the stones become fine paper weights. 7.11

#48 hinged-top box of 48 CRAYOLA Crayons offers widest range of smooth brilliant colors. CRAYOLA Crayons are clean, safe, non-toxic.

BINNEY & SMITH

The "CRAYOLA" Makers

380 Madison Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

you ——" The amusement, the quick excitement in his eyes, was genuine. "I never dreamed she'd have the spirit!"

"And if she ran away, what makes you think she'll come back to you?"

"I told you. I know Medora. And so, it's plain, do you. If it's any consolation at all to you," Durand said. "I'm going to make her happy."

But he could never make anyone happy, not for long, and even in his hatred Tom felt a strange stirring of pity. There had never been anything solid and substantial in the world for Durand, and there never would be. Somehow he had absorbed from the tropical nature of this island its cruelty, its changeability, its carelessness of humanity.

He said, "I shall stop this."

"You may try to." Durand reached for a silver bell on the table beside him. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I'm going inside. This accursed heat!"

In his hut near Prêcheur, to which he had returned with fearful bravery, a small black fisherman named Théophile was breakfasting at daybreak on bread and coffee when the two deafening detonations of the second eruption shook the earth. He ran out of his house to see, but he saw nothing; either then or ever again.

The cloud of destruction rushed down on St. Pierre, savagely wrenching apart the walls that still stood, slamming down the remaining tower of the cathedral. Then, as if knowing that it would never, in spite of its great power, achieve the reputation of the first eruption, because no prey had been left for it in the city, it thinned and spread itself out in thwarted fury.

Over Morne Rouge it extended a canopy of blackness shot through with lightninglike flashes, hurling boulders. It dumped tons of ruinous cinders over the sugar estates on the Atlantic side, sent the rivers there boiling over their banks, and then, greatly spent, but still carrying behind it a sound like thund swept down over the twin peaks of Carbe rising sun turning its spirals to scarlet as advanced over Fort-de-France, twenty kilometers south of its beginnings. The dropped the last of its ashes and a scatt rain of little stones. Its noise died away, then the great, concerted cry of the city be heard.

And in Fort-de-France and all over M nique, as though it had left a hurricane behind it, people were set in motion—in te in courage, in responsibility, in ruthless g and in agonized love.

Tom felt nearly asleep on his feet, or, ra as though he already slept and all that happened since his return to Bellefontaine been part of a phantasy of sleep in which ple widely separated in actuality are bro together in a mad extravaganza: Med opening the front door as he lifted his han knock; Gabrielle of Morne d'Orange in kitchen; then Nell joining them. He had sumed that Gabrielle had died, along with others in that hilltop house, but this was country of the "revenants," of ghosts an those who returned. . . . The shadow of D Durand was suddenly long across the floo

In the morning he would convince D Grandville that they must leave the pla tion. The old man could offer no valid a ment now. They would find Mrs. Hitchcoc Grande Anse, and then they would go or Trinité. There were boats at Trinité, an they offered enough they could get transpo tion to Dominica. They didn't have to re to Fort-de-France, because American pas ger freighters stopped at Dominica.

It seemed to him that nothing could th this plan. It was only a final detail in a lar a predestined design.

"Tom," Medora said at his door, "I n talk to you. Please. We may not be able talk privately tomorrow."

"I'll be with you as soon as I can dress."

"I'm going down to the parlor."

Medora was sitting in one of the rock chairs. Her face was colorless. She was tw ing her diamond ring, pathetically loose n on her finger, and as soon as he entered room she said, "Tom, I saw your father af the mine explosion. It must have been t night. I heard him talking with my fathe

It was so unexpected that he received a ph ical jolt. "Why didn't you tell me this before

"I didn't remember it clearly until tonigh

"What did you hear? How did you happ to recall it tonight?"

She told him; she told him the story o dream that had not been a dream, and wh he listened Colesville came into that parlor Martinique; Colesville had caught up w them at last, as it had always been bound to

"You understand the significance of t scene, don't you?" Medora's expression w that of a child expecting to be punished something she had not done. "Tell me."

"Some other time," he said.

"No, now. Why would any other time better?"

She was right, no other time would be b ter, and he couldn't avoid giving her the tru she had asked for, even though he must h her.

It was her turn to prompt: "What was t accusation your father was making?"

"There was a breach of the law involved. any owner shall employ a fire boss who do not have the required certificate of competen and an accident shall occur by which a min is killed or injured, he or his heirs shall ha right of action against such owner and sha recover full value of damages sustained.'"

"And someone broke that law?" She didn ask, "Did my father break it?"

"Your father was in financial trouble. H couldn't raise any more money without sellin the mine. Certain safety devices should ha been installed to meet the state regulatio and he couldn't afford them. An ignora miner who didn't know the regulations an had no certificate was made fire boss. Th mine inspector ——" He couldn't go on. H had crushed his unlighted cigarette and h threw it in the ash tray, in a furious revo against this old burden that had been laid o

New life for old nylons BLU WHITE
INSTANT DISSOLVING BEADS

washes nylons dazzling white stops nylon grey before it starts

BLU WHITE's tiny beads of dazzling brighteners burst into action the instant they touch water—whitening, bluing, washing new life back into yellowed, greyed, dingy-looking nylons! Whites will look whiter, colors brighter when you pamper undies, stockings, blouses with BLU-WHITE! And nothing's safer!

WORKS WONDERS ON ALL OTHER MIRACLE FABRICS AND COTTONS, TOO, IN WASHBOWL OR AUTOMATIC WASHER!

A PRODUCT OF PUREX CORPORATION LTD

ANOTHER OF PUREX CORPORATION'S FAMILY OF PRODUCTS FOR YOUR FAMILY: SweetHeart Soap, New Blue Dutch Cleanser, Trend for dishes, Beads O' Bleach and Purex Liquid Bleach.

©1957 PUREX CORPORATION LTD *Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

RESIDUE

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

The salt with which I have taken love
In recent and wiser years
Is only the saline remnant of My floods of earlier tears.

him, on both of them. "You don't want to know!" he nearly shouted at her. "It all happened so long ago. There isn't any point in dredging it up."

"What about the mine inspector?"

"He was bribed," Tom said wearily. "He was a political hack who never made a thorough inspection, and your father asked mine, as the superintendent, to bribe him to pass a fire boss without a certificate."

Her body jerked as though a lethal volt had been shot into it, and the chair rocked back, creaking. "How do you know that? What proof have you?"

"It was all in the letter my father wrote before he killed himself. My mother had it with her the night she went to see your father. She told him he had to make full restitution to the families of the dead miners at once, or the letter would be made public."

She covered her face with her hands and he went to her then, kneeling beside the chair, trying to pull her head onto his shoulder.

"I'm sorry, darling. You mustn't take it this way." He repeated, "It happened so long ago," but it was long ago for only him. For her the deed had just been done, the dead, accusing bodies had been uncovered. He had thrown back the blankets that hid them.

She shuddered. "Then everything about him was a lie. The way he let me believe in his grand gesture and worship him. All those pompous sermons on truth and goodness and the Hardin code of honor that I must live up to!"

"He was trying to convince himself that he had merely made a business error—that he couldn't actually have done wrong. Can't you see that because of his own guilt he gave you too great a consciousness of sin? His secret was corroding him, and he made it corrode you too."

She wasn't listening. "And so that's why your father killed himself."

"Yes. You see, he had come up from the mine just before the explosion, presumably because of the payroll. Actually he was to meet the mine inspector and pay him the rest of his bribe. That's why he escaped, and he couldn't face living with that kind of escape. So he ruined my mother's life and marked me as the son of a suicide."

She gave him a quick glance, and then lowered her head and began twisting the ring again. A whole world of insects had invaded the room, buzzing about their heads, dashing themselves against the lamp and the walls. Like the volcano, Tom thought, the mine explosion had been building through the years to this second one, and there was no assessing the new damage. Once he had believed that knowing the truth would be a good thing for her, but "truth or consequences" was a risky game for adults. What could he say to her now? He wanted to give her love and he always gave her suffering. Whatever he did, in respect to her, he only broke and smashed; he felt a kind of mounting hysteria of futility.

Medora got up. She turned down the wick of the lamp, which had started to smoke. "I understand something now," she said in a drained, dull voice. "When my father was still under the effect of ether after his operation, he kept saying, 'I would have done it anyway.' Your mother should have given him a little time; she should have given him a chance to make a decision."

"I know that. But she's a person of strong character and she takes things into her own hands. I suppose she felt that she couldn't trust ——"

"Trust. That's it, isn't it?" She looked at him steadily above the soot-rimmed lamp chimney. "I think I've been aware of this in you all the time: that you're a great exponent of life, but you don't trust it and you don't trust other people. Your trust is only in yourself. You're the kind of man who can't let people go their own blundering way and find their own solutions. Yes, I think that's why I've been intuitively afraid of you."

She turned her back on him and went over to close the shutters she had thrown open. He watched her slight figure, but all the time he was seeing himself, just a short time ago, up in his bedroom busily making plans for everybody. He had said to her that the great gift was the gift of life, and yet he had seen for himself, these last days, how the demands of life accepted as normal and sensible could be, even must be, sometimes transcended.

Medora returned to the table and lighted her candle, and he was struck again by the realization of how different her hands were from those painted in her portrait. At Morne d'Orange he had been touched by the emptiness of her hands, and now they were emptier still because he had taken away from her the faith she had had in her father. He had been about to take more: to deprive her, by his clever maneuvering and by the weight of his will and his love, of the power of making a free decision. If she chose unreasonably and "threw herself away," he hadn't the right to say that this must prove wrong for her.

"Why weren't your hands in your portrait your own?"

His question must have seemed outrageously irrelevant to her. She gave him an amazed look. "The artist said my hands didn't belong with the rest of me, and Paul agreed with him. I don't have good hands."

"They're the best thing about you." And now he was going to push off. He couldn't delay any longer, and he was wrenched by an anguish of separation. He started to put out his hand, just to touch her hair, but this was a weakening gesture, and, instead, he closed his hand into a fist. "My dear," he said in a hoarse voice, like the voice of a stranger, "Paul is alive; I saw him in Fort-de-France. He'll take you back if you want him to. But I love you," he said. "You know how I love you."

She grabbed at the rim of the table, her head dropping forward, and he seized her under the arms, put her in a chair, and started for the dining room to get her some brandy. He was breathing as if he had climbed a morne, the roots clutching at his feet, the branches battering him.

Nell was in the doorway, rubbing her eyes with one hand, and with the other holding together a blue wrapper. "There's a most queer light in the sky, to the north. It looks like a fire."

Medora opened her eyes. "The cane fields! They're on fire!" she exclaimed. "Get Uncle Robert, Tom. Quick!"

But when he went into the hall, De la Grandville was coming down the stairs, stuffing his shirt into his trousers. "They're not Bellefontaine fields," he said. "They're the Lorrain fields, and there's a wide stone gulch between."

They opened a pair of shutters at the end of the galerie, and they could see the wide flare of orange light against a cold blue sky. "Looters?" Tom said.

"Most likely. Yesterday a band of them attacked a plantation near Basse-Pointe. They came in by sea. They demanded money, and when they didn't get it, they set the fields on fire. The people at the plantation weren't prepared for them, but if we're to be next tonight, we will be!" De la Grandville was calmly buttoning his shirt. "We'll have a few shots at them, anyway."

The lighted clock tower at Grande Anse appeared in a rocket burst of yellow. André held the course of the sloop far out to sea because of the mile-long breakers between Pointe Bourgant and Pointe Châteaugué, unfurling in claps of thunder.

"I'll never forget that scene at the dock as we cast off," old Hector remarked beside him. "All those people down on their knees praying to be taken away. You could have asked the moon for a passage today and got it." He said in an artful voice, "You have given up a great deal for the sake of one foolish white man."

"I had an obligation."

"That's the trouble with life, isn't it? Just when one thinks oneself a completely free man, up pops some obligation."

"This was a great one."

But it was not one that M. de la Grandville would have expected him to fulfill in this particular way. The old planter had given him only an obligation to himself, which was the most exacting one of all, and which had proved impossible of fulfillment.

The mast of the sloop dipped and swayed as the long, narrow hull raced on.

"Look there!" Hector cried in André's ear. "To the north."

Then André saw it: the running flash of burning fields. The boat seemed to stand still, on the crest of a wave.

"Crows—pillagers," Hector said. "They'll be everywhere tonight. The eruption will have driven the gendarmes from their posts."

"If M. de la Grandville has seen that fire, he'll be ready for them," André said. He

This plus in his diet proves you care

➔ Only French's, the clean, dependable Parakeet Seed, has the big plus in every package—an exclusive pep-up biscuit that actually promotes vigor, sharpens appetites, aids digestion! French's Parakeet Seed, with Biscuit, is one of the "Basic Five" foods of the Natural Feeding Diet, shown below, the only scientifically prepared diet that provides all the benefits of the foods that wild birds enjoy.

French's
NATURAL FEEDING DIET
KEEPS YOUR PARAKEET HAPPY AND HEALTHY

grow with Jockey Jr.®
BRAND
underwear
made only by Cooper's®

Active, growing boys of all ages need the security and comfortable coverage of Jockey Jr. underwear. Specially designed for your boy's body and activity. Sitting, walking or running there's no gap, bind or chafe. That's because of the special long-lasting Jockey elastic in waistband and leg openings, and the same careful attention to trimness and comfort that's tailored into Jockey underwear for men.

Undershirt Briefs T-Shirt Midway

known the world over by this symbol Cooper's, Incorporated—Kenosha, Wis. Licensees and registered users: Canada: J. R. Moodie Company, Limited; Australia: Speedo Knitting Mills; British Isles: Lyle & Scott; New Zealand: Lane, Walker, Rudkin; Switzerland: Vollmoeller; France: Verdier; Colombia: Textiles, Ego; Italy: Sacit; Denmark: Taco; South Africa: Ninian & Lester; Germany: Volma; Austria: Josef Huber's Erben; Ireland: Dublin Shirt & Collar Company; Mexico: Rinbros, S.A.; Venezuela: HRH.

BONADETTES®

STOP CAR SICKNESS

nausea, dizziness, vomiting in cars, planes, trains, boats!

Just one dose of delicious, melt-in-your-mouth BONADETTES prevents carsickness, airsickness and seasickness for 24 hours. No water needed!

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

At all drug stores . . .
Get 24-hour relief with TRAVEL-TESTED BONADETTES

Summer fun for youngsters starts with JACK and JILL
The better magazine for boys and girls

Make this the best summer yet for your favorite youngsters by ordering a subscription to JACK and JILL! And there's plenty of entertainment in each of the 12 colorful issues to delight them now—and throughout the rest of the year! Exciting stories, cutouts, games and puzzles will bring many happy playtime hours.

It's an ideal gift for birthday, holiday and surprise occasions. And JACK and JILL is so easy to order. Just fill out and mail the coupon below. We'll send a special gift card signed in your name . . . and bill you later. Order today!

PRICES (U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada)
1 year—$3.50 2 or more 1-year gifts from the same donor—$3 each

Unconditional Guaranty. The publishers agree, upon request direct from subscribers to their Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

JACK and JILL Dept. 7305 Independence Sq., Philadelphia 5, Penna.

My Name_____
Street or R.D._____
Town_____ Zone____ State____
____Bill Me. ____Payment Enclosed.
Please send a JACK and JILL gift subscription to:
Name_____
Street or R.D._____
Town_____ Zone____ State____
____Birthday ____Just a gift
Sign my gift card_____
Additional subscriptions may be written on a separate card or paper.

A CURTIS MAGAZINE

would be ready, one old man against a band. He wished that he had brought a pistol, but then a swim through the surf with it would make it useless. He had nothing but his father's dagger.

No lights marked out the house at Bellefontaine, but André knew when they were opposite to it, by a high rock formation that jutted into the sea. They anchored to seaward of the breakers and he prepared to swim ashore. "If I'm not back by tomorrow noon," he said to Hector, "return to Fort-de-France. Circumstances could keep me here."

"May the good God watch over you," Hector said.

"And over you, mon vieux."

The Atlantic water was colder than that of the Caribbean, and his body felt the sharp shock of it as he dived beneath the surface and came up again. He made for a spit of sand, and when he reached it, he stretched out, panting, because it had been a hard swim, even for him. Beyond the pale band of the highway a chasm in the trees and the thicket indicated the driveway. He crossed the road, empty of refugees here, and then he hesitated. If that fierce old man had noticed the fire, he might well be lying in wait, armed, behind the shutters of a window. He might shoot at the sight of a nearly naked figure.

It would be better to make an approach under cover, and then call to announce himself when he was near enough to be clearly heard. On both sides of the driveway stands of banana reached within a few feet of the ponds and the flower beds. André pushed into the planting on his right, and an almost total darkness enclosed him. He managed to part his canopy sufficiently to be able to look up, and he could make out the oblong of the house.

He was about to start on when he became aware of a rustling in the leaves more pronounced than that they made in the stirring of the wind. An animal? No, someone else was moving stealthily, not far from him, taking this same cover in approaching the house. He drew the dagger from his belt.

It became a menacing game. He would go on, and then stop, and in the fraction of a second that other would halt too. The other knew now that there were two of them in the dark banana jungle.

The planting came to an end abruptly, and André found himself on the open lawn. There seemed to be no movement now, and when he looked cautiously around he saw only his own attenuated shadow. He was lifting his head to call, when something heavy struck the side of his head. His knees buckled and he felt himself falling, but he twisted and struck out wildly with his dagger. A man screamed. The cry fell back into the silence; a thud on the ground was like a period.

Then he was down on all fours, fighting for his hold on consciousness. He was nearly blinded by the force of the blow, but he began creeping forward. His hand touched cloth and moved along a sleeve. It was a coat he felt, a linen coat. This was no cane worker turned robber, and somewhere within him a great premonitory fear gathered.

He dragged his trembling, searching hand downward until he discovered a pocket and his fingers closed over a box of matches. He squatted and struck one of the matches and before the wind snatched away the flame he had looked at the face of Paul Durand.

"God," he said. "Oh, God."

(It was no longer night. It was blazing day at Sainte Anne, and he tracked murderously after a boy who had stolen his book—his book ——)

He sought once more for the inert arm and found a wrist, as slender as a woman's. The pulse throbbed faintly.

He scrambled up and began shouting. He shouted for help, and he repeated his name. Then he could no longer stand, and he crouched down, like an animal beside its prey.

A light came on in the house, breaking through louvered shutters. But no one came, and he felt abandoned for eternity with his crime. The sound of casuarina trees was like the shocked, the shuddering accusation of a thousand voices. "Not I," he answered them. "It was not I. It was only my hand."

The front door opened and two figures appeared, one of them swinging a lantern. "André? André? Where are you?" This was Tom Carruthers, who was in Fort-de-France—no, in Morne Rouge.

But time and space had run together, and he called back, "Here. Here." Here I am. Here I was intended to be. His lips began to taste bitterly of salt.

Tom and M. de la Grandville got down on either side of Paul Durand, verifying his babbled assurance that Durand still lived. His voice went on endlessly, trying to explain, trying to tell them. On and on until M. de la Grandville broke in sharply, "Don't touch that dagger, M. Carruthers! See that the coachman is dispatched for the doctor—and the priest."

Tom sprinted into the darkness. "It may not be serious," M. de la Grandville said. "He may merely have fainted from the shock." He set the lantern on the ground. "I should have kept that dagger, Aziz," he said, but not unkindly.

"You weren't meant to, monsieur."

Slow footfalls descended the stairs, followed by lighter ones. The priest and his acolyte must be coming down. What had Durand confessed before receiving absolution? Tom wondered. You had to have a consciousness of sin in order to confess it. In the searching sunlight of that Fort-de-France courtyard, he had been struck by the youthfulness of Durand's face. Faces were open fields, meant to be furrowed by love and pity, implanted with conflicts. These Durand had never known.

Women can be just as surely starved for want of pretty clothes as they can for want of food.
LADY DUFF-GORDON

"Ah, here comes poor Mme. Durand," the doctor said. "I told you to try to rest, madame." He shook his finger at her.

"But Paul may ask for me." Medora went over to the coffeepot. She held her head in an unconscious attitude of listening. "I just wanted a little coffee."

"Here," Tom said, "let me do that."

He took the coffeepot from her and filled her cup. She thanked him with a vague politeness; she was not in this room with them at all. He felt that she had already relegated him to the past, and whether this was with regret or pain he could not know. Loneliness, the faithful companion of the future, took its place beside him.

"Gabrielle is proving such a help," Medora remarked as she sat down.

He had never noticed before how high the arch of her foot was; he didn't need any further detail to recall. He heard her add that Gabrielle seemed quite beside herself with apprehension. She said that the servants all loved her husband.

The martyr's crown was already being prepared for Durand. He would "make a good death," as the people here said. His courage had never been anything to question.

Medora asked about André then, and was told that he slept. She said that Paul had told her he had found out that she was at Bellefontaine, and he had come here. His hired driver, when they had reached the area of the burning cane fields, had refused to go any farther and Paul had come the rest of the way on foot. Then, like André, he had considered the possibility of an ambush at a window. So he, too, had taken to the banana planting for cover and had, of course, taken André for a stray robber. He had struck him with his gun butt.

"Paul was worried about me, you see," Medora explained. "He didn't know what might have happened to Uncle Robert and he was afraid that I wouldn't be safe up here."

"M. Durand shouldn't be trying to speak," the doctor said, "even though he feels no pain, as a result of the morphine."

"We talked before you arrived." Medora had not yet touched her coffee. "There were things we needed to have a talk about."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 204

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND LITERATURE. WRITE THEM DIRECT, STATING YOUR SPECIFIC INTERESTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Junior Colleges

Stratford College Accredited Junior College and Preparatory. Develops aptitudes and abilities. Liberal Arts. Fine Arts, Vocational Courses. Healthful location in foothills Blue Ridge Mts. Campus of 15 acres—all sports. Social program. Write for "Intimate Glimpses" and catalog.
John C. Simpson, LL.D., Pres., Box L-6, Danville, Va.

Averett College
For girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Pre-professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 98th yr. Catalog.
Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Coeducational Schools

The Arnold School Trains boys and girls, 6–18, for self-reliant living. Work, study, play program. Stress on fundamentals. Thorough college preparation; also general, agricultural courses. Guidance. Family atmosphere. 165 acres. Operating farm. Sports, hobbies for all. 26th year. Write for catalog.
Nathan H. Arnold, E. Pembroke, Mass.

Cherry Lawn School
For academic distinction and personality development. Coed. Accredited. Grades 3–12. College preparatory. Small classes. Individual guidance. Study Aids. Dramatics, music, art. Riding, sports.
Christina Staal, Ph.D., Dir., Box 27, Darien, Conn.

Special School

The Training School at Vineland, N. J.
Summer session, July 1–Sept. 1. An adventure in happiness for retarded and slow-learning children. Internationally noted. Medical, psychiatric, psychological, speech programs. 1600 acres; swimming pools. Minimum enrollment—4 weeks.
Write: Registrar, Box L.

Fine & Applied Arts

Moore Institute of Art 113th year. Professional College for Career Women. Internationally known artist-instructors. State accredited 4-year B.F.A. or B.S. degree courses. Advertising Art, Art Ed., Fashion Design & Illustration, Interior & Textile Design. Painting & Illus. New residence hall. Catalog.
1384 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia 21, Pa.

Ray-Vogue Schools
Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Dress Design, Fashion Illustration. Interior Decoration, Commercial Art; Photography. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st Mon. monthly. Write Registrar. Room 6B. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Medical Technology

College of Medical Technology
Medical & X-ray Technicians in demand, excellent pay. Free placement service. Intensive 9–12 mo. courses for medical offices, labs. State year H.S. grad. Two leading colleges. Catalog L.
1900 LaSalle Avenue, Minneapolis 4, Minn.
1004 Truxillo, Houston, Texas

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for excellence of training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Write for Catalog L.
251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Business & Secretarial

katharine gibbs secretarial

BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.

Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Easiest to learn, write, transcribe. Lowest cost. Over 350,000 graduates. Typing available 34th Year. Write for FREE booklet to:
Speedwriting® Dept. 9906-7, 55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36, N. Y.

Girls' Schools

Kent Place

A SCHOOL FOR GIRLS · SUMMIT · NEW JERSEY

Since 1894 a school of distinctive purpose—to graduate alert, poised girls, well-trained in every respect for college life. Spacious dorm on extensive campus 20 miles from NYC—country and cosmopolitan living. Music, art, dramatics, sports, riding, all activities. Catalog.
Miss Florence A. Wolfe, B.A., M.A., Headmistress

Penn Hall Junior College
192 acres in Blue Ridge Mts. Terminal or transfer courses. Lib. Arts, Home Ec., Music, Art, Merchandising, Radio, Sec'l. Lab. Tech., Med. Sec'l. Also Prep School Division. Modern buildings. Pool, riding, golf on campus. Trips.
Dr. C. Gordon Frantz, Pres., Box W, Chambersburg, Pa.

Charles E. Ellis School Girls, grades 6–12, MSA accredited. College preparatory, art, music, home economics, secretarial. Small classes. Individual guidance. 300-acre campus, modern stone buildings, suburban Phila. Separate dorms for younger girls. Sports, riding. Gymnasium. Est. 1910. Catalog.
Arnold E. Look, Ph. D., Pres., Newtown Square 14, Pa.

Linden Hall
Junior College and School for Girls. Cultural and Vocational. Music, Home Economics, Secretarial Studies. Fine and Commercial Art. Dramatic Art. Preparatory and General Courses. All sports. Riding. Swimming Pool. Moderate tuition. Address:
Byron K. Horne, D.D., Box 76, Lititz, Pa.

Kemper Hall
Gives girls mental, spiritual, moral and physical training for gracious, successful living. College preparation; opportunities in Music, Dramatics and Fine Arts including Ceramics. Jr. School. 87th Yr. Under direction of Sisters of St. Mary (Episcopal).
Write Box J, Kenosha, Wis.

Radford School for Girls Accredited college preparation in ideal year 'round climate. Open air classes. Music, art, dramatics, secretaryship. Character and personality developed in friendly home life. Sports, riding. Endowed. Limited enrollment. Catalog.
Lucinda de L. Templin, Ph.D., Principal, 4701 Austin Terrace, El Paso, Texas

Retailing

Tobé-Coburn School for Fashion Careers
Prepare for a career in buying, advertising, fashion coordination, radio/TV. Field trips, cultural activities, store work with pay. One and Two Year Courses. Lifelong placement service. Begins September 4. Ask for catalog L.
851 Madison Avenue, New York 21, New York

Vocational

Hotels Call for Trained Women

Record-breaking travel means nationwide opportunities and a sound, substantial future for trained women in hotels, motels, clubs, apartment house positions. Fascinating field; quick advancement. You can qualify at home, in leisure time or through resident classes in Washington. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Placement Service FREE. Write for FREE book. Approved for ALL Veteran Training.
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL
Room CH-512, Washington 7, D. C. 41st Year

Home Study Schools

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H. S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. HA3, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 9, PENNA. DEPT. 39112E

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 51st year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 856 W. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

Boys' Schools

Cheshire Academy Junior School. Grades 5 to 8. Thorough grounding in subjects anticipating college preparatory study on same campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible program for each boy develops good habits of concentration. Separate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruction.
Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut

Bordentown Military Institute Fully accredited. College preparatory. Business, general courses. Aviation. Outstanding record of college entrance. ROTC. Boys taught how to study; small classes; individual attention. All sports. Junior School. 76th yr. Summer session. Write for catalog.
Registrar, Box 406, Bordentown, N. J.

Peddie A college preparatory school with a tradition of outstanding success preparing boys for college and for life. Grades 6–12. Endowed; fully accredited. Guidance; remedial reading; public speaking required. Separate Junior School. All sports, golf, tennis. Gym, swimming pool. 280 acres. Summer session. 92nd year. Catalog.
Dr. C. O. Morong, Headmaster, Box M, Hightstown, N. J.

Carson Long
Boys' Military School. Educates the whole boy—physically, mentally, morally. How to learn, how to labor, how to live. Prepares for college, life or business. 121st year of character building. Overall charges $1225.00.
Box 10, New Bloomfield, Pa.

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep, School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band. Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Blue Ridge School for Boys
Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Thorough college preparation. Small classes. Good study habits encouraged. Guidance. Christian environment. Healthful mountain climate. Sports. Crafts. Six weeks summer school. 44th yr. Catalog.
Mrs. J. R. Sandifer, Box 548-L, Hendersonville, N. C.

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1250. Catalog.
Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5–12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influences. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

Greenbrier Military School
145th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write
D. T. Moore, Box J-606, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Fishburne Military School
Grades 9–12. Distinguished College Preparatory School. Fully accredited since 1897. Small classes. Friendly, homelike atmosphere. ROTC. Sports; gym, indoor pool. Constructive recreational, social programs. Summer School. Catalog.
Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8–12. Small classes. 144-acre campus. 84th year. Catalog.
Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

Miami Military Academy
Disciplined training for successful manhood. Fully accredited. Grades 1–12. College preparatory, general. Tutoring method assures maximum progress. Sports, teams for all. Pool. 35 acres. Moderate all-inclusive fee. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 90th year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Gordon Military College
Accredited. Grades 8–12. Also two years college. ROTC trains for military or civilian leadership. Supervised study. Stimulating activities program. 350 acres. Golf, all sports, pool. $895 inclusive rate. Founded 1852. Catalog.
Col. C. L. Harris, President, Barnesville, Georgia

PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY
124th year. Successful College preparation. High Achievement records in College and Life. Non profit. Small classes. Personal interest in each boy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. Expert coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming pool, Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 6-12. Summer session. For illustrated catalog write:
Headmaster, Box 406, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

Carteret School
Superior College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. Small classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Shops. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop Orange Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. Request booklet F-16.
Carteret School, West Orange, N.J.

Perkiomen Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading colleges, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 7–12. Sports, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New York City, Philadelphia. 83rd year. Summer school. Write for catalog.
Stephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Penna.

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog.
Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Croydon Hall
For boys, Grades 1 through 12. Sound college preparation. Small classes. Strong remedial education program. Individual guidance and testing. Team sports. Riding, tennis, golf. Field trips. 45 acres. 40 miles from N.Y.C. Summer Session.
Dr. John J. Carr, Pres., Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

McDonogh One of the Nation's leading preparatory schools for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges and service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses. 2 gyms, indoor pool. Near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Judson School in Arizona
A ranch school for boys 6 to 18, in healthful, warm, dry climate. Small classes. Accredited to all colleges. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, music. 29th yr. For Catalog, write
H. J. Wick, D. M. Ashley, Dirs., Scottsdale, Arizona

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. Sports. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, Box 367, Delafield, Wisconsin

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. New dorms and pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1767 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 115th yr. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, 1667 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 79th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-6, Alton, Illinois

Roosevelt Military Academy
"Builders of Men." An outstanding educational institution. Fully accredited; Noted Guidance Department; small classes; personal supervision; free tutoring; all sports; band; riding. Moderate rate. Grades 5–12. Catalog:
Colonel Glen J. Millikan, Box J, Aledo, Ill.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

- Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study
- Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration
- Fully accredited ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 4 completely equipped gyms, pool. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, housemothers. 59th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write

Dr. J.C.Wicker, Box 866, Fork Union, Va.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

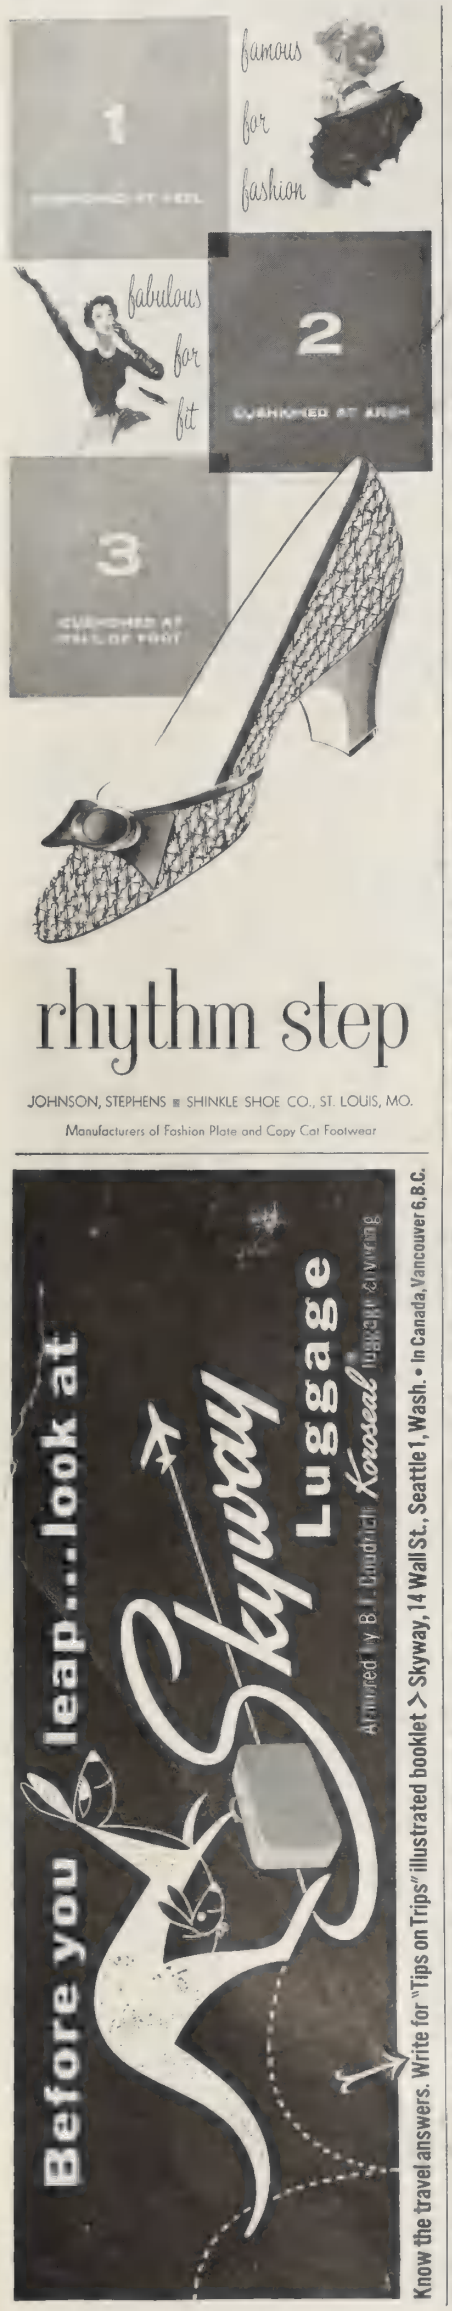
Junior Military Academy
Boys 4–14. Semi-military. Kindergarten–8th grade. Family life and affectionate care. Food from our own farm. 12 months' enrollment includes 8 weeks at Camp Whoppee. Enter any time. Moderate rate. 38th year. Catalog.
Maj. Roy DeBerry, Box L, Bloomington Springs, Tenn.

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1000. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 79th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY

Health and interest assured by Spring and Fall in Georgia mountains. Winter at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida—two complete school plants, each with all facilities. Outdoor sports year round.

Fully accredited preparation for all colleges. Also Post Graduate Dept. Constant association with selected teachers who live and eat with cadets. Weekly reports. ROTC program. Progress GUARANTEED. Reasonable All-inclusive fee. Outstanding record. Athletics for all. Separate Junior High, grades 7-8. For illustrated catalog, address:
GENERAL SANDY BEAVER, Pres., Box 506-J, Gainesville 5, Georgia



6 MONTHS IN BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS • 3 WINTER MONTHS NEAR MIAMI

BECAUSE a good many schools and colleges will be filled to capacity for the fall term it would be wise to start your investigations as soon as possible.

Bulletins describing the schools listed on this page will be sent to you on request. The heads of the schools will be glad to arrange appointments for you to visit their schools, meet members of the staff, and discuss the particular needs of your girl or boy. In writing to the schools mention the age and present grade of the prospective student.

Private camps and summer schools begin their seasons early in July. If you are interested in finding a camp for your boy or girl, refer to the listings in the School and Camp sections of the March and April issues of the Journal, or write for reprints of these pages.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 202

That "talk" had been exactly as he had envisaged it, Tom was sure. Durand had nobly granted her a complete absolution—binding her with that memory for the rest of her life, whether he lived or died. She had never, in the past, been able to see through her husband's clever plausibility because she had not been equipped with a healthy skepticism. Now it was too late.

The end of the day brought a sunset more lurid than any ever seen on this Atlantic coast. Tom walked to the door and opened it without knocking. Only Gabrielle was with Durand now, sitting in a low chair, and she got up with a movement of protest as he entered. The lamp from the parlor, the only one kept filled with the diminishing supply of oil, had been brought here and placed on a table near the foot of the bed.

"Monsieur must not be disturbed," Gabrielle said, but Tom went on past her.

It was Durand who spoke first. "The ubiquitous M. Carruthers."

"Please, monsieur!" Gabrielle said.

"Let him talk. M. Carruthers likes to talk." The words came in groups of two and three, divided by heavy gasps.

"Let Medora go."

"I don't know what you mean," Durand told him. "I've pardoned her everything. How—let her go?"

"Tell her the truth. Tell her you don't love her and that you married her because you needed her money."

"But I do love her."

Tom heard the stir of Gabrielle's skirts behind him. "You don't know anything about love. You only know egotism. You want to keep a hold on Medora even after you're dead."

"Well, a man likes some monument." It was shocking to hear amused cynicism in those fading accents. "Can't you see that you want to deprive Medora? In marriage there's always jealousy, misunderstanding and disappointment. A dead husband is never unsatisfactory."

"Tom!" The door slammed. "What are you doing in here?" Medora demanded. "I think you'd better go."

Medora's hands were squeezed tightly together, and he detected tears in her eyes. He must seem monstrous to her, Tom thought, coming in here to vent his frustration on a dying man. He started for the door, bumped blindly against the table, and grabbed at the lamp as it started to rock.

"Monsieur, wait," Gabrielle said. The command in her voice turned him around in surprise. It occurred to him then that she must have understood every word that had passed, for they had spoken in French, and she knew French, as well as the patois. "Madame—there is something you both must know."

Gabrielle was now at the head of the bed. The lamp glow heightened that strange golden cast of her skin.

"Tais-toi!" Durand said to her harshly.

She gave him a hesitating, almost fearful, look, and then she lifted her shoulders. "Madame, your husband has never loved you. We planned together to drive you back to your father, but in such a way that your money would remain in his—your husband's—hands."

The words were simply said, but they erupted in that room like a convulsion of the volcano. Durand swore with a startling force. Medora gasped and backed against the window. The persiennes rattled. "You're saying that you were his mistress—in my house! It can't be true."

"It's true, madame," Gabrielle said. "I tell you because of the kindness with which you took me in when I came here, although I'd given you good reason for turning me away."

God hath promised pardon to him that repenteth, but He has not promised repentance to him that sinneth.

ANSELM

Tom remembered the stir of Gabrielle's skirts as Durand had claimed that he loved his wife. This admission was probably not so uncomplicated.

"I grew impatient with his subtlety," the girl went on. "I bought a charm from a guimboiseur—I was that foolish. I put the powder in your milk and it made you ill. That frightened him. Do you remember asking me about the bruise on my face, the next morning?"

"Yes, I remember. She is telling the truth, isn't she, Paul?" She spoke with a touching patience.

"Certainly it's true." Durand sounded bored. He must know that nothing he said to the contrary could carry any weight. Medora was credulous, but not stupid.

"I don't pretend that he ever loved me," Gabrielle said, "but we understood each other. We were always alike. Please go now. Don't ask him any more questions." She threw her arm out, across the bed. It was a definitely protective gesture. Only she could punish him, it said—she had that right.

Medora didn't move. She stood braced against the window embrasure and the room filled with an audible breathing: her own, rapid and shallow; Durand's labored struggle for air; and the broken inhalations of Gabrielle. But it seemed to Tom that he didn't breathe at all.

"Madame"—Gabrielle raised her head—"can you forgive me?"

"Forgive you? Yes, I can. I do!"

"She's going to forgive everybody now," Durand said, "unworthy as they are. Then we'll be treated to her revelation that there must be a God, who forgives like that, without requiring a lot of self-abasement. I can see it all coming, but I'm tired. Allez. All of you." His head turned on the pillow and his white face came fully into the light. "Toi," he said to Gabrielle, "you may stay, if you wish."

The second-floor passageway was almost completely dark. "We ought to have brought a candle," Tom said. He couldn't make any but the most ordinary remark.

But Medora said in a tight, angry voice, "I won't have it that way. I'm stronger than he is. I've been deceived, I've been used, I've been lied to by my father and my husband. But still I've found the beginning of faith. You've treated me like a child, most of the time, yet I've lived through volcanic eruptions and such emotional impacts as few women ever face, and I'm on my feet."

It was just where he had wanted to see her and he started to tell her that, but she whispered, "Oh, Tom!" and put her hand on his arm. "Last night when you told me, voluntarily, that Paul was alive and that he would take me back, I loved you more than I ever had before. But I thought that Paul was between us. I thought he always would be, living or dead, until just now."

"This is the first time you've ever said that you love me."

"Haven't I told you in other ways, in spite of myself?"

"I could never be sure for long. Even now, I'm almost afraid to touch you," he said, and it was true. "I've wandered so much in the desert that it's hard to believe this isn't another mirage. I'd nearly resigned myself to loving you without touching you, without even seeing you again."

"Me too. This morning in the parlor I thought, 'He'll leave nothing tangible behind. If only he'd forget a handkerchief. I could keep it in a pocket and feel it between my fingers. I don't have a photograph of him—and how relentlessly memory fades!'"

"I know. I thought your laugh, as I first heard it, would probably be the last thing to go."

"Darling, this is like a farewell scene. How sad and silly we are!"

Her eyes were bright with tears and laughter. Out of all the faces in the world one face became the face of love. Those Hardin eyebrows had become a part of the topography of his heart. END themselves. (A fourth element might be counted in: the restful atmosphere of the school, with its simple old brick buildings, its orderly walks, its absence of noise and clutter and confusion.) This combination of elements produces the "climate of freedom" so stimulating to the growth of intellectual powers, the maturing of judgment, the acquiring of a sense of proportion. Many students, coming from conservative and well-to-do families, find themselves momentarily disconcerted by the new ideas they encounter—and explore—in the classroom. One girl says, "This school shook up my thinking! I grew up in a Republican family, everyone I knew was Republican, I never thought about it much. At Madeira I found myself asking questions. It's no good to take sides on any issue unless you know why you're for or against." Another says, "My English teacher told me I was glossing over unfinished thinking with decorative writing—relying too much on a facile style." Still another discovered—and slowly conquered—an unrecognized prejudice, through daily association with one of the foreign students. In seeming contradiction to the widespread idea that liberal-arts schools tend to shelter students from life, many of the Madeira girls are first awakened to the world's poverty, harshness and need for reform while comfortably seated in their well-appointed classrooms. This fact (possibly due to Miss Madeira's insistence that her students be taught the grave realities of life, and her refusal to sanction any kind of snobbery) is borne out by the large numbers of alumnae to be found in volunteer community work.

A CLIMATE OF FREEDOM

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 174

Nothing could please Miss Madeira more than the knowledge that her firm belief in the value of community work has infected her students.

"Democracy," she says, "depends on the little groups: the Granges, the town meetings, the small organizations spontaneously formed for the good of the larger groups. I am glad that Madeira girls are taking part in strengthening this democracy."

Although she has taught in private schools all her life, Miss Madeira still maintains that public schools are the foundation stones of American education. "But public schools, ideally, should be modeled after private schools. They should have more teachers, smaller classes, a more leisurely pace. That seems impossible now, I know. But as Emerson so notably puts it, 'We think our civilization near its meridian, but we are yet only at the cockcrowing and the morning star.' I have lived through the period of the coming of the telephone, the development of the telegraph, the horseless carriage, the radio; I saw a flight of Orville Wright's airplane. I have seen people begin to move into better ways of living, and I believe that civilization has only just begun.

"We don't know much yet about education," she says frankly, leaning across the narrow, book-cluttered desk. Behind her, the office windows command a fine view of green campus sloping down to meet the Potomac; there is a faint continuous sound of rushing water, blending with the laughter and voices of students on their way to class. "We are slowly beginning to learn. Sometimes I wonder if we are not in danger of going haywire about education, making a fad of it, sending our children to college because it is the 'thing to do.' One great change I have noticed over the years is the students' consuming desire for higher education. Today, everyone wants to go on to college. But that's all right." She settles back in her chair, a calm, white-haired woman smiling with the undimmed optimism of fifty well-spent years. "Whatever the reason for seeking education, the results are invariably good. Studying creates habits of discipline that last a lifetime, and education opens up the mind—and the heart." END

Printed in U.S.A.

Modess . . . because

Breck Hair Set Mist

A NEW, SLENDER CONTAINER FOR THE FRAGRANT SPRAY THAT HOLDS HAIR SOFTLY, BEAUTIFULLY IN PLACE

Breck Hair Set Mist, a fragrant spray, is now available in an attractive new, slender container. This graceful new package is easy to use and economical to purchase.

Breck Hair Set Mist is gentle as nature's mist, yet its delicate touch holds your hair softly in place for hours. After combing, a few brief sprays keep the hair beautifully in place. When it's time for freshening, a damp comb renews your waves without respraying.

Breck Hair Set Mist provides a quick and easy way to make lasting pin curls, too.

Fragrant as a bouquet, Breck Hair Set Mist contains lanolin, which leaves the hair soft to the touch and brings out the natural lustre and beauty of your hair.

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

Copyright 1957 by John H. Breck Inc

New 8 ounce size $1.65; 4½ ounce $1.25; 11 ounce $2.00. Plus tax. Available wherever cosmetics are sold.